Hotel Baggage will be left in New York and forwarded to Boston on Saturday, March 28.
Leave New York, Central R. R. of N. J., Ferry foot of Liberty St., Saturday, March 28, at 10 A. M.
Arrive Philadelphia, 12th and Market Streets, 12.20 P.M.
CONTINENTAL HOTEL.
1390th Concert (Matinee) at Academy of Music, at 2.30 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia, Broad St. station Penna. R. R., at 6.50 P.M.
Arrive Boston, Sunday, March 29, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night, (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, March 21, 1896.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

FIFTEENTH SEASON.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor,

WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

24 CONCERTS,

On Consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 19, 1895, to May 2, 1896, Omitting Nov. 16, Dec. 21, 1895, Jan. 25, Feb. 29 and March 28, 1896, and

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS,

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, from Oct. 18, 1895, to May 1, 1896, Omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 20, 1895, Jan. 24, Feb. 28 and March 27, 1896.

SOLOISTS: Mme. MELBA, Mrs. HENSCHEL, Miss BREMA, Mme. DE VERE, Miss BLAUVELT, Miss SZUMOWSKA, Messrs. BEN DAVIES, HENSCHEL, JOSEFFY, MacDOWELL, FAELTEN, ONDRICEK, KNEISEL, LOEFFLER, ADAMOWSKI, SCHROEDER, SCHULZ and Others.

TICKETS for the Series of Concerts and for the Series of Rehearsals, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Thursday, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets Will Be Delivered in the Hall, and Must Be Paid for as Soon as Bought or They Will Be Resold.

THE SUNDAY HERALD | BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 15, 1895

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

FIFTEENTH SEASON.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR,

WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

24 CONCERTS,

On Consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 19, 1895, to May 2, 1896, Omitting Nov. 16, Dec. 21, 1895, Jan. 25, Feb. 29 and March 28, 1896, and

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS,

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, from Oct. 18, 1895, to May 1, 1896, Omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 20, 1895, Jan. 24, Feb. 28 and March 27, 1896.

SOLOISTS: Mme. MELBA, Mrs. HENSCHEL, Miss BREMA, Mme. DE VERE, Miss BLAUVELT, Miss SZUMOWSKA, Messrs. BEN DAVIES, HENSCHEL, JOSEFFY, MacDOWELL, FAELTEN, ONDRICEK, KNEISEL, LOEFFLER, ADAMOWSKI, SCHROEDER, SCHULZ and Others.

TICKETS for the Series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Thursday, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets Will Be Delivered in the Hall, and Must Be Paid for as Soon as Bought or They Will Be Resold.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Fifteenth Season. 1895-96.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS,

On Consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct 19, 1895, to May 2, 1896, omitting Nov. 16, Dec. 21, 1895, Jan. 25, Feb. 29, and March 28, 1896, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On Consecutive Friday Afternoons, from Oct. 18, 1895, to May 1, 1896, omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 20, 1895, Jan. 24, Feb. 28, and March 27, 1896.

Soloists: MME. MELBA, MRS. HENSCHEL, MISS BREMA, MME. DE VERE, MISS BLAUVELT, MISS SZUMORSKA, MESSRS. BEN DAVIES, HENSCHEL, JOSEFFY, MacDOWELL, FAELTEN, ONDRICEK, KNEISEL, LOEFFLER, ADAMOWSKI, SCHROEDER, SCHULZ and others.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals $12 and $7.50 according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold by auction at Music Hall MONDAY, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold by auction at Music Hall TUESDAY, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.

The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold by auction at Music Hall on THURSDAY, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. 1t sep15

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Fifteenth Season. 1895-96.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On Consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 19, 1895, to May 2, 1896, omitting Nov. 16, Dec. 21, 1895, Jan. 25, Feb. 29, and March 28, 1896, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On Consecutive Friday Afternoons, from Oct. 18, 1895, to May 1, 1896, omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 20, 1895, Jan. 24, Feb. 28, and March 27, 1896.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold by auction at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 23, at 10 a. m.

The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold by auction at Music Hall, on TUESDAY, Sept. 24, at 10 a. m.

The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold by auction at Music Hall on THURSDAY, Sept. 26, at 10 a. m.

The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY, Sept. 27, at 10 a. m.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, SEPT. 16, 1895.

MUSIC HALL. | BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUL, Conductor.

15th Season, 1895-96.

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS

on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 18 (omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 20, Jan. 24, Feb. 28 and March 27).

24 CONCERTS

on Saturday Evenings, beginning Oct. 19 (omitting Nov. 16, Dec. 21, Jan. 25, Feb 29 and March 28).

Soloists: Mme. MELBA, Mrs. HENSCHEL, Miss MARIE BREMA, Mme. Clementine DE VERE-SAPIO, Miss LILLIAN BLAUVELT, Miss ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA, Messrs. BEN DAVIES, GEORG HENSCHELL, JOSEFFY, ONDRICEK, MacDOWELL, FAELTEN, KNEISEL, LOEFFLER, ADAMOWSKI, SCHROEDER, SCHULZ and others.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the Series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 23, at 10 A.M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 24, at 10 A.M.

The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 26, at 10 A.M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 27, at 10 A.M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold. w16-6t

---

MUSIC HALL. | BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

15th Season, 1895-96.

24 Public Rehearsals

on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 18 (omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 20, Jan. 24, Feb. 28 and March 27).

24 Concerts

on Saturday Evenings, beginning Oct. 19 (omitting Nov. 16, Dec. 21, Jan. 25, Feb. 29 and March 28).

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.

The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on Thursday, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON, September 23, 1895.

Auction Sale of $12 Season Tickets for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall this (Monday) Morning, beginning at Ten o'clock.

POSTAL CARD - ONE CENT.

United States of America.

THIS SIDE IS FOR THE ADDRESS ONLY.

THE BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE— SEPTEMBER 15, 1895—

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

FIFTEENTH SEASON.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor,

WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

24 CONCERTS,

On Consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 19, 1895, to May 2, 1896, Omitting Nov. 16, Dec. 21, 1895, Jan. 25, Feb. 29 and March 28, 1896, and

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS,

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, from Oct. 18, 1895, to May 1, 1896, Omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 20, 1895, Jan. 24, Feb. 28 and March 27, 1896.

SOLOISTS: Mme. MELBA, Mrs. HENSCHEL, Miss BREMA, Mme. DE VERE, Miss BLAUVELT, Miss SZUMOWSKA, Messrs. BEN DAVIES, HENSCHEL, JOSEFFY, MacDOWELL, FAELTEN, ONDRICEK, KNEISEL, LOEFFLER, ADAMOWSKI, SCHROED R, SCHULZ and Others.

TICKETS for the Series of Concerts and for the Series of Rehearsals, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Thursday, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets Will Be Delivered in the Hall, and Must Be Paid for as Soon as Bought or They Will Be Resold.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.
Fifteenth Season. 1895-96.
TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS,
On Consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct 19, 1895, to May 2, 1896, omitting Nov. 16, Dec. 21, 1895, Jan. 25, Feb. 29, and March 28, 1896, and
TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS
On Consecutive Friday Afternoons, from Oct. 18, 1895, to May 1, 1896, omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 20, 1895, Jan. 24, Feb. 28, and March 27, 1896.

Soloists: MME. MELBA, MRS. HENSCHEL, MISS BREMA, MME. DE VERE, MISS BLAUVELT, MISS SZUMORNSKA, MESSRS. BEN DAVIES, HENSCHEL, JOSEFFY, MACDOWELL, FAELTEN, ONDRICEK, KNEISEL, LOEFFLER, ADAMOWSKI, SCHROEDER, SCHULZ and others.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals $12 and $7.50 according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold by auction at Music Hall MONDAY, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold by auction at Music Hall TUESDAY, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.

The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold by auction at Music Hall on THURSDAY, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown, on a diagram and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. 1t sep15

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.
Fifteenth Season. 1895-96.
TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS
On Consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 19, 1895, to May 2, 1896, omitting Nov. 16, Dec. 21, 1895, Jan. 25, Feb. 29, and March 28, 1896, and
TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS
On Consecutive Friday Afternoons, from Oct. 18, 1895, to May 1, 1896, omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 20, Jan. 24, Feb. 28, and March 27, 1896.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold by auction at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 23, at 10 a. m.

The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold by auction at Music Hall, on TUESDAY, Sept. 24, at 10 a. m.

The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold by auction at Music Hall on THURSDAY, Sept. 26, at 10 a. m.

The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY, Sept. 27, at 10 a. m.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

THE SUNDAY HERALD BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 15, 1895 -

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

FIFTEENTH SEASON.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR,

WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

24 CONCERTS,

On Consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 19, 1895, to May 2, 1896, Omitting Nov. 16, Dec. 21, 1895, Jan. 25, Feb. 29 and March 28, 1896, and

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS,

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, from Oct. 18, 1895, to May 1, 1896, Omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 20, 1895, Jan. 24, Feb. 28 and March 27, 1896.

SOLOISTS: Mme. MELBA, Mrs. HENSCHEL, Miss BREMA, Mme. DE VERE, Miss BLAUVELT, Miss SZUMOWSKA, Messrs. BEN DAVIES, HENSCHEL, JOSEFFY, MacDOWELL, FAELTEN, ONDRICEK, KNEISEL, LOEFFLER, ADAMOWSKI, SCHROEDER, SCHULZ and Others.

TICKETS for the Series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Thursday, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets Will Be Delivered in the Hall, and Must Be Paid for as Soon as Bought or They Will Be Resold.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, SEPT. 16, 1895.

MUSIC HALL. | BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUL, Conductor.

15th Season, 1895-96.
24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS
on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 11 (omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 20, Jan. 24, Feb. 28 and March 27).
24 CONCERTS
on Saturday Evenings, beginning Oct. 19 (omitting Nov. 16, Dec. 21, Jan. 25, Feb 29 and March 28).

Soloists: Mme. MELBA, Mrs. HENSCHEL, Miss MARIE BREMA, Mme. Clementine DE VERE-SAPIO, Miss LILLIAN BLAUVELT, Miss ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA, Messrs. BEN DAVIES, GEORG HENSCHELL, JOSEFFY, ONDRICEK, MacDOWELL, FAELTEN, KNEISEL, LOEFFLER, ADAMOWSKI, SCHROEDER, SCHULZ and others.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the Series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 23, at 10 A.M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 24, at 10 A.M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 26, at 10 A.M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 27, at 10 A.M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.
Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold. s16-6t

---

MUSIC HALL. | BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

15th Season, 1895-96.
24 Public Rehearsals
on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 18 (omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 20, Jan. 24, Feb. 28 and March 27).
24 Concerts
on Saturday Evenings, beginning Oct. 19 (omitting Nov. 16, Dec. 21, Jan. 25, Feb. 29 and March 28).

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on Thursday, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 27, at 10 A.M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.
Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON, September 23, 1895.

Auction Sale of $12 Season Tickets for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall this (Monday) Morning, beginning at Ten o'clock.

POSTAL CARD - ONE CENT.

United States of America.

THIS SIDE IS FOR THE ADDRESS ONLY.

TRANSCRIPT.
SEPTEMBER 19, 1895

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

15th Season, 1895-96.

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS

on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 18 (omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 20, Jan. 24, Feb. 28 and March 27.)

24 CONCERTS

on Saturday Evenings, beginning Oct. 19 (omitting Nov. 16, Dec. 21, Jan. 25 Feb. 29, and March 28.)

Soloists: MME. MELBA, MRS. HENSCHEL, MISS MARIE BREMA, MME. CLEMENTINE DE VERE-SAPIO, MISS LILLIAN BLAUVELT, MISS ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA, MESS. BEN DAVIES, GEORG HENSCHEL, JOSEFFY, ONDRICEK, MACDOWELL, FAELTEN, KNEISEL, LOEFFLER, ADAMOWSKI, SCHROEDER, SCHULZ, and others.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.
The $12 seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.
Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

5t[A] s17

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FIFTEENTH SEASON. 1895-96.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall Tomorrow (Monday), Beginning at 10 o'Clock.

Auction	Sale	of	$7.50	Seats	for	Rehearsals,	Tuesday,	Sept.	24,	at 10 A. M.
Auction	Sale	of	12.00	Seats	for	Concerts,	Thursday,	Sept.	26,	at 10 A. M.
Auction	Sale	of	7.50	Seats	for	Concerts,	Friday,	Sept.	27,	at 10 A. M.

BOSTON JOURNAL—SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1895

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FIFTEENTH SEASON. 1895-96.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall Tomorrow (Monday), Beginning at 10 o'Clock.

Auction	Sale	of	$7.50	Seats	for	Rehearsals,	Tuesday,	Sept.	24,	at 10 A. M.
Auction	Sale	of	12.00	Seats	for	Concerts,	Thursday,	Sept.	26,	at 10 A. M.
Auction	Sale	of	7.50	Seats	for	Concerts,	Friday,	Sept.	27,	at 10 A. M.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

FIFTEENTH SEASON.

AUCTION SALE OF $12 SEATS FOR THE FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS AT MUSIC HALL THIS (MONDAY) MORNING, AT 10 O'CLOCK, CONTINUING THROUCH THE DAY.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals Tomorrow (TUESDAY). Auction Sale of $12 Seats for Concerts THURSDAY, Sept. 26. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts FRIDAY, Sept. 27.

1t sep23

SUNDAY GLOBE—
SEPTEMBER 22, 1895—THIRTY-SIX PAGES.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-1896.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall Tomorrow (Monday), Beginning at 10 O'Clock.

Auction	Sale	of	$7.50	Seats	for	Rehearsals,	Tuesday,	Sept.	24,	at 10 A. M.
Auction	Sale	of	12.00	Seats	for	Concerts,	Thursday,	Sept.	26,	at 10 A. M.
Auction	Sale	of	7.50	Seats	for	Concerts,	Friday,	Sept.	27,	at 10 A. M.

DAILY GLOBE—
SEPTEMBER 25,

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra

FIFTEENTH SEASON.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Saturday Evening Concerts at Music Hall, tomorrow (Thursday), beginning at 10 o'clock. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts Friday, Sept. 27.

TRAVELER, TUESDAY,
SEPTEMBER 24, 1895.

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra.

FIFTEENTH SEASON.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Saturday Evening Concerts at Music Hall, Thursday, Sept. 26, beginning at 10 o'clock. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts Friday, Sept. 27.

TRANSCRIPT. MONDA
SEPTEMBER 23, 189

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra

FIFTEENTH SEASON.

AUCTION SALE OF $7.50 SEATS FOR THE FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS AT MUSIC HALL TOMORROW (TUESDAY) MORNING AT 10 O'CLOCK.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for Concerts THURSDAY, Sept. 26. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts FRIDAY, Sept. 27.
[A] s23

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1895.

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra.

FIFTEENTH SEASON.

AUCTION SALE OF $7.50 SEATS FOR THE FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS AT MUSIC HALL THIS (TUESDAY) MORNING, AT 10 O'CLOCK.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for Concerts THURSDAY, Sept. 26. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts FRIDAY, Sept. 27.

1t sep24

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVIII., NO. 86.

MONDAY, SEPT. 23, 1895.

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra

FIFTEENTH SEASON.

AUCTION SALE OF $12 SEATS FOR THE FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS AT MUSIC HALL THIS (MONDAY) MORNING, AT 10 O'CLOCK, CONTINUING THROUCH THE DAY.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals Tomorrow (TUESDAY). Auction Sale of $12 Seats for Concerts THURSDAY, Sept. 26. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts FRIDAY, Sept. 27.

THE BEACON: BOSTON,
SEPTEMBER 21, 1895.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

15th Season, 1895-96.

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS

on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 18 (omitting Nov 15, Dec. 20, Jan. 24, Feb. 28 and March 27)

24 CONCERTS

on Saturday Evenings, beginning Oct. 19 (omitting Nov. 16, Dec. 21, Jan. 25, Feb. 29 and March 28)

Soloists: MME. MELBA, MRS. HENSCHEL, MISS MARIE BREMA, MME. CLEMENTINE DE VERE-SAPIO, MISS LILLIAN BLAUVELT, MISS ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA, MESS. BEN DAVIES, GEORG HENSCHEL, JOSEFFY, ONDRICEK, MACDOWELL, FAELTEN, KNEISEL, LOEFFLER, ADAMOWSKI, SCHROEDER, SCHULZ and others.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold
Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

BOSTON COURIER,
SUNDAY MORNING,
SEPTEMBER 22, 1895.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

15th Season, 1895-96.

24 Public Rehearsals

on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 18 (omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 20, Jan. 24, Feb. 28 and March 27).

24 Concerts

on Saturday Evenings, beginning Oct. 19 (omitting Nov. 16, Dec. 21, Jan. 25, Feb. 29 and March 28).

Soloists: MME. MELBA, MRS. HENSCHEL, MISS MARIE BREMA, MME. CLEMENTINE DE VERE-SAPIO, MISS LILLIAN BLAUVELT, MISS ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA, MESS. BEN DAVIES, GEORG HENSCHEL, JOSEFFY, ONDRICEK, MACDOWELL, FAELTEN, KNEISEL, LOEFFLER, ADAMOWSKI, SCHROEDER, SCHULTZ, and others.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on Thursday, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.
Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

TRANSCRIPT. TUES
SEPTEMBER 24, 189

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra

FIFTEENTH SEASON.

AUCTION SALE OF $12 SEATS FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS AT MUSIC HALL, THURSDAY, SEPT. 26. AUCTION SALE OF $7.50 SEATS FOR CONCERTS, FRIDAY, SEPT. 27.

[A] s24

---

[3]

ING TRANSCRIPT
SEPTEMBER 19. 1895

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

15th Season, 1895-96.

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS

on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 18 (omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 20, Jan. 24, Feb. 28 and March 27.)

24 CONCERTS

on Saturday Evenings, beginning Oct. 19 (omitting Nov. 16, Dec. 21, Jan. 25 Feb. 29, and March 28.)

Soloists: MME. MELBA, MRS. HENSCHEL, MISS MARIE BREMA, MME. CLEMENTINE, DE VERE-SAPIO, MISS LILLIAN BLAUVELT, MISS ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA, MESS. BEN DAVIES, GEORG HENSCHEL, JOSEFFY, ONDRICEK, MACDOWELL, FAELTEN, KNEISEL, LOEFFLER, ADAMOWSKI, SCHROEDER, SCHULZ, and others.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 24, at 10 A.M.
The $12 seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.
Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

5t[A] s17

ON JOURNAL—SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall Tomorrow (Monday), Beginning at 10 o'Clock.

Auction Sale of	$7.50	Seats for	Rehearsals,	Tuesday,	Sept.	24,	at	10	A. M.
Auction Sale of	12.00	Seats for	Concerts,	Thursday,	Sept.	26,	at	10	A. M.
Auction Sale of	7.50	Seats for	Concerts,	Friday,	Sept.	27,	at	10	A. M.

JOURNAL—MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 189

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra.

FIFTEENTH SEASON.

AUCTION SALE OF $12 SEATS FOR THE FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS AT MUSIC HALL THIS (MONDAY) MORNING, AT 10 O'CLOCK, CONTINUING THROUGH THE DAY.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals Tomorrow (TUESDAY). Auction Sale of $12 Seats for Concerts THURSDAY, Sept. 26. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts FRIDAY, Sept. 27.

1t sep22

SUNDAY GLOBE—
SEPTEMBER 22, 1895—THIRTY-SIX PAGES.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-1896.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall Tomorrow (Monday), Beginning at 10 O'Clock.

Auction Sale of	$7.50	Seats for	Rehearsals,	Tuesday,	Sept.	24,	at	10	A. M.
Auction Sale of	12.00	Seats for	Concerts,	Thursday,	Sept.	26,	at	10	A. M.
Auction Sale of	7.50	Seats for	Concerts,	Friday,	Sept.	27,	at	10	A. M.

DAILY GLOBE—
SEPTEMBER 25,

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra

FIFTEENTH SEASON.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Saturday Evening Concerts at Music Hall, tomorrow (Thursday), beginning at 10 o'clock. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts Friday, Sept. 27.

TRAVELER, TUESDAY,
SEPTEMBER 24, 1895.

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra.

FIFTEENTH SEASON.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Saturday Evening Concerts at Music Hall, Thursday, Sept. 26, beginning at 10 o'clock. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts Friday, Sept. 27.

TRANSCRIPT. MONDA
SEPTEMBER 23, 189

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra

FIFTEENTH SEASON.

AUCTION SALE OF $7.50 SEATS FOR THE FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS AT MUSIC HALL TOMORROW (TUESDAY) MORNING AT 10 O'CLOCK.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for Concerts THURSDAY, Sept. 26. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts FRIDAY, Sept. 27.

[A] s28

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1895.

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra.

FIFTEENTH SEASON.

AUCTION SALE OF $7.50 SEATS FOR THE FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS AT MUSIC HALL THIS (TUESDAY) MORNING, AT 10 O'CLOCK.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for Concerts THURSDAY, Sept. 26. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts FRIDAY, Sept. 27.

1t sep24

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVIII., NO. 86.

MONDAY, SEPT. 23, 1895.

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra

FIFTEENTH SEASON.

AUCTION SALE OF $12 SEATS FOR THE FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS AT MUSIC HALL THIS (MONDAY) MORNING, AT 10 O'CLOCK, CONTINUING THROUGH THE DAY.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals Tomorrow (TUESDAY). Auction Sale of $12 Seats for Concerts THURSDAY, Sept. 26. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts FRIDAY, Sept. 27.

THE BEACON : BOSTON,
, SEPTEMBER 21, 1895.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

15th Season, 1895-96.

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS

on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 18 (omitting Nov 15, Dec. 20, Jan. 24, Feb. 28 and March 27)

24 CONCERTS

on Saturday Evenings, beginning Oct. 19 (omitting Nov. 16, Dec. 21, Jan. 25, Feb. 29 and March 28)

Soloists: MME. MELBA, MRS. HENSCHEL, MISS MARIE BREMA, MME. CLEMENTINE DE VERE-SAPIO, MISS LILLIAN BLAUVELT, MISS ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA, MESS. BEN DAVIES, GEORG HENSCHEL, JOSEFFY, ONDRICEK, MACDOWELL, FAELTEN, KNEISEL, LOEFFLER, ADAMOWSKI, SCHROEDER, SCHULZ and others.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.
The $7 50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold
Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

BOSTON COURIER,
SUNDAY MORNING,
SEPTEMBER 22, 1895.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

15th Season, 1895-96.

24 Public Rehearsals

on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 18 (omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 20, Jan. 24, Feb. 28 and March 27).

24 Concerts

on Saturday Evenings, beginning Oct. 19 (omitting Nov. 16, Dec. 21, Jan. 25, Feb. 29 and March 28).

Soloists: MME. MELBA, MRS. HENSCHEL, MISS MARIE BREMA, MME. CLEMENTINE DE VERE-SAPIO, MISS LILLIAN BLAUVELT, MISS ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA, MESS. BEN DAVIES, GEORG HENSCHEL, JOSEFFY, ONDRICEK, MACDOWELL, FAELTEN, KNEISEL, LOEFFLER, ADAMOWSKI, SCHROEDER, SCHULTZ, and others.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on Thursday, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.
Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

TRANSCRIPT. TUES
SEPTEMBER 24, 189

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra

FIFTEENTH SEASON.

AUCTION SALE OF $12 SEATS FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS AT MUSIC HALL, THURSDAY, SEPT. 26. AUCTION SALE OF $7.50 SEATS FOR CONCERTS, FRIDAY, SEPT. 27.

[A] s24

[3]

SATURDAY, March 21 1896.

ING TRANSCRIPT.
SEPTEMBER 19, 1895

MUSIC HALL. BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

15th Season, 1895-96.

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS

on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 18 (omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 20, Jan. 24, Feb. 28 and March 27.)

24 CONCERTS

on Saturday Evenings, beginning Oct. 19 (omitting Nov. 16, Dec. 21, Jan. 25 Feb. 29, and March 28.)

Soloists: MME. MELBA, MRS. HENSCHEL, MISS MARIE BREMA, MME. CLEMENTINE, DE VERE-SAPIO, MISS LILLIAN BLAUVELT, MISS ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA, MESS. BEN DAVIES, GEORG HENSCHEL, JOSEFFY, ONDRICEK, MACDOWELL, FAELTEN, KNEISEL, LOEFFLER, ADAMOWSKI, SCHROEDER, SCHULZ, and others.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.
The $12 seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.
Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.
5t(A) s17

ON JOURNAL—SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1895

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall Tomorrow (Monday), Beginning at 10 o'Clock.

Auction Sale of	$7.50	Seats for	Rehearsals,	Tuesday,	Sept.	24,	at	10	A.	M.
Auction Sale of	12.00	Seats for	Concerts,	Thursday,	Sept.	26,	at	10	A.	M.
Auction Sale of	7.50	Seats for	Concerts,	Friday,	Sept.	27,	at	10	A.	M.

BOSTON
Symphony Orchestra.
FIFTEENTH SEASON.

AUCTION SALE OF $12 SEATS FOR THE FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS AT MUSIC HALL THIS (MONDAY) MORNING, AT 10 O'CLOCK, CONTINUING THROUGH THE DAY.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals Tomorrow (TUESDAY). Auction Sale of $12 Seats for Concerts THURSDAY, Sept. 26. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts FRIDAY, Sept. 27.
1t sep22

SUNDAY GLOBE—SEPTEMBER 22, 1895—THIRTY-SIX PAGES.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-1896.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall Tomorrow (Monday), Beginning at 10 O'Clock.

Auction Sale of	$7.50	Seats for	Rehearsals,	Tuesday,	Sept.	24,	at	10	A.	M.
Auction Sale of	12.00	Seats for	Concerts,	Thursday,	Sept.	26,	at	10	A.	M.
Auction Sale of	7.50	Seats for	Concerts,	Friday,	Sept.	27,	at	10	A.	M.

DAILY GLOBE—SEPTEMBER 25,

BOSTON
Symphony Orchestra
FIFTEENTH SEASON.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Saturday Evening Concerts at Music Hall, tomorrow (Thursday), beginning at 10 o'clock. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts Friday, Sept. 27.

TRAVELER, TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1895.

BOSTON
Symphony Orchestra.
FIFTEENTH SEASON.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Saturday Evening Concerts at Music Hall, Thursday, Sept. 26, beginning at 10 o'clock. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts Friday, Sept. 27.

TRANSCRIPT. MONDA
SEPTEMBER 23, 189

BOSTON
Symphony Orchestra
FIFTEENTH SEASON.

AUCTION SALE OF $7.50 SEATS FOR THE FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS AT MUSIC HALL TOMORROW (TUESDAY) MORNING AT 10 O'CLOCK.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for Concerts THURSDAY, Sept. 26. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts FRIDAY, Sept. 27.
[A] s26

Boston Journal.
TEN PAGES.
TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1895.

BOSTON
Symphony Orchestra.
FIFTEENTH SEASON.

AUCTION SALE OF $7.50 SEATS FOR THE FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS AT MUSIC HALL THIS (TUESDAY) MORNING, AT 10 O'CLOCK.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for Concerts THURSDAY, Sept. 26. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts FRIDAY, Sept. 27.
1t sep24

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVIII., NO. 86.

MONDAY, SEPT. 23, 1895.

BOSTON
Symphony Orchestra
FIFTEENTH SEASON.

AUCTION SALE OF $12 SEATS FOR THE FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS AT MUSIC HALL THIS (MONDAY) MORNING, AT 10 O'CLOCK, CONTINUING THROUGH THE DAY.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals Tomorrow (TUESDAY). Auction Sale of $12 Seats for Concerts THURSDAY, Sept. 26. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts FRIDAY, Sept. 27.

THE BEACON: BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 21, 1895.

MUSIC HALL. BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

15th Season, 1895-96.

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS

on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 18 (omitting Nov 15, Dec. 20, Jan. 24, Feb. 28 and March 27)

24 CONCERTS

on Saturday Evenings, beginning Oct. 19 (omitting Nov. 16, Dec. 21, Jan. 25, Feb. 29 and March 28)

Soloists: MME. MELBA, MRS. HENSCHEL, MISS MARIE BREMA, MME. CLEMENTINE DE VERE-SAPIO, MISS LILLIAN BLAUVELT, MISS ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA, MESS. BEN DAVIES, GEORG HENSCHEL, JOSEFFY, ONDRICEK, MACDOWELL, FAELTEN, KNEISEL, LOEFFLER, ADAMOWSKI, SCHROEDER, SCHULZ and others.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold
Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

BOSTON COURIER, SUNDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 22, 1895.

MUSIC HALL. BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

15th Season, 1895-96.

24 Public Rehearsals

on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 18 (omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 20, Jan. 24, Feb. 28 and March 27).

24 Concerts

on Saturday Evenings, beginning Oct. 19 (omitting Nov. 16, Dec. 21, Jan. 25, Feb. 29 and March 28).

Soloists: MME. MELBA, MRS. HENSCHEL, MISS MARIE BREMA, MME. CLEMENTINE DE VERE-SAPIO, MISS LILLIAN BLAUVELT, MISS ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA, MESS. BEN DAVIES, GEORG HENSCHEL, JOSEFFY, ONDRICEK, MACDOWELL, FAELTEN, KNEISEL, LOEFFLER, ADAMOWSKI, SCHROEDER, SCHULTZ, and others.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on Thursday, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.
Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

TRANSCRIPT. TUES
SEPTEMBER 24, 189

BOSTON
Symphony Orchestra
FIFTEENTH SEASON.

AUCTION SALE OF $12 SEATS FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS AT MUSIC HALL, THURSDAY, SEPT. 26. AUCTION SALE OF $7.50 SEATS FOR CONCERTS, FRIDAY, SEPT. 27.
s24

[3]

ING TRANSCRIPT
SEPTEMBER 19. 1895

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

15th Season, 1895-96.

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS

on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 18 (omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 20, Jan. 24, Feb. 28 and March 27.)

24 CONCERTS

on Saturday Evenings, beginning Oct. 19 (omitting Nov. 16, Dec. 21, Jan. 25 Feb. 29, and March 28.)

Soloists: MME. MELBA, MRS. HENSCHEL. MISS MARIE BREMA, MME. CLEMENTINE, DE VERE-SAPIO, MISS LILLIAN BLAUVELT, MISS ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA, MESS. BEN DAVIES, GEORG HENSCHEL, JOSEFFY, ONDRICEK, MACDOWELL, FAELTEN, KNEISEL, LOEFFLER, ADAMOWSKI, SCHROEDER, SCHULS, and others.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.
The $12 seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.
Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

5t[A] s17

ON JOURNAL—SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall Tomorrow (Monday), Beginning at 10 o'Clock.

Auction Sale of	$7.50	Seats for	Rehearsals,	Tuesday,	Sept.	24,	at	10	A. M.
Auction Sale of	12.00	Seats for	Concerts,	Thursday,	Sept.	26,	at	10	A. M.
Auction Sale of	7.50	Seats for	Concerts,	Friday,	Sept.	27,	at	10	A. M.

JOURNAL—MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 189

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra.

FIFTEENTH SEASON.

AUCTION SALE OF $12 SEATS FOR THE FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS AT MUSIC HALL THIS (MONDAY) MORNING, AT 10 O'CLOCK, CONTINUING THROUGH THE DAY.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals Tomorrow (TUESDAY). Auction Sale of $12 Seats for Concerts THURSDAY, Sept. 26. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts FRIDAY, Sept. 27.

1t sep22

SUNDAY GLOBE-
SEPTEMBER 22, 1895—THIRTY-SIX PAGES.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-1896.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall Tomorrow (Monday), Beginning at 10 O'Clock.

Auction Sale of	$7.50	Seats for	Rehearsals,	Tuesday,	Sept.	24,	at	10	A. M.
Auction Sale of	12.00	Seats for	Concerts,	Thursday,	Sept.	26,	at	10	A. M.
Auction Sale of	7.50	Seats for	Concerts,	Friday,	Sept.	27,	at	10	A. M.

DAILY GLOBE—
SEPTEMBER 25,

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra

FIFTEENTH SEASON.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Saturday Evening Concerts at Music Hall, tomorrow (Thursday), beginning at 10 o'clock. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts Friday, Sept. 27.

TRAVELER, TUESDAY,
SEPTEMBER 24, 1895.

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra.

FIFTEENTH SEASON.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Saturday Evening Concerts at Music Hall, Thursday, Sept. 26, beginning at 10 o'clock. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts Friday, Sept. 27.

TRANSCRIPT. MONDA
SEPTEMBER 23, 189

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra

FIFTEENTH SEASON.

AUCTION SALE OF $7.50 SEATS FOR THE FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS AT MUSIC HALL TOMORROW (TUESDAY) MORNING AT 10 O'CLOCK.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for Concerts THURSDAY, Sept. 26. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts FRIDAY, Sept. 27.

[A] s26

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1895.

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra.

FIFTEENTH SEASON.

AUCTION SALE OF $7.50 SEATS FOR THE FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS AT MUSIC HALL THIS (TUESDAY) MORNING, AT 10 O'CLOCK.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for Concerts THURSDAY, Sept. 26. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts FRIDAY, Sept. 27.

1t sep24

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVIII., NO. 86.

MONDAY, SEPT. 23, 1895.

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra

FIFTEENTH SEASON.

AUCTION SALE OF $12 SEATS FOR THE FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS AT MUSIC HALL THIS (MONDAY) MORNING, AT 10 O'CLOCK, CONTINUING THROUGH THE DAY.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals Tomorrow (TUESDAY). Auction Sale of $12 Seats for Concerts THURSDAY, Sept. 26. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts FRIDAY, Sept. 27.

THE BEACON: BOSTON,
, SEPTEMBER 21, 1895.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

15th Season, 1895-96.

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS

on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 18 (omitting Nov 15, Dec. 20, Jan. 24, Feb. 28 and March 27)

24 CONCERTS

on Saturday Evenings, beginning Oct. 19 (omitting Nov. 16, Dec. 21, Jan. 25, Feb. 29 and March 28)

Soloists: MME. MELBA, MRS. HENSCHEL, MISS MARIE BREMA, MME. CLEMENTINE DE VERE-SAPIO, MISS LILLIAN BLAUVELT, MISS ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA, MESS. BEN DAVIES, GEORG HENSCHEL, JOSEFFY, ONDRICEK, MACDOWELL, FAELTEN, KNEISEL, LOEFFLER, ADAMOWSKI, SCHROEDER, SCHULZ and others.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.
The $7 50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold
Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

BOSTON COURIER,
SUNDAY MORNING,
SEPTEMBER 22, 1895.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

15th Season, 1895-96.

24 Public Rehearsals

on Friday Afternoons, beginning Oct. 18 (omitting Nov. 15, Dec. 20, Jan. 24, Feb. 28 and March 27).

24 Concerts

on Saturday Evenings, beginning Oct. 19 (omitting Nov. 16, Dec. 21, Jan. 25, Feb. 29 and March 28).

Soloists: MME. MELBA, MRS. HENSCHEL, MISS MARIE BREMA, MME. CLEMENTINE DE VERE-SAPIO, MISS LILLIAN BLAUVELT, MISS ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA, MESS. BEN DAVIES, GEORG HENSCHEL, JOSEFFY, ONDRICEK, MACDOWELL, FAELTEN, KNEISEL, LOEFFLER, ADAMOWSKI, SCHROEDER, SCHULTZ, and others.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 23, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 24, at 10 A. M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on Thursday, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 27, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.
Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

TRANSCRIPT. TUES
SEPTEMBER 24, 189

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra

FIFTEENTH SEASON.

AUCTION SALE OF $12 SEATS FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS AT MUSIC HALL, THURSDAY, SEPT. 26. AUCTION SALE OF $7.50 SEATS FOR CONCERTS, FRIDAY, SEPT. 27.

[A] s24

[3]

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.

THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

TEN CONCERTS IN

SANDERS THEATRE, CAMBRIDGE.

Thursday Evening, October 31.

Thursday Evening, November 21.

Thursday Evening, December 12.

Thursday Evening, January 2.

Thursday Evening, January 16.

Thursday Evening, February 6.

Thursday Evening, February 20.

Thursday Evening, March 12.

Thursday Evening, April 9.

Thursday Evening, April 30.

AT A QUARTER TO EIGHT.

SOLO ARTISTS:

Mme. DEVERE-SAPIO. Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

Miss MARIE BREMA.

Miss ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA. Mr. BEN DAVIES.

And others to be announced.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of ten concerts, $7.50.

The sale of season tickets will open at the University Book Store, Saturday morning, October 26, at 8 o'clock.

A limited number of reserved seats have been reserved for college officers and invited guests.

CUT-OUT

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1895.

BOSTON

Symphony Orchestra.

FIFTEENTH SEASON.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Saturday Evening Concerts at Music Hall, this morning, beginning at 10 o'clock. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts tomorrow (Friday).

sep26

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

PUBLISHED BY THE

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL COMPANY,

Offices Westminster, Eddy and

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. Emil Paur, Conductor. Fifteenth Season, 1895-96.

6 GRAND CONCERTS

—IN—

Infantry Hall, WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, Oct. 23, Nov. 27, Jan. 8, Feb. 12, March 18 and April 22.

SOLO ARTISTS—

MME. DEVERE-SAPIO, MISS SZUMOWSKA,
MISS BLAUVELT, MR. BEN DAVIES
AND MR. RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

Season Tickets with reserved seats for the series of six concerts, $5. Programme books with descriptive notes on the works to be performed will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets. The sale of season tickets will open at the box office, Infantry Hall, MONDAY MORNING, October 14, at 9 o'clock. To secure a fair distribution of seats no more than ten tickets will be sold to one person.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Providence Journal

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.
FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.

6 GRAND CONCERTS
IN INFANTRY HALL,
Wednesday Evenings,
Oct. 23, Nov. 27, Jan. 8, Feb. 12, March 18 and April 22.
SOLO ARTISTS:
MME. DEVERE-SAPIO, MISS BLAUVELT, MISS SZUMOWSKA, MR. BEN DAVIES and MR. RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

Season tickets with reserved seats for the series of six concerts, $5. Programme books with descriptive notes on the works to be performed will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets. The sale of season tickets will open at the box office, Infantry Hall, MONDAY MORNING, October 14, at 9 o'clock. To secure a fair distribution of seats no more than ten tickets will be sold to one person. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

o7 J&B12t

[4]

LIST OF WORKS TO BE PERFORMED.

BEETHOVEN		Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"
BEETHOVEN		Symphony No. 4
SCHUMANN		Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major
DVORAK		Symphony in D minor
BRAHMS		Symphony No. 2, in D major
HAYDN		Symphony
GOETZ		Symphony in F, Op. 9
TSCHAIKOWSKY	(FIRST TIME.)	Symphony No. 6
MOZART		Symphony No. 9
BEETHOVEN		Overture, "Coriolanus"
HUMPERDINCK	(FIRST TIME.)	Overture, "Hansel and Gretel"
WEBER		Overture, "Freischuetz"
CORNELIUS		Overture, "Barber of Bagdad"
ROSSINI		Overture, "William Tell"
BERLIOZ	(FIRST TIME.)	Overture, "Corsair"
DVORAK	(FIRST TIME.)	Overture, "Nature"
DVORAK		Capriccio
GOLDMARK		Overture, "Sakuntala"
VOLKMANN		Fest Overture
REZNICECK	(FIRST TIME.)	Overture, "Donna Diana"
GODARD	(FIRST TIME.)	Suite
HAENDEL		Largo
MOZART		Turkish March
MOZART	(FIRST TIME.)	Variations
RICHARD STRAUSS	(FIRST TIME.)	Prelude and Entr'acte, "Guntram"
TSCHAIKOWSKY		Variations
TSCHAIKOWSKY		"Elegie and Valse"
WAGNER		"Ride of the Valkyries"
WEBER–BERLIOZ		"Invitation to Dance"
HAYDN		Variations
JOH. STRAUSS	(FIRST TIME.)	Musical Joke, "Moto Perpetuo"

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1895.

BOSTON

Symphony Orchestra.

FIFTEENTH SEASON.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Saturday Evening Concerts at Music Hall, this morning, beginning at 10 o'clock. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts tomorrow (Friday). sep26

Providence Journal

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.
FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.

6 GRAND CONCERTS
IN INFANTRY HALL,

Wednesday Evenings,
Oct. 23, Nov. 27, Jan. 8, Feb. 12, March 18 and April 22.

SOLO ARTISTS:
MME. DEVERE-SAPIO, MISS BLAUVELT, MISS SZUMOWSKA, MR. BEN DAVIES and MR. RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

Season tickets with reserved seats for the series of six concerts, $5. Programme books with descriptive notes on the works to be performed will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets. The sale of season tickets will open at the box office, Infantry Hall, MONDAY MORNING, October 14, at 9 o'clock. To secure a fair distribution of seats no more than ten tickets will be sold to one person.
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
oc7 J&B12t

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

PUBLISHED BY THE
PROVIDENCE JOURNAL COMPANY,
Offices Westminster, Eddy and

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. Emil Paur, Conductor. Fifteenth Season, 1895-96.

6 GRAND CONCERTS

—IN—

Infantry Hall, WEDNESDAY EVENINGS, Oct. 23, Nov. 27, Jan. 8, Feb. 12, March 18 and April 22.

SOLO ARTISTS—

MME. DEVERE-SAPIO, MISS SZUMOWSKA, MISS BLAUVELT, MR. BEN DAVIES AND MR. RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

Season Tickets with reserved seats for the series of six concerts, $5. Programme books with descriptive notes on the works to be performed will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets. The sale of season tickets will open at the box office, Infantry Hall, MONDAY MORNING, October 14, at 9 o'clock. To secure a fair distribution of seats no more than ten tickets will be sold to one person.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.

FOURTEENTH SEASON IN PROVIDENCE.

THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

SIX CONCERTS IN
INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, October 23.

Wednesday Evening, November 27.

Wednesday Evening, January 8.

Wednesday Evening, February 12.

Wednesday Evening, March 18.

Wednesday Evening, April 22.

AT EIGHT O'CLOCK, PRECISELY.

SOLO ARTISTS:

Mme. DEVERE-SAPIO. Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

Miss LILLIAN BLAUVELT.

Miss ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA. Mr. BEN DAVIES.

And others to be announced.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of six concerts, $5.00. Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

The sale of season tickets will open at the box office, Infantry Hall, Monday morning, October 14, at 9 o'clock. To secure a fair distribution of seats, no more than ten tickets will be sold to one person.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.

TENTH SEASON IN PHILADELPHIA.

THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

90 PERFORMERS

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

FIVE CONCERTS IN ACADEMY OF MUSIC, PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, November 11.

Monday Evening, December 16.

Monday Evening, January 20.

Monday Evening, February 24.

Monday Evening, March 23.

AT EIGHT O'CLOCK.

SOLO ARTISTS:

Mme. MELBA. Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY. Mr. BEN DAVIES.

And others to be announced.

Forty-six new Private Boxes, twenty on the parquet floor and twenty-six in the first balcony, have been placed in the Academy of Music during the past summer. Proscenium boxes seating eight, and the new boxes seating six and four, will be sold at $75, $63, and $42, respectively, for the series of five concerts.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7, $5, and $3.50, according to location.

The sale of tickets will open Monday morning, November 4, at Fischer's Music Store, 1221 Chestnut Street.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

INCOMPLETE

CUT-OUT

Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER, 'Cello,
And Others.

DATES OF CONCERTS:

I. Tuesday Even'g, Nov. 12.
II. Friday Even'g, Dec. 20.
III. Friday Even'g, Jan. 24.
IV. Friday Even'g, Feb. 28.
V. Friday Even'g, Mch. 27.

SOLOISTS AT THE FIRST CONCERT, TUESDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 12,
Mme. MELBA, Soprano,
Mme. SCALCHI, Contralto,
M. D'AUGIGNE, Tenor,
M. CAMPANARI, Basso.

COURSE TICKETS TO THE PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

The Sale of Course tickets begins on TUESDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 15, at 8 o'clock, at the Art Galleries, 174 Montague street, next door to the Academy of Music, and will continue on and after October 16, from 9 A. M. to 6 P. M. and from 7:30 to 10 evenings, at 174 Montague st. Tickets may also be purchased at the office of the Institute, 502 Fulton st, on and after October 16, from 9 A. M. to 6 P. M. and from 7:30 to 10 evenings, and at 300 Fulton st (Chandler's) from 9 A. M. to 6 P. M.

The RESERVED SEAT TICKETS for the Course are $7.00, $5.00 and $4.00, according to location, as in former years.

SINGLE TICKETS TO THE PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

The sale of Tickets for Single Concerts will be as follows: To the first concert (November 12), on and after SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 2; to the remaining concerts after the concert next preceding at the same places and hours as the Course Tickets.

RESERVED SEATS to Single Concerts are $1.50 and $1.00, according to location.

Not more than Six Course Tickets can be purchased by one person in the line at the opening sale.

[5]

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.

FOURTEENTH SEASON IN PROVIDENCE.

THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

SIX CONCERTS IN
INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, October 23.

Wednesday Evening, November 27.

Wednesday Evening, January 8.

Wednesday Evening, February 12.

Wednesday Evening, March 18.

Wednesday Evening, April 22.

AT EIGHT O'CLOCK, PRECISELY.

SOLO ARTISTS:

Mme. DEVERE-SAPIO. Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

Miss LILLIAN BLAUVELT.

Miss ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA. Mr. BEN DAVIES.

And others to be announced.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of six concerts, $5.00. Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

The sale of season tickets will open at the box office, Infantry Hall, Monday morning, October 14, at 9 o'clock. To secure a fair distribution of seats, no more than ten tickets will be sold to one person.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.

TENTH SEASON IN PHILADELPHIA.

THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

90 PERFORMERS

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

FIVE CONCERTS IN ACADEMY OF MUSIC, PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, November 11.

Monday Evening, December 16.

Monday Evening, January 20.

Monday Evening, February 24.

Monday Evening, March 23.

AT EIGHT O'CLOCK.

SOLO ARTISTS:

Mme. MELBA. Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY. Mr. BEN DAVIES.

And others to be announced.

Forty-six new Private Boxes, twenty on the parquet floor and twenty-six in the first balcony, have been placed in the Academy of Music during the past summer. Proscenium boxes seating eight, and the new boxes seating six and four, will be sold at $75, $63, and $42, respectively, for the series of five concerts.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7, $5, and $3.50, according to location.

The sale of tickets will open Monday morning, November 4, at Fischer's Music Store, 1221 Chestnut Street.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

INCOMPLETE

Mr. TIMOTHEE ADAMOWSKI,
Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER, 'Cello,
And Others.

DATES OF CONCERTS:

I. Tuesday Even'g, Nov. 12.
II. Friday Even'g, Dec. 20.
III. Friday Even'g, Jan. 24.
IV. Friday Even'g, Feb. 28.
V. Friday Even'g, Mch. 27.

SOLOISTS AT THE FIRST CONCERT, TUESDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 12,
Mme. MELBA, Soprano,
Mme. SCALCHI, Contralto,
M. D'AUGIGNE, Tenor,
M. CAMPANARI, Basso.

COURSE TICKETS TO THE PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

The Sale of Course tickets begins on TUESDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 15, at 8 o'clock, at the Art Galleries, 174 Montague street, next door to the Academy of Music, and will continue on and after October 16, from 9 A. M. to 6 P. M. and from 7:30 to 10 evenings, at 174 Montague st. Tickets may also be purchased at the office of the Institute, 502 Fulton st, on and after October 16, from 9 A. M. to 6 P. M. and from 7:30 to 10 evenings, and at 300 Fulton st (Chandler's) from 9 A. M. to 6 P. M.

The RESERVED SEAT TICKETS for the Course are $7.00, $5.00 and $4.00, according to location, as in former years.

SINGLE TICKETS TO THE PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

The sale of Tickets for Single Concerts will be as follows: To the first concert (November 12), on and after SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 2; to the remaining concerts after the concert next preceding at the same places and hours as the Course Tickets.

RESERVED SEATS to Single Concerts are $1.50 and $1.00, according to location.

Not more than Six Course Tickets can be purchased by one person in the line at the opening sale.

CUT-OUT

[5]

LIST OF WORKS TO BE PERFORMED.

BEETHOVEN	Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"
SCHUMANN	Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major
MENDELSSOHN	Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch"
BRAHMS	Symphony No. 2, in D major
TSCHAIKOWSKY	Symphony No. 6 (FIRST TIME.)
WAGNER	Overture, "Flying Dutchman"
WAGNER	A Faust Overture
VOLKMANN	Fest Overture
REZNICECK	Overture, "Donna Diana" (FIRST TIME.)
DELIBES	Suite, "Sylvia"
GODARD	Suite (FIRST TIME.)
HAENDEL	Largo
MOZART	Turkish March
DVORAK	Capriccio
RICHARD STRAUSS	Prelude and Entr'acte, "Guntram" (FIRST TIME.)

LIST OF WORKS TO BE PERFORMED.

BEETHOVEN	Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"
SCHUMANN	Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major
BRAHMS	Symphony No. 2, in D major
TSCHAIKOWSKY	Symphony No. 6 (FIRST TIME.)
BEETHOVEN	Overture, "Dedication of the House"
HUMPERDINCK	Overture, "Hansel and Gretel (FIRST TIME.)
CORNELIUS	Overture, "Barber of Bagdad"
BERLIOZ	Overture, "Corsair" (FIRST TIME.)
BERLIOZ	"Menuet des Follets," and "Valse des Sylphes," from "La Damnation de Faust"
REZNICECK	Overture, "Donna Diana" (FIRST TIME.)
GODARD	Suite (FIRST TIME.)
HAENDEL	Largo
MOZART	Variations
DVORAK	Capriccio
RICHARD STRAUSS	Prelude and Entr'acte, "Guntram" (FIRST TIME.)
WAGNER	Kaisermarsch
WAGNER	"Ride of the Valkyries"

Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER, 'Cello,
And Others.

DATES OF CONCERTS:

I. Tuesday Even'g, Nov. 12.
II. Friday Even'g, Dec. 20.
III. Friday Even'g, Jan. 24.
IV. Friday Even'g, Feb. 28.
V. Friday Even'g, Mch. 27.

SOLOISTS AT THE FIRST CONCERT, TUESDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 12,
Mme. MELBA, Soprano,
Mme. SCALCHI, Contralto,
M. D'AUGIGNE, Tenor,
M. CAMPANARI, Basso.

COURSE TICKETS TO THE PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

The Sale of Course tickets begins on TUESDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 15, at 8 o'clock, at the Art Galleries, 174 Montague street, next door to the Academy of Music, and will continue on and after October 16, from 9 A. M. to 6 P. M. and from 7:30 to 10 evenings, at 174 Montague st. Tickets may also be purchased at the office of the Institute, 502 Fulton st, on and after October 16, from 9 A. M. to 6 P. M. and from 7:30 to 10 evenings, and at 300 Fulton st (Chandler's) from 9 A. M. to 6 P. M.

The RESERVED SEAT TICKETS for the Course are $7.00, $5.00 and $4.00, according to location, as in former years.

SINGLE TICKETS TO THE PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

The sale of Tickets for Single Concerts will be as follows: To the first concert (November 12), on and after SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 2; to the remaining concerts after the concert next preceding at the same places and hours as the Course Tickets.

RESERVED SEATS to Single Concerts are $1.50 and $1.00, according to location.

Not more than Six Course Tickets can be purchased by one person in the line at the opening sale.

CUT-OUT

[5]

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.

THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

TO PERFORMERS

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

FIVE CONCERTS IN METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, WASHINGTON.

Thursday Evening, November 14.

Tuesday Evening, December 17.

Tuesday Evening, January 21.

Tuesday Evening, February 25.

Tuesday Evening, March 24.

AT EIGHT O'CLOCK.

SOLO ARTISTS:

Mr. G. CAMPANARI. Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

Mr. BEN DAVIES.

And others to be announced.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7 and $5, according to location.

The sale of tickets will open Tuesday morning, November 5, at 9 o'clock, at Metzerott's Music Store, 1110 F Street.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.

ELEVENTH SEASON IN NEW YORK.

THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

87 PERFORMERS

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

FIVE CONCERTS IN THE METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE.

Friday Evening, November 15.

Thursday Evening, December 19.

Thursday Evening, January 23.

Thursday Evening, February 27.

Thursday Evening, March 26.

AT EIGHT O'CLOCK.

SOLO ARTISTS:

Mme. MELBA. Mr. E. A. MACDOWELL.

Mr. BEN DAVIES. Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI.

And others to be announced.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

Subscription tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7.50, $6, $5, and $3, and boxes, $50, $40, and $30, according to location, will be on sale at Schuberth's, 23 Union Square, and at the Box Office, Metropolitan Opera House, on and after Monday, October 28.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.

TWELFTH SEASON IN BALTIMORE.

THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

87 PERFORMERS

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

FIVE CONCERTS IN MUSIC HALL,

Wednesday Evening, November 13.

Wednesday Evening, December 18.

Wednesday Evening, January 22.

Wednesday Evening, February 26.

Wednesday Evening, March 25.

AT EIGHT O'CLOCK.

SOLO ARTISTS:

Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY. Mr. BEN DAVIES.

Mr. G. CAMPANARI.

And others to be announced.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7 and $5, according to location. Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

The sale of season tickets will open at Albert's Ticket Office, 13 North Charles Street, Tuesday morning, November 5, at 9 o'clock. To secure a fair distribution of seats, no more than ten tickets will be sold to one person.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.

THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

70 PERFORMERS

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

FIVE CONCERTS IN METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, WASHINGTON.

Thursday Evening, November 14.

Tuesday Evening, December 17.

Tuesday Evening, January 21.

Tuesday Evening, February 25.

Tuesday Evening, March 24.

AT EIGHT O'CLOCK.

SOLO ARTISTS:

Mr. G. CAMPANARI. Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

Mr. BEN DAVIES.

And others to be announced.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7 and $5, according to location.

The sale of tickets will open Tuesday morning, November 5, at 9 o'clock, at Metzerott's Music Store, 1110 F Street.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.

SPECIAL NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Subscribers of last season may secure their subscription tickets for the five concerts at the Metropolitan Opera House in advance of the public sale, by applying at Schuberth's, 23 Union Square, from Monday, Oct. 21, to Saturday, Oct. 26, inclusive.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.

TWELFTH SEASON IN BALTIMORE.

THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

87 PERFORMERS

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

FIVE CONCERTS IN MUSIC HALL,

Wednesday Evening, November 13.

Wednesday Evening, December 18.

Wednesday Evening, January 22.

Wednesday Evening, February 26.

Wednesday Evening, March 25.

AT EIGHT O'CLOCK.

SOLO ARTISTS:

Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY. Mr. BEN DAVIES.

Mr. G. CAMPANARI.

And others to be announced.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7 and $5, according to location. Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

The sale of season tickets will open at Albert's Ticket Office, 13 North Charles Street, Tuesday morning, November 5, at 9 o'clock. To secure a fair distribution of seats, no more than ten tickets will be sold to one person.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.

THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

70 PERFORMERS

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

FIVE CONCERTS IN METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, WASHINGTON.

Thursday Evening, November 14.

Tuesday Evening, December 17.

Tuesday Evening, January 21.

Tuesday Evening, February 25.

Tuesday Evening, March 24.

AT EIGHT O'CLOCK.

SOLO ARTISTS:

Mr. G. CAMPANARI. Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

Mr. BEN DAVIES.

And others to be announced.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7 and $5, according to location.

The sale of tickets will open Tuesday morning, November 5, at 9 o'clock, at Metzerott's Music Store, 1110 F Street.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

LIST OF WORKS TO BE PERFORMED.

BEETHOVEN	. . .	Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"
BEETHOVEN	. . . .	Symphony No. 4
SCHUMANN	. .	Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major
SCHUBERT	. . . . .	Unfinished Symphony
TSCHAIKOWSKY	. . . .	Symphony No. 6 (FIRST TIME.)
BEETHOVEN	. .	Overture, "Dedication of the House"
HUMPERDINCK	. .	Overture, "Hansel and Gretel" (FIRST TIME.)
CORNELIUS	. . .	Overture, "Barber of Bagdad"
BERLIOZ	. . . .	Overture, "Corsair" (FIRST TIME.)
BERLIOZ	.	"Menuet des Follets" and "Valse des Sylphes," from "La Damnation de Faust"
REZNICECK	. . .	Overture, "Donna Diana" (FIRST TIME.)
TSCHAIKOWSKY	. . . . .	Variations
RICHARD STRAUSS	.	Prelude and Entr'acte, "Guntram" (FIRST TIME.)
ZÖLLNER	. . .	"Midnight of Sedan" (FIRST TIME.)
WAGNER	. . . . .	Kaisermarsch

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.

TWELFTH SEASON IN BALTIMORE.

THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

87 PERFORMERS

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

FIVE CONCERTS IN MUSIC HALL,

Wednesday Evening, November 13.

Wednesday Evening, December 18.

Wednesday Evening, January 22.

Wednesday Evening, February 26.

Wednesday Evening, March 25.

AT EIGHT O'CLOCK.

SOLO ARTISTS:

Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY. Mr. BEN DAVIES.

Mr. G. CAMPANARI.

And others to be announced.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7 and $5, according to location. Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

The sale of season tickets will open at Albert's Ticket Office, 13 North Charles Street, Tuesday morning, November 5, at 9 o'clock. To secure a fair distribution of seats, no more than ten tickets will be sold to one person.

LIST OF WORKS TO BE PERFORMED.

BEETHOVEN	. . . .	Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"
SCHUBERT	. . . .	Symphony in C major
HAYDN	. . . .	Symphony
BRAHMS	. . . .	Symphony No. 2, in D major
TSCHAIKOWSKY	. . . . (FIRST TIME.)	Symphony No. 6
BEETHOVEN	. .	Overture, "Dedication of the House"
HUMPERDINCK	. . . (FIRST TIME.)	Entr'acte, "Hansel and Gretel"
AUBER	. . . . (FIRST TIME.)	Overture, "Carlo Broschi"
BERLIOZ	. "Menuet des Follets," and "Valse des Sylphes," from "La Damnation de Faust"
REZNICECK	. . . (FIRST TIME.)	Overture, "Donna Diana"
DELIBES	. . . . .	Suite, "Sylvia"
HAENDEL	. . . . .	Largo
MOZART	. . . . .	Variations
MOZART	. . . . .	Turkish March
DVORAK	. . . . .	Capriccio
RICHARD STRAUSS	. (FIRST TIME.)	Prelude and Entr'acte, "Guntram"
WAGNER	. . . . .	Kaisermarsch
WAGNER	. . . . .	"Ride of the Valkyries"
JOH. STRAUSS	. . . . .	Musical Joke, "Perpetuo Moto"
HAYDN	. . . . .	Variations
LISZT	. . . . .	Rhapsody No. 2

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.

TWELFTH SEASON IN BALTIMORE.

THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

87 PERFORMERS

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

FIVE CONCERTS IN MUSIC HALL,

Wednesday Evening, November 13.

Wednesday Evening, December 18.

Wednesday Evening, January 22.

Wednesday Evening, February 26.

Wednesday Evening, March 25.

AT EIGHT O'CLOCK.

SOLO ARTISTS:

Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY. Mr. BEN DAVIES.

Mr. G. CAMPANARI.

And others to be announced.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7 and $5, according to location. Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

The sale of season tickets will open at Albert's Ticket Office, 13 North Charles Street, Tuesday morning, November 5, at 9 o'clock. To secure a fair distribution of seats, no more than ten tickets will be sold to one person.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.

ELEVENTH SEASON IN NEW YORK.

THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

87 PERFORMERS

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

FIVE CONCERTS IN THE METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE.

Friday Evening, November 15.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.

THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

70 PERFORMERS

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

FIVE CONCERTS IN METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, WASHINGTON.

Thursday Evening, November 14.

Tuesday Evening, December 17.

Tuesday Evening, January 21

uary 25.

OSEFFY.

$7 and $5,

t 9 o'clock,

ied, will be

, Manager.

LIST OF WORKS TO BE PERFORMED.

BEETHOVEN	. . . .	Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"
SCHUMANN	. . .	Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major
MENDELSSOHN	. .	Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch"
HAYDN	. . . . .	Symphony
TSCHAIKOWSKY	. . . . .	Symphony No. 6 (FIRST TIME.)
WAGNER	. . . . .	Overture, "Rienzi"
WAGNER	. . . . .	"Ride of the Valkyries"
AUBER	. . . . .	Overture, "Carlo Broschi"
SCHUBERT	. . . .	Overture, "Rosamunde"
REZNICECK	. . . .	Overture, "Donna Diana" (FIRST TIME.)
BERLIOZ	.	"Menuet des Follets" and "Valse des Sylphes," from "La Damnation de Faust"
BERLIOZ	. . . . .	"Carneval" Overture
WEBER	. . . . .	Overture, "Oberon"
DELIBES	. . . . .	Suite, "Sylvia"
BEETHOVEN		"Claerchen's Death" and "Turkish March," from "Ruins of Athens"
GODARD	. . . . .	Suite (FIRST TIME.)
HAENDEL	. . . . .	Largo
MOZART	. . . . .	Turkish March
DVORAK	. . . . .	Capriccio
TSCHAIKOWSKY	. . . . .	Variations
TSCHAIKOWSKY	. . . . .	Elegie and Valse
LISZT	. . . . .	Rhapsody

...EVENING, NOV. 1, 1895.

THE SALE OF SINGLE TICKETS FOR THE FIRST CONCERT BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC, OPENS SATURDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 2, at the Brooklyn Institute, 502 Fulton St., and at Chandler's, 300 Fulton St.

ASSISTING ARTISTS:

MME. MELBA,
MME. SCALCHI,
MR. D'AUBIGNE,
MR. CAMPANARI.

BROOKLYN DAILY EAGLE-FRIDAY.

NOVEMBER 1, 189...

THE SALE OF SINGLE TICKETS FOR THE FIRST CONCERT BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC, OPENS SATURDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 2, at the Brooklyn Institute, 502 Fulton St, and at Chandlers', 300 Fulton St.

ASSISTING ARTISTS:

MME. MELBA,
MME. SCALCHI,
MR. D'AUBIGNE,
MR. CAMPANARI.

Special Announcement.

Appreciating most sincerely the hearty and successful co-operation of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences

AND THE

Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn

in the series of concerts now drawing to a close, the management of the

Boston Symphony Orchestra,

Mr. Emil Paur, Conductor, takes great pleasure in announcing a similar series of Five Concerts at the Academy of Music for the season of 1896–97, under the same auspices. Further details will be announced in due season.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET --

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin
LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola
ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello

11th Season, 1895-96

EIGHT CONCERTS

In Association Hall, Boylston and Berkeley Sts.,

ON MONDAY EVENINGS, AT EIGHT O'CLOCK.

Oct. 28, Nov. 25, Dec. 39, Jan. 12, Feb. 17, March 9, April 6, and April 27.

ASSISTING ARTISTS: Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Gesselschap, Messrs. Baerman, MacDowell, Perabo, Arthur Foote, and Pourtau.

The following is a partial list of the works to be performed:

BEETHOVEN,	Quartets: Op. 18, 59, 29, 130; and Quintet, F minor, op. 95.
MOZART,	Quintet with Clarinet; Quartet for Piano and Strings in G minor.
HAYDN,	Quartets in G major and D major.
SCHUBERT,	Quintet in C major.
RUBINSTEIN,	Quartet in C minor.
BRAHMS,	Sextet in B-flat, op. 18; Quartets in B-flat, op. 67, and G major, op. 111; Quartet for Piano and Strings in F minor.
DVOŘAK,	Quartet in E major, op. 80; Quintet in E-flat major, op. 97.

NOVELTIES.

(First time in Boston.)

CÆSAR FRANK,	Quartet in D major.
EMILE BERNARD,	Suite, op. 34.
BRAHMS,	Clarinet Sonatas (Piano and Clarinet).
HÆNDEL,	Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra.
BACH,	Concerto Grosso for String Orchertra (MS.)
C. M. LOEFFLER,	Octet.
DVOŘAK,	Trio for Piano, Violin and Violoncello, "Dumki."

Subscription Tickets, with reserved seats for the series, $8.00, on sale at the Box Office, Music Hall, Monday October 21, at 9 A. M.

J. SAUERQUELL, Sec'y.

THE STANDARD UNION.

FRIDAY EVENING, NOV. 1, 1895.

THE SALE OF SINGLE TICKETS FOR THE FIRST CONCERT BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC, OPENS SATURDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 2, at the Brooklyn Institute, 502 Fulton St., and at Chandler's, 300 Fulton St.

ASSISTING ARTISTS:

MME. MELBA,
MME. SCALCHI,
MR. D'AUBIGNE,
MR. CAMPANARI.

BROOKLYN DAILY EAGLE—FRIDAY.

NOVEMBER 1, 1895

THE SALE OF SINGLE TICKETS FOR THE FIRST CONCERT BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC, OPENS SATURDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 2, at the Brooklyn Institute, 502 Fulton St, and at Chandlers', 300 Fulton St.

ASSISTING ARTISTS:

MME. MELBA,
MME. SCALCHI,
MR. D'AUBIGNE,
MR. CAMPANARI.

Special Announcement.

Appreciating most sincerely the hearty and successful co-operation of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences

AND THE

Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn

in the series of concerts now drawing to a close, the management of the

Boston Symphony Orchestra,

Mr. Emil Paur, Conductor, takes great pleasure in announcing a similar series of Five Concerts at the Academy of Music for the season of 1896–97, under the same auspices. Further details will be announced in due season.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET --

FRANZ KNEISEL, 1st Violin
OTTO ROTH, 2d Violin
LOUIS SVECENSKI, Viola
ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncello

11th Season, 1895-96

EIGHT CONCERTS

In Association Hall, Boylston and Berkeley Sts.,

ON MONDAY EVENINGS, AT EIGHT O'CLOCK.

Oct. 28, Nov. 25, Dec. 39, Jan. 12, Feb. 17, March 9, April 6, and April 27.

ASSISTING ARTISTS: Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Gesselschap, Messrs. Baerman, MacDowell, Perabo, Arthur Foote, and Pourtau.

The following is a partial list of the works to be performed:

BEETHOVEN,	Quartets: Op. 18, 59, 29, 130; and Quintet, F minor, op. 95.
MOZART,	Quintet with Clarinet; Quartet for Piano and Strings in G minor.
HAYDN,	Quartets in G major and D major.
SCHUBERT,	Quintet in C major.
RUBINSTEIN,	Quartet in C minor.
BRAHMS,	Sextet in B-flat, op. 18; Quartets in B-flat, op. 67, and G major, op. 111; Quartet for Piano and Strings in F minor.
DVOŘAK,	Quartet in E major, op. 80; Quintet in E-flat major, op. 97.

NOVELTIES.

(First time in Boston.)

CÆSAR FRANK,	Quartet in D major.
EMILE BERNARD,	Suite, op. 34.
BRAHMS,	Clarinet Sonatas (Piano and Clarinet).
HÆNDEL,	Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra.
BACH,	Concerto Grosso for String Orchertra (MS.)
C. M. LOEFFLER,	Octet.
DVOŘAK,	Trio for Piano, Violin and Violoncello, "Dumki."

Subscription Tickets, with reserved seats for the series, $8.00, on sale at the Box Office, Music Hall, Monday October 21, at 9 A. M.

J. SAUERQUELL, Sec'y.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. Emil Paur, Conductor

Comments of the New York Press on the concert given in the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, on Thursday evening, March twenty-sixth, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-six

Fifteenth Season, 1895–96

Beginning October 15, 1895, 1306th Performance

Ending May 2, 1896, 1404th Performance

The Sun.

Full almost to the point of surfeit as has been the present musical season in New York, it was yet with feelings of genuine regret that all true lovers of orchestral music last night bade farewell for a season to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston orchestra is ever the same, from conductor unto conductor, and, under whatever conditions of leadership, still remains the standard by which all other like musical bodies must be measured in this country. By years of association these Boston men have attained not only a precision and unanimity of purpose not surpassed in the world perhaps, but there shines through all this work the light of individual enthusiasm and pure devotion to high ideals, so that they compel, invariably, admiration and respect.

The Herald.

It was simply the perfection of orchestral playing that one heard last evening. Such tonal beauty — Klangschönheit, as the Germans have it — has not been listened to in a long while. The strings sounded simply intoxicating, and the brass and wood-winds were hardly less fine.

À bientôt, ye Boston Symphonists! You will not be readily forgotten; for last night you played like mastersingers, all of you.

The Tribune.

Last night's concert was far and away the most brilliant orchestral affair that New York has enjoyed this season. Small wonder that the audience was kept in a state of gladsome excitement from beginning to end, that there were recalls for Mr. Paur after every number. The enthusiasm broke out with the first number, and was continued in each brief intermission, rolling now high, now lower, like the huge waves of the sea. The orchestra played superbly. Mr. Paur conducted finely.

The Recorder.

The orchestra is still the finest body of its kind on this side of the water; and last evening it fully justified its reputation. The various selections were rendered in a manner entirely beyond cavil.

The Press.

The performance was a fit ending to an extremely successful season; and we promise a hearty welcome next fall to this fine band of players, and trust that they will fiddle and blow harmoniously for many years to come.

The Times.

The entire performance of the orchestral part of this comprehensive programme was as near perfection as it is reasonable to expect human work to be.

Such a concert as that of last night must give a thrill of genuine enjoyment to the most blasé concert-goer, and leave to the commentator nothing but a fruitless search after adjectives that will not sound rhapsodic.

The Mail and Express.

The final Boston Symphony concert at the Metropolitan Opera House last night was one of the best concerts New Yorkers have had the privilege of hearing this season. Mr. Paur was on his mettle. He led with enthusiasm and energy last night, and his men responded with an esprit de corps that could not have been more unanimous.

In quality and tone, in unanimity and precision, and in delicacy of effect and fineness of shading the Boston orchestra easily leads here.

The Staats-Zeitung.

There seems to be nothing left for us New Yorkers to do but to imitate the Bostonians. It is impossible to imagine a higher standard; and, if the Boston Symphony could be heard to-day in Paris, Vienna, or Berlin, there is hardly a doubt but what the critics there would surpass anything that has been said in praise of the orchestra in this country. To make it short, let the reader think of every conceivable superlative of praise, and use them in connection with last night's concert of the Boston Symphony, and he will have done all that we could do.

The Independent.

The Boston Symphony gave an extraordinary concert of Wagner numbers on Thursday evening. Nothing could surpass the sonorous, thrilling vitality of such playing,— the precision, the articulation, so to say, the emotional coloring of the work. It was the last concert by the Bostonians for this season, its fifteenth season at home, its tenth in New York, its forty-seventh concert with us, and its one thousand three hundred and eighty-eighth concert since organizing! Think of what such a record means in such a case! The hearer came from the hall convinced that it is — under any conductor, and by its own superb making-up, its own aggregate of superior musicians — the "greatest" orchestra in virtuosity that the musical world knows.

COLORED PAPER

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
SEASON 1895-96. 492
CONCERTS.
No.
Premium,
Name,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
SEASON 1895-96.
CONCERTS.
No.
Premium,
Name,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
SEASON 1895-96. 700
REHEARSALS.
No.
Premium,
Name,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
SEASON 1895-96. 418
REHEARSALS.
No.
Premium,
Name,

1

BOSTON MUSIC HALL 740
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MR. EMIL PAUR
Conductor
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
Friday Afternoon, October 18, at 2.30 o'clock
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis Manager

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE.
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.
FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.
WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 23, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 12,
WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 27, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 18,
WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 8, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 22.
EVENINGS AT 8 O'CLOCK.
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
1 2 3 4 5 6
FLOOR
CC 38

COLORED PAPER

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1895-96.

CONCERTS.

No.

Premium,

Name,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1895-96. 1000

CONCERTS.

No.

Premium,

Name,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1895-96. 700

REHEARSALS.

No.

Premium,

Name,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1895-96. 418

REHEARSALS.

No.

Premium,

Name,

1

BOSTON MUSIC HALL 740

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. EMIL PAUR
Conductor

PUBLIC REHEARSAL
Friday Afternoon, October 18, at 2.30 o'clock

ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis Manager

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 23, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 12,
WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 27, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 18,
WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 8, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 22.

EVENINGS AT 8 O'CLOCK.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

1	2	3	4	5	6

FLOOR

CC 38

REDUCTION

RATIO

15x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION[SM] RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCVIII., NO. 77.
SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON.

Programmes of Some of the Earlier Concerts.

Noted Artists Whose Engagement Is Announced—Fifteenth Year of the Famous Orchestral Organization—Dates for the Sales of Tickets—Performances in Other Cities.

The annual announcement of the Boston Symphony orchestra is awaited with eager curiosity each autumn by thousands of music lovers, who find enjoyment in the faultless performances of this great organization. No topic possesses more interest in musical circles at present than the arrangements for the approaching season. For the 15th consecutive year will be given a series of high class concerts, which can be equalled in no other city. It is impossible at this early date to give all details of a series of performances lasting from October to May. The experience of 14 years has shown that the confidence of the public in this enterprise has never been misplaced, and that whatever is undertaken is carried out in the most perfect manner possible. Enough is known to justify the statement that the season of 1895-96 will be one of the most brilliant in the career of the orchestra.

The orchestral forces will number 87 players, including all the principal artists, whose efforts have added so much to the prestige of the concerts in recent years. This constitutes the largest permanent orchestra maintained exclusively for concert purposes in the world. Twenty-four concerts will be given at Music Hall on Saturday evenings, and 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons. The dates of the first performances will be Oct. 18 and 19.

MME. MELBA.

While the primary object and the chief attraction of the concerts is the performance of great orchestral works, the solo artists constitute an important feature in the minds of many. During the approaching season the orchestra will have the co-operation of the greatest vocal and instrumental artists that are available, including several who hold a very high place in the esteem of the public and who have not been heard here for several years. Among those engaged are: Mme. Melba, Miss Marie Brema, Mrs. Georg Henschel, Mme. Clementine De Vere, Miss Lillian Blau-

MISS SZUMOWSKA.

velt, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, Messrs. Ben Davies, Georg Henschel, Joseffy, E. A. MacDowell, Carl Faelten, Ondricek, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder and Schulz. Others will be added to this list later.

Conductor Paur has been in Europe during the summer, and it is expected that he will bring a portfolio of novelties when he returns late in September.

The programmes of some of the earlier concerts are as follows:

I. Concert, Saturday, Oct. 19.

Symphony No. 1 ..... Brahms
Andante and variations ..... Mozart
Cappriccio ..... Dvorak
Overture, "Leonore" No. 3 ..... Beethoven

II. Concert, Saturday, Oct. 26.

Overture, "Flying Dutchman" ..... Wagner
Aria.

Miss De Vere.

GEORG HENSCHEL.

Suite ..... MacDowell
Aria.

Miss De Vere.

Symphony No. 5 ..... Beethoven

III. Concert, Saturday, Nov. 2.

Symphony, "Harold in Italy" ..... Berlioz
(Viola obligato, Mr. Kneisel.)
Aria.

Miss Blauvelt.

Variations ..... Tschaikowsky
Aria.

Miss Blauvelt.

Overture, "Sakuntala" ..... Goldmark

IV. Concert, Saturday, Nov. 9.

Overture, "Oberon" ..... Weber
Aria.
Scotch symphony ..... Mendelssohn
Aria.
Huldigungsmarsch ..... Wagner

V. Concert, Saturday, Nov. 23.

Symphony No. 8 ..... Beethoven
Aria (Miss Brema).
Overture, "In der Natur" ..... Dvorak
(First time.)
Prelude, "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Aria (Miss Brema).
Hungarian rhapsody ..... Liszt
Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini" .....
(First time.) ..... Tschaikowsky
Symphony ..... Goetz

Season tickets will be sold by auction, as has been the custom for several years past. There will be two prices for each series, $12 and $7.50, according to location of seats. The $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold at Music Hall on Monday, Sept. 23. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday, Sept. 24. The $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday, Sept. 26, and the $7.50 concert seats will be sold on Friday, Sept. 27. The sales will begin each day at 10 A. M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

EMIL PAUR.

The payment of premiums conveys

MARIE BREMA.

to many the idea of high cost, but it should be borne in mind that $12 and $7.50 for 24 high-class performances are only nominal prices, and that the seating capacity of the hour at these rates would yield but a small proportion of the outlay for the concerts.

The orchestra's season outside of Boston will include a series of concerts in the Metropolitan Opera House, New York; Academy of Music, Philadelphia; Music Hall, Baltimore; Metzerott Hall, Washington; Academy of Music, Brooklyn; Infantry Hall, Providence; Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, and occasional performances in several other cities.

JOSEFFY.

ANDREW LANG AND EVE.

(From Harper's Weekly.)

Andrew Lang brags that he has never read "The Heavenly Twins," and that only one man of his acquaintance has read it. He asserts that he has never been able to learn what it was all about. The men that he knew couldn't tell him, and the ladies wouldn't. Most people read novels for one of two reasons—if the novels are known to be good they read them for pleasure, and if they are known to be improper they read them out of curiosity. Mr. Lang seems to be superior to curiosity of that sort. He is a fortunate and well regulated man. He wants to know only what he has reason to believe is worth knowing.

MRS. HENSCHEL.

Would that our mother Eve had more of his self-contained moderation!

DON'T.

(From Harper's Round Table.)

"I'm tired of 'don'ts'," said Margaret H,
"Just as tired of 'don'ts' as I can be,
For it's 'don't' do this, and 'don't' do that,
'Don't' worry the dog, 'don't' scare the cat,
'Don't' be untidy, and 'don't' be vain,
'Don't' interrupt, 'don't' do it again,
'Don't' bite your nails, 'don't' gobble your food,
'Don't' speak so loud, it's dreadfully rude,
'Don't' mumble your words, 'don't' say I won't,
Oh! all day long it's nothing but 'don't'!
Some time or other I hope—don't you?
Some one or other will say, 'Please do'!"

SUNDAY GLOBE—SEPTEMBER 15, 1895

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Announcement of the Next Symphony Season.

"Martha" at the Castle Sq Theater—"The Trigane" and "Madeleine."

Coming Concert Events and Gossip About Singers and Players.

The Boston symphony orchestra will begin its 15th season, Oct 18. For years the weekly public rehearsals and concerts of this organization have been in high favor with all classes of music lovers, and the arrangements, now nearly completed, for 1895-96, insure a continuance of their great popularity. The orchestra, made up of the same players as last year, will number 87 men, constituting the largest permanent orchestra maintained exclusively for concert purposes in the world. Composed of picked men of the profession, it has reached a degree of proficiency only to be acquired through years of training, and at its hands the great orchestral works receive interpretations that cannot be surpassed.

Twenty-four concerts will be given on Saturday evenings and 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons at Music hall. It is impossible to give in advance all details of a series of performances lasting from October to May. The programs will include a wide variety of standard works of old and modern composers and many attractive novelties. All worthy schools of music will be represented and all tastes will be considered.

While the solo numbers are a secondary consideration in this scheme, they form a very important feature, in the opinion of a considerable portion of the public. The services of the greatest artists available, both vocal and instrumental, have been secured, and their cooperation will add greatly to the brilliancy of the concerts. Engagements have been made with Mme Melba, Miss Brema, Mrs Henschel, Miss De Vere, Miss Szumowska, Mr Ben Davies, Messrs George Henschel, Emil Fischer, Joseffy, Ondricek, MacDowell, Faelten, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder and Schulz. Others will be added to the list later.

Season tickets will be sold by auction, as has been the custom for several years past. There will be two prices for each series, $12 and $7.50, according to location of seats. The $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold Monday, Sept 23, the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals Tuesday, Sept 24; the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts Thursday, Sept 26, and the $7.50 concert seats Friday, Sept 27. All the sales will be held in Music hall and will begin each day at 10 a m. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

In addition to the Boston concerts the orchestra will give a series in the Metropolitan opera house, New York, the academy of music, Philadelphia, Music hall, Baltimore, Metzerott hall, Washington, the academy of music, Brooklyn, Infantry hall, Providence, Sanders theater, Cambridge, and single concerts in several other cities.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, SEPT. 15, 1895.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Announcement of the Next Symphony Season.

"Martha" at the Castle Sq Theater—"The Trigane" and "Madeleine."

Coming Concert Events and Gossip About Singers and Players.

The Boston symphony orchestra will begin its 15th season, Oct 18. For years the weekly public rehearsals and concerts of this organization have been in high favor with all classes of music lovers, and the arrangements, now nearly completed, for 1895-96, insure a continuance of their great popularity. The orchestra, made up of the same players as last year, will number 87 men, constituting the largest permanent orchestra maintained exclusively for concert purposes in the world. Composed of picked men of the profession, it has reached a degree of proficiency only to be acquired through years of training, and at its hands the great orchestral works receive interpretations that cannot be surpassed.

Twenty-four concerts will be given on Saturday evenings and 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons at Music hall. It is impossible to give in advance all details of a series of performances lasting from October to May. The programs will include a wide variety of standard works of old and modern composers and many attractive novelties. All worthy schools of music will be represented and all tastes will be considered.

While the solo numbers are a secondary consideration in this scheme, they form a very important feature, in the opinion of a considerable portion of the public. The services of the greatest artists available, both vocal and instrumental, have been secured, and their cooperation will add greatly to the brilliancy of the concerts. Engagements have been made with Mme Melba, Miss Brema, Mrs Henschel, Miss De Vere, Miss Szumowska, Mr Ben Davies, Messrs George Henschel, Emil Fischer, Joseffy, Ondricek, MacDowell, Faelten, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder and Schulz. Others will be added to the list later.

Season tickets will be sold by auction, as has been the custom for several years past. There will be two prices for each series, $12 and $7.50, according to location of seats. The $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold Monday, Sept 23, the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals Tuesday, Sept 24, the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts Thursday, Sept 26, and the $7.50 concert seats Friday, Sept 27. All the sales will be held in Music hall and will begin each day at 10 a. m. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

In addition to the Boston concerts the orchestra will give a series in the Metropolitan opera house, New York, the academy of music, Philadelphia, Music hall, Baltimore, Metzerott hall, Washington, the academy of music, Brooklyn, Infantry hall, Providence, Sanders theater, Cambridge, and single concerts in several other cities.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1895.

The Symphony Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, during 1895-96, will give forty-eight performances in Music Hall—twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons and twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings. The dates of the first performances will be Oct. 18 and 19. All details of so extended a series cannot be given now, but the arrangements for the season promise the usual attractive concerts. The orchestra will number eighty-seven players, and, with one or two exceptions, will be made up of the same players as last year. The list of solo artists engaged includes Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Marie Brema, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, Mme. Clementine De Vere-Sapio, Miss Lillian Blauvelt, Messrs. Ben Davies, Georg Henschel, Joseffy, Ondricek, MacDowell, Faelten, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder, Schulz and others. The programmes of some of the earlier concerts are as follows:

I. Concert, Saturday, Oct. 19.

Symphony No. 1 ..... Brahms
Andante and variations ..... Mozart
Cappriccio ..... Dvorak
Overture "Leonore No. 3." ..... Beethoven

II. Concert, Saturday, Oct. 26.

Overture "Flying Dutchman" ..... Wagner
Aria (Mme. De Vere-Sapio).
Suite ..... MacDowell
Aria (Mme. De Vere-Sapio) ..... Beethoven
Symphony No. 5.

III. Concert, Saturday, Nov. 2.

Symphony "Harold in Italy" ..... Berlioz
(Solo Viola, Mr. Kneisel.)
Aria (Miss Blauvelt) .....
Variations ..... Tschaikowsky
Aria (Miss Blauvelt).
Overture "Sakuntala" ..... Goldmark

IV. Concert, Saturday, Nov. 9

Overture, "Oberon" ..... Weber
Aria.
Scotch Symphony ..... Mendelssohn
Aria.
Huldigungsmarsch ..... Wagner

V. Concert, Saturday, Nov. 23.

Symphony No. 8 ..... Beethoven
Aria (Miss Brema).
Overture, "In der Natur" ..... Dvorak
(First time.)
Prelude, "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Aria (Miss Brema).
Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt

The auction sales of season tickets will be held at Music Hall next week, full particulars being given in our advertising columns.

THE BOSTON TIMES
BOSTON, SUNDAY, SEPT. 15, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fifteenth season of the Boston Symphony orchestra will begin on Friday afternoon, Oct. 18, and will consist of twenty-four rehearsals and twenty-four concerts at Music hall. The seats will be sold at auction at Music hall, as follows: The $12.00 seats for rehearsals, on Monday Sept. 23, at 10 a. m; the $7.50 seats for rehearsals, on Tuesday, Sept. 24, at 10 a. m.; the $12.00 seats for concerts, on Thursday, Sept. 26, at 10 a. m; the $7.50 seats for concerts, on Friday, Sept. 27, at 10 a. m.

Bids will be accepted in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be immediately re sold.

The conductor, Mr. Paur, has devoted him self during the summer to the preparation of the programmes, and the examination and selection of numerous new and interesting works by famous composers.

The performance of the orchestra will be supplemented by those of a brilliant array of solo artists, both vocal and instrumental. Among them are, Mme. Melba, Mrs. George Henschel, and Joseffy, the famous pianist, and the season in this particular promises to be of the very highest merit and interest.

The orchestra will also give a series of concerts in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Brookiyn, Providence and Cambridge, and occasional concerts in other cities.

REDUCTION RATIO 12x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&D

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCVIII., NO. 77.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON.

Programmes of Some of the Earlier Concerts.

Noted Artists Whose Engagement Is Announced—Fifteenth Year of the Famous Orchestral Organization—Dates for the Sales of Tickets—Performances in Other Cities.

The annual announcement of the Boston Symphony orchestra is awaited with eager curiosity each autumn by thousands of music lovers, who find enjoyment in the faultless performances of this great organization. No topic possesses more interest in musical circles at present than the arrangements for the approaching season. For the 15th consecutive year will be given a series of high class concerts, which can be equalled in no other city. It is impossible at this early date to give all details of a series of performances lasting from October to May. The experience of 14 years has shown that the confidence of the public in this enterprise has never been misplaced, and that whatever is undertaken is carried out in the most perfect manner possible. Enough is known to justify the statement that the season of 1895-96 will be one of the most brilliant in the career of the orchestra.

The orchestral forces will number 87 players, including all the principal artists, whose efforts have added so much to the prestige of the concerts in recent years. This constitutes the largest permanent orchestra maintained exclusively for concert purposes in the world. Twenty-four concerts will be given at Music Hall on Saturday evenings, and 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons. The dates of the first performances will be Oct. 18 and 19.

MME. MELBA.

While the primary object and the chief attraction of the concerts is the performance of great orchestral works, the solo artists constitute an important feature in the minds of many. During the approaching season the orchestra will have the co-operation of the greatest vocal and instrumental artists that are available, including several who hold a very high place in the esteem of the public and who have not been heard here for several years. Among those engaged are: Mme. Melba, Miss Marie Brema, Mrs. Georg Henschel, Mme. Clementine De Vere, Miss Lillian Blau-

MISS SZUMOWSKA.

velt, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, Messrs. Ben Davies, Georg Henschel, Joseffy, E. A. MacDowell, Carl Faelten, Ondricek, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder and Schulz. Others will be added to this list later.

Conductor Paur has been in Europe during the summer, and it is expected that he will bring a portfolio of novelties when he returns late in September.

The programmes of some of the earlier concerts are as follows:

I. Concert, Saturday, Oct. 19.

Symphony No. 1.....Brahms
Andante and variations.....Mozart
Cappriccio.....Dvorak
Overture, "Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven

II. Concert, Saturday, Oct. 26.

Overture, "Flying Dutchman".....Wagner
Aria.

Miss De Vere.

Fantasie, "Francesca da Rimini".....Tschaikowsky
(First time.)
Symphony.....Goetz

Season tickets will be sold by auction, as has been the custom for several years past. There will be two prices for each series, $12 and $7.50, according to location of seats. The $12 seats for

EMIL PAUR.

the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold at Music Hall on Monday, Sept. 23. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday, Sept. 24. The $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday, Sept. 26, and the $7.50 concert seats will be sold on Friday, Sept. 27. The sales will begin each day at 10 A. M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

The payment of premiums conveys

MARIE BREMA.

to many the idea of high cost, but it should be borne in mind that $12 and $7.50 for 24 high-class performances are only nominal prices, and that the seating capacity of the hou- at these rates would yield but a sma.. proportion of the outlay for the concerts.

The orchestra's season outside of Boston will include a series of concerts in the Metropolitan Opera House, New York; Academy of Music, Philadelphia; Music Hall, Baltimore; Metzerott Hall, Washington; Academy of Music, Brooklyn; Infantry Hall, Providence; Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, and occasional performances in several other cities.

JOSEFFY.

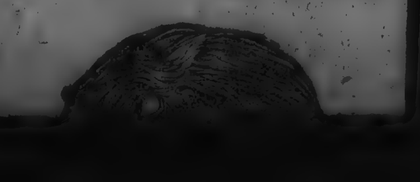
ANDREW LANG AND EVE.

(From Harper's Weekly.)

Andrew Lang brags that he has never read "The Heavenly Twins," and that only one man of his acquaintance has read it. He asserts that he has never been able to learn what it was all about. The men that he knew couldn't tell him, and the ladies wouldn't. Most people read novels for one of two reasons—if the novels are known to be good they read them for pleasure, and if they are known to be improper they read them out of curiosity. Mr. Lang seems to be superior to curiosity of that sort. He is a fortunate and well regulaed man. He wants to know only what he has reason to believe is worth knowing.



N SUNDAY GLOBE—SEPTEMBER 15, 1895

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Announcement of the Next Symphony Season.

"Martha" at the Castle Sq Theater—"The Tzigane" and "Madeleine."

Coming Concert Events and Gossip About Singers and Players.

The Boston symphony orchestra will begin its 15th season, Oct 18. For years the weekly public rehearsals and concerts of this organization have been in high favor with all classes of music lovers, and the arrangements, now nearly completed, for 1895-96, insure a continuance of their great popularity. The orchestra, made up of the same players as last year, will number 87 men, constituting the largest permanent orchestra maintained exclusively for concert purposes in the world. Composed of picked men of the profession, it has reached a degree of proficiency only to be acquired through years of training, and at its hands the great orchestral works receive interpretations that cannot be surpassed.

Twenty-four concerts will be given on Saturday evenings and 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons at Music hall. It is impossible to give in advance all details of a series of performances lasting from October to May. The programs will include a wide variety of standard works of old and modern composers and many attractive novelties. All worthy schools of music will be represented and all tastes will be considered.

While the solo numbers are a secondary consideration in this scheme, they form a very important feature, in the opinion of a considerable portion of the public. The services of the greatest artists available, both vocal and instrumental, have been secured, and their cooperation will add greatly to the brilliancy of the concerts. Engagements have been made with Mme Melba, Miss Brema, Mrs Henschel, Miss De Vere, Miss Szumowska, Mr Ben Davies, Messrs George Henschel, Emil Fischer, Joseffy, Ondricek, MacDowell, Faelten, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder and Schulz. Others will be added to the list later.

Season tickets will be sold by auction, as has been the custom for several years past. There will be two prices for each series, $12 and $7.50, according to location of seats. The $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold Monday, Sept 23, the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals Tuesday, Sept 24, the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts Thursday, Sept 26, and the $7.50 concert seats Friday, Sept 27. All the sales will be held in Music hall and will begin each day at 10 a m. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

In addition to the Boston concerts the orchestra will give a series in the Metropolitan opera house, New York, the academy of Music, Philadelphia, Music hall, Baltimore, Metzerott hall, Washington, the academy of Music, Brooklyn, Infantry hall, Providence, Sanders theater, Cambridge, and single concerts in several other cities.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1895.

The Symphony Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, during 1895-96, will give forty-eight performances in Music Hall—twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons and twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings. The dates of the first performances will be Oct. 18 and 19. All details of so extended a series cannot be given now, but the arrangements as far as completed insure the usual attractive concerts. The orchestra will number eighty-seven players, and, with one or two exceptions, will be made up of the same players as last year. The list of solo artists engaged includes Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Marie Brema, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, Mme. Clementine De Vere-Sapio, Miss Lillian Blauvelt, Messrs. Ben Davies, Georg Henschel, Joseffy, Ondricek, MacDowell, Faelten, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder, Schulz and others. The programmes of some of the earlier concerts are as follows:

I. Concert, Saturday, Oct. 19.

Symphony No. 1.....Brahms
Andante and variations.....Mozart
Cappriccio.....Dvorak
Overture "Lenore No. 3."....Beethoven

II. Concert, Saturday, Oct. 26.

Overture "Flying Dutchman".....Wagner
Aria (Mme. De Vere-Sapio).....
Suite.....MacDowell
Aria (Mme. De Vere-Sapio).....
Symphony No. 5.....Beethoven

III. Concert, Saturday, Nov. 2.

Symphony "Harold in Italy".....Berlioz
(Solo Viola, Mr. Kneisel.)
Aria (Miss Blauvelt).....
Variations.....Tschaikowsky
Aria (Miss Blauvelt).....
Overture "Sakuntala".....Goldmark

IV. Concert, Saturday, Nov. 9

Overture, "Oberon".....Weber
Aria.....
Scotch Symphony.....Mendelssohn
Aria.....
Huldigungsmarsch.....Wagner

V. Concert, Saturday, Nov. 23.

Symphony No. 8.....Beethoven
Aria (Miss Brema).....
Overture, "In der Natur".....Dvorak
(First time.)
Prelude, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Aria (Miss Brema.).....
Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt

The auction sales of season tickets will be held at Music Hall next week, full particulars being given in our advertising columns.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 15, 1895.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Announcement of the Next Symphony Season.

"Martha" at the Castle Sq Theater—"The Tzigane" and "Madeleine."

Coming Concert Events and Gossip About Singers and Players.

The Boston symphony orchestra will begin its 15th season, Oct 18. For years the weekly public rehearsals and concerts of this organization have been in high favor with all classes of music lovers, and the arrangements, now nearly completed, for 1895-96, insure a continuance of their great popularity. The orchestra, made up of the same players as last year, will number 87 men, constituting the largest permanent orchestra maintained exclusively for concert purposes in the world. Composed of picked men of the profession, it has reached a degree of proficiency only to be acquired through years of training, and at its hands the great orchestral works receive interpretations that cannot be surpassed.

Twenty-four concerts will be given on Saturday evenings and 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons at Music hall. It is impossible to give in advance all details of a series of performances lasting from October to May. The programs will include a wide variety of standard works of old and modern composers and many attractive novelties. All worthy schools of music will be represented and all tastes will be considered.

While the solo numbers are a secondary consideration in this scheme, they form a very important feature, in the opinion of a considerable portion of the public. The services of the greatest artists available, both vocal and instrumental, have been secured, and their cooperation will add greatly to the brilliancy of the concerts. Engagements have been made with Mme Melba, Miss Brema, Mrs Henschel, Miss De Vere, Miss Szumowska, Mr Ben Davies, Messrs George Henschel, Emil Fischer, Joseffy, Ondricek, MacDowell, Faelten, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder and Schulz. Others will be added to the list later.

Season tickets will be sold by auction, as has been the custom for several years past. There will be two prices for each series, $12 and $7.50, according to location of seats. The $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold Monday, Sept 23, the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals Tuesday, Sept 24, the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts Thursday, Sept 26, and the $7.50 concert seats Friday, Sept 27. All the sales will be held in Music hall and will begin each day at 10 a m. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

In addition to the Boston concerts the orchestra will give a series in the Metropolitan opera house, New York, the academy of Music, Philadelphia, Music hall, Baltimore, Metzerott hall, Washington, the academy of Music, Brooklyn, Infantry hall, Providence, Sanders theater, Cambridge, and single concerts in several other cities.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, SEPT. 15, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fifteenth season of the Boston Symphony orchestra will begin on Friday afternoon, Oct. 18, and will consist of twenty-four rehearsals and twenty-four concerts at Music hall. The seats will be sold at auction at Music hall, as follows: The $12.00 seats for rehearsals, on Monday Sept. 23, at 10 a. m; the $7.50 seats for rehearsals, on Tuesday, Sept. 24, at 10 a.m.; the $12.00 seats for concerts, on Thursday, Sept 26, at 10 a. m; the $7.50 seats for concerts, on Friday, Sept, 27, at 10 a. m.

Bids will be accepted in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be immediately re sold.

The conductor, Mr. Paur, has devoted him self during the summer to the preparation of the programmes, and the examination and selection of numerous new and interesting works by famous composers.

The performance of the orchestra will be supplemented by those of a brilliant array of solo artists, both vocal and instrumental. Among them are, Mme. Melba, Mrs. George Henschel, and Joseffy, the famous pianist, and the season in this particular promises to be of the very highest merit and interest.

The orchestra will also give a series of concerts in New York, Philadelpia, Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn, Providence and Cambridge, and occaasional concerts in other cities.

[10]

Announced—Fifteenth Year of the Famous Orchestral Organization—Dates for the Sales of Tickets—Performances in Other Cities.

The annual announcement of the Boston Symphony orchestra is awaited with eager curiosity each autumn by thousands of music lovers, who find enjoyment in the faultless performances of this great organization. No topic possesses more interest in musical circles at present than the arrangements for the approaching season. For the 15th consecutive year will be given a series of high class concerts, which can be equalled in no other city. It is impossible at this early date to give all details of a series of performances lasting from October to May. The experience of 14 years has shown that the confidence of the public in this enterprise has never been misplaced, and that whatever is undertaken is carried out in the most perfect manner possible. Enough is known to justify the statement that the season of 1895-96 will be one of the most brilliant in the career of the orchestra.

The orchestral forces will number 87 players, including all the principal artists, whose efforts have added so much to the prestige of the concerts in recent years. This constitutes the largest permanent orchestra maintained exclusively for concert purposes in the world. Twenty-four concerts will be given at Music Hall on Saturday evenings, and 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons. The dates of the first performances will be Oct. 18 and 19.

MME. MELBA.

While the primary object and the chief attraction of the concerts is the performance of great orchestral works, the solo artists constitute an important feature in the minds of many. During the approaching season the orchestra will have the co-operation of the greatest vocal and instrumental artists that are available, including several who hold a very high place in the esteem of the public and who have not been heard here for several years. Among those engaged are: Mme. Melba, Miss Marie Brema, Mrs. Georg Henschel, Mme. Clementine De Vere, Miss Lillian Blau-

MISS SZUMOWSKA.

velt, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, Messrs. Ben Davies, Georg Henschel, Joseffy, E. A. MacDowell, Carl Faelten, Ondricek, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder and Schulz. Others will be added to this list later.

Conductor Paur has been in Europe during the summer, and it is expected that he will bring a portfolio of novelties when he returns late in September.

The programmes of some of the earlier concerts are as follows:

I. Concert, Saturday, Oct. 19.

Symphony No. 1.....Brahms
Andante and variations.....Mozart
Cappriccio.....Dvorak
Overture, "Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven

II. Concert, Saturday, Oct. 26.

Overture, "Flying Dutchman".....Wagner
Aria.

Miss De Vere.

GEORG HENSCHEL.

Suite .....MacDowell
Aria.

Miss De Vere.

Symphony No. 5.....Beethoven

III. Concert, Saturday, Nov. 2.

Symphony, "Harold in Italy".....Berlioz
(Viola obligato, Mr. Kneisel.)
Aria.

Miss Blauvelt.

Variations .....Tschaikowsky
Aria.

Miss Blauvelt.

Overture, "Sakuntala".....Goldmark

IV. Concert, Saturday, Nov. 9.

Overture, "Oberon".....Weber
Aria.
Scotch symphony.....Mendelssohn
Aria.
Huldigungsmarsch.....Wagner

V. Concert, Saturday, Nov. 23.

Symphony No. 8.....Beethoven
Aria.
Overture, "In der Natur".....Dvorak
(First time.)
Prelude, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Aria.

Miss Brema.

Hungarian rhapsody.....Liszt

VI. Concert, Saturday, Nov. 30.

Overture, "Richard III."....Liszt
Concerto for violin.

Mr. Kneisel.

to location of seats. The $12 seats for

EMIL PAUR.

the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold at Music Hall on Monday, Sept. 23. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday, Sept. 24. The $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday, Sept. 26, and the $7.50 concert seats will be sold on Friday, Sept. 27. The sales will begin each day at 10 A. M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

The payment of premiums conveys

MARIE BREMA.

to many the idea of high cost, but it should be borne in mind that $12 and $7.50 for 24 high-class performances are only nominal prices, and that the seating capacity of the hou- at these rates would yield but a sma.. proportion of the outlay for the concerts.

The orchestra's season outside of Boston will include a series of concerts in the Metropolitan Opera House, New York; Academy of Music, Philadelphia; Music Hall, Baltimore; Metzerott Hall, Washington; Academy of Music, Brooklyn; Infantry Hall, Providence; Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, and occasional performances in several other cities.

JOSEFFY.

ANDREW LANG AND EVE.
(From Harper's Weekly.)

Andrew Lang brags that he has never read "The Heavenly Twins," and that only one man of his acquaintance has read it. He asserts that he has never been able to learn what it was all about. The men that he knew couldn't tell him, and the ladies wouldn't. Most people read novels for one of two reasons—if the novels are known to be good they read them for pleasure, and if they are known to be improper they read them out of curiosity. Mr. Lang seems to be superior to curiosity of that sort. He is a fortunate and well regulaed man. He wants to know only what he has reason to believe is worth knowing.

MRS. HENSCHEL.

Would that our mother Eve had more of his self-contained moderation!

DON'T.
(From Harper's Round Table.)

"I'm tired of 'don'ts'," said Margaret B,
"Just as tired of 'don'ts' as I can be,
For it's 'don't' do this, and 'don't' do that,
'Don't' worry the dog, 'don't' scare the cat,
'Don't' be untidy, and 'don't' be vain,
'Don't' interrupt, 'don't' do it again,
'Don't' bite your nails, 'don't' gobble your food,
'Don't' speak so loud, it's dreadfully rude,
'Don't' mumble your words, 'don't' say 'I won't.'
Oh! all day long it's nothing but 'don't'!
Some time or other I hope—'don't' you?
Some one or other will say, 'Please do't.'"

Coming Concert Events and Gossip About Singers and Players.

The Boston symphony orchestra will begin its 15th season, Oct 18. For years the weekly public rehearsals and concerts of this organization have been in high favor with all classes of music lovers, and the arrangements, now nearly completed, for 1895-96, insure a continuance of their great popularity. The orchestra, made up of the same players as last year, will number 87 men, constituting the largest permanent orchestra maintained exclusively for concert purposes in the world. Composed of picked men of the profession, it has reached a degree of proficiency only to be acquired through years of training, and at its hands the great orchestral works receive interpretations that cannot be surpassed.

Twenty-four concerts will be given on Saturday evenings and 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons at Music hall. It is impossible to give in advance all details of a series of performances lasting from October to May. The programs will include a wide variety of standard works of old and modern composers and many attractive novelties. All worthy schools of music will be represented and all tastes will be considered.

While the solo numbers are a secondary consideration in this scheme, they form a very important feature, in the opinion of a considerable portion of the public. The services of the greatest artists available, both vocal and instrumental, have been secured, and their cooperation will add greatly to the brilliancy of the concerts. Engagements have been made with Mme Melba, Miss Brema, Mrs Henschel, Miss De Vere, Miss Szumowska, Mr Ben Davies, Messrs George Henschel, Emil Fischer, Joseffy, Ondricek, MacDowell, Faelten, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder and Schulz. Others will be added to the list later.

Season tickets will be sold by auction, as has been the custom for several years past. There will be two prices for each series, $12 and $7.50, according to location of seats. The $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold Monday, Sept 23, the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals Tuesday, Sept 24, the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts Thursday, Sept 26, and the $7.50 concert seats Friday, Sept 27. All the sales will be held in Music hall and will begin each day at 10 a m. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

In addition to the Boston concerts the orchestra will give a series in the Metropolitan opera house, New York, the academy of Music, Philadelphia, Music hall, Baltimore, Metzerott hall, Washington, the academy of Music, Brooklyn, Infantry hall, Providence, Sanders theater, Cambridge, and single concerts in several other cities.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1895.

The Symphony Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, during 1895-96, will give forty-eight performances in Music Hall—twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons and twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings. The dates of the first performances will be Oct. 18 and 19. All details of so extended a series cannot be given now, but the arrangements as far as completed insure the usual attractive concerts. The orchestra will number eighty-seven players, and, with one or two exceptions, will be made up of the same players as last year. The list of solo artists engaged includes Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Marie Brema, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, Mme. Clementine De Vere-Sapio, Miss Lillian Blauvelt, Messrs. Ben Davies, Georg Henschel, Joseffy, Ondricek, MacDowell, Faelten, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder, Schulz and others. The programmes of some of the earlier concerts are as follows:

I. Concert, Saturday, Oct. 19.

Symphony No. 1.....Brahms
Andante and variations.....Mozart
Cappriccio.....Dvorak
Overture "Lenore No. 3."....Beethoven

II. Concert, Saturday, Oct. 26.

Overture "Flying Dutchman".....Wagner
Aria (Mme. De Vere-Sapio).....
Suite.....MacDowell
Aria (Mme. De Vere-Sapio).....
Symphony No. 5.....Beethoven

III. Concert, Saturday, Nov. 2.

Symphony "Harold in Italy".....Berlioz
(Solo Viola, Mr. Kneisel.)
Aria (Miss Blauvelt).....
Variations.....Tschaikowsky
Aria (Miss Blauvelt).....
Overture "Sakuntala".....Goldmark

IV. Concert, Saturday, Nov. 9

Overture, "Oberon".....Weber
Aria.....
Scotch Symphony.....Mendelssohn
Aria.....
Huldigungsmarsch.....Wagner

V. Concert, Saturday, Nov. 23.

Symphony No. 8.....Beethoven
Aria (Miss Brema).....
Overture, "In der Natur".....Dvorak
(Fisrt time.)
Prelude, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Aria (Miss Brema.).....
Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt

The auction sales of season tickets will be held at Music Hall next week, full particulars being given in our advertising columns.

[10]

Coming Concert Events and Gossip About Singers and Players.

The Boston symphony orchestra will begin its 15th season, Oct 18. For years the weekly public rehearsals and concerts of this organization have been in high favor with all classes of music lovers, and the arrangements, now nearly completed, for 1895-96, insure a continuance of their great popularity. The orchestra, made up of the same players as last year, will number 87 men, constituting the largest permanent orchestra maintained exclusively for concert purposes in the world. Composed of picked men of the profession, it has reached a degree of proficiency only to be acquired through years of training, and at its hands the great orchestral works receive interpretations that cannot be surpassed.

Twenty-four concerts will be given on Saturday evenings and 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons at Music hall. It is impossible to give in advance all details of a series of performances lasting from October to May. The programs will include a wide variety of standard works of old and modern composers and many attractive novelties. All worthy schools of music will be represented and all tastes will be considered.

While the solo numbers are a secondary consideration in this scheme, they form a very important feature, in the opinion of a considerable portion of the public. The services of the greatest artists available, both vocal and instrumental, have been secured, and their cooperation will add greatly to the brilliancy of the concerts. Engagements have been made with Mme Melba, Miss Brema, Mrs Henschel, Miss De Vere, Miss Szumowska, Mr Ben Davies, Messrs George Henschel, Emil Fischer, Joseffy, Ondricek, MacDowell, Faelten, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder and Schulz. Others will be added to the list later.

Season tickets will be sold by auction, as has been the custom for several years past. There will be two prices for each series, $12 and $7.50, according to location of seats. The $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold Monday, Sept 23, the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals Tuesday, Sept 24, the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts Thursday, Sept 26, and the $7.50 concert seats Friday, Sept 27. All the sales will be held in Music hall and will begin each day at 10 a m. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

In addition to the Boston concerts the orchestra will give a series in the Metropolitan opera house, New York, the academy of Music, Philadelphia, Music hall, Baltimore, Metzerott hall, Washington, the academy of Music, Brooklyn, Infantry hall, Providence, Sanders theater, Cambridge, and single concerts in several other cities.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, SEPT. 15, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fifteenth season of the Boston Symphony orchestra will begin on Friday afternoon, Oct. 18, and will consist of twenty-four rehearsals and twenty-four concerts at Music hall. The seats will be sold at auction at Music hall, as follows: The $12.00 seats for rehearsals, on Monday Sept. 23, at 10 a. m; the $7.50 seats for rehearsals, on Tuesday, Sept. 24, at 10 a.m.; the $12.00 seats for concerts, on Thursday, Sept 26, at 10 a. m; the $7.50 seats for concerts, on Friday, Sept, 27, at 10 a. m.

Bids will be accepted in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be immediately re sold.

The conductor, Mr. Paur, has devoted himself during the summer to the preparation of the programmes, and the examination and selection of numerous new and interesting works by famous composers.

The performance of the orchestra will be supplemented by those of a brilliant array of solo artists, both vocal and instrumental. Among them are, Mme. Melba, Mrs. George Henschel, and Joseffy, the famous pianist, and the season in this particular promises to be of the very highest merit and interest.

The orchestra will also give a series of concerts in New York, Philadelpia, Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn, Providence and Cambridge, and occaasional concerts in other cities.

"The Tzigane" and "Madeleine."

Coming Concert Events and Gossip About Singers and Players.

The Boston symphony orchestra will begin its 15th season, Oct 18. For years the weekly public rehearsals and concerts of this organization have been in high favor with all classes of music lovers, and the arrangements, now nearly completed, for 1895-96, insure a continuance of their great popularity. The orchestra, made up of the same players as last year, will number 87 men, constituting the largest permanent orchestra maintained exclusively for concert purposes in the world. Composed of picked men of the profession, it has reached a degree of proficiency only to be acquired through years of training, and at its hands the great orchestral works receive interpretations that cannot be surpassed.

Twenty-four concerts will be given on Saturday evenings and 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons at Music hall. It is impossible to give in advance all details of a series of performances lasting from October to May. The programs will include a wide variety of standard works of old and modern composers and many attractive novelties. All worthy schools of music will be represented and all tastes will be considered.

While the solo numbers are a secondary consideration in this scheme, they form a very important feature, in the opinion of a considerable portion of the public. The services of the greatest artists available, both vocal and instrumental, have been secured, and their cooperation will add greatly to the brilliancy of the concerts. Engagements have been made with Mme Melba, Miss Brema, Mrs Henschel, Miss De Vere, Miss Szumowska, Mr Ben Davies, Messrs George Henschel, Emil Fischer, Joseffy, Ondricek, MacDowell, Faelten, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder and Schulz. Others will be added to the list later.

Season tickets will be sold by auction, as has been the custom for several years past. There will be two prices for each series, $12 and $7.50, according to location of seats. The $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold Monday, Sept 23, the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals Tuesday, Sept 24, the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts Thursday, Sept 26, and the $7.50 concert seats Friday, Sept 27. All the sales will be held in Music hall and will begin each day at 10 a m. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

In addition to the Boston concerts the orchestra will give a series in the Metropolitan opera house, New York, the academy of Music, Philadelphia, Music hall, Baltimore, Metzerott hall, Washington, the academy of Music, Brooklyn, Infantry hall, Providence, Sanders theater, Cambridge, and single concerts in several other cities.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its 15th season Oct. 18. The weekly concerts of this great organization, perfect in every detail, provide musical entertainment of the highest order, and the arrangements for the coming season insure a continuance of the favor in which they are held by all classes of the musical public. The high standard of musicianship required in every player long ago gave it a membership which can hardly be improved, and few changes are made from year to year. The season will comprise as usual 48 performances, 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, and 24 concerts on Saturday evenings. The programs have been arranged with care by Mr. Paur during the summer. They embrace a wide variety of standard works by old and modern composers and many attractive novelties. All worthy schools of music are represented and all tastes have been considered. Some of the works which will have a first hearing during the season are the following:

Overture, "In der Natur" ..... Dvorak
Fantasie, "Francesca da Rimini" ..... Tschaikowsky
Prelude, "Der Rubin" ..... D'Albert
Prelude, "Guntram" ..... Richard Strauss
Fantasie in F minor, op. 103 ..... Schubert
(Orchestrated by Felix Mottl).
Ballet Suite ..... Rameau
Symphony No. 4 ..... Glazounow
Symphonic Poem ..... Zellner
Overture, "Kuss" ..... Smetana

The list of solo artists engaged is as follows: It includes the names of Mrs. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Marie Brema, Mrs. De Vere-Sapio, Miss Lillian Blauvelt, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, Messrs. Davies, Henschel, Fischer, Joseffy, Ondricek, MacDowell, Faelten, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder and Schulz.

The sales of season tickets will be by auction. There will be two classes of tickets for each series, $12 and $7 50, according to location of seats. The $12 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 23; the $7 50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday, Sept. 24; the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday, Sept. 26 and the $7 50 concert seats on Friday, Sept. 27.

The sales will all be held in Music Hall and will begin each day at 10 A. M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. In addition to the Boston concerts the orchestra will give a series during the season at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York; the Academy of Music, Philadelphia; Metzerott Hall, Washington; Music Hall, Baltimore; the Academy of Music, Brooklyn; Infantry Hall, Providence; Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, and single concerts in several other cities.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The annual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra long ago became a leading feature of each musical year. The fifteenth season of this organization will begin on Oct. 18, and many indications justify the belief that it will be of exceptional interest. The orchestra will be the same in size and membership as last season. Mr. Paur has devoted much time during the summer to the arrangement of programmes which will include many interesting novelties, in addition to a great variety of standard works.

The list of soloists already engaged is very attractive. It includes the names of Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Marie Brema, Mme. Clementine De Vere-Sapio, Miss Lillian Blauvelt, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, Messrs. Ben Davies, Georg Henschel, Josseffy, MacDowell, Faelten, Ondricek, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder and Schulz.

Twenty-four concerts will be given at Music Hall on Saturday evenings, and twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons. The auction sales of season tickets will be held in Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Sept. 23, 24, 26 and 27.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its 15th season on Oct. 18, and will give its usual series of 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and 24 Saturday evening concerts at Music Hall.

This fine organization has long been firmly established in the favor of the musical public and its coming concerts promise to be in all respects as brilliant and successful as in past seasons. Engagements have been made with a number of distinguished solo artists whose appearance will add greatly to the attractiveness of the concerts. The list includes Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Marie Brema, Mme. Clementine De Vere-Sapio, Miss Lillian Blauvelt, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, Messrs. Ben Davies, Georg Henschel, Joseffy, Ondricek, MacDowell, Faelten, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder, Schulz and others.

The auction sales of season tickets for both series will be held at Music Hall next week. The prices will be the same as last year; $12 and $7.50, according to location of seats. The $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 23; the $7.50 seats for rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday, Sept. 24; the $12 for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday, evening concerts will be sold on Thursday, Sept. 26, and the $7.50 concert seats on Friday, Sept. 27. The sales will begin each day at 10 A.M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

BOSTON, SEPT. 15. 1895.

MUSIC.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The annual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra long ago became a leading feature of each musical year. The fifteenth season of this organization will begin on Oct. 18, and the indications justify the belief that it will be of exceptional interest. The orchestra will be the same in size and membership as that of last season. Mr. Paur has devoted much time during the summer to the arrangement of programmes, which will include many interesting novelties, in addition to a great variety of standard works. The list of soloists already engaged is very attractive. It includes the names of Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Marie Brema, Mme. Clementine De Vere-Sapio, Miss Lillian Blauvelt, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, Messrs. Ben Davies, Georg Henschel, Joseffy, MacDowell, Faelten, Ondricek, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroder and Schulz. Twenty-four concerts will be given in Music Hall on Saturday evenings, and twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons. The auction sales of season tickets will be held in Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Sept. 23, 24, 26 and 27.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 15, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The annual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra long ago became a leading feature of each musical year. The 15th season of this organization will begin on Oct. 18, and many indications justify the belief that it will be of exceptional interest. The Orchestra will be the same in size and membership as last season. Mr. Paur has devoted much time during the summer to the arrangement of programmes which will include many interesting novelties, in addition to a great variety of standard works.

The list of soloists already engaged is very attractive. It includes the names of Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Marie Brema, Mme. Clementine De Vere-Sapio, Miss Lillian Blauvelt, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, Messrs. Ben Davies, Georg Henschel, Joseffy, MacDowell, Faelten, Ondricek, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder and Schulz.

Twenty-four concerts will be given at Music Hall on Saturday evenings, and twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons. The auction sales of season tickets will be held in Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Sept. 23, 24, 26 and 27.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 19, 1895.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT

Next Monday morning begins the auction sale of the seats for the Symphony Rehearsals, and next Thursday morning the auction sale of the seats for the Saturday evening concerts. It is not hazarding much to say that the interest and the competition for seats will prove as great as usual, and that it will be the part of wisdom to make up one's mind now what one wants and at what figures. Certainly, the special attractions set forth in the prospectus for the season have rarely been excelled. The orchestra will be nearly ninety strong, and under the direction of the experienced and devoted Paur. For soloists, there are Mme. Melba, Miss Marie Brema, the Henschels, Mr. Joseffy, the pianist; Mr. Ondricek, the violinist; and other distinguished stars. But a good wine needs no bush.

The announcements made concerning the coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will awaken pleasant anticipations in the minds of the admirers of this organization. The appearance of many famous solo artists will add variety and attractiveness to the performances of the orchestra. Melba will be heard in one concert; Joseffy and the Henschels will be warmly welcomed after an absence of several years; Ondricek, the Bohemian violinist, will make his Boston debut with the orchestra; and the names of Miss Brema, Madame De Vere-Sapio, Miss Blauvelt, Miss Szumowska, Ben Davies, E. A. McDowell, Carl Faelten, and others complete a notable list of artists. The auction sales of season tickets for the public rehearsals and concerts will be held in Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday of next week. Full particulars are given in our advertising columns.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 15, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The annual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra long ago became a leading feature of each musical year. The 15th season of this organization will begin on Oct. 18, and many indications justify the belief that it will be of exceptional interest. The Orchestra will be the same in size and membership as last season. Mr. Paur has devoted much time during the summer to the arrangement of programmes which will include many interesting novelties, in addition to a great variety of standard works.

The list of soloists already engaged is very attractive. It includes the names of Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Marie Brema, Mme. Clementine De Vere-Sapio, Miss Lillian Blauvelt, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, Messrs. Ben Davies, Georg Henschel, Joseffy, MacDowell, Faelten, Ondricek, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder and Schulz.

Twenty-four concerts will be given at Music Hall on Saturday evenings, and twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons. The auction sales of season tickets will be held in Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Sept. 23, 24, 26 and 27.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 21, 1895

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give during the season of 1895-96 forty-eight performances in Music Hall—twenty-four so-called public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, and twenty-four concerts Saturday evenings. October 18 and 19 will be the dates of the first two performances. With their customary liberality the management has provided a series of attractive concerts that will be notable even in the annals of this organization. While minor details of the extended series are not fully developed, the arrangements are so far completed that already success is assured and the music-loving public of Boston is only awaiting the opening of the box-office to attest their appreciation of the inimitable "Symphony."

The orchestra includes eighty-seven, and with few exceptions they will be the same players as last season. The list of solo artists engaged includes Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Marie Brema, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, Mme. Clementine De Vere-Sapio, Miss Lillian Blauvelt, Messrs. Ben Davies, Georg Henschel, Joseffy, Ondricek, MacDowell, Faelten, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder, Schulz and others.

Tickets for the series of concerts and for the series of rehearsals will be $12 and $7.50, according to location. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall Monday, September 23, at 10 A. M.; the $7 50 seats for the rehearsals Tuesday, September 24, at 10 A. M.; the $12 seats for the concerts Thursday, September 26, at 10 A. M.; the $7.50 seats for the concerts Friday, September 27, at 10 A. M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The first and most important of the musical announcements of the year is that of the fifteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose series of concerts at Boston Music Hall will include 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, beginning Oct. 18, and 24 evening concerts on Saturdays, beginning Oct. 19, all under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, who is about to arrive from a summer spent in Europe, during which the most important works of the later writers were brought to his attention. To the performances of this unrivaled orchestra will be added those of a notable list of soloists, which comprises the reigning dramatical musical star, Mrs. Melba, and many well-known artists, among whom are Miss Marie Brema, Mrs. Henschel, Mrs. DeVere-Sapio and Rafael Joseffy, who reappears after several seasons of complete retirement. The sale of tickets will be by auction at Music Hall for the rehearsals, on Monday and Tuesday next, and for the evenings on Thursday and Friday next.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The first and most important of the musical announcements of the year is that of the fifteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose series of concerts at Boston Music Hall will include 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, beginning Oct. 18, and 24 evening concerts on Saturdays, beginning Oct. 19, all under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, who is about to arrive from a summer spent in Europe, during which the most important works of the later writers were brought to his attention. To the performances of this unrivaled orchestra will be added those of a notable list of soloists, which comprises the reigning dramatical musical star, Mrs. Melba, and many well-known artists, among whom are Miss Marie Brema, Mrs. Henschel, Mrs. DeVere-Sapio and Rafael Joseffy, who reappears after several seasons of complete retirement. The sale of tickets will be by auction at Music Hall for the rehearsals, on Monday and Tuesday next, and for the evenings on Thursday and Friday next.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The first and most important of the musical announcements of the year is that of the fifteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose series of concerts at Boston Music Hall will include 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, beginning Oct. 18, and 24 evening concerts on Saturdays, beginning Oct. 19, all under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, who is about to arrive from a summer spent in Europe, during which the most important works of the later writers were brought to his attention. To the performances of this unrivaled orchestra will be added those of a notable list of soloists, which comprises the reigning dramatical musical star, Mrs. Melba, and many well-known artists, among whom are Miss Marie Brema, Mrs. Henschel, Mrs. DeVere-Sapio and Rafael Joseffy, who reappears after several seasons of complete retirement. The sale of tickets will be by auction at Music Hall for the rehearsals, on Monday and Tuesday next, and for the evenings on Thursday and Friday next.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 22, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The annual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra long ago became a leading feature of each musical year. The 15th season of this organization will begin on Oct. 18, and many indications justify the belief that it will be of exceptional interest. With their customary liberality the management has provided a series of attractive concerts that will be notable even in the annals of this organization. The Orchestra will be the same in size and membership as last season. Mr. Paur has devoted much time during the summer to the arrangement of programmes which will include many interesting novelties, in addition to a great variety of standard works.

The list of soloists already engaged is very attractive. It includes the names of Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Marie Brema, Mme. Clementine De Vere-Sapio, Miss Lillian Blauvelt, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, Messrs. Ben Davies, Georg Henschel, Joseffy, MacDowell, Faelten, Ondricek, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder and Schulz.

Tickets for the series of concerts and for the scries of rehearsals will be $12 and $7.50, according to location. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall Monday, September 23, at 10 A. M.; the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals Tuesday, September 24, at 10 A. M.; the $12 seats for the concerts Thursday, September 26, at 10 A. M.; the $7.50 seats for the concerts Friday, September 27, at 10 A. M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVIII., NO. 84.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The facts that have been published concerning the approaching season of the Boston Symphony orchestra have occasioned much favorable comment in musical circles, and the opinion seems general that the announcement for 1895-96 is one of the most attractive ever made by the management. The list of solo artists engaged seems particularly well chosen, and the programmes, as far as announced, leave nothing to be desired. The number of inquiries received at Music Hall has been very large, and the ticket brokers report more orders for seats than in the last two years. There is every indication that the entire capacity of the hall will be disposed of at the auction sales. The plan adopted of selling the seats by auction creates a wide variety of prices and suits all purses. While there is usually sharp competition for places in certain parts of the hall, there has never yet been a year when hundreds of good seats have not been sold at merely nominal premiums, and intending purchasers will do well to attend the auctions in person, if possible. The sales will begin tomorrow (Monday) morning, in Music Hall, when the $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday. The $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts on Thursday, and the $7.50 concert seats on Friday. Full particulars of the terms of the sale may be found in the advertisement in another column.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 22, 1895.

Sale of Symphony Seats.

The prospectus of the 15th season of the Boston symphony orchestra will be read with interest by all lovers of music. This superb orchestra, under the accomplished leadership of Mr Emil Paur, will be heard at Boston Music hall during its usual series of 24 public rehearsals, to take place on Friday afternoons, beginning Oct 18, and of 24 Saturday evening concerts, beginning Oct 19. Commendation of this splendid body of musicians is superfluous. It has long been recognized as the standard in this country, and has no reason to fear comparison with the most noted orchestras of the old world.

Liberal provision has been made for soloists, the list of names including those of Miss Marie Brema, Mrs Georg Henschel, Mme de-Vere-Sapio, Miss Lilian Blauvelt, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, Mr Ben Davies, Mr Georg Henschel, and others, and being notable for its inclusion of the renowned Melba, and the old favorite, Joseffy, whose reappearance after a long period of seclusion will be gladly hailed.

The auction sale of course tickets will be held at Music hall next Monday and Tuesday for the rehearsals, and next Thursday and Friday for the evenings.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1895

SYMPHONY AUCTION SALE.

Every indication points to a large attendance and a brisk rivalry among the patrons of the Symphony Orchestra to secure their favorite seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals at the auction sale of tickets to be held in Music Hall this morning, beginning at 10 o'clock. Only $12 seats will be offered today.

Tomorrow (Tuesday) at the same hour the $7 50 seats will be sold. The sale will be continued on Thursday and Friday, when the concert tickets will be sold.

[11]

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its 15th season Oct. 18. The weekly concerts of this great organization, perfect in every detail, provide musical entertainment of the highest order, and the arrangements for the coming season insure a continuance of the favor in which they are held by all classes of the musical public. The high standard of musicianship required in every player long ago gave it a membership which can hardly be improved, and few changes are made from year to year. The season will comprise as usual 48 performances, 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, and 24 concerts on Saturday evenings. The programs have been arranged with care by Mr. Paur during the summer. They embrace a wide variety of standard works by old and modern composers and many attractive novelties. All worthy schools of music are represented and all tastes have been considered. Some of the works which will have a first hearing during the season are the following:

Overture, "In der Natur" .....Dvorak
Fantasie, "Francesca da Rimini" .....Tschaikowsky
Prelude, "Der Rubin" .....D'Albert
Prelude, "Guntram" .....Richard Strauss
Fantasie in F minor, op. 103 .....Schubert
(Orchestrated by Felix Motti).
Ballet Suite .....Rameau
Symphony No. 4 .....Glazounow
Symphonic Poem .....Zellner
Overture, "Kuss" .....Smetana

The list of solo artists engaged is as follows: It includes the names of Mrs. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Marie Brema, Mrs. De Vere-Sapio, Miss Lillian Blauvelt, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, Messrs. Davies, Henschel, Fischer, Joseffy, Ondricek, MacDowell, Faelten, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder and Schulz.

The sales of season tickets will be by auction. There will be two classes of tickets for each series, $12 and $7 50, according to location of seats. The $12 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 23; the $7 50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday, Sept. 24; the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday, Sept. 26 and the $7 50 concert seats on Friday, Sept. 27.

The sales will all be held in Music Hall and will begin each day at 10 A. M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. In addition to the Boston concerts the orchestra will give a series during the season at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York; the Academy of Music, Philadelphia; Metzerott Hall, Washington; Music Hall, Baltimore; the Academy of Music, Brooklyn; Infantry Hall, Providence; Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, and single concerts in several other cities.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The annual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra long ago became a leading feature of each musical year. The fifteenth season of this organization will begin o- Oct. 18, and many indications justify the belief that it will be of exceptional interest. The orchestra will be the same in size and membership as last season. Mr. Paur has devoted much time during the summer to the arrangement of programmes which will include many interesting novelties, in addition to a great variety of standard works.

The list of soloists already engaged is very attractive. It includes the names of Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Marie Brema, Mme. Clementine De Vere-Sapio, Miss Lillian Blauvelt, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, Messrs. Ben Davies, Georg Henschel, Josseffy, MacDowell, Faelten, Ondricek, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder and Schulz.

Twenty-four concerts will be given at Music Hall on Saturday evenings, and twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons. The auction sales of tickets will be held in Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Sept. 23, 24, 26 and 27.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its 15th season on Oct. 18, and will give its usual series of 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and 24 Saturday evening concerts at Music Hall.

This fine organization has long been firmly established in the favor of the musical public and its coming concerts promise to be in all respects as brilliant and successful as in past seasons. Engagements have been made with a number of distinguished solo artists whose appearance will add greatly to the attractiveness of the concerts. The list includes Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Marie Brema, Mme. Clementine De Vere-Sapio, Miss Lillian Blauvelt, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, Messrs. Ben Davies, Georg Henschel, Joseffy, Ondricek, MacDowell, Faelten, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder, Schulz and others.

The auction sales of season tickets for both series will be held at Music Hall next week. The prices will be the same as last year; $12 and $7.50, according to location of seats. The $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 23; the $7.50 seats for rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday, Sept. 24; the $12 for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday, evening concerts will be sold on Thursday, Sept. 26, and the $7.50 concert seats on Friday, Sept. 27. The sales will begin each day at 10 A.M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

BOSTON, SEPT. 15. 1895.

MUSIC.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The annual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra long ago became a leading feature of each musical year. The fifteenth season of this organization will begin on Oct. 18, and the indications justify the belief that it will be of exceptional interest. The orchestra will be the same in size and membership as that of last season. Mr. Paur has devoted much time during the summer to the arrangement of programmes, which will include many interesting novelties, in addition to a great variety of standard works. The list of soloists already engaged is very attractive. It includes the names of Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Marie Brema, Mme. Clementine De Vere-Saplo, Miss Lillian Blauvelt, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, Messrs. Ben Davies, Georg Henschel, Joseffy, MacDowell, Faelten, Ondricek, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroder and Schulz. Twenty-four concerts will be given in Music Hall on Saturday evenings, and twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons. The auction sales of season tickets will be held in Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Sept. 23, 24, 26 and 27.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 15, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The annual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra long ago became a leading feature of each musical year. The 15th season of this organization will begin on Oct. 18, and many indications justify the belief that it will be of exceptional interest. The Orchestra will be the same in size and membership as last season. Mr. Paur has devoted much time during the summer to the arrangement of programmes which will include many interesting novelties, in addition to a great variety of standard works.

The list of soloists already engaged is very attractive. It includes the names of Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Marie Brema, Mme. Clementine De Vere-Sapio, Miss Lillian Blauvelt, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, Messrs. Ben Davies, Georg Henschel, Joseffy, MacDowell, Faelten, Ondricek, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder and Schulz.

Twenty-four concerts will be given at Music Hall on Saturday evenings, and twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons. The auction sales of season tickets will be held in Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Sept. 23, 24, 26 and 27.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 19, 1895.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT

Next Monday morning begins the auction sale of the seats for the Symphony Rehearsals, and next Thursday morning the auction sale of the seats for the Saturday evening concerts. It is not hazarding much to say that the interest and the competition for seats will prove as great as usual, and that it will be the part of wisdom to make up one's mind now what one wants and at what figures. Certainly, the special attractions set forth in the prospectus for the season have rarely been excelled. The orchestra will be nearly ninety strong, and under the direction of the experienced and devoted Paur. For soloists, there are Mme. Melba, Miss Marie Brema, the Henschels, Mr. Joseffy, the pianist; Mr. Ondricek, the violinist; and other distinguished stars. But a good wine needs no bush.

The announcements made concerning the coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will awaken pleasant anticipations in the minds of the admirers of this organization. The appearance of many famous solo artists will add variety and attractiveness to the performances of the orchestra. Melba will be heard in one concert; Joseffy and the Henschels will be warmly welcomed after an absence of several years; Ondricek, the Bohemian violinist, will make his Boston debut with the orchestra; and the names of Miss Brema, Madame De Vere-Sapio, Miss Blauvelt, Miss Szumowska, Ben Davies, E. A. McDowell, Carl Faelten, and others complete a notable list of artists. The auction sales of season tickets for the public rehearsals and concerts will be held in Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday of next week. Full particulars are given in our advertising columns.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 15, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The annual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra long ago became a leading feature of each musical year. The 15th season of this organization will begin on Oct. 18, and many indications justify the belief that it will be of exceptional interest. The Orchestra will be the same in size and membership as last season. Mr. Paur has devoted much time during the summer to the arrangement of programmes which will include many interesting novelties, in addition to a great variety of standard works.

The list of soloists already engaged is very attractive. It includes the names of Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Marie Brema, Mme. Clementine De Vere-Sapio, Miss Lillian Blauvelt, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, Messrs. Ben Davies, Georg Henschel, Joseffy, MacDowell, Faelten, Ondricek, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder and Schulz.

Twenty-four concerts will be given at Music Hall on Saturday evenings, and twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons. The auction sales of season tickets will be held in Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Sept. 23, 24, 26 and 27.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 21, 1895

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give during the season of 1895-96 forty-eight performances in Music Hall—twenty-four so-called public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, and twenty-four concerts Saturday evenings. October 18 and 19 will be the dates of the first two performances. With their customary liberality the management has provided a series of attractive concerts that will be notable even in the annals of this organization. While minor details of the extended series are not fully developed, the arrangements are so far completed that already success is assured and the music-loving public of Boston is only awaiting the opening of the box-office to attest their appreciation of the inimitable "Symphony."

The orchestra includes eighty-seven, and with few exceptions they will be the same players as last season. The list of solo artists engaged includes Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Marie Brema, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, Mme. Clementine De Vere-Sapio, Miss Lillian Blauvelt, Messrs. Ben Davies, Georg Henschel, Joseffy, Ondricek, MacDowell, Faelten, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder, Schulz and others.

Tickets for the series of concerts and for the series of rehearsals will be $12 and $7.50, according to location. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall Monday, September 23, at 10 A. M.; the $7 50 seats for the rehearsals Tuesday, September 24, at 10 A. M.; the $12 seats for the concerts Thursday, September 26, at 10 A. M.; the $7.50 seats for the concerts Friday, September 27, at 10 A. M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The first and most important of the musical announcements of the year is that of the fifteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose series of concerts at Boston Music Hall will include 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, beginning Oct. 18, and 24 evening concerts on Saturdays, beginning Oct. 19, all under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, who is about to arrive from a summer spent in Europe, during which the most important works of the later writers were brought to his attention. To the performances of this unrivaled orchestra will be added those of a notable list of soloists, which comprises the reigning dramatical musical star, Mrs. Melba, and many well-known artists, among whom are Miss Marie Brema, Mrs. Henschel, Mrs. DeVere-Sapio and Rafael Joseffy, who reappears after several seasons of complete retirement. The sale of tickets will be by auction at Music Hall for the rehearsals, on Monday and Tuesday next, and for the evenings on Thursday and Friday next.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The first and most important of the musical announcements of the year is that of the fifteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose series of concerts at Boston Music Hall will include 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, beginning Oct. 18, and 24 evening concerts on Saturdays, beginning Oct. 19, all under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, who is about to arrive from a summer spent in Europe, during which the most important works of the later writers were brought to his attention. To the performances of this unrivaled orchestra will be added those of a notable list of soloists, which comprises the reigning dramatical musical star, Mrs. Melba, and many well-known artists, among whom are Miss Marie Brema, Mrs. Henschel, Mrs. DeVere-Sapio and Rafael Joseffy, who reappears after several seasons of complete retirement. The sale of tickets will be by auction at Music Hall for the rehearsals, on Monday and Tuesday next, and for the evenings on Thursday and Friday next.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 22, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The annual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra long ago became a leading feature of each musical year. The 15th season of this organization will begin on Oct. 18, and many indications justify the belief that it will be of exceptional interest. With their customary liberality the management has provided a series of attractive concerts that will be notable even in the annals of this organization. The Orchestra will be the same in size and membership as last season. Mr. Paur has devoted much time during the summer to the arrangement of programmes which will include many interesting novelties, in addition to a great variety of standard works.

The list of soloists already engaged is very attractive. It includes the names of Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Marie Brema, Mme. Clementine De Vere-Sapio, Miss Lillian Blauvelt, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, Messrs. Ben Davies, Georg Henschel, Joseffy, MacDowell, Faelten, Ondricek, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder and Schulz.

Tickets for the series of concerts and for the scries of rehearsals will be $12 and $7.50, according to location. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall Monday, September 23, at 10 A. M.; the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals Tuesday, September 24, at 10 A. M.; the $12 seats for the concerts Thursday, September 26, at 10 A. M.; the $7.50 seats for the concerts Friday, September 27, at 10 A. M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVIII., NO. 84.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The facts that have been published concerning the approaching season of the Boston Symphony orchestra have occasioned much favorable comment in musical circles, and the opinion seems general that the announcement for 1895-96 is one of the most attractive ever made by the management. The list of solo artists engaged seems particularly well chosen, and the programmes, as far as announced, leave nothing to be desired. The number of inquiries received at Music Hall has been very large, and the ticket brokers report more orders for seats than in the last two years. There is every indication that the entire capacity of the hall will be disposed of at the auction sales. The plan adopted of selling the seats by auction creates a wide variety of prices and suits all purses. While there is usually sharp competition for places in certain parts of the hall, there has never yet been a year when hundreds of good seats have not been sold at merely nominal premiums, and intending purchasers will do well to attend the auctions in person, if possible. The sales will begin tomorrow (Monday) morning, in Music Hall, when the $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday. The $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts on Thursday, and the $7.50 concert seats on Friday. Full particulars of the terms of the sale may be found in the advertisement in another column.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 22, 1895.

Sale of Symphony Seats.

The prospectus of the 15th season of the Boston symphony orchestra will be read with interest by all lovers of music. This superb orchestra, under the accomplished leadership of Mr Emil Paur, will be heard at Boston Music hall during its usual series of 24 public rehearsals, to take place on Friday afternoons, beginning Oct 18, and of 24 Saturday evening concerts, beginning Oct 19. Commendation of this splendid body of musicians is superfluous. It has long been recognized as the standard in this country, and has no reason to fear comparison with the most noted orchestras of the old world.

Liberal provision has been made for soloists, the list of names including those of Miss Marie Brema, Mrs Georg Henschel, Mme de-Vere-Sapio, Miss Lilian Blauvelt, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, Mr Ben Davies, Mr Georg Henschel, and others, and being notable for its inclusion of the renowned Melba, and the old favorite, Joseffy, whose reappearance after a long period of seclusion will be gladly hailed.

The auction sale of course tickets will be held at Music hall next Monday and Tuesday for the rehearsals, and next Thursday and Friday for the evenings.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1895

SYMPHONY AUCTION SALE.

Every indication points to a large attendance and a brisk rivalry among the patrons of the Symphony Orchestra to secure their favorite seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals at the auction sale of tickets to be held in Music Hall this morning, beginning at 10 o'clock. Only $12 seats will be offered today.

Tomorrow (Tuesday) at the same hour the $7 50 seats will be sold. The sale will be continued on Thursday and Friday, when the concert tickets will be sold.

[11]

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, SEPT. 22, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, during 1895-96, will give forty-eight performances in Music hall—twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons and twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings. The dates of the first performances will be Oct. 18 and 19. The orchestra of eighty-seven players, will be made up of the same players as last year with a few exceptions. The list of solo artists engaged includes Mme. Melba, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Marie Brema, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, Mme. Clementine De Vere-Sapio, Miss Lillian Blauvelt, Messrs. Ben Davies, Georg Henschel, Joseffy, Ondricek, MacDowell, Faelton, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder, Schulz and others. The programme of the first concert Saturday, Oct. 19, is as follows:

Symphony No. 1.....Brahms
Andante and variations.....Mozart
Cappriccio.....Dvorak
Overture "Lenore No. 3".....Beethoven

The auction sales of season tickets will be held at Music hall, Monday and Tuesday, Thursday and Friday of this week, full particulars being given in our advertising columns.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

SEPTEMBER 23, 1895.

$80 PREMIUM.

Highest Paid for Symphony Rehearsal Ticket.

As interesting a performance as takes place during the symphony season began at 10 a.m. in Music Hall. It was the auction for the $12 seats at the rehearsals.

Long before the hour there was a great crowd collected. Nearly every one there had their eye on some particular seat.

There were a few men and women scattered over the hall whose faces were stamped with that grim expression of dire determination which plainly said, "Let come what will, I will have this seat so long as there is a dollar left on my bank account."

Those who had come prepared for a long stay were there with a book or a paper, and one sweet Dorothea brought along Jack's last European letter which had come in the morning mail, and was entertaining a bevy of friends with bright scraps of where he was and what he was doing now.

If a stranger had suddenly appeared on the scene, having already been informed of Boston's leaning toward mental gymnastics (and where, even in heathendom, is there a person who has not) he would have thought sure enough a select and highly cultured audience had gathered there for the purpose of indulging in an advanced mathematical contest.

For there they sat, earnestly gazing at the stupendous array of figures which was placed before them on the platform.

READY FOR BIDS.

The auctioneer stood just in front with a baton in hand ready for their most enthusiastic ventures. So lofty was the figure diagram that a very tall and shaky step-ladder had to be employed in order that the numbers might be properly checked off.

The first seat sold brought a premium of $9, and as this was an increase of $2.50 over the sale of the same seat last year, the management was jubilant.

It was an auspicious beginning, and the bidding kept right up in a lively kind of a way that made things seem cheerful, even if a few did look disconsolate and finally left with a half muzzled grumble on their lips.

When section G was reached the premiums quickly run up to $20.50. The next four went for $36, and right beside those seats went one for $42.

L centre rushed the price up to $51, and then again the sides cooled off at the respectable price of $30.

M and N went throughout at prices averaging about $40 50.

And just at the noon hour the highest premium of the morning came at $76.

All agree that rehearsal tickets went at a better figure than last year.

The highest premium of the day was $80 for N, 17. The three ladies who bought 1, 2 and 3 in S for $19 hugged themselves for joy when the next seat just beside went for $35.

The speculators were there in great numbers.

The Boston Traveler

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1895.

SYMPHONY SALE STILL ON.

Cheaper Class of Seats Sold at a Premium This Morning.

The sale of symphony concert seats was continued in Music Hall this morning. The audience that faced Auctioneer Jackson was not so large as that which assembled there yesterday, numbering about 700. Younger faces were the rule and men were even less in evidence than yesterday.

Today $7.50 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsal were sold at a premium. There were about 600 of them marked upon the diagram upon the stage. The prices were a little higher on an average than were obtained last year.

Most of the seats sold this morning were located under the balcony in the rear of the hall. The first seat sold at $9 premium, and soon afterwards one was disposed of at $14. The lowest price was $6.50. Most of the purchasers were bidders, and the speculators took but little part in the proceedings. The sale began at 10.10 o'clock, ten minutes later than the time advertised.

Boston Daily Globe.

MONDAY, SEPT. 23, 1895.

CROWD FANNED AND BID FOR SEATS.

Smaller Gathering at Sale of Symphony Rehearsal Seats Than Last Year—Mrs "Jack" Gardner Paid Highest Premium.

Twelve dollar seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Boston symphony orchestra were sold today at various premiums, ranging from $7 and $8 up to $80, the highest price paid up to 1 o'clock. These two seats which brought the highest money were 16 and 17 J, Mrs "Jack" Gardner's particular choice always in seasons past. Mrs Gardner was present in Music hall this morning, and it is safe to assume that these same two seats were purchased this year by the society leader.

The sale in Music hall this morning was but another evidence of "better times." The man who is interested figured for a few moments and announced that the premiums were averaging 20 percent more than they did last year. The highest figure a year ago was $92.50, and while the top figure this season fell $10 short of that, the seats as a whole brought larger premiums.

The gathering which perspired and fanned itself was not so large as those of former years—reasonably accountable to the condition of the weather—and agents and speculators were conspicuous as the buying portion of the assemblage. Blocks of "fours" were taken up at good, stiff prices by these speculators, and Herrick, Hurd, Thayer or Connelley were names which frequently fell from the lips of Mr Jackson, who acted as auctioneer.

The first seat, 1A, was started at $1, and knocked down to a Mr Reynolds for $9. From $7 to $10 was the premium paid on seats in A, but B, the second row from the stage, raised this considerably, the premiums ranging form $10 to $21.50. The best price paid for a seat in C was $24 for No. 19.

There was brisk bidding for chairs in D. Gen W. W. Blackmar paid $18.50 each for 4, 5, 6 and 7. Mr Connelley bid $25 for 14, 15, 16 and 17, and Mr Richards wanted three, about in the center of the row, badly enough to pay a premium of $40 each. Mr Richards' three were numbered 18, 19 and 20. The next seat, 21, brought but $20. Mr Herrick bought a block of three in D at a premium of $27.

The highest premium in E was for 17, which was sold for $51. One and two, on the end, sold for $12, and the rest brought from $29 to $40.

Mr Herrick bought 1 and 2 in F for $18.50, and Mr Rantoul secured 3 for $26. Seats 18, 19 and 20 were bought by Mr Wilson at a premium of $42.

Six, 7, 8 and 9 in G were knocked down to Mr Thayer for $32. In H seats 15, 16 and 17 were sold to Mr Wadsworth, who was presumably acting as an agent, for $69, while Mr Harlow paid a premium of $76 each on seats numbered 18, 19, 20 and 21 in the same row.

In I some of the best prices of the day were obtained. Seats 11, 12, 13 and 14 sold at a premium of $58, and 15, 16, 17 and 18 were knocked down to Mr Wadsworth for $70.

In J, seats 3, 4 and 5 sold for $26, 6, 7, 8 and 9 to Mr Herrick for $42, 10 and 11 for $35, 12, 13, 14 and 15 for $34.

In K, L, M and N the premiums bid ranged from $20 to $60, the majority selling for $40. In O, 1, 2, 3 and 4 sold for $25, 10 for $41, 11 and 12 for $40, 13 and 14 for $41, 15 for $41, 20 and 21 for $42, 24 and 25 for $47. In P, 1 and 2 sold for $22, and Henry D. Hyde paid a premium of $47 on 8.

In Q, 8 and 9 brought $44, 10 and 11 $43, 12, 13, 14 and 15 $40, 18 and 19 $54 and 20 $41.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1895.

SYMPHONY SHOPPERS AT MUSIC HALL.

An Unusually Large Attendance at the Second Day's Sale of Concert Tickets.

Boston's much admired institution, the Symphony girl, was decidedly in evidence at Music Hall today. She may be a frivolous creature on ordinary social occasions, but she is seriously in earnest when the important matter of buying tickets for the concerts is on her programme. She was intensely business-like this morning, so much so that she bid against herself over and over again; but she betrayed no agitation as she took the little green ticket and passed on to deposit the money, not dreaming that she might have had several dollars for candy between the numbers and ice cream sodas afterward, if she had been less eager.

This morning the $7.50 seats were offered, and it is safe to say that the average premium was from thirty to forty per cent higher than that of last year. There were more people present, the bidding was more brisk, and with the exception of the most desirable seats, which, strangely enough, brought less, the prices were much higher. This was especially noticeable when the bidding began on the section under the balcony. Experienced buyers waited for the last rows, remembering that formerly the premiums ranged from fifty cents to two or three dollars. They found out their mistake, and the management reaps the benefit. The first seats went at a premium of $9 each; others in the next row, $12.50, while some brought $15. Prices in the row against the wall ranged from $5.50 to $9.50; remarkable prices, considering the location.

Aisle seats in the balconies sold for nearly double the price of last year. From $14 to $20 was the average premium, while many brought $26 and $27.

Said a stranger who happened into Music Hall while the auction was in progress, "I perceive that the young women of Boston are great lovers of music." "Perhaps they are," said the cynic beside him, "but I'll wager that half the girls here don't know G natural from a quart of blueberries!"

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1895.

SYMPHONY PREMIUMS HIGHER.

Tickets for the Friday Rehearsals Sold This Morning at Prices Noticeably Better Than Those of Last Season.

The sale of seats for the Symphony Orchestra performances is really a social event in Boston. It may not be counted so on everybody's list, but it is so, in fact. There were plenty of purchasers at the sale of tickets for Friday rehearsal seats in the Music Hall this forenoon. The shirt-waist girls were there in great numbers, and although they said little so far as bidding is concerned, they talked to each other about all the time.

When the bidding started the two short sections of seats on each side the stage sold at premiums of from $9 to $12.50. The premiums on section B ranged from $7.50 to $18, and those in C and D ran from $13 and $15 to $19, $26 and $29.50.

"Why, that's a good deal higher than the prices for rehearsal seats last year," exclaimed a girl who had been to Symphony sales before. And prices certainly were higher. End seats in C brought $13, and side seats in E brought $28.50. Centre section seats in E went easily at $30, $32 and even $42, and they hovered around the thirty-dollar mark all the while that a clerk was drawing his blue chalk through the numbers in the two following sections. The first seat inside the aisle in H went off promptly for $41. Others farther along in the same section brought $69 to $76. Bids then began to be started at $50. In section I the first two seats went for $34 each, and four centre seats brought $72. "Just think," droned out one girl in an awestruck whisper, "that's $84 for a seat, counting in the twelve, you know. And four times $84—well, it's no use for me to stay here now."

There is to be no sale on Wednesday. On Thursday the $12 concert seats will be sold by auction, and on Friday the sale will be completed by the disposal of the $7.50 concert seats. The people who collected the money in the office just outside the entrance to Music Hall were jubilant this noon. They could not give an exact comparison with the prices of last year, but they said that this morning's figures not only started in better but that they averaged much higher.

The highest premium paid today was for a seat in J, which cost $80. As the back rows were reached there was almost a scramble for seats. Those in X ranged from $25 to $31, and bids frequently started at $25. Seat in Y cost as much as $26, and in Z they were about the same. In the last row in front of the gallery the prices ran around an average of $18. A considerable number of bidders, driven away from the seats farther forward by the lofty prices, had waited for the seats under the gallery, and as these seats were placed on sale the bidding was almost too fast to follow. The average prices were, for the first row, $15; for the second, $11.50, and for the third, $10. All these are much above those for the same seats last year. One man who had been making strenuous efforts to secure a seat for $5 or $6, said to a neighbor, as the auctioneer closed his day's work:

"Never saw such prices! The seat I bought last year for two dollars went for $8.50."

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 25, 1895

SECOND DAY OF SYMPHONY SALE.

Bidding Brisk and Greater Premiums Obtained—One Agent Has $17,000 to Invest.

Well, of course, it was a typical Symphony assembly at Music hall yesterday, when the sale of seats for the Friday rehearsals of the Symphony orchestra performances were continued from Monday.

Shortly before 10 there was such a procession of fashionably dressed girls hurrying along Tremont st down to the Hamilton pl entrance of Music hall that had you, too, not the same errand on your list you might have imagined the Symphony rehearsal show was arranged for the morning.

There was the regular symphony shopper, who knew just the seats she wanted, and got them, too, although she paid 50 percent more for them than she did last year.

One agent said his orders for seats had increased at least 25 percent over last year. He had $17,000 to invest in orders.

"I never saw such prices," he remarked. "I paid this morning $20 for the very seat I got last year for $11.50."

The last row of seats under the balcony brought premiums of $5, $6, $8 and $9.50. The highest premium on the back row of seats was $14. The average premium on these seats was $5.50.

Last year many of these cane seats under the balcony were sold at a premium of $1 and $2.

The sale of seats in the first balcony was very interesting, and the bidders most enthusiastic. Premiums of $20, $18, $17.50, $19.50, $27 and $26 were paid for aisle seats, and those who delayed purchasing, hoping the prices would fall, were doomed to disappointment.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1895

The Symphony Rehearsal Seats Sold.

Highest Price Was $80 by Mrs. Wilson.

Happened To Be Same as Last Year's Highest.

The auction sale of seats for the Symphony rehearsals was held in Music Hall Monday forenoon, and while there had not been any appreciable change in the weather from Sunday, and it was unquestionably too hot for many people to go to church on Sunday, it was not so hot on Monday that an audience was not able to gather in Music Hall, the equal of which would have gladdened the heart of any of the preachers of the day before.

As might have been expected of the sale for the Friday afternoon concerts, the feminine element was in a large majority, and light colored shirt waists and fans were very much in evidence. Most of these women were evidently not new at such a scene. They knew what they wanted, and about how much they ought to pay, and when they were ready to bid they generally made their voices heard quite as well as the men.

The sale was a little late in beginning, and it was 10.15 A. M. when Auctioneer Jackson walked on the platform, and the checker-off, blue chalk in hand, climbed cautiously up on a step-ladder so tall and rickety that it threatened momentarily to precipitate him into the audience.

This sale was simply of seats for Friday afternoon. The price, as usual, was $12 plus whatever premium was bid, and the seats were sold in order. Seat No. 1, in Row A, the front seat nearest the Hamilton Place entrance, was the first sold, and brought a premium of $9.

A is only a partial row. In B, the first complete row, the best seats brought a premium of $21, and from here the price mounted rapidly to $40 in D, and more than $50 in E. The bidding was brisk, and, thanks to Mr. Jackson's energy, the sale proceeded more expeditiously than could have been expected. Rows H, I and J seemed to be the favorites, and premiums ranged here from $70 to $80. The highest figure paid was a premium of $80 each, paid by Mrs. Wilson, for seats 16 and 17, the two seats on the right hand side of the middle aisle in row J. This happens to be just exactly the same as the highest figure paid last year for two seats, but those were much farther back.

On the whole, the premiums ran rather higher than last year, and the average price of about $40 was kept up considerably farther back in the hall than last year, so that the total receipts of this sale must be considerably larger.

The speculators were out in full force, and most of them bought briskly, usually at good prices. Individual limitations were interesting to watch.

One young man evidently had a commission to execute, as he regularly and systematically started every seat within a certain limit at $10, no matter if the one beside it had sold for $75. One woman kept up good courage until the seats she sat in last year, for which she paid $26 premium, sold this year for $40. Another woman was evidently determined to sit in the middle aisle, and equally determined to pay but $50 bonus for doing so. Time after time as the middle seats were reached, she bid steadily up to $50, only to lose. Finally, when row R was reached, she evidently thought the case was becoming desperate, for she went to $52, and secured the chairs.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

SEPTEMBER 25, 1895.

SYMPHONY TICKETS.

The second day's auction sale of $7.50 season tickets for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, yesterday morning, was fully as exciting as on Monday, when the $12 seats were sold.

Every seat was sold and at premiums averaging higher than last year. Only the Saturday evening concert tickets now remain to be sold, and the auction for these seats will take place on Thursday and Friday of this week. The first day the $12 seats will be offered and on Friday the $7 50 seats.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 25, 1895.

SYMPHONY TICKETS.

The second day's auction sale of $7.50 season tickets for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, yesterday morning, was fully as exciting as on Monday, when the $12 seats were sold.

Every seat was sold and at premiums averaging higher than last year. Only the Saturday evening concert tickets now remain to be sold, and the auction for these seats will take place on Thursday and Friday of this week. The first day the $12 seats will be offered and on Friday the $7 50 seats.

[12]

TUESDAY, SEPT. 24, 1895.

BOSTON STANDARD.

MATTERS MUSICAL.

Coming Season Promises to Be One of Unusual Interest.

The inauguration of each series of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra virtually marks the beginning of the musical season in Boston, and that now announced, the 15th series, promises to be a most interesting and brilliant one, embracing not only the unrivalled performances of the superb orchestra of 87 players, but also an array of eminent soloists that will serve in enhancing the pleasure and gratification of the patrons in a greater degree than during any previous season.

Among the soloists announced, none will be more welcome to the critical listeners than our townsmen, E. A. MacDowell and Carl Faelten, both of whom hold the highest positions in their profession.

* * *

A great novelty in these concerts will be the reappearance here of Mr. Joseffy, the eminent pianist.

Mr. Joseffy, after a most brilliant career upon the concert stage in this country, retired from the public some years ago, and in a mysterious manner isolated himself from all musical society. Very few knew of his whereabouts after his retirement, or the cause for his sudden disappearance. Some said he sought repose to avert a serious condition of nervious prostration arising from overwork in his professional duties. Others said that the difficulty was a case of hypochondria. Whatever the reason, let us rejoice that he has now come forth from his seclusion, and will again display his rare aoilities before the public.

* * *

Franz Orducck, the Bohemian violin virtuose, will be another novelty upon our concert stage. This eminent performer has played with the greatest success before the critical audiences of all the European centres of music. He has an enormous repertoire, embracing both the classic school and that of modern brilliancy and romance.

* * *

Among the vocalists will be Melba, Brema, Mrs. Henschel and Clementine De Vere, the latter of whom has been abroad for the past two or three years, where she has sung with success in concerts in the principal cities of Europe.

If we add to this brilliant array of soloists the performance of numerous novelties in the way of orchestral compositions that Conductor Paur has collected during his summer's sojourn abroad it will be seen that every inducement is offered for a continued interest in the success of our symphony orchestra which now enters upon its 15th consecutive season.

* * *

In the great privilege that these concerts offer we must not forget the benefactor whose munificence has made it possible to enjoy such opportunities to hear music of the highest class performed in the most perfect manner. Had it not been for the generosity of Henry L. Higginson in establishing this superb body of players, and his courage and liberality in upholding the enterprise for the benefit of his townsmen, we should today be without the opportunity, except at long intervals, of hearing symphonic music in this city of cultured tastes. All praise to Mr. Higginson, our benefactor.

* * *

SYMPHONY AUCTION.

The race for Symphony tickets is on, the start having been made yesterday at Music Hall with much eclat. In fact, the affair, as usual on these annual occasions, amounted to quite a social function.

Yesterday morning at the hour of 10 was the time for the first gathering of those who wished to make their bids for the choice of seats for the coming Symphony Orchestra performances. Yesterday's sale was limited to the disposal of the $12 seats for the Friday afteroon rehearsals, and about 1000 people were present, the ladies being much in the majority.

The bidding this year, judging from yesterday's sale, promises to be higher and more brisk than last season. As Auctioneer Jackson stepped upon the platform at 10:15 and offered the first seat there seemed to be a foreboding of high bids. They continued commensurate with the rising temperature of Music Hall.

The first seat brought $10 premium. It was numbered A 1, and was bought by A. M. Reynolds. A 2 went to a Mr. Whitcomb for $7.50, and, the seats being sold in regular order, the prices ranged from $6.50 premium to $40 in the first three rows. E 17 sold at $51 premium and the next seat beyond it at $42. Auctioneer Jackson was quite as dignified as the occasion demanded, and so business-like that he disposed of nearly 300 seats in an hour and a half. The highest price brought was $80 each for T 16 and 17, a Mr. Wilson being the purchaser. Last year these seats sold for $60 each. T 18 and 19 brought $40 premium each. This remarkable fluctuation in the prices of adjoining seats was paralleled in several other instances. Seats H 18, 19, 20 and 21 sold at $76 premium each; H 15, 16 and 17 at $69; G 17 at $45; G 24, 25, 26 and 27 at $42, E 17 at $51; E 18 at $42.

Today $7.50 seats for the Friday rehearsal will be sold at a premium; on Thursday $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be auctioned off, and on Friday $7.50 seats for the latter event will be disposed of.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVIII., NO. 86.

TUESDAY, SEPT. 24, 1895.

MUSIC STILL HAS ITS CHARM

Symphony Ticket Sale Brought Out Crowd of Purchasers.

Seats in First Two or Three Rows Were Not Much in Favor—Prices Paid for Choice Locations, However, Averaged Considerably Better Than Those of Last Year.

The sale of Symphony tickets began yesterday morning in Music Hall, and during the day the whole of the $12 seats for the public rehearsals was auctioned off.

Mr. Jackson, as always, was the auctioneer, and George Hartshorn, the veteran, moved the step-ladder up and down the stage, marking off on the huge plot each seat as it was sold.

The auctioneer stepped forward at about quarter past 10, and, after explaining the rules of the sale, put seat No. A 1 at the mercy of the bidders. It was almost immediately knocked down to a Mr. Reynolds for $9 premium.

Seats in the first two or three rows ruled, of course, comparatively low, bringing less than $25 at the highest; but it was easily seen, even by these prices, that the bids were averaging considerably higher than last year.

When D was reached prices began to grow firmer, and from then on they rose gradually during the whole of the morning's sale. D 1, 2 and 3 sold for $13.50, and Gen. W. W. Blackmer bought the next four for $18.50—making a total, that is, of $30.50 a seat.

Connelly got 14, 15, 16, 17 on a bid of $25, and the next four went to Mr. Richards for $40, while the next seat, 21, brought hardly more than half that premium.

In E, 13, 14, 15, 16 brought $39 each; 17 brought $51; 18, $42, and 19, $32.

Many of the bids went on orders or for speculation. Herrick taking perhaps the most, and a number of other seats being knocked down to Connelly and Hurd.

In F, No. 3 was sold at a premium of $26; 6, 7, 8, 9 for $27; 21 and 22 for $31; and 23, 24, 25 and 26 for $33.

Nos. 6, 7, 8 and 9 in G brought $32 each; 22 and 23 for $34.50, and 28 and 29 for $37 each.

In H prices began to boom in earnest. Nos. 15, 16 and 17 brought $69, and the next four $76—or a total for the four, reckoning in the original $12 for each, of $352.

In I prices receded a trifle—11, 12, 13 and 14 going for $58 apiece; 15, 16, 17 and 18 for $70. Nos. 28 and 29 brought $40.

Row J ruled lower, except for Mrs. Gardner's old seats—16 and 17—which brought the highest price of the day, $80 premium, or a total of $92 apiece, against the record of over $100 last year. Other seats in this row brought $30 to $42.

K averaged about $40, and L and M about the same. N brought a few prices which were higher—$52 for 18 and 19; $61 for 16 and 17, and $63 for 20 and 21.

In the next three rows $40 to $50 were the average of the good prices. Henry D. Hyde bought 8 in P for $47. In Q 18 and 19 brought $54.

From Q back, the prices gradually decreased, until the maximum in the last rows was about $25. In the first row under the gallery prices were almost invariably $14 or $15. In the two rows behind they were usually $9 or $10.

In the front rows of the gallery, which were put up after the intermission, prices were as a rule about $25 or $30. Nos. 35 and 36, on the right hand side, brought $60.

The sale yesterday was very successful. Throughout, seats brought from $5 to $10 more than last year.

Today—at 10 A. M.—the $7.50 rehearsal tickets are sold; Thursday, the $12 Saturday evening concert tickets; and, Friday, $7.50 concert tickets.

The Bo[illegible]

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1895.

A Thousand Persons At end the Sale of Symphony Concert Seats.

ANXIOUS TO HEAR REHEARSALS.

The Highest Premium Paid Was $80 Per Seat for Each of Two in Row T—Prices a Trifle Higher Than Last Year.

Nearly 1,000 persons were in Music Hall at 10 o'clock this morning, the hour announced as the beginning of the sale of $12 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Seventy per cent of those present were women. There were stately matrons, blushing society buds and types of the coming as well as the going woman galore. It was a representative Boston audience: quietly dressed and undemonstrative. The conversation that preceded the sale was subdued in volume, though general.

A composite photograph of the faces of the assemblage should afford an ideal countenance for the face of Minerva. Boston culture is no myth, nor are its exponents rara avis. Doubters should attend the next sale of seats at Music Hall tomorrow at 10 o'clock, or as much later as the elect in charge of the affair—it might almost be termed a function—see fit to begin business.

It was just 10.15 o'clock this morning when Mr. H. T. Jackson, the auctioneer, stepped upon the platform. The delay had been exasperating to some of the gentlemen in the audience, who had been entrusted by feminine relatives and friends with the weighty task of buying symphony tickets, and were anxious to get to their business offices. But the impatient persons were too well bred to manifest their perturbation by the methods so generally adopted to hurry the curtain up in a theatre. They simply looked at their watches every 30 seconds, fidgeted a bit and complained of the heat, which was really lurid enough to suit a salamander. Bostonians are not always so cold as Philistines from other towns are fond of saying.

Upon the stage was a diagram of the first floor of the auditorium. It was affixed to the face of a high board barricade that entirely concealed from view the melancholy face and draped figure of the immortal Beethoven. The numbers of seats were in big type and black figures; letters designating aisles being painted in red.

Auctioneer Jackson explained the terms of the sale very briefly. The seats were sold at auction to the highest bidders, and the bids in each and every case were premiums added to the regular price of $12 a seat. No bids of less than 25 cents would be entertained, and not more than four seats were to be sold at one time to one person.

Behind the auctioneer and perched at the top of an Eiffel tower of a stepladder was Chief Usher George Hartshorn, who crossed the numbers of the seats upon the diagram as fast as they were sold. His aerial exploits seemed so risky that the attention of the audience was at times distracted from the bidding to watch what is billed by circuses as "lofty tumbling." Mr. Hartshorn got there, all the same.

The bidding opened briskly and never lagged a moment during the morning. The first seat brought $10 premium. It was numbered A 1, and was bought by A. M. Reynolds. A 2 went to a Mr. Whitcomb for $7.50, and, the seats being sold in regular order, the prices ranged from $6.50 premium to $40 in the first three rows. E 17 sold at $51 premium and the next seat beyond it at $42. A lady bid $5 for E 19 and the auctioneer thought she said $25, and disposed of the seat to her for that price, whereupon she raised a low and pleasant voice in expostulation, and it was sold again and to another person. Auctioneer Jackson dispensed with all the facetiousness that has come to be considered characteristic of his profession by those who have never attended a symphony race. He was quite as dignified as the occasion demanded, and so business-like that he disposed of nearly 300 seats in an hour and a half. Up to 12 o'clock the highest price brought was $80 each for T 16 and 17, a Mr. Wilson being the purchaser. Last year these seats sold for $60 each. T 18 and 19 brought $40 premium each. This remarkable fluctuation in the prices of adjoining seats was paralleled in several other instances. Seats H 18, 19, 20 and 21 sold at $76 premium each; H 15, 16 and 17 at $69; G 17 at $45; G 24, 25, 26 and 27 at $42; E 17 at $51; E 18 at $42. At the start the prices ranged below the standard of last year's sale, but after the first half hour the bids averaged considerably higher than at the auction of twelve months ago.

Tomorrow $7.50 seats for the Friday rehearsal will be sold at a premium; on Thursday $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be auctioned off, and on Friday $7.50 seats for the latter event will be disposed of.

[illegible]TON

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 24, 1895.

SYMPHONY SALE.

Auctioneering for Premiums on Seats---Good Figures.

The symphony girls, the dear creatures who delight in attending the afternoon rehearsals, have discovered that it is infinitely proper to take in the auction sale of seats for these performances. They were in evidence yesterday between the hours of 10 o'clock in the forenoon and 5 o'clock in the afternoon in Music Hall, and their flute-like voices were heard bidding for tickets, so they might not miss the opportunity of being seen at any of the twenty-four rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which begins Friday afternoon, Oct. 18.

When Auctioneer H. T. Jackson arrived there were all of 1000 persons assembled, 70 per cent of them being women. The music-craving Hubites, who enjoy a rare treat such as this Symphony Orchestra offers, with such an eminent leader as Emil Paur, were out in force. Such an opportunity could not be lost. They listened patiently to the explanations of the auctioneer, who informed them that the seats to be sold for the twenty-four rehearsals would cost them $12 apiece.

On top of this they were to bid for premiums to be added to the regular price, $12. The man with a deep bass voice informed them also that no bids less than 25 cents would be entertained, and only four seats were to be sold to any one person. The smallest bid was $5, but in each case this was increased.

The first seat brought $10 premium; it was A 1, and was sold to A. M. Reynolds.

Mrs. Demesque was the one who bid in T 16 and 17, and the premiums cost $80 each.

Seventeen sold for $51 premium, and the next seat brought $42. All the seats in the auditorium were sold at higher bids than were offered last year. In the afternoon all seats in the first balcony were disposed of, and the front row brought a large price. Mr. Condon paid $39 each for three seats, Mr. Tyler $32 for three seats, Mrs. Lowry $35 for three seats, Mr. Condon $35 each for four seats, Mr. Robinson $32 each for two seats, Mr. Hurd $26 for four seats, Mr. Cunningham $21 each for four seats, Mrs. Herrick $21 each for four seats and Mr. Carr $29 for two seats. The rear seats in the balcony were sold for prices ranging from $10 to $25 premium.

Today $7.50 seats for the Friday rehearsals will be sold at premium; Thursday, $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts, begining Oct. 19, and on Friday, $7.50 seats for the concerts will be auctioned off.

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 1895.

People Desiring to Attend the Regular Performances of the Symphony Orchestra Bid.

Thursday the $12 seats for the regular concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, to be given on Saturday evenings, were sold by auction in Music Hall, beginning at a few minutes after 10 o'clock. At the beginning the bidding dragged somewhat, and the premiums did not range very high, but it was not long before bids came thick and fast, and the seats began to sell at remarkably high premiums. Even after the best seats had been disposed of, there were occasional bursts of brisk and spirited bidding, and high premiums were still reached now and then. The highest premium paid was $41 for the seat numbered 19, in section J, which was probably desired by the same bidder who had already paid $38 apiece for the four adjoining seats numbered 15 to 18, in the same section, two of which, 17 and 18, are aisle seats. Other seats in section J that brought high premiums were 20, 21 and 22, which went for $33, 9 and 10 and the aisle seat numbered 27 for $26 apiece, 23 and 24 for $25 apiece, 11 to 14 for $22 each, and 3 to 8 for $20 each. The next to the highest premium paid was $39 for the seats numbered 8 and 9 in section L, the former being an aisle seat. The seat numbered 7 on the opposite side of the same aisle in this section sold for $35, another aisle seat numbered 17, with the three adjoining it numbered 14 to 16, went for $31 apiece, the two aisle seats 27 and 28, with those numbered 26 and 29 to 31, for $29 each, 20 to 23 for $24 each, and 10 to 13, 24 and 25 for $21 each.

In section K a premium of $36 apiece was paid for the seats numbered 20 and 21, $34 each for the aisle seat 17 and the three next to it numbered 14 to 16, $32 for 22, $29 each for the aisle seat numbered 28 and its neighbor numbered 29, and $24 for those numbered 23 to 26. The aisle seat numbered 8 in section M, and the next one numbered 9 sold for $36 apiece; other seats in this section that brought high premiums were 16 and 17, $25 each; 18, 19, 28 and 29, $24 each; 12 to 15, $23.50 each; and 4 to 7, 10 and 11, $23 apiece. Across the broad transverse aisle on the floor the highest premium paid was $35 for the aisle seat numbered 18, and in this same section $29 premium each was paid for 20 and 21, $25 each for the aisle seats 7, 8, 17 and 27, and $24 apiece for 9 to 11. Back in section S $33 premium was paid for the aisle seat numbered 18, $26 each for 20 and 21, and $22 each for aisle seats 17 and 28.

The final sale will take place today at 10 o'clock.

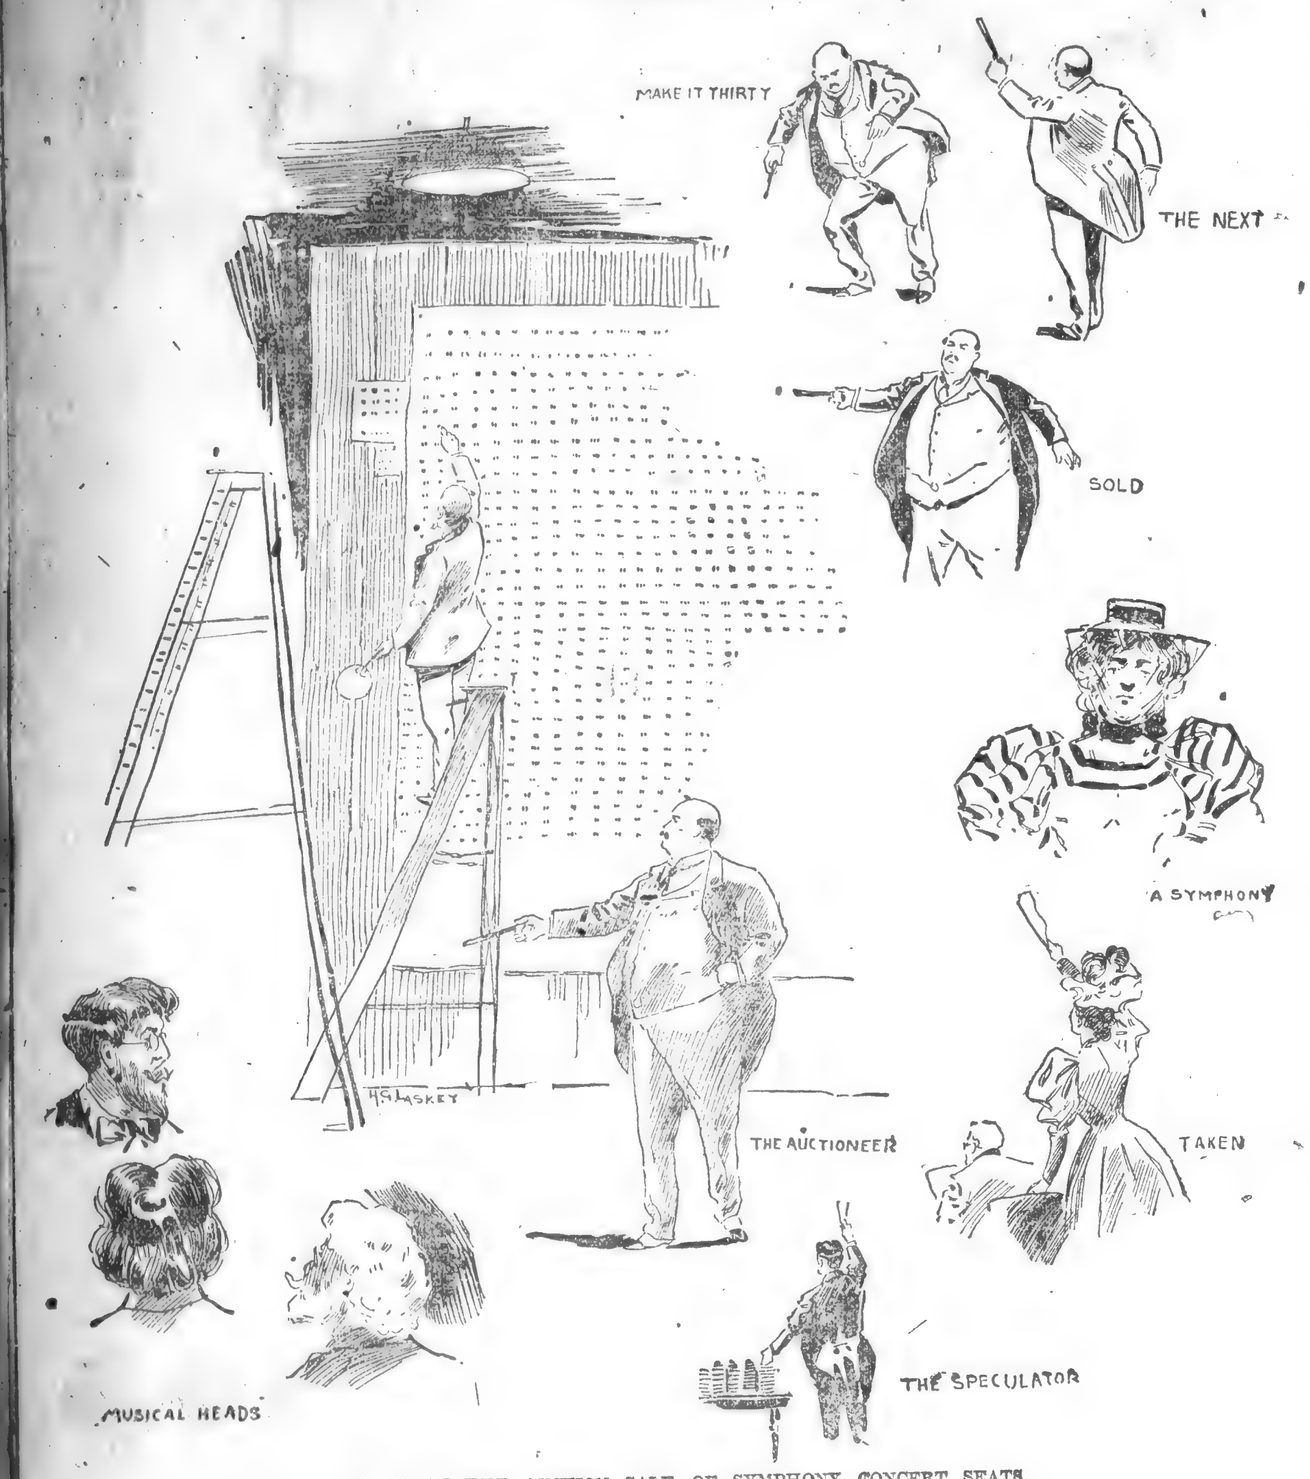
---

[13]

TON HERAL[illegible]

GOOD PRICES FOR SYMPHONY SEATS.

The $12 Lot Disposed of in a Few Hours and at Comparatively Large Premiums.



SEEN AT THE AUCTION SALE OF SYMPHONY CONCERT SEATS.

The sale of the $12 seats for the Saturday evening Symphony concerts began yesterday morning at 10 o'clock, under the auspices of Auctioneer Jackson, and all these seats were sold by 4 o'clock in the afternoon. Today the closing sale will take place, when the last of the seats at $7.50 will be disposed of.

As a whole the sale showed a very satisfactory improvement over that of last year, which is in itself a strong indication of a more prosperous condition of affairs. It is safe to assert that no series of entertainments give better satisfaction than these concerts, and there is a feeling that purchasers of tickets are sure to get their money's worth.

It was amusing to watch the different types of buyers as they came up to the box office to get their seats. Some of them, especially those who had never purchased tickets for these concerts before, were very nervous. The old patrons, who have for years patronized the Symphony series, came up and passed in their checks or paid their money in the most nonchalant manner. One gentleman remarked that he had purchased "these seats"—referring to those he had in his hand—last year for $9 premium and the year before at an advance of $11, and this year at $13.

Several hundred people were present, and the bidding was briskly carried forward. The universal absence of the matinee girl, however, deprived the occasion of the vivaciousness which attached to the rehearsal sales of Monday and Tuesday.

The concert seats have always sold lower than those for the rehearsals, and always will until it becomes the custom for women to attend evening entertainments unaccompanied. This year is, of course, no exception, but the prices received ruled conspicuously higher than those which prevailed at last year's corresponding sale. This was particularly noticeable in the end seats, under the right-hand balcony, which brought from $10 to $16 in good rows, while last year they sold for only $5 or $6, or even lower. Throughout the average increase in price might be fairly put at $4 or $5.

Seats in the broken front row—A—brought as low as a couple of dollars, and, again, as high as $10 or $11. B, 4 sold for a dollar; 6, for $3, and 7, for $2, the better seats bringing $15 or $16.

Prices grew higher back to and including J, K, L and M, from which point they gradually declined. In D, 20 and 21 sold for $16, and 24, 25 and 26 for $12.50. In E, 21 and 22 brought $18; in F, 16, 17, 18 and 19, in two lots, for $31; in G, 8 and 9, for $27; 13 and 14, for $24, and 15, 16, 17 and 18 for $32. The highest price in H was $28—for 20, 21 and 22. I 20 brought $28, and J 15, 16, 17 and 18 for $38—the latter batch, including the two seats, 16 and 17, which brought the highest premium, $80 each, at the rehearsal sale. The next seat, 19, brought the highest premium attained today, or $41.

K 20 and 21 sold for $36; L 8 and 9 for $39, and M 8 and 9 for $36—from which point, as has been said, they gradually declined.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1895.

SEATS FOR THE SATURDAY CONCERTS

People Desiring to Attend the Regular Performances of the Symphony Orchestra Bid at the Auction Sale in Music Hall.

Today the $12 seats for the regular concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, to be given on Saturday evenings, were sold by auction in Music Hall, beginning at a few minutes after ten o'clock. The forward half of the seats on the floor was well filled with prospective bidders, and there were a few onlookers in the first balcony. At the beginning the bidding dragged somewhat, and the premiums did not range very high, but it was not long before bids came thick and fast, and the seats began to sell at remarkably high premiums. Even after the best seats had been disposed of, there were occasional bursts of brisk and spirited bidding, and high premiums were still reached now and then. The highest premium paid was $41 for the seat numbered 19, in section J, which was probably desired by the same bidder who had already paid $38 apiece for the four adjoining seats numbered 15 to 18, in the same section, two of which, 17 and 18, are aisle seats. Other seats in section J that brought high premiums were 20, 21 and 22, which went for $33, 9 and 10 and the aisle seat numbered 27 for $26 apiece, 23 and 24 for $25 apiece, 11 to 14 for $22 each, and 3 to 8 for $20 each. The next to the highest premium paid was $39 for the seats numbered 8 and 9 in section L, the former being an aisle seat. The seat numbered 7 on the opposite side of the same aisle in this section sold for $35, another aisle seat numbered 17, with the three adjoining it numbered 14 to 16, went for $31 apiece, the two aisle seats 27 and 28, with those numbered 26 and 29 to 31, for $29 each, 20 to 23 for $24 each, and 10 to 13, 24 and 25 for $21 each.

In section K a premium of $36 apiece was paid for the seats numbered 20 and 21, $34 each for the aisle seat 17 and the three next to it numbered 14 to 16, $32 for 22, $29 each for the aisle seat numbered 28 and its neighbor numbered 29, and $24 for those numbered 23 to 26. The aisle seat numbered 8 in section M and the next one numbered 9 sold for $36 apiece; other seats in this section that brought high premiums were 16 and 17, $25 each; 18, 19, 28 and 29, $24 each; 12 to 15, $23.50 each; and 4 to 7, 10 and 11, $23 apiece. Across the broad transverse aisle on the floor the highest premium paid was $35 for the aisle seat numbered 18, and in this same section $29 premium each was paid for 20 and 21, $25 each for the aisle seats 7, 8, 17 and 27, and $24 apiece for 9 to 11. Back in section S $33 premium was paid for the aisle seat numbered 18, $26 each for 20 and 21, and $22 each for aisle seats 17 and 28.

In the remaining sections in front of the broad cross aisle the highest premium was $33 for the aisle seat 18 in section H. Of the other seats in this section 20 to 22 sold for $28 each, 14 to 17, 23 and 24 for $26 each, and 10 to 13 for $24 apiece. A laugh was caused at the beginning of the sale of seats in this section by the attendant inadvertently crossing off the H instead of the 1 when the first seat was sold, thus disposing of the section for $16, the premium bid. The auctioneer increased the momentary merriment by remarking that the section was "certainly worth it." In section G the highest premium paid was $32 for the aisle seats 17 and 18; $27 was bid for 8, 9 and 19; $25 was paid for 28 on the aisle; and $24 was bid for 10 to 14 and 20 to 27. The aisle seats numbered 17 and 18 in section F brought $31 premium, as did also the aisle seat 18 in section I. In the latter section the aisle seat 17 sold for $27 and the aisle seat 28 for $26. In section E $26 premium was also paid for the aisle seat 18 after a spirited contest in bidding.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

FRIDAY MORNING, SEPT. 27, 1895.

BROUGHT BIG PREMIUMS.

From the Evening Record.

Symphony Saturday night concert tickets sold today at a humming rate, and at an average of fully 50 p. c. higher than last year.

There were a few seats right on the front row that went very low—the first in A for $3. But with this slight exception the premiums reached a good figure.

The average premium from the second to the fifth row was $20; from the seventh to the twelfth row, $28, and from there back to R about $22.

There were a few seats which sold last year for 50 cts. premium which went today for $11.50.

The highest premium, $44, was paid by a speculator for end seats in L.

Conspicuous among those deeply interested was R. M. Cushing, who secured fine seats on the left centre.

Among others buying were A. W. Apthorp, M. E. W. Blake, Clarence Humphries, Robert Winthrop, B. L. Whelpley, the organist; Mr. Cummings of Cummings & Sears; Arthur Pickering, Dr. Fifield, A. P. Blake, Walter Brackett, the artist; C. E. Lauriet and M. Gangengigl.

Mrs. J. L. Gardner w[illegible] again occupy her favorite seats in the [illegible]cony.

Next to the highest p[illegible]ium was $39, paid by a man represer[illegible]g some stock exchange men, for 8 an[illegible] in L. These seats last year went for $[illegible]50.

Nos. 16 and 17 in F th[illegible] year brought $31; last year they were sol[illegible]l for $16. So, too, 1 and 2 in H was sold for $16, when last year they went for the modest sum of $5.

K, 16 and 17, went for $36; last year $20. J, 23 and 24, were started at $20 by Miss Goring, and bought by her at $25.

Throughout M many of the bids were started at $15.

Friday is the last day of the sale of $7.50 tickets.

[14]

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVIII., NO. 89.
FRIDAY, SEPT. 27, 1895.

LAST OF SYMPHONY SEATS.

Triumphant and High-Priced Conclusion of the Four Days' Sale.

The auctioneer, Mr. Jackson, disposed of the last of the Symphony seats this morning and afternoon, bringing the four days' sale to a triumphant and high-priced conclusion.

Only $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts were offered, i. e., those in the last rows of the floor and first balcony and all in the second balcony. The sale began at 10 and ended at about 2:45.

More people were present than at any previous sale. Very many were those who had been disappointed on account of the high prices in obtaining for $12 such seats as they had been accustomed to buy in previous years.

The sale opened with the fourth row under the first balcony, and some of the prices were higher (adding the premium to the nominal price) than the $12 seats immediately in front had aggregated. The row of $12 seats numbered from 1112 to 1150 had sold at premiums ranging from $3 to $4 or $5, making a total of from $15 to $16 or $17.

The row of $7.50 seats from 1151 to 1189 brought from $4.50 to $9, a total of from $11 to $16.50.

Prices became considerably lower, however, as the row next to the wall was reached. No. 1287 brought $1.75, a very usual price. Nos. 1293 and 1294 were sold for $1.50. 1300 for $1. 1314 for 50 cents and 1345 to 1352 for an even quarter each, the lowest bid possible under the rules of the auction. Last year, however, at this same sale, similar seats were in even worse luck, and had to be sold at par at the box office.

In the last row, the occupants of which have a broad transverse aisle all to themselves in which to stretch their legs, the bids grew a bit firmer—an average of a dollar or so being obtained.

When the first balcony was reached, however, prices took a sudden bound. The first seat sold, No. 103, in the second row immediately to the right of the stage, brought $17.50 premium, and 109 brought $18. Nos. 127 to 130, inclusive, sold for $13 apiece; 35, 36 and 37 for $16.50; 146, 147, 148 and 149, in two lots, for $17. Prices then began to fall off, averaging however, down the whole third row, from $8 to $12.

In the left-hand balcony bids, ruled lower, perhaps $6 being the most usual for seats in the third row, but in the little portion of the second row, over the stage, which was offered, they were even higher than for corresponding seats across the hall—$21 being paid for Nos. 570, 571 and 572. In the third row the only unusually high bid had been $14; the aisle seats 543 and 544.

In the last rows of the centre of the first balcony the best seats sold for $6 or $7.

All these prices were surprisingly high in comparison with sales in former years, but bids for the first row of the second galary were so high that they must have astonished the wildest expectations of the management.

Nos. 12, 13 and 14, on the right hand side, sold for $7.50, and 15 and 16 and 19 to 22, inclusive, for $13. Nos. 23, 24, 25 and 26 sold at $16, and the climax was reached when the aisle seats, 27 and 28, which brought $7.50 last year, brought this morning no less than $27.

Toward the end of the row $8 or $9 was the usual figure, and in the two back rows, $3 or $4.

On the left hand side, prices were higher for the rear rows, but considerably lower for the first row. Nos. 367 and 368, aisle seats in the middle of the second row, brought $7.50. In the row in front, the best seats brought from $7.50 to $9, with those over the stage $4 or $5.

A good deal of confusion was caused among bidders for seats in the third row of this balcony by their misunderstanding of the position of the piers which support the ceiling. It was a frequent occurence for the purchaser of two seats to find that they were completely separated in this way, so that the occupant of one could not see the occupant of the other.

In such cases, where it was discovered in time (as was not always the case), the auctioneer good naturedly resold the seats.

A great many people were still unsupplied with seats when the sale concluded with those in the central position of the balcony, owing to the high price which practically every desirable seat in the hall had brought.

The last seat sold was 273, which was knocked down to a bidder, who called, with a sigh of relief, for two seats. When the laugh subsided, the seat was resold.

Boston Transcript
FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 1895.

FINAL SALE OF SYMPHONY SEATS.

Premiums Bid Today for the $7.50 Seats for the Saturday Evening Concerts.

In Music Hall this morning the final auction sale of seats for the regular concerts of the Symphony Orchestra on Saturday evenings began at ten o'clock. The front seats on the floor were largely occupied by the bidders, and parties of two and three or more persons wandered about at the extreme rear of the floor or in the balconies, picking out the seats for which they wished to bid. It was the $7.50 seats that were disposed of today, and the sale was slower, owing to the fact that so many purchasers bought only single seats.

The seats at the rear on the main floor sold for $5, $6, $7 and $8 premium for those in the forward rows, and for as low as fifty cents premium for those in the last two rows, for some of which, indeed, there were no bidders. In the first balcony the rear seats were sold at premiums ranging from $6 up to $21, the latter premium being paid for the end seat numbered 572 in the second row on the left side, and the three neighboring ones numbered 569 to 571. Two seats on the right side sold for $18 premium each.

In the second balcony $27 premium was paid for the end seat numbered 27 in the front row on the right. Aside from this one, the premiums did not rise higher than $16, and most of them ranged from $5 to $10. The bidding as a rule was brisk, but the advances were usually small.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVIII., NO. 91.
SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA LEADER.

The latest number of the Detroit Song Journal makes the following pointed remarks: "A great deal of interest centres in the Boston Symphony orchestra, or rather in its conductor. A little while ago wisacres who pretended to be behind the scenes asserted that Mr. Paur would no longer wield the baton. This malicious rumor pleased a certain number of people, for Mr. Paur is not a favorite, and this for several reasons. In the first place, he attends to his own business, and believes that when his hours of work are over he has the right to enjoy his leisure in his own way, and that is with his family. To understand the immorality of this you must remember that it is women who are the chief patrons of music in Boston, and they insist upon patronizing artists as well as art. They like to have clever people in their drawing rooms, to put them through their paces before admiring and envious friends. Mr. Paur objected to being patronized in this way; he unwisely thought that there was no reason why he should be bored that strangers might have the satisfaction of staring at him. His obstinacy turned Society against him—Society written with a big S, please remember—and so he became a species of pariah celebrity, doomed to a purgatory where kid gloves and violets are unknown. He antagonized lovely women, and the apothecary store hath no bitterness like a woman's scorn. Another mistake made by Mr. Paur was in not allowing the members of his orchestra to rule him. A symphony orchestra is crowded with genius from the first fiddlers down to the cymbal players. Our Boston Symphony orchestra is particularly filled with genius, and there is not a man in it who is not persuaded that he knows more than any conductor set over him. Our first fiddle players are firmly convinced of this fact, and so when Mr. Paur first appeared before them they very generously went out of their way to give him advice, which he ungratefully refused to follow. In fact, he so far forgot his place as to fine, or threaten to fine, a first fiddle player for persistently coming late to rehearsals. Imagine the threatening to fine a combination of Paganini, Ysaye and Thompson! But, as in the fairy stories, Nemesis speedily followed the bad action with a cruel whip. When the Symphony orchestra went to New York the fiddle players, or rather some of the fiddle players, whispered certain secrets to the critics, and so there appeared the startling news that Mr. Paur was a poor conductor, and that he had been dismissed. One of the knowing ones, however, has confided to me that Mr. Paur has not been dismissed, but that he has been deprived of all authority, having no right to engage a soloist or discharge a recalcitrant musician, and so on through a long and foolish list. I am not a blind admirer of Mr. Paur, but there is not the slightest doubt that he is a most able and conscientious conductor. Thanks to a thousand and one little meannesses, his life has not been a pleasant one, but Boston has yet to see a more capable orchestra leader."

The concerts of the Kneisel quartet will be given this season in Association Hall, the auditorium of which has undergone some important changes to fit it better for chamber music. There will be eight concerts, as usual, the dates of which are the Mondays Oct. 28, Nov. 25, Dec. 30, Jan. 30, Feb. 17, March 9, April 6 and April 27. Among the novelties to be performed are a string quartet by Cesar Franck, a suite for piano and violin by Emil Bernard, two sonatas for clarinet and piano by Brahms, a concerto for strings by Handel and a MS. quartet by Hermann Graedener. The sale of season tickets will be announced at an early date.

Boston Transcript
SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1895.

FINAL SALE OF SYMPHONY SEATS.

Premiums Bid Friday for the $7.50 Seats for the Saturday Evening Concerts.

In Music Hall Friday morning the final auction sale of seats for the regular concerts of the Symphony Orchestra on Saturday evenings began at ten o'clock. The front seats on the floor were largely occupied by the bidders, and parties of two and three or more persons wandered about at the extreme rear of the floor or in the balconies, picking out the seats for which they wished to bid. It was the $7.50 seats that were disposed of Friday, and the sale was slower, owing to the fact that so many purchasers bought only single seats.

The seats at the rear on the main floor sold for $5, $6, $7 and $8 premium for those in the forward rows, and for as low as fifty cents premium for those in the last two rows, for some of which, indeed, there were no bidders. In the first balcony the rear seats were sold at premiums ranging from $6 up to $21, the latter premium being paid for the end seat numbered 572 in the second row on the left side, and the three neighboring ones numbered 569 to 571. Two seats on the right side sold for $18 premium each.

In the second balcony $27 premium was paid for the end seat numbered 27 in the front row on the right. Aside from this one, the premiums did not rise higher than $16, and most of them ranged from $5 to $10. The bidding as a rule was brisk, but the advances were usually small.

Boston Journal.
TEN PAGES.
SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1895.

LAST SYMPHONY SEATS.

Premiums Bid Friday for the $7 50 Seats for the Saturday Evening Concerts.

In Music Hall Friday morning the final auction sale of seats for the regular concerts of the Symphony Orchestra on Saturday evenings began at 10 o'clock. The front seats on the floor were largely occupied by the bidders, and parties of two and three or more persons wandered about at the extreme rear of the floor or in the balconies, picking out the seats for which they wished to bid. It was the $7 50 seats that were disposed of today, and the sale was slower, owing to the fact that so many purchasers bought only single seats.

The seats at the rear on the main floor sold for $5, $6, $7 and $8 premium for those in the forward rows, and for as low as 50 cents premium for those in the last two rows, for some of which, indeed, there were no bidders. In the first balcony the rear seats were sold at premiums ranging from $6 up to $21, the latter premium being paid for the end seat numbered 572 in the second row on the left side, and the three neighboring ones numbered 569 to 571. Two seats on the right side sold for $18 premium each.

In the second balcony $27 premium was paid for the end seat numbered 27 in the front row on the right. Aside from this one, the premiums did not rise higher than $16, and most of them ranged from $5 to $10. The bidding as a rule was brisk, but the advances were usually small.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, SEPT. 29, 1895.

Symphony Season.

The sales of season tickets for the public rehearsals and concerts of the Boston symphony orchestra were held last week, and the results clearly show the esteem in which this famous organization is held by the musical public. All seats for both series of performances were sold and the supply was not equal to the demand.

This season's concerts promise to be even more attractive than in the past, as several of the great soloists who will appear have not been heard here for some years. The program for the first rehearsal and concert, Oct 18 and 19, will be as follows: Symphony No. 1, Brahms; andante and variations, Mozart; capriccio, Dvorak; overture, "Leonore," No. 3, Beethoven.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVIII., NO. 68.
SUNDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1895.

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

The Kneisel quartet will begin its 11th season of chamber concerts in Boston on Monday evening, Oct. 28, at Association Hall, corner Boylston and Berkeley streets. It is a significant fact that a large proportion of the audience on that evening will also begin its 11th season as patrons of these concerts. To all lovers of the very best music, the annual announcement of the Kneisel quartet is most interesting. This season the assisting artists will be Mrs. Georg Henschel, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Miss Gesellschap, Mr. Carl Baermann, Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. E. A. MacDowell, Mr. Arthur Foote and Mr. Pourteau. Among the novelties to be performed are a quartet in D major by Caesar Franck, a suite by Emil Bernard, Brahm's clarinet sonatas, a concerto grosso for string orchestra by Handel, a trio for piano, violin and 'cello by Dvorak, an octet by C. M. Loeffler and a concerto grosso for string orchestra (MS.) by Bach. Other works will include quartets, op. 18, 29, 59 and 130, and a quintet, op. 95, by Beethoven; a sextet, op. 18, quartets, op. 67 and 111, and a quartet in F minor for piano and strings by Brahms; two quartets, op. 80 and 97, by Dvorak; two quartets by Haydn, a piano quartet and clarinet quintet by Mozart; Rubinstein's C minor quartet, and the C major quintet of Schubert.

The sale of season tickets opens at the box office, Music Hall, Monday, Oct. 21.

THE BOSTON TIMES
BOSTON, SUNDAY, OCT. 6, 1895.

The prices that prevailed at the sales of the Symphony tickets were on an average nearly thirty-three per cent higher than last season.

There will be eight concerts in the Kneisel quartette course, the dates of which are Mondays, Oct, 28, Nov. 25, Dec. 30, Jan. 30, Feb. 17. March 9, April 6 and April 27. They will be given in Association hall, which has been newly fitted up with special reference to the requirements of chamber music. Among the novelties promised are a string quartette by Cæsar Franck, a suite for piano and violin by Emil Bernard, two sonatas for clarinet and piano by Brahms, a concerto for strings by Handel and an MS. quartette by Herman Græ-dener.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1895.

KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERTS.

The Kneisel Quartet is now in the West, for concerts in Chicago, Evanston and Milwaukee.

The tenth series of concerts in Boston will be given in Association Hall, Boylston Street, corner of Berkeley. There will be changes made in the hall for the aid of the acoustics.

The dates of the concerts are Oct. 28, Nov. 25, Dec. 30, Jan. 13, Feb. 17, March 9, April 6 and 27.

The following works will be performed: Beethoven's quartets op. 18, 59, 130 (B flat), 29, and quintet F min. op. 95; Brahm's sextet B flat op. 18, quartet B flat op. 67, and G maj. op. 111, quintet F minor for piano and strings; Dvorak, quartet op. 80; quintet E flat major op. 97; Haydn, quartets G major and D major; Mozart, G minor piano quartet, clarinet quintet; Rubinstein C minor quartet; Schubert C major quintet.

These novelties will be performed: César Franck, D maj. quartet; Emil Bernard, suite op. 34; Brahm's clarinet sonatas; Handel concerts grosso; Bach concerto grosso MS.; Dvorak, trio for piano, violin and 'cello; C. M. Loeffler, octet.

Mrs. Henschel, Mrs. Beach, Miss Gesellschap, Messrs. Pourtau, MacDowell, Perabo, Baermann and Foote will assist.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1895.

THE CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONIES.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Paur, will give a series of concerts this season the following Thursday nights at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge: Oct. 31, Nov. 21, Dec. 12, Jan. 2, 16, Feb. 6, 20, March 12, April 9, 30. Among those who will appear as soloists are Mrs. De Vere-Sapio, Miss Brema, Miss Szumowska, Joseffy, Ben Davies. The sale of reserved seats will begin at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, Monday, Oct. 26, at 8 A. M. Tickets for the season will be $7 50. The concerts will begin at 7.45 o'clock.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The first rehearsal and concert of the fifteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, will be given in Music Hall Friday and Saturday. The program will be as follows: Brahms' First Symphony; Andante and variations from the Divertimento in D major (K 334), Mozart; Dvorak's Capriccio; Beethoven's overture "Leonore" No. 3.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, OCT 13, 1895.

Program of the First Symphony Concert.

The 15th season of the Boston symphony orchestra will open this week in Music hall, the first rehearsal being given Friday afternoon, Oct 18, with the regular concert Saturday evening. In the course of the season the famous organization will have the assistance of many prominent artists, among which will be Mme Melba, Marie Brema, Mrs Georg Henschel, Mme Clementine de Vere, Miss Lillian Blauvelt, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, Messrs Ben Davies, Georg Henschel, Joseffy, E. A. MacDowell, Carl Faelton, Ondricek, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder and Schulz. Others will be added to this list later.

Conductor Paur, who has been in Europe this summer, has secured several novelties for his orchestra, and doubtless the season will prove as brilliant as any in the career of this organization. The admission tickets for this week's concerts will be placed on sale tomorrow at Music hall.

The program of the first concert will be as follows:

Symphony, No.1	Bahms
Andante and variations	Mozart
Capriccio	Dvorak
Overture, Leonore, No. 3	Beethoven

[15]

Boston Symphony.

ONE of the most admirably balanced, harmonious and effective orchestral organizations that has ever appeared in this city. The musical public of Providence are to be congratulated on such an excellent series of entertainments. This was the hearty welcome extended to the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the columns of the Journal on the morning after its first appearance in Providence, 13 years ago, and never during the intervening seasons has there been any occasion to withdraw these words of commendation. In 1881, only a year previous to the debut of this matchless orchestra in Providence, Henry L. Higginson, a Boston banker, actuated solely by a desire to present good music in the best way, and fortunately possessed of means ample to carry out his most commendable impulse, conceived the idea of a large permanent orchestra, which should give each year an extended series of concerts in Music Hall, Boston, with an occasional visit to the adjacent New England cities. This idea was at once acted on and to-day what was then a Boston organization has grown to be a national pride—an orchestra second to none in the world, whose name and fame are known in every cultured city on the globe, dependent upon no subsidy from the public exchequer, as is the case in all of the European cities, but rather upon the generous liberality of a music-loving Bostonian.

PAUR.

A condensed resume of the careers of the various conductors of the orchestras and of the concerts given in this city since the first concert on the evening of Thursday, Nov. 16, 1882, may prove of interest.

Mr. Georg Henschel was the conductor at this opening concert, in 1882. The soloists were Mr. Henschel himself, Miss Alice Constance Ward, soprano, and Mr. Bernhard Listemann, at that time the first violin and concert-meister of the orchestra.

The concert was given in Music Hall and the programme was as follows:

Overture (Freischuetz)	Weber
Air (Creation)	Haydn
Symphony in C	Mozart
Concert Pathetique pour Violon	Ernst
Funeral March of a Marionette	Gounod
Pogner's Address (Meistersingers)	Wagner
Overture (Rienzi)	Wagner

Two more concerts were given during the season, and the following year Infantry Hall was selected as the most desirable location, and there the concerts have been given ever since. Mr. Henschel remained as conductor until the season of 1884-85, and on his retirement located in London, where he met with his usual marked success as a composer and teacher, and in a few years assumed the leadership of a large orchestra in London, giving 12 concerts each year in St. James Hall.

Mr. Henschel's successor was Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who came from Vienna, and to this second leader can be attributed much of the wonderful precision and finish of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Five years of untiring zeal and persistent striving for absolute perfection of ensemble, during which time he spared neither the orchestra nor himself, and Mr. Gericke returned to Vienna, leaving behind him the stamp of a skill so marvellous that it cannot be effaced. It was indeed a gracious compliment to Mr. Gericke that on his arrival in Vienna he at once assumed the leadership of the "Geselschaft Musikfreund," a society not unlike the Handel and Haydn Society in Boston, the orchestra, however, playing a much more important part. The above society having offered its leadership to Mr. Gericke just as he was leaving Vienna for should return, and [illegible] retained. Mr. Gericke retained this position until last season, a period of six years, and is at present resting on his well-deserved laurels.

JOSEFFY.

The third and youngest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was Arthur Nikisch, a Hungarian, leader of the orchestra at the Stadt Theatre at Leipsic, the first opera house in that city. His reign was for four years, a year longer than that of Mr. Henschel and a year less than Mr. Gericke. One thing the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always done for its conductors—it has given to them a greater renown than was theirs when they assumed control. Henschel, Gericke and Nikisch all must own a greater fame attended their return to Europe because of their association with America's first orchestra. Nikisch on leaving Boston was appointed director of the Royal Opera and also conductor of the orchestra at Buda-Pesth, but has just accepted a more congenial position as the conductor of the Gewandhaus Concerts in Leipsic.

When Arthur Nikisch left the Stadt Theatre in Leipsic to come to Boston he was succeeded by the same man who followed him as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the present leader, Mr. Emil Paur. It is also worthy of comment that Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur played at the same desk as first violinists under Mr. Gericke at the very same Stadt Theatre several years before.

Mr. Paur enters upon his third year with the orchestra this season and below will be found a partial list of works he has promised to the patrons of the Providence concerts, as well as a list of the soloists. At the 45 concerts given by the orchestra in Providence the following list of eminent soloists have appeared:

DE VERE-SAPIO.

Mme. Lillian Nordica,	Mr. Fol Plancon,
Miss Emma Juch,	Mr. Theodor Reichmann
Miss C. De Vere,	Mr. Emil Fischer,
Miss Emma Thursby,	Mr. Georg Henschel,
Mrs. Georg Henschel,	Mr. Max Heinrich,
Miss Clara Poole,	Mr. Anton Schott.
Mrs. Arthur Nikisch,	Mr. Heinrich Meyn,
Mme. Antonia Mielke,	Mr. Eugen d'Albert,
Miss Louise Meisslinger,	Mr. Carl Baermann,
Miss Gertrude Franklin,	Mr. F. Busoni,
Miss Gertrude Edmands	Mr. Frederic Boscovitz,
Miss Lena Little,	Mr. Cesar Thomson,
Miss Marguerite Hall,	Mr. Franz Kneisel,
Miss A. Aus Der Ohe,	Mr. Bernhard Listemann
Mrs. Bloomfield Zeisler,	Mr. T. Adamowski,
Mrs. Emil Paur,	Mr. Fritz Giese,
Miss L. Von Stosch,	Mr. Anton Hekking.
Miss Alice Wentworth,	Mr. Alwin Schroeder.
Mr. Jules Jordan,	Mr. Rafael Joseffy,

Each season Providence has been given several novelties in the various programmes, and for the coming season four new works are promised. On several occasions a work has received its first production in America at these concerts, a fact worthy of recognition. The last instance of this sort occurred at the first concert of the series at Infantry Hall, when Sgambati's Symphony No. 1, was given its first American production. Precisely the same standard of performance is maintained here as in Boston, and New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington all pay a higher rate for five concerts than Providence pays for a series of six.

This year's season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence includes six concerts, each on a Wednesday evening, the dates being: Oct. 23, Nov. 27, Jan. 8, Feb. 12, March 18 and April 22. They will be given, in accordance with what has become the rule, in Infantry Hall. The orchestra will be assisted by the following solo artists: Mme. De Vere-Sapio, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Miss Lillian Blauvelt, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, Mr. Ben Davies and others, who cannot now be announced. The sale of season tickets opens at the box office at Infantry Hall to-morrow morning at 9.

The list of works to be performed includes those given below, which include four that are new to American audiences, and it is not out of place to state that the first appearance of Joseffy this season in America will be at the Providence concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Here is this season's repertoire:

Beethoven	Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"
Schumann	Symphony No. 1 in B-flat major
Mendelssohn	Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch"
Brahms	Symphony No. 2, in D major
Tschaikowsky	Symphony No. 6 (First time.)
Wagner	Overture, "Flying Dutchman"
Wagner	A Faust Overture
Volkmann	Fest Overture
Reznicek	Overture, "Donna Diana" (First time.)
Delibes	Suite, "Sylvia"
Godard	Suite (First time.)
Haendel	Largo
Mozart	Turkish March
Dvorak	Capriccio
Richard Strauss	Prelude and Entr'acte, "Guntram" (First time.)

Local Musical Notes.

FELIX WENDELSCHAEFER, director of the Providence Opera House Orchestra, who had the misfortune to meet with an accident that resulted in his arm being fractured just as the season was opening, and has been in ordinary ever since, will resume his duties at the theatre to-morrow evening. He has now quite recovered.

Rivarde, the celebrated violinist, is to appear in a concert at Infantry Hall, this city, in December.

W. C. Carl of New York, probably the leading recital organist in the country and the favorite pupil of Gilmont, spent a day in Providence last week as the guest of N. B. Sprague.

The Narragansett Choral Society began its season last week with the largest chorus in its history and a degree of enthusiasm that promises the best of results.

Mr. N. B. Sprague will begin an extended tour of organ recitals in the principal New England towns on Nov. 1. He expects this season to make his tour larger than ever before. Last season his engagements took him into northern Massachusetts, and there were some engagements as far distant as in Maine.

DAVIES.

There was an error in the announcement of the recitals to be given by Miss Charlotte Broome at Pilgrim Congregational Church. These entertainments are to take place on Friday evenings, and not Sundays, as was stated.

Mr. David E. Carter will probably go to Newport as an organist.

Mr. N. B. Sprague was the recipient last week of a number of gifts that he places great value upon. They are from the venerable organist of Temple Church, London, England, Dr. E. J. Hopkins, President of the College of Organists of London. Dr. Hopkins is undoubtedly the leading organist of the English capital and one of the leading composers in Great Britain, especially of organ music. While Mr. Sprague was in London last summer this venerable musician contributed in no small measure to the pleasure of both Mr. Sprague and his companion, Judge Carpenter, and the present received the other day is the fruit of the friendship then begun. The gift includes a portrait of Dr. Hopkins, an autograph letter, a printed history, and an account of the scheme of the organ of Temple Church, which was first built in 1307, and a number of other things of value, even aside from the fact that they are gifts from this particular gentleman.

Brown University Mandolin and Guitar Club has been organized with the following membership: First mandolins, H. C. Clark, '99; C. M. Whipple, '97; A. M. Greenwood, '98. Second mandolin, C. B. Dana, '99; C. F. Shipper, '99. Guitars, M. H. Cady, '99; R. E. Barker, '99; A. A. Mulligan, '99. Flute, E. A. Robinson, '97. Violin, E. C. Broome, '97.

The remaining artists of the company which is to support Mme. Melba in her tour of operatic concerts arrived last week. Among the leading members is Scalchi, without whom many leading contralto roles are well-nigh impossible, and who is a universal favorite. Mlle. Bauermeister is another favorite with all opera goers, and the reputation of Campanari rests scarcely more upon his fine voice and method than upon his undeniable histrionic ability. The tenor of the company, Lloyd d'Aubigne, though less known than the others, has an enviable reputation and astonished the public last year by acquitting himself brilliantly as Faust when called unexpectedly to the part by the sudden illness of Jean De Reszke. Mr. Ronald, the conductor of the orchestra, was secured by Mr. Ellis when in London last summer. He is one of the staff of Sir Augustus Harris of Covent Garden, and is a brother of Clark Russell the popular novelist. Melba is to appear at Infantry Hall, Nov. 5

SZUMOWSKA.

The Providence Symphony Orchestra (amateur), will resume rehearsals at the Providence Art Club, 11 Thomas street, to-morrow evening (Oct. 14). There are a number of new names among the applicants for membership, and the prospect is favorable for one of the most successful seasons in the history of the orchestra. Musicians desiring to become members should address Robert Bonner, conductor, or A. Livingston Mason, business manager, care Providence Art Club, 11 Thomas street.

BLAUVELT.

The chorus choir of the South Baptist Church, corner Ocean and Gallup streets, will render the following music at the evening service to-day: "I Am Alpha and Omega," Stainer; "Memories of Galilee," Brown; "The Way is Long and Dreary," Sullivan.

Miss Luella Flagg of Worcester, a pupil of Dr. Jordan, who sang the contralto part for the Arion Club in the "Walpurgis Night" at last season's concert, will sing the part of Armida in Niels Gade's "Crusaders," to be given by the Choral Association of the South Baptist Church, Wednesday, Nov. 6.

At the Westminster Unitarian Church the following music will be sung at the morning service to-day: Anthem, "I Will Greatly Rejoice in the Lord," with soprano solo, Cruikshank; solo by Miss Mary Louise Hayden of Boston, "By the Waters of Babylon," Howell; response, with bass solo and quartet, "Teach us to Pray," Jordan; anthem, "Sun of My Soul," with alto solo by Miss Deane, and tenor solo, Wagner.

Mrs. Elene Eaton, the American dramatic soprano, repeated the success she made with the Handel and Haydn Society, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, etc., at the recent Worcester Festival, singing "St. Paul" and "Israel in Egypt." The best evidence of Mrs. Eaton's success is that she was given a reception by Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Downey, one of the directors of the Worcester Musical Association, on Friday evening, and by the President, Mr. A. C. Munroe, on Saturday evening.

[16]

Brooklyn Daily Times.
24 AND 26 BROADWAY.
BROOKLYN, KINGS COUNTY, N. Y.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1895.

A SERIES OF FINE CONCERTS.

BROOKLYN INSTITUTE DEPARTMENT OF MUSIC PROGRAM.

Boston Symphony Concerts to Be Given This Year Under the Joint Patronage Of the Department of Music of the Brooklyn Institute and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society—World-famous Artists Engaged to Assist Herr Paur And His Orchestra of Ninety Pieces—Details of the Performances.

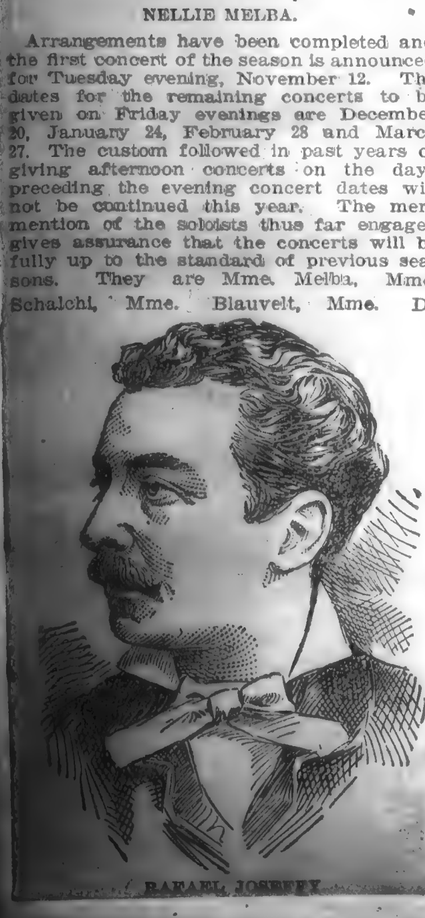
A very attractive prospectus has been issued giving special information regarding the five concerts to be given this season by the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Academy of Music, under the joint auspices of the department of music of the Brooklyn institute, and the Brooklyn Philharmonic society.

EMIL PAUR.

But for the enterprise and activity of the department of music this splendid orchestra with Mr. Paur as conductor, might not have been heard in Brooklyn, and this would have occasioned much regret. The department has known steady success in the past and it may be inferred from the willingness of the institute clientele to rise to the genuine artistic opportunities offered them, that the confidence of the officers in starting the new enterprise will not be misplaced. This engagement was not made until assurance was asked and received that only the best solo talent of the country should supplement the work of the orchestra.

NELLIE MELBA.

Arrangements have been completed and the first concert of the season is announced for Tuesday evening, November 12. The dates for the remaining concerts to be given on Friday evenings are December 20, January 24, February 28 and March 27. The custom followed in past years of giving afternoon concerts on the days preceding the evening concert dates will not be continued this year. The mere mention of the soloists thus far engaged gives assurance that the concerts will be fully up to the standard of previous seasons. They are Mme. Melba, Mme. Schalchi, Mme. Blauvelt, Mme. De Vere-Sapio, Rafael Joseffy, [illegible] Davies, Lloyd D'Aubigne and Giuseppe Campanari. Scarcely less well known are those who will be at the head of the orchestral players, Franz Kneisel, Timothee Adamowski and Alwin Schroeder. Mr. Paur will, of course, conduct the orchestra, which will be made up of ninety musicians.



RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

LILLIAN BLAUVELT.

This organization is so well known that it hardly seems necessary to dwell upon its merits at this time. Started on an ideal basis by Mr. Higginson, of Boston, it has been devoted to giving high-class concerts exclusively, and has gained the reputation throughout the country of being the best equipped orchestra in this country, and one of the most complete, if not the largest permanently maintained organization of the kind in the world. Besides giving a notable series of concerts every season in Boston, the orchestra makes a tour of the country, appearing in most of the large cities.

All the singers engaged have been heard in Brooklyn, but this will not detract from the interest that will center in their appearance. They are well-tried favorites, and will receive a hearty welcome. Mme. Melba may be regarded as the bright particular star of the vocal firmament. She is an exquisite, not to say incomparable vocalist, and she has been a reigning favorite during the past few years, both here and abroad. Mme. Scalchi is a competent singer who has been before the public many years. Her voice is not in its prime, but she is a popular favorite and is always cordially received. There will be a natural curiosity to hear Mme. De Vere-Sapio who returns to this country after an absence of three years, and there is no reason to doubt that she will live up to her past success. The career of Lillian Blauvelt has been a notably successful one. She began as a concert soloist in Brooklyn and has many friends in this city. Mr. Joseffy is an artist of acknowledged ability, who needs no introduction to Brooklynites, although it is some time since he appeared here. D'Aubigne and Campanari have made their principal success in opera, but are well equipped for concert work.

BEN DAVIES.

CLEMENTINE DE VERE-SAPIO.

The department of music has taken a commendable step in undertaking to support these concerts. They are desirous of bringing the series within the reach of all, and with this in view, the price for course tickets has been fixed low. The sale will begin Tuesday evening, October 15, at the Art galleries, 174 Montague street, and will continue thereafter at the same place and also at the institute office, 502 Fulton street, and at Chandler's, 300 Fulton street. The soloists at the first concert will be Mme. Melba, Mme. Scalchi, M. D'Aubigne and M. Campanari.

GIUSEPPI CAMPANARI.

These concerts should not be confounded with the series of afternoon and evening concerts by the department of music which will be given as usual. These will take place at Association hall and will begin October 30. A splendid series has been planned as follows:

SOFIA SCALCHI.

October 30, matinee and evening, two song recitals by Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, soprano, assisted by Arthur W. Foote, piano, and Anton Hegner, 'cello; Isador Luckstone, accompanist.

November 27, matinee and evening, two piano recitals, by Mme. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeissler, pianist, assisted by William H. Reiger, tenor, and Miss Bertha Bucklin, violin (invited); Mr. Luckstone, accompanist.

LLOYD D'AUBIGNE.

December 11, matinee and evening, two ballad concerts by Miss Charlotte Walker, soprano; Miss Cecile Horrlocker, alto; William R. Williams, tenor; Grant Odell, basso, assisted by Albert Mildenberg, piano and Abram Ray Tyler, accompanist.

January 8, matinee and evening, two choral concerts by the Caecilia Ladies' Vocal society, assisted by George W. Fergusson, barytone; Franz Wilczek, violin; Miss Grace A. Povey, accompanist; musical director, John Hyatt Brewer.

February 5, matinee and evening, two chamber music concerts by the Kneisel String quartet, of Boston: Franz Kneisel, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; Louis Svecenski, viola; Alwin Schroeder, 'cello, assisted by Mrs. Corinne Moore Lawson, soprano; Mr. Luckstone, accompanist.

March 11, matinee and evening, two song recitals by Max Heinrich, barytone, assisted by Mrs. Charles Tyler Dutton, soprano, and Miss Maude Powell, violin; Mr. Luckstone, accompanist.

April 8, matinee and evening, two piano recitals by Edward A. MacDowell, piano, assisted by Mrs. Marie Vanderveer-Green, contralto. Accompanist to be engaged.

April 29, matinee and evening, two choral concerts by the Arion Singing society (evening), and the Arion Ladies' chorus (matinee), assisted by Mme. Georgine Von Januschowsky, soprano. 'Cellist to be selected. Musical director, Arthur Claassen.

To supplement and round off the season's program it is expected that Paderewski and Ondricek may be engaged for special extra concerts.

The officers of the department of music are: Walter S. Carter, president; Charles H. Morse, first vice-president; R. Huntington Woodman, second vice-president; John Hyatt Brewer, secretary; Perlee V. Jervis, librarian. Henry K. Sheldon is president of the Brooklyn Philharmonic society; L. S. Burnham, vice-president, and B. T. Frothingham, secretary.

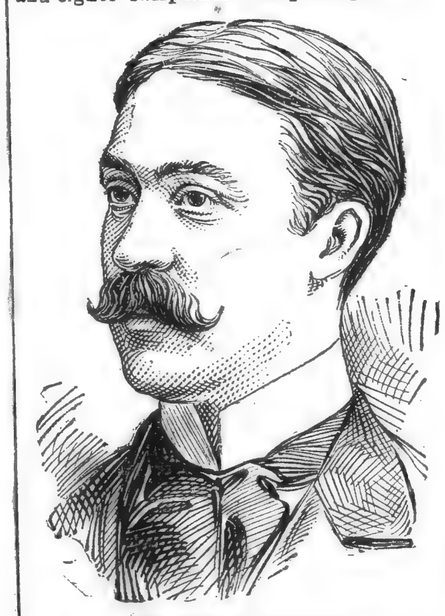
MILTON'S PUBLIC [illegible]

SUNDAY MORNING HERALD.
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 6, 1895.

MELBA, THE QUEEN OF SONG.

Mme. Melba, the "Queen of Song," and most famous of living singers, will be heard at the Lyceum on Thursday evening, and such an audience, both in numbers and quality as is seldom seen in Rochester, may be looked for. The sale of seats will begin Tuesday morning. The farewells and returns of Patti have become so numerous that the public takes them as a matter of course, and is rather amused by them. It is tolerably certain, however, that those farewells are, or will soon be, over. She could brook no rival near her throne, and, now that one has come, her peaceful abdication may be looked for. That rival is Melba. To the attractions of youth and beauty she adds a voice which Milan, Paris, London, New York, have in turn declared to be peerless. An entire generation has passed since an artist has arisen on whom the mantle of the great "diva" could be bestowed. This will also be the first chance for Rochester music lovers so hear Madame Scalchi, the consummate contralto artist without whom, it may almost be said, no great operatic cast can now be made; to enjoy the singing of Mlle. Bauermeister, whose great popularity at the Metropolitan Opera house, New York, has been earned only by unquestioned musical gifts and a remarkable power over her audiences; to appreciate the fine abilities both as vocalists and as dramatic artists, of Signor Guiseppe Companari, the basso, and Signor D'Aubigne, the tenor, of this company, who, if all reports are true, are to prove themselves worthy members of a distinguished musical coterie; the efforts of all having the important assistance of a well-trained orchestra, under the baton of an English conductor, Landon Ronald, especially engaged for this company, whose ability may be judged from the fact that he has become chief d'orchestre under the famous Sir Augustus Harris, of London.

The chief interest of the occasion will be in Melba, the peerless, the indescribable, whose liquid notes have set glowing with enthusiasm the soberest critics of the musical centers of two continents. There can be no doubt that in hearing her this community is to listen for the first time to the only artist who can give the musical delight heretofore only possible to be experienced by those who were fortunate enough to have heard in an elaborate program of operatic selections, and Mme. Melba will also be heard in the mad scene from Lucia D'Lammermoor. This will be followed by the fifth act of "Faust," with Mme. Melba as Marguerite. Signor D'Aubigne as Faust, and Signor Campanari as Mephistopheles.



CHARLES A. ELLIS.

For the opportunity of hearing such a musical treat in the smaller cities thanks are due Manager Charles A. Ellis, of Boston, who has undertaken the enterprise at an enormous expense. Mr. Ellis is manager of the well known Boston Symphony orchestra and also of the concert tours of many famous musical celebreties.

REDUCTION

RATIO

13x

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

MUSIC FOR THE PEOPLE

Furnished by the Brooklyn Institute.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

A New Departure of the Department of Music—Some of the Noted Artists Who Will Appear.

It is easy to start artistic fads among persons with long purses. It is not so easy to arouse a genuine interest in art among those whose means are limited and whose days are occupied with strenuous labor. Since its foundation, the Department of Music of the Brooklyn Institute has set itself to this latter task and has performed it well. Now it proposes to extend the advantages of orchestral music among a popular membership which has already shown its hearty appreciation of the Institute's endeavors along both literary, scientific and musical lines.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is probably the premier organization of its kind in North America. The soloists at the symphony concerts number the greatest musical geniuses from abroad as well as the fruit and flower of American musical culture. This great agency, the Brooklyn Institute has taken hold of this year. Five concerts will be given under the joint auspices of the Department of Music and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, with the orchestra as the chief attraction, supplemented by Melba, Clementine De Vere, Blauvelt, Scalchi, Ben Davies, Joseffy and other gifted singers and instrumentalists. The rate for course tickets has been set low, and the engagement of the Academy of Music gives assurance of plenty of room for the big audiences. The dates for the concerts are: Tuesday, Nov. 12, and Fridays, Dec. 26, Jan. 24, Feb. 28 and March 27.

MME. DE VERE SAPIO.

Herr Paur, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, has been in Europe this summer and has selected a number of new things which he will bring out this season for the first time. The orchestral works will be rendered by ninety musicians, and at the first concert the following artists will be heard: Mme. Nella Melba, soprano; Mme. Sofia Scalchi, contralto; M. Lloyd D'Aubigne, tenor; M. Guiseppe Campanari, basso.

Mme. Melba has had a comparatively brief, but an amazingly successful career as a prima donna, ranking with Nordica, Eames, Calve and the other queens of songs whom Messrs. Abbey and Grau have introduced to the American public within the last few years. She is an Australian by birth, but is of Scotch descent. She learned music very young under the tuition of her mother, who was an accomplished amateur. It was not until she was 12 years old, however, that her extraordinary voice was discovered. As a girl, Mme. Melba was full of ambition, and after acquiring all the Antipodean teachers could give her, she went to Paris and further cultivated her gift under the celebrated Mme. Marchesi. Notwithstanding the objections interposed by her father, Mr. Mitchell (who was one of the Commissioners of the Melbourne Exposition), a lyric career became irresistible; and upon the completion of her studies with Mme. Marchesi, Mme. Melba made her debut on Oct. 15, 1887, as Gilda in "Rigoletto," at the Theater de la Monnaie, Brussels. Her triumph here was so marked that she was engaged right away for a series of performances. Then followed a series of flattering receptions in London, Paris and other continental cities. Gounod and Ambroise Thomas respectively taught her the leading roles in their operas "Romeo and Juliette" and "Hamlet." On coming to New York, Melba became a great favorite with the metropolitan public. Her voice is of a remarkably pure, beautiful and sympathetic quality, with a very extensive range. Her vocalization is almost unrivalled in fluency. Mme. Melba now has her own concert company on the road.

MR. BEN DAVIS.

Of the other artistes who will be heard at the Symphony concerts, it is not necessary to speak at so much length. De Vere and Blauvelt are both native songbirds, that is their homes are in this country, though Mrs. De Vere Sapio was born in Paris and is of mixed Belgian and English extraction. Mme. Blauvelt has been heard time and again by Institute audiences, and is very much of a favorite in Brooklyn. How well she is liked is attested by the fact that she has been engaged to appear in a matinee and evening song recital to open the Institute chamber concerts at Association Hall on Oct. 30. Mme. Scalchi has been called the greatest contralto of our time. This is high praise, and whatever be the strict judgment of critics, no one will deny her claims to a leading place. Mme. Scalchi represents the best traditions of Italian opera. Born in Turin, she began her stage career at 16. She has sung in almost every large civilized city in the world, including Milan, London, St. Petersburg, Warsaw, Vienna, Madrid, Rio Janeiro and New York.

Joseffy, the pianist, will also make his bow to a Brooklyn audience this season under the auspices of the Symphony. Joseffy is second only to Paderewski as a master of the pianoforte. The other solo instrumentalists will include Franz Kneisel, the director of the Kneisel String Quartet, violin; Timothee Adamowski, violin, and Alwin Schroeder, 'cello. Lloyd d'Aubigne, the tenor, and Guiseppe Campanari, the basso of the concerts, are both comparatively young artists of the most brilliant performance and promise. D'Aubigne first attracted popular notice last season by taking Jean de Reszke's role of Faust in Boston when that singer was too ill to appear. Campanari is a spirited basso, and is at his best in Italian opera.

Besides these large concerts at the Academy, the department of music will by no means neglect its friends, who retain their old fondness for the less pretentious but equally beautiful chamber pieces of the great composers. The sixteen concerts to be given in Association Hall, beginning Oct. 30, have been planned to suit every variety of refined musical taste in the kind of works referred to. Opening with Mme. Blauvelt's song recitals, assisted by Arthur W. Foote, the pianist; Anton Hegner, 'cello, and Isador Luckstone, accompanist. the second programme will consist of two piano recitals by Mme. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeissler, supported by William H. Rieger, tenor, and Miss Bertha Bucklin, violin. These two concerts will occur Nov. 27. The other events of the season are: Dec. 11, matinee and evening, two ballad concerts by Miss Charlotte Walker, soprano; Miss Cecile Horrlocker, alto; William R. Williams, tenor; Grant Odell, basso, assisted by Albert Mildenberg, piano, and Abram Ray Tyler, accompanist. Jan. 8, matinee and evening, two choral concerts by the Cecilia Ladies' Vocal Society, assisted by George W. Ferguson, baritone; Franz Wilczek, violin; Miss Grace A. Povex, accompanist; John Hyatt Brewer, director. Feb. 5, matinee and evening, two chamber music concerts by the Kneisel String Quartet, of Boston; Franz Kneisel, first violin; Louis Svecenski, viola, and Alwin Schroeder, 'cello. On this occasion Mrs. Corinne Moore Lawson, the western soprano, will also appear. March 11, matinee and evening, two song recitals by Max Heinrich, the baritone, assisted by Mrs. Charles Tyler Dutton, soprano, and Miss Maude Powell, violin. April 8, matinee and evening, two piano recitals by Edward A. McDowell, the Boston pianist, assisted by Mrs. Marie Vanderveer Green, contralto. Mrs.

HERR PAUR.

M. CAMPANARI.

Green is a native of the town of Flatbush, and has won a series of musical successes abroad. April 29, matinee and evening, two choral concerts by the Arion Mannergesang Verein (evening) and the Arion Damengesang Verein (afternoon), assisted by Miss Georgine Von Januschowsky, soprano. Arthur Claassen, the well-known director, will have charge of this concert.

In addition to these elaborate programmes, the Department of Music will give special and extra concerts whenever there is a call for them from the members. At one of these extra concerts the peerless Paderewski is expected, and at another Franz Ondricek, the Bohemian violinist. Ondricek will also likely be heard at one of the Symphony concerts.

Nemesis and the Deserter.

A man who deserted during the war of 1870 has just been arrested here, writes the Paris correspondent of the London "Telegraph." He belonged to an artillery regiment, and when the Commune broke out he joined the revolutionists, fought in their ranks, and disappeared when the Versailles troops entered Paris. Until recently this individual has lived in the country, but a short time ago he came to this metropolis in search of employment. Until he could get settled he was in the habit of sleeping in the different night refuges, and his name having excited suspicion his case was investigated, and he was taken into custody. The deserter, who is 53 years of age, is now at the Depot of the Prefecture of Police, pending his transfer to the military authorities. He had fondly hoped that his offense had been forgotten; so, lulled into a false feeling of security, he left his provincial retreat.

MME. MELBA.

RECORD IN THE BRAIN.

Thought and Action Leave Impressions in the Gray Matter.

DEVELOPMENT OF BUMPS.

Professor Gates' Novel Experiment with Trained Puppies—Interesting Physiological Tests.

What is regarded by many scientists as the most valuable discovery ever made concerning the relations of the structures and functions of the mind was recently announced to the scientific world by Professor Elmer Gates, a psychologist, who has for several years been making elaborate studies both in Washington and Philadelphia, says a Washington correspondent of the Pittsburg "Dispatch."

By training pet animals, especially dogs, to perform various difficult tricks, Professor Gates developed many strange abnormalities in the gray structures of their brain. In this manner he has not only located the exact parts of the brain in which even the most intricate emotions originate, but has convinced himself of a method by which the brain of man may be built entirely anew. His laboratory is one of the most interesting institutions of the kind in the world. Various instruments have been erected in it for aiding the professor in his peculiar training.

In one experiment Professor Gates trained dogs so skillfully that they were able to distinguish colors, one from another, and associate them with action. Seven little shepherd puppies were kept in a totally darkened room from the moment they were born until they became nine months old. So careful was the professor lest even a spark should enter this room that he placed three different doors in the approach to it.

M. JOSEFFY.

A second group of little shepherd dogs of the same age were allowed to lead a normal life. A third group of the same age and stock were put through an interesting course of sight training. To accomplish this the floor of the hall leading to one room of the laboratory was covered with square metallic plates, separated each from the other by insulation. These, with the exception of a few, were connected with the current of a strong electric induction coil. Those not connected were irregularly scattered and painted a like color. The others were painted in various other shades, giving the whole floor a checkered appearance.

At first when the dogs followed the professor to his laboratory they had their feet comfortably tickled, not knowing the proper combination. In a few months, however, after being trained a number of hours each day, they gradually learned the proper plates, no matter how their positions were changed. Within five months the professor had perfected this unique education to his satisfaction.

Another interesting method of developing the color bumps was by feeding the same dogs meat placed under different colored pans, which had to be turned over with their noses before the food could discovered. Each pan was rubbed with meat on the outside that they might not be led to the proper pan to smell. Each was shown that the yellow pans only contained the meat. For several weeks, however, they continued to turn each pan, indiscriminately until finding the dinner.

MME. SCALCHI.

After six weeks the proper places were found the first time, no matter in what manner their positions were altered. By placing the food under the pans of other colors they soon became able to discriminate between seven different shades of red, several of green and of still others.

The three groups of puppies when nine months old were chloroformed, and their brains and spinal cords studied under powerful microscopes and by applying various chemical tests. Those kept in the dark room all their lives showed a total absence of development in the portion of the gray exterior covering, or cortex, which Professor Gates previously knew to be occupied by "seeing area." This was totally lacking in cells.

The group which had led a normal dog life had much greater development in the "bump of sight," as the common phrenologist would call it. The cortex was thicker, more thickly supplied with arteries and veins. It was more gray in color and contained cells. But the seeing area of the dogs highly trained showed a wonderful development. The cortex was abnormally thick and exceeded those of the normal dogs in the number of cells and blood vessels. The cells were much more complex in form.

In short, in that portion of the brain where originated the sense of sight the highly trained dogs were found to be twenty-five times as complex as the group which had led a usual life. It therefore seems very apparent that similar training applied to human beings deficient in brains might

[18]

WILL SING IN BROOKLYN.

OPERATIC STARS BOOKED FOR THE ACADEMY.

Programmes Prepared by the Department of Music of the Brooklyn Institute and the Philharmonic Society. Melba, Scalchi and De Vere Sapio.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given at the Academy of Music November 12, with Melba, Scalchi, D'Aubigne and Campanari as soloists.

This year the Symphony concerts will appeal to larger audiences than before. The department of music of the Brooklyn institute will co-operate with the Brooklyn Philharmonic society in their management. The institute department of music has done a great work since its foundation. It has admirably filled the need existing in this city for first rate chamber music and it has gathered together a clientele of cultivated, music loving people. This year it takes the boards of the Academy of Music with its sister society, making a wider appeal, both to its own membership and the artistic instincts of Brooklynites generally than it has ever attempted before.

Five concerts in all will be given under the auspices of the Philharmonic and the department of music. The dates are Tuesday, November 12, and the Friday evenings falling on December 20, January 24, February 28 and March 27. Among those who will sing are Mme. Nellie Melba, soprano; Mme. Clementine De Vere-Sapio, soprano; Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, soprano; Mme. Sofia Scalchi, contralto; Ben Davies, tenor; Lloyd D'Aubigne, tenor; Giuseppe Campanari, basso.

Chief of the instrumental soloists will be Rafael Joseffy, the pianist, and the solo string performers will include Franz Kneisel, violin, director of the Kneisel string quartet; Timothee Adamowski, violin, and Alwin Schroeder, 'cello. Prefatory to some notice of the soloists, it may be mentioned that the present is the fifteenth season of the Boston Symphony. At home forty-eight concerts are given annually, lasting from October to May. Herr Paur's orchestral forces number eighty-seven players, constituting the largest permanent orchestra maintained exclusively for concert purposes in the world. Herr Paur has been in Europe during the summer and has reurned with a number of new compositions, which will greatly strengthen the orchestra repertoire.

Mme. Melba, the foremost prima donna on the Bostom Symphony list, is of Scotch descent and was born in Australia. She began the study of the pianoforte at a very early age, her mother, being an accomplished musician. She pursued her studies under professional teachers, securing a thorough ground work in harmony and composition, but it was not until she was about 12 years old that it was discovered that nature had endowed her with a voice of unusual beauty. The young girl took a few lessons in Australia, but her ambition led her in the end to Paris, where she placed herself under the tuition of the famous Mme. Marchesi. Her father, who was one of the commissioners of the Melbourne exposition, was strenuously opposed to her adopting the lyric stage, but Mme. Melba persisted. After completing her studies with Mme. Marchesi, she made her debut in 1887, as Gilda in "Rigoletto" at the Theater de La Monnaie, Brussels. She immediately won such favor that the intendant engaged her for a term and she appeared in several leading grand opera roles. Then Sir Augustus Harris, the London impresario, secured her for Covent Garden, and in the season of 1888 she made her debut in London, in "Lucia" with a success well remembered by all English opera goers.

Since then Mme. Melba's career has been a constant succession of triumphs. A favorite at Brussels, she has sung in Paris, London and New York as well. The grand opera in Paris has been the scene of many of her best interpretations, including the role of Ophelie, which was studied with Ambroise Thomas, the composer of "Hamlet," and Juliette, which she learned with Gounod, afterward appearing in London with Jean de Reszke, who assumed the part of Romeo. M. Bemberg wrote "Elaine" for her. During the last two seasons, Mme. Melba has been one of Abbey & Grau's leading cantatrices. At the Metropolitan Opera house, New York, she has divided honors with Calve, Nordica and Eames. This season she has her own operatic concert company on the road, including a complete orchestra and four solo artists.

Mme. Clementine De Vere Sapio has been characterized as belonging to the very limited class of singers who have succeeded in combining the excellencies of widely different styles of music. The description is a truthful one. It would be difficlut to say whether Mme. Sapio is at her best in opera, oratorio or concert. Judging from her own adherence to the concert stage, it may perhaps be thought she is best fitted for this variety of musical endeavor. Clemence Duchene De Vere Sapio was born in Paris and is partly of continental extraction. Her father was a Belgian nobleman, his wife being an English woman. Mlle. De Vere's musical education was had under Mme. Albertini Baucarde, in Florence, Italy, and she made her operatic debut in that city at the age of 16, in "The Huguenots," arousing the greatest enthusiasm by the youthful brilliancy of her powers. Subsequently she appeared at the leading theaters of France, Italy, Mexico and Spain. She studied Ophelie and Marguerite with Thomas and Gounod, respectively. Her fame increased, and she was sought after in England, Australia and the United States. Since the beginning of her permanent residence here, Mme. Sapio has become one of our best liked sopranos. Her pure and perfect voice, brilliancy of execution and delicacy of shading have been commented upon and raved over by musical critics from one end of the country to the other.

Mme. Lillian Blauvelt and Mme. Sofia Scalchi conclude the list of the artists already announced. Mme. Scalchi is the contralto of the Melba operatic concert company. For a decade her services have been considered indispensable to the success of every important operatic entertainment. She is a native of Turin and went into opera very young. She has won laurels in nearly every large city including Milan, London, St. Petersburg, Warsaw, Vienna, Madrid, Rio Janeiro and New York. During several of Patti's transcontinental tours, Mme. Scalchi accompanied the peerless singer and was only second in popular esteem and regard to Patti herself. By many Mme. Scalchi is ranked as the greatest living contralto.

Ben Davies, the English tenor, is a fine representative of English male singers and will no doubt sustain his enormous reputation here. Lloyd D'Aubigne is not so well known to the public as Ben Davies, but is nevertheless a rising star in the operatic world. He first became prominently in evidence in the course of the last season in Boston, when Jean de Reszke became suddenly indisposed, and he was called upon at an hour's notice to replace him in the role of Washington; Infantry hall, Providence; Sander's theater, Cambridge, Mass.; and at occasional performances in other cities.

SOME SYMPHONY ARTISTS.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1895

The Symphony Sale.

As usual, it was full of society interest, and prices ranged higher than last year. Seats which then brought five dollars premium for the matinee concerts, now brought ten, in the front corners, generally considered undesirable; while in the rear rows, seats which have often brought only twenty-five cents premium, or been left unsold at the auction, this year brought from six to twenty dollars premium. The lowest premiums for the matinees were for two $7.50 seats in different localities, which brought five dollars premium each, and it happened that these were bought by your correspondent for lady friends with short pockets. As usual the tickets for the Saturday evening concerts brought much lower prices than the afternoon. Much is said about these concerts not being for the ordinary purse; but eight dollars (including fifty cents premium) can hardly be called high for a series of twenty-four concerts, yet at this price tickets were sold.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1895.

The first Symphony concert will be given in Music Hall next Saturday evening. The program will include Brahms' first symphony, andante and variations from Mozart's Divertimento in D major (the last of the set), Dvorák's capriccio and Beethoven's overture to Leonora, No. 3. A program radiant with novelties! There are the two B's so dear to Boston; why was not something by Bach played instead of the Dvorák piece, and then we would have paid homage to the three B's? I still maintain that my plan is best of all, and that Mr. Paur should have devoted the program of the first concert to the works of composers whose names begin with A. Then B would have its turn, then C, and so on. This would be a truly educational scheme.

The tickets this fall commanded an unusually high premium. There are good reasons for this. The orchestra is a legitimate source of civic pride, whether you approve heartily or disapprove mildly of the conductor. Then the list of soloists seems to be unusually strong.

* * *

The rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began on Friday morning. There was also a rehearsal on Saturday morning, and during next week there will be at least four private rehearsals before the public one on Friday afternoon. During the season there are always three rehearsals a week, often four.

Melba will be the soloist at the first concert in New York given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra November 11.

[19]

THE [illegible]

SUNDAY, OCT[illegible] 1895.

WILL SING IN BROOKLYN.

OPERATIC STARS BOOKED FOR THE ACADEMY.

Programmes Prepared by the Department of Music of the Brooklyn Institute and the Philharmonic Society. Melba, Scalchi and De Vere Sapio.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given at the Academy of Music November 12, with Melba, Scalchi, D'Aubigne and Campanari as soloists.

This year the Symphony concerts will appeal to larger audiences than before. The department of music of the Brooklyn institute will co-operate with the Brooklyn Philharmonic society in their management. The institute department of music has done a great work since its foundation. It has admirably filled the need existing in this city for first rate chamber music and it has gathered together a clientele of cultivated, music loving people. This year it takes the boards of the Academy of Music with its sister society, making a wider appeal, both to its own membership and the artistic instincts of Brooklynites generally than it has ever attempted before.

Five concerts in all will be given under the auspices of the Philharmonic and the department of music. The dates are Tuesday, November 12, and the Friday evenings falling on December 20, January 24, February 28 and March 27. Among those who will sing are Mme. Nellie Melba, soprano; Mme. Clementine De Vere-Sapio, soprano; Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, soprano; Mme. Sofia Scalchi, contralto; Ben Davies, tenor; Lloyd D'Aubigne, tenor; Giuseppe Campanari, basso.

Chief of the instrumental soloists will be Rafael Joseffy, the pianist, and the solo string performers will include Franz Kneisel, violin, director of the Kneisel string quartet; Timothee Adamowski, violin, and Alwin Schroeder, 'cello. Prefatory to some notice of the soloists, it may be mentioned that the present is the fifteenth season of the Boston Symphony. At home forty-eight concerts are given annually, lasting from October to May. Herr Paur's orchestral forces number eighty-seven players, constituting the largest permanent orchestra maintained exclusively for concert purposes in the world. Herr Paur has been in Europe during the summer and has reurned with a number of new compositions, which will greatly strengthen the orchestra repertoire.

Mme. Melba, the foremost prima donna on the Bostom Symphony list, is of Scotch descent and was born in Australia. She began the study of the pianoforte at a very early age, her mother, being an accomplished musician. She pursued her studies under professional teachers, securing a thorough ground work in harmony and composition, but it was not until she was about 12 years old that it was discovered that nature had endowed her with a voice of unusual beauty. The young girl took a few lessons in Australia, but her ambition led her in the end to Paris, where she placed herself under the tuition of the famous Mme. Marchesi. Her father, who was one of the commissioners of the Melbourne exposition, was strenuously opposed to her adopting the lyric stage, but Mme. Melba persisted. After completing her studies with Mme. Marchesi, she made her debut in 1887, as Gilda in "Rigoletto" at the Theater de La Monnaie, Brussels. She immediately won such favor that the intendant engaged her for a term and she appeared in several leading grand opera roles. Then Sir Augustus Harris, the London impresario, secured her for Covent Garden, and in the season of 1888 she made her debut in London, in "Lucia" with a success well remembered by all English opera goers.

Since then Mme. Melba's career has been a constant succession of triumphs. A favorite at Brussels, she has sung in Paris, London and New York as well. The grand opera in Paris has been the scene of many of her best interpretations, including the role of Ophelie, which was studied with Ambroise Thomas, the composer of "Hamlet," and Juliette, which she learned with Gounod, afterward appearing in London with Jean de Reszke, who assumed the part of Romeo. M. Bemberg wrote "Elaine" for her. During the last two seasons, Mme. Melba has been one of Abbey & Grau's leading cantatrices. At the Metropolitan Opera house, New York, she has divided honors with Calve, Nordica and Eames. This season she has her own operatic concert company on the road, including a complete orchestra and four solo artists.

Mme. Clementine De Vere Sapio has been characterized as belonging to the very limited class of singers who have succeeded in combining the excellencies of widely different styles of music. The description is a truthful one. It would be difficlut to say whether Mme. Sapio is at her best in opera, oratorio or concert. Judging from her own adherence to the concert stage, it may perhaps be thought she is best fitted for this variety of musical endeavor. Clemence Duchene De Vere Sapio was born in Paris and is partly of continental extraction. Her father was a Belgian nobleman, his wife being an English woman. Mlle. De Vere's musical education was had under Mme. Albertini Baucarde, in Florence, Italy, and she made her operatic debut in that city at the age of 16, in "The Huguenots," arousing the greatest enthusiasm by the youthful brilliancy of her powers. Subsequently she appeared at the leading theaters of France, Italy, Mexico and Spain. She studied Ophelie and Marguerite with Thomas and Gounod, respectively. Her fame increased, and she was sought after in England, Australia and the United States. Since the beginning of her permanent residence here, Mme. Sapio has become one of our best liked sopranos. Her pure and perfect voice, brilliancy of execution and delicacy of shading have been commented upon and raved over by musical critics from one end of the country to the other.

Mme. Lillian Blauvelt and Mme. Sofia Scalchi conclude the list of the artists already announced. Mme. Scalchi is the contralto of the Melba operatic concert company. For a decade her services have been considered indispensable to the success of every important operatic entertainment. She is a native of Turin and went into opera very young. She has won laurels in nearly every large city including Milan, London, St. Petersburg, Warsaw, Vienna, Madrid, Rio Janeiro and New York. During several of Patti's transcontinental tours, Mme. Scalchi accompanied the peerless singer and was only second in popular esteem and regard to Patti herself. By many Mme. Scalchi is ranked as the greatest living contralto.

Ben Davies, the English tenor, is a fine representative of English male singers and will no doubt sustain his enormous reputation here. Lloyd D'Aubigne is not so well known to the public as Ben Davies, but is nevertheless a rising star in the operatic world. He first became prominently in evidence in the course of the last season in Boston, when Jean de Reske became suddenly indisposed, and he was called upon at an hour's notice to replace him in the role of "Faust." He sang and acted the part splendidly and received the applause of the vast audience and the congratulations of Mme. Melba, who was the Marguerite of the performance. Messrs. Abbey & Grau thereupon engaged D'Aubigne for their grand opera season of 1895-6. D'Aubigne, before he adopted music, was a member of Augustin Daly's company of players, and as may be imagined, is not deficient on the dramatic side of his singing. This, with the possession of an exceptionally fine tenor voice and the advantages of teaching under such men as Signor Mancinelli, the famous conductor, are elements that indicate for him a rosy future.

Giuseppe Campanari the Symphony basso, is a native of Venice, the one time proud mistress of the seas. He was educated at the Milan conservatory made his debut at the Theater dal Verme, and obtained valuable experience through numerous operatic engagements in Italy and Spain. Campanari came to the United States a few years ago and settled in Boston, where he accepted an engagement with the Boston Symphony orchestra, being an accomplished player on the violoncello. During his engagement in the orchestral ranks he sang occasionally for charity, but his fine qualities as singer and actor were known only to a limited circle. It is only within two years, since he joined Abbey & Grau's company, that his exceptional gifts have found full scope. He created in the United States the part of Alfio in "Pagliacci," and some of his notable successes have been in the operas of "Falstaff," "Otello," "Faust," "Rigoletto," "Lucia," "Martha," "Samson and Dalila," "Pearl Fishers," "Traviata" and "Trovatore."

With this force of soloists and others yet to be announced, together with Joseffy, Kneisel, Adamowski and Schroeder, the Boston Symphony enters upon its Brooklyn campaign for 1895-6. Beside the concerts here and in Boston the orchestra will also be heard at the Metropolitan Opera house, New York; Academy of Music, Philadelphia; Music hall, Baltimore; Metzerott hall, Washington; Infantry hall, Providence; Sander's theater, Cambridge, Mass.; and at occasional performances in other cities.

SOME SYMPHONY ARTISTS.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1895

The Symphony Sale.

As usual, it was full of society interest, and prices ranged higher than last year. Seats which then brought five dollars premium for the matinee concerts, now brought ten, in the front corners, generally considered undesirable; while in the rear rows, seats which have often brought only twenty-five cents premium, or been left unsold at the auction, this year brought from six to twenty dollars premium. The lowest premiums for the matinees were for two $7.50 seats in different localities, which brought five dollars premium each, and it happened that these were bought by your correspondent for lady friends with short pockets. As usual the tickets for the Saturday evening concerts brought much lower prices than the afternoon. Much is said about these concerts not being for the ordinary purse; but eight dollars (including fifty cents premium) can hardly be called high for a series of twenty-four concerts, yet at this price tickets were sold.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1895.

The first Symphony concert will be given in Music Hall next Saturday evening. The program will include Brahms' first symphony, andante and variations from Mozart's Divertimento in D major (the last of the set), Dvorák's capriccio and Beethoven's overture to Leonora, No. 3. A program radiant with nôvelties! There are the two B's so dear to Boston; why was not something by Bach played instead of the Dvorák piece, and then we would have paid homage to the three B's? I still maintain that my plan is best of all, and that Mr. Paur should have devoted the program of the first concert to the works of composers whose names begin with A. Then B would have its turn, then C, and so on. This would be a truly educational scheme.

The tickets this fall commanded an unusually high premium. There are good reasons for this. The orchestra is a legitimate source of civic pride, whether you approve heartily or disapprove mildly of the conductor. Then the list of soloists seems to be unusually strong.

* * *

The rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began on Friday morning. There was also a rehearsal on Saturday morning, and during next week there will be at least four private rehearsals before the public one on Friday afternoon. During the season there are always three rehearsals a week, often four.

Melba will be the soloist at the first concert in New York given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra November 11.

[19]

REDUCTION

RATIO

12x

2.5 mm 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.5 mm

THE STANDARD UNION

SATURDAY EVENING, OCT. 12, 1895.

BROOKLYN.

FINE PROGRAMME

The Brooklyn Institute's Efforts For Good Music.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

TO BE GIVEN THIS YEAR UNDER ITS PATRONAGE CONJOINTLY WITH THAT OF THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY—WORLD-FAMOUS ARTISTS—INTERESTING DETAILS.

Where excellence is the ultima thule, it is always gratifying to record progress. The Department of Music of the Brooklyn Institute takes a very long step ahead this year, of which it is the purpose of this article to speak.

That step is one from the concert hall to the orchestral stage. Whether such a move shall be permanent depends on the membership of the institute itself. Judging, however, from the steady success of the department in years past, and the willingness of the institute clientele to rise to the genuine artistic opportunities offered them, it may be augured that the confidence of the officers of the institute in starting the new enterprise will not be misplaced.

MME. MELBA.

Not to speak in riddles, the Department of Music has engaged to patronize the Boston Symphony concerts at the Academy of Music. This engagement was not made until assurance was asked that the best artists, whether in America or abroad would supplement Herr Paur's incomparable orchestra. The assurance was given, and its realization is near. On Nov. 12 will take place the first Symphony event of the season, under the joint auspices of the department and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society. The soloists will be singers of the rank of Melba, Scalchi, D'Aubigne, and Campanari. With such a brilliant quartet of artists to aid the opening performance, and with Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, Mme. Clementine De Vere-Sapio, Ben Davies, the tenor; Joseffy, the pianist; Franz Kneisel, Timothee Adamowski and Alwin

MME. SCALCHI.

Schroeder in the background, the equation of promise and performance will be made complete.

In this industrial age music of the higher grade is apt to be a select thing. The managers of the Institute may not make it the darling of the multitude, but they will at least extend its circle of acquaintcraves culture and is willing to pay something for it. This class, comprising a large part of the membership of the Department of Music, has been the mainstay of the annual sixteen or twenty concerts in Association Hall, of the Riddle readings and the Richardson recitals. When the Institute has brought the greatest orchestral works and the masters of vocal and instrumental art to the doors, so to speak, of everyday people, it will have done something both salutary and revolutionary.

The better to effect this, the price of course tickets to the five concerts has been set low. The sale will commence Tuesday evening, Oct. 15, at the Art Galleries, 174 Montague street, and will continue thereafter at 174 Montague street, 502 Fulton street and 300 Fulton street (Chandler's).

M. D'AUBIGNE.

The dates of the five concerts are: Tuesday, Nov. 12, and the Fridays, Dec. 20, Jan. 24, Feb. 28 and March 27. All the concerts will take place in the evening.

A word first as to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and, secondly, as to the individual artists. This superb organization is at the threshold of its fifteenth season. Ninety musicians play in it. For concert purposes exclusively, it is the largest permanently maintained orchestra in the world. Nowhere, perhaps, does Herr Paur's organization enjoy such popularity as in its own home. The way Boston supports an artistic institution of this character may be inferred from the statements that forty-eight concerts a year are most liberally patronized, and the sale of course seats brings large premiums above their advertised price. Besides a series of concerts at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, under the managerial direction of Messrs. Abbey and Grau, the orchestra will also be heard during the present season in most of the other large cities of the East, including Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. As regards the works to be rendered, Conductor Paur is prepared to surpass himself. He has been in Europe, and has returned with a collection of fine things for the rehearsals of the band.

M. CAMPANARI.

Of all the soloists booked with the orchestra Melba will doubtless excite the greatest public curiosity. Her meteoric rise, Scotch-Australian antecedents, together with her beauty and her splendid musical endowment, invest her with a charm which even the most ignorant must feel. It is eight years since Melba made her debut on the operatic stage. The role was Gilda in "Rigoletto," and the scene was the Theatre de la Monnaie in Brussels. Melba had studied with Mme. Marchesi of Paris, after having obtained song recitals for the Department of Music at Association Hall on Oct. 30. Her progress in the musical world has been constantly upward, and many of her friends in this city will take advantage of the opportunity to hear her on a larger stage.

Ben Davies, the English tenor, and Rafael Joseffy, the rising star among pianists, are the most interesting of the male soloists on the list. D'Aubigne and the groundwork of her musical education in Australia. Her success was definite and complete. She was engaged to play a term at Brussels, and after leaving sang in London, Paris and other cities, to the increasing delight of opera goers. She studied the role of Ophelie under the composer Ambroise Thomas and Juliette under Gounod. Following her triumphs at the Grand Opera in Paris and Covent Garden in England, Messrs. Abbey and Grau captured her for the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. For the last two seasons she has shared the honors of grand opera in this country with Calve, Nordica and Eames.

MME. CLEMENTINE DE VERE-SAPIO.

Mme. Scalchi is as well-known in contralto roles as Melba in soprano. Mme. Scalchi is a native of Turin and a graduate of the Italian in singing and drama. Her operatic experiences have included nearly every large centre in Europe and America, including Milan, St. Petersburg, London, Warsaw, Vienna, Madrid, Rio Janeiro and New York. The other two cantatrices who make up the list of the Symphony artistes are both Americans by residence, although Mme. De Vere-Sapio was born in Paris and is of mixed Belgian and English extraction. Mme. Blauvelt is also engaged to give two Campanari are both comparatively young singers, but both possess undeniable merit Campanari's repertoire is very large, while D'Aubigne, though not having so long an experience to draw upon, is admirably equipped on the dramatic side of his art, and demonstrated last winter, by his successful assumption of the role of Faust when Jean de Reszke was suffering from an indisposition, that he has both voice and method requisite for a brilliant career. Kneisel, Adamowski and Schroeder are string performers, whose supremacy could be challenged by very few living violinists or 'cellists. Mr. Kneisel's string quartet is to give a chamber concert before the Department of Music in February. In previous seasons Kneisel and his fellow players have been among the most satisfactory on the Institute's musical programme.

MME. BLAUVELT.

Many persons connected with the department also hope that Paderewski and Ondricek, the Bohemian violinist, may be engaged for special and extra concerts. Probably this will be done. Two recitals by these masters would certainly well round off the year's programme.

Meantime those persons who love the smaller concerts in which the Institute has been so successful, will not be neglected. Eight matinees and eight evening concerts of this character will be given in Association Hall, commencing Wednesday, Oct. 30. The dates and attractions at these concerts are as follows:

Oct. 30. Matinee and evening. Two song recitals by Mlle. Lillian Blauvelt, soprano, assisted by Arthur Foote, piano, and Anton Hegner, cello; Isadore Luckstone, accompanist.

Nov. 27. Matinee and evening. Two piano recitals by Mme. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler, pianist, assisted by William H. Rieger, tenor, and Miss Bertha Bucklin, violin; Isadore Luckstone, accompanist.

Dec. 11. Matinee and evening. Two ballad concerts by Miss Charlotte Walker, soprano; Miss Gladys Horrlocker, alto; William R. Williams, tenor; Grant Odell, basso, assisted by Albert Mildenberg, piano, and Abram Ray Tyler, accompanist.

Jan. 8. Matinee and evening. Two choral concerts by the Caecilia Ladies' Vocal Society, assisted by George W. Ferguson, baritone, Mr. Franz Wilczek, violin; Miss Grace A. Povey, accompanist. Musical director, John Hyatt Brewer.

Feb. 5. Matinee and evening. Two chamber music concerts by the Kneisel String Quartet, of Boston. Frank Kneisel, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; Louis Svecenski, viola; Alwin Schroeder, cello; assisted by Mrs. Corinne Moore Lawson, soprano; Mr. Luckstone, accompanist.

March 11. Matinee and evening. Two song recitals by Max Heinrich, baritone, assisted by Mrs. Charles Tyler Dutton, soprano (invited), and Miss Maude Powell, violin; Mr. Luckstone, accompanist.

April 8. Matinee and evening. Two piano recitals by Edward A. McDowell, piano, assisted by Mrs. Marie Vander

BEN DAVIES.

Veer-Green, contralto. Harpist and accompanist to be engaged.

April 29. Matinee and evening. Two choral concerts by the Arion Mannergesang Verein (evening), and the Arion Damengesang Verein (P. M.), assisted by Mme. Georgine Von Januschowsky, soprano. 'Cellist to be selected. Musical director, Arthur Claassen.

Following is the programme of the Oct. 30 concert:

Allegro (first movement), Sonata in D Major .....Rubenstein
Piano and cello, Mr. Foote, Mr. Hegner.
a. Ave Printemps.....Bouhy
b. Mondnacht .....Schumann
c. Spring Song.....Mendelssohn
d. Schlummerlied (first time).....Hummel
Mme. Lillian Blauvelt.
a. Elegie .....Hegner
b. Gavotte .....David Popper
Anton Hegner.
Appasionato, Romance.....Toccata
Arthur Foote.
a. Sunshine Song.....Grieg
b. "Hark, Hark, the Lark".....Schubert
c. "Ninan" .....Pergolese
d. "Fallih! Fallah!".....Van der Stucken
Mme. Lillian Blauvelt.
a. Andante Recitative.....Hegner
b. "The Bee".....Fr. Schubert
Anton Hegner.
a. Elegie .....Massenet
b. "La Favette".....Gretry
Mme. Lillian Blauvelt.
Prelude in E Minor, from Suite Op. 10, MacDowell
Berceuse .....Grieg
Intermezzo .....Schuett

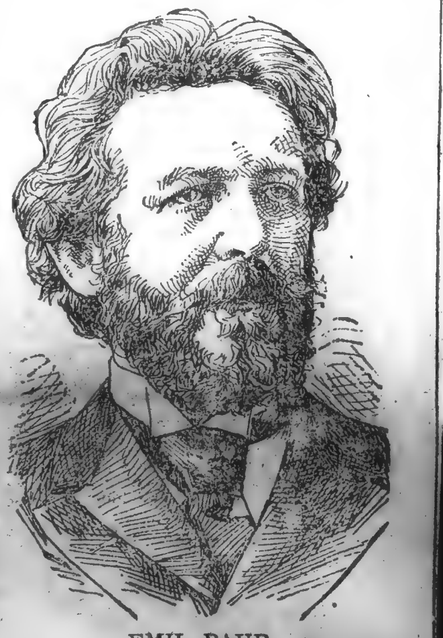
M. JOSEFFY.

Waltz in E Major.....Moszkowski

The officers of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society are: Board or Directors—Henry K. Sheldon, president; L. S. Burnham, vice-president; B. T. Frothingham, secretary; George H. Prentiss, Carll H. DeSilver, John F. Praeger, Alexander E. Orr, William R. Bunker, Frederick A. Ward, W. W. Goodrich, C. T. Christensen, John S. Frothingham, Henry N. Whitney, John D. Elwell, Theodore F. Jackson, Samuel R. Probasco, William A. Nash, John S. James.

The Department of Music of the Brooklyn Institute is thus manned: Walter S. Carter, president; Charles H. Morse, first vice-president; R. Huntington Woodman, second vice-president; John Hyatt Brewer, secretary; Perlee V. Jervis, librarian.

Advisory Board—August Arnold, T. Merrill Austin, John F. Anderson, H. E. H. Benedict, Edward M. Bowman, Edwin W. Bray, John Hyatt Brewer, Henry Eyre Browne, Walter S. Carter, Edwin Cary, Arthur Claassen, Gustav Dannreuther, Carl Fique, E. J. Grant, Walter Henry Hall, Henry G. Hanchett, M.D., William S. Haskell, William Heaton, Franklin W. Hooper, Perlee V. Jervis, Louis Mollenhauer, Albert Mildenberg, Frank J. Mulligan, Charles H. Morse, Frederic Reddall, G. Waring Stebbins, Frank Taft, Abram



EMIL PAUR.

Ray Tyler, R. Huntington Woodman, Charles S. Yerbury.

Honorary Members—Dudley Buck, Alexandre Guilmant.

Executive Committee—Walter S. Carter, John F. Anderson, Charles H. Morse, H. E. H. Benedict, Arthur Claassen, John Hyatt Brewer, R. Huntington Woodman, Perlee V. Jervis, T. Merrill Austin and Prof. Franklin W. Hooper.

Committee on Membership—Frederic Reddall, Carl Fique, E. J. Grant, Frank J. Mulligan and Abram Ray Tyler.

Committee on Reception—Arthur Claassen, Albert Mildenberg, Henry G. Hanchett, M. D., G. Waring Stebbins and Charles S. Yerbury.

[20]

The Brooklyn Citizen.

Nos. 327 to 403 FULTON ST.
Opposite the City Hall.

Receiving the Entire United Press Telegraphic Service.
Entered at the Brooklyn, N. Y., Post Office as second-class matter.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 12.

MUSIC PATRONS.

LIST OF THOSE WHO WILL AID SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Department of Music of the Brooklyn Institute to Lend Its Help in Herr Paur's Season at the Academy of Music—Great Orchestral Works and Famous Soloists.

Few events in recent years have been of so much moment to the musical interests of Brooklyn as the determination of the Department of Music of the Brooklyn Institute to actively support the Boston Symphony concerts. This determination presents both a climax and an opportunity. The Department has reached a higher rung of the ladder, and the large membership stands at the threshold of unrivalled advantages in musical education.

A condition, precedent to the management of the Symphony concerts by the Institute, was that the best vocalists and instrumentalist performers obtainable in America or abroad should be engaged to supplement the orchestra. With Melba, Scalchi, DeVere-Sapio, Joseffy, Ben Davies and Campanari on the solo list, it can be seen that this aim has been accomplished.

Some idea of the strength the Department of Music will bring to the concerts may be gathered from the roll of its officers and members. The controlling force of the Department is as follows:

Officers—Walter S. Carter, president; Charles H. Morse, first vice-president; R. Huntington Woodman, second vice-president; John Hyatt Brewer, secretary; Perlee V. Jervis, librarian.

Advisory Board—August Arnold, T. Merrill Austin, John F. Anderson, H. E. H. Benedict, Edward M. Bowman, Edwin W. Bray, John Hyatt Brewer, Henry Eyre Browne, Walter S. Carter, Edwin Cary, Arthur Claassen, Gustav Dannreuther, Carl Fique, E. J. Grant, Walter Henry Hall, Henry G. Hanchett, M. D., William S. Haskell, William Heaton, Franklin W. Hooper, Perlee V. Jervis, Louis Mollenhauer, Albert Mildenberg, Frank J. Mulligan, Charles H. Morse, Frederic Reddall, G. Waring Stebbins, Frank Taft, Abram Ray Tyler, R. Huntington Woodman and Charles S. Yerbury.

Honorary Members—Dudley Buck, Alexandre Guilmant.

Executive Committee—Walter S. Carter, John F. Anderson, Charles H. Morse, H. E. H. Benedict, Arthur Claassen, John Hyatt Brewer, R. Huntington Woodman, Perlee V. Jervis, T. Merrill Austin and Professor Franklin W. Hooper.

Committee on Membership—Frederic Reddall, Carl Fique, E. J. Grant, Frank J. Mulligan and Abram Ray Tyler.

Committee on Receptions—Arthur Claassen, Albert Mildenberg, Henry G. Hanchett, M. D., G. Waring Stebbins and Chas. S. Yerbury.

The members of the department are: The Hon. Geo. B. Abbott, the Rev. Lyman Abbott, D.D., Abram Abraham, Fritz Achelis, Miss Eloise Adams, the Rev. J. Coleman Adams, Mrs. J. H. Adams, F. O. Afield, the Rev J. C. Agey, Miss Amanda W. Alexander, William H. Allee, Jr., Franklin Allen, John P. Allen, Miss Marie A. Almirall, Miss A. L. Anderson, John F. Anderson, Mrs. H. S. Anderson, William Anderson, Miss Maud Andrews, Mrs. W. W. Andrews, Mrs. James F. Atkinson, Robert B. Atterbury, Miss Edna Atterbury, C. G. Atwood, Mrs. Charles Auel, Miss Harriet Austin, T. Merrill Austin, Frank M. Avery, Miss Mary L. Avery, Miss Fannie H. Ayres, Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Catherine M. Babcock, Truman J. Backus, LL. D., Colonel Alexander S. Bacon, Miss Virginia B. Bailey, Mrs. William R. Bailey, Henry C. Bainbridge, the Rev. Charles R. Baker, Miss Kate C. Baldwin, Mrs. Lillian Palmer Ball, Miss A. W. Banta, Theodore M. Banta, Mrs. J. E. Barber, Almon G. Bardin, Miss Alice Barlow, Clinton W. Barlow, Raymond S. Barlow, General Alfred C. Barnes, Thomas A. Barrett, Miss S. M. Barstow, the Hon. Willard Bartlett, William C. Bartlett, Jas. H. Bates, Henry Batterman, Miss A. C. Baxter, Miss Clara F. Baxter, Miss Minnie Bayer, Frank D. Beattys, Heinrich C. Beck, Miss Agnes E. Becker.

Frank C. Beckwith, Henry W. Beebe, Miss Mary T. Beebe, Mrs. Edwin Beers, Miss Carrie L. Belcher, F. P. Bellamy, Henry Belden, H. E. H. Benedict, Frederick von Benkendorff, Miss Myra M. Benoit, Frank Sherman Benson, Miss Mary Benson, John Bentley, Mrs. Cornelia M. Bergen, Tunis G. Bergen, William Berri, Louis E. Berger, Miss Nellie M. Bessey, Miss Annie L. Betts, John H. Betts, Miss Mary Betts, Mrs. J. C. Billwiller, N. J. Bolmrick, Alexander Black, Benjamin F. Blair, Miss Edith Blaisdell, Sylvester L. Bland, Miss Josephine E. Blydenburgh, D. Botkin, M. D., Mrs. W. P. Boggs, T. J. Bohl, Miss Minerva Bon, Samuel W. Bonnick, Hon. David A. Boody, Mrs. David A. Boody, William B. Boorum, Miss Louise Borchers, Miss Rita Bowdoin, Edwin William Bray, John Hyatt Brewer, Edgar Briggs, W. B. Brinsmade, Harry N. Brooks, Miss Cornelia Brown, Miss Nellie C. Brown, Miss Evelyn B. Brown, Florence S. Brown, Miss Florence S. Brown, Hersey Brown, Joseph E. Brown, Lucien M. Brown, E. T. Brownson, Miss Grace M. Brunn, F. E. Bruns, Miss Minnie Bruns, George W. Brush, M. D., William C. Bryant, Mrs. Dudley Buck, Miss S. M. Buckalew, Walter L. Burdett, William H. Burger, James S. Burke, Miss Alice C. Burling, Arthur H. Burnett, Miss Julia A. Burr, Mrs. Carrie L. Burt, Mrs. C. W. Butler, W. P. Calligan, Alexander Cameron, the Rev. Stephen H. Camp, the Hon. Felix Campbell, Flamen B. Candler, Mrs. G. W. Cann, Mrs. Clara H. Carhart, Adolph C. Carpenter, Miss Mabel V. Carpenter, W. A. Carpenter, Mrs. Harriet C. Carter, Walter S. Carter, Edwin Cary, Isaac H. Cary, Miss Alice Casamajor, Miss Marie Champney, A. B. Chandler, Frank H. Chandler, Henry Chapin, Jr., the Rev. M. B. Chapman, D. D., Miss S. B. Chase, S. B. Chittenden, Paul T. Cheriton, General C. T. Christensen, Mrs. C. T. Christensen, Arthur Claassen, John Claflin, Dwight P. Clapp, Miss Sarah S. Clapp, Miss Carrie J. Clark, Miss Madge S. Clarke, W. C. Clarke, William H. Clark, Mrs. James O. Cleveland, Miss Ermina Clement, Miss E. Louise Cochrane, Miss Florence Coe, Isaac F. Coffin, Sturgis Coffin, N. Park Collin, Miss Elizabeth Colson, W. Irving Comes, Miss Frances Cone.

John M. Conklin, Miss Adelaide Cook, Arthur B. Cook, Miss Agnes L. Cook, C. W. Cook, John J. Cooper, Miss N. Coppernoll, Miss F. A. Corey, Miss Blanche A. Cornwell, Leonard Cort, James R. Cowing, Miss Julia R. Cowing, Miss Edith Cowan, Henry T. Cox, Henry L. Craig, George C. Cranford, Powell Creech, Miss Kate P. Crittenden, Mrs. Mary S. Croxson, Charles C. Cummings, Miss Cornelia R. Cummings, Churchill H. Cutting, Gustav Dannreuther, Mrs. Henry Darling, Mrs. S. T. Dauchy, James Davidson, Miss Cora G. Davis, Frederick W. Davis, F. H. Davol, John J. Dawson, J. Arthur Day, Miss E. S. Delapierre, Miss H. E. Deshons, Carll H. DeSilver, Mrs. Carll H. DeSilver, Jacob G. Dettmer, Miss B. J. Deuell, Charles H. Dewey, Miss Jessie F. Dibble, Alfred W. Diller, Miss Margaret A. Dillhoff, Clarke Dooley, Francis E. Dodge, Miss Agnes Dougall, Abbott L. Dow, R. F. Downing, Frank A. Doyle, Henry Drisler, Jr., Miss M. E. Ducker, U. H. Dudley, W. F. Dudley, M. D., Miss Mary Dugan, Miss Grace Dusenberry, Silas B. Dutcher, W. H. Dutcher, Mrs. B. M. Dutton, Edward E. Eames, Mrs. L. H. Eastburn, Miss Elsie Ray Eddy, J. Lynn Eddy.

Mrs. F. D. Edsall, Miss Kate S. Edwards, Cornelius Eldert, Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, Mrs. M. D. Ellison, Miss Belle A. Ennis, Mrs. Q. N. Evans, George E. Fahys, Joseph Fahys, Rev. William B. Farrell, Mrs. Theodore W. Field, Frederick Fischer, Louis G. Fisher, Carl Fique, Miss Theresa Ford, W. Edward Foster, Arthur W. Fox, William B. Fox, Henry Franke, H. E. Frankenberg, Benjamin T. Frothingham, William F. Fuller, Miss M. H. Fullerton, Robert Gair, Mrs. W. F. Gardiner, Charles T. Geyer, Mrs. Emma E. Gibb, Howard Gibb, Mrs. Emmeline Gibson, Mrs. E. C. Gibson, William Hamilton Gibson, William Gilfillan, M. D., Thomas Gill, Miss Virginia S. Goddard, Miss Anna Goessling, A. Goldmark, Miss C. T. Goll, Rev. A. H. Goodnough, William W. Goodrich, Frederick P. Gordon, E. J. Grant, Miss Anna K. Green, Rev. David Gregg, D. D., O. B. Gregory, Miss Charlotte L. Gulick, Mrs. Helena D. Gunther, Miss Mary Hagar, Albert Haley, Mrs. R. B. Hall, Miss A. T. Hallock, David F. Halstead, Miss Isabel Halstead, James M. Ham, James Hamblet, H. G. Hanchett, M. D., Edward E. Hand, Henry S. Hand, Mrs. J. W. Handren, Miss M. S. Handren, William H. Hanning, Henry E. Hard, Mrs. Olive T. Hardy, Miss Annie Hart.

Miss Amelia S. Hart, James H. Hart, Charles C. W. Harvey, Miss Julia P. Harwood, Miss Annie S. Hawes, Mrs. Clara Hawkins, Mrs. Mary R. Hawley, A. Augustus Healy, Henry R. Heath, Charles W. Henderson, Skidmore Hendrickson, M. D., Henry Hentz, W. F. Herbert, Mrs. Luther Hildreth, Miss Marian Hildreth, William B. Hill, Gustav Hillmann, John Hills, William E. Hinds, Miss Florence P. Hines, Miss Norma Hoage, Cornelius N. Hoag and, M. D., Mrs. M. E. Hobart, Edward H. Hobbs, Miss Clara E. Holland, Mrs. J. W. Hollenbeck, Frederick C. Holmes, Miss Ida H. Holmes, Mrs. J. S. Holmes, M. D., Miss Sarah W. Holmes, Miss Martha W. Hooper, Miss Adele E. Hopkins, Miss Clara L. Hopkins, Edward I. Horsman, Miss Julia R. Hotchkiss, David H. Houghtaling, Mrs. C. W. House, Mrs. Lucy E. Howard, William C. Howard, Miss Lulu Howell, Charles A. Hoyt, Miss Adelia A. Hudson, Joseph D. Huggins, Henry C. Hulbert, Washington Hull, Miss Mary Hunter, Henry E. Hutchinson, Mrs. John W. Hutchinson, Mrs. Catherine E. Hyatt, Miss Elizabeth H. Ilgen, Miss Fannie A. Irvine, W. H. Irwin, Mrs. John N. Ives, Hon. Darwin R. James, John S. James, William Jarvie, M. D. S., Perlee V. Jervis, D. Clinton Johnson, Mrs. R. H. Johnson, Miss Sadie Johnson, Miss Annie M. Jones, Miss G. E. Jones, Henry R. Jones.

Samuel B. Jones, Miss Sarah E. Jones, Miss C. Juchau, Miss Alice M. Judge, Mrs. Harriet Judson, Mrs. Russel Keith, William B. Kendall, Mrs. Clarence Kenyon, Robert J. Kimball, General Horatio C. King, Miss Helen F. Kingsbury, Mrs. T. S. Knapp, Mrs. A. M. Kneeland, Mrs. M. Koehl, Albert Korber, Henry C. Kuhns, Edward B. Ladd, Francis P. Ladd, John B. Ladd, Miss Annie E. Lampe, Miss Caroline P. Latimer, John A. Latimer, Mrs. A. C. Lawrence, Mrs. John H. Lawrence, Miss Marion Ledger, Miss Mary Lee, John Leech, Mrs. S. K. Lees, William F. Leffingwell, Miss Lillian S. Leitch, Theodore A. Liebler, Jr., Mrs. J. L. Ling, Edward H. Litchfield, Miss M. J. Lloyd, Herbert E. Locke, Miss Lydia A. Lockwood, Stephen O. Lockwood, Frederick Loeser, Gustav Loeser, Albert E. Loomis, Edward M. Loomis, J. Pierpont Lord, Loftin Love, F. W. Lovejoy, Frank H. Lovell, A. A. Low, Hon. Seth Low, William G. Low, Sidney V. Lowell, E. F. Lozier, Miss K. Ludwig, Frank M. Lupton, Miles K. Lynch, E. H. R. Lyman, Rev. A. J. Lyman, D. D., Mrs. Clarence Lyon, Le Roy M. Lyon, Miss Josephine M. Mackintosh, Miss Alice B. MacNary, Mrs. William Maddren, Rev. George P. Mains, D. D., Mrs. Jessie N. Mainwaring.

William H. Male, H. L. Mallory, Charles J. Mann, Frederick C. Manvel, George G. Martin, George W. Martin, Charles D. Marvin, Miss Mary A. Mason, John W. Mason, Miss Della A. Masters, Miss Harriet Matchett, Frank J. Mather, Mrs. A. M. Matheson, Albert H. Matthews, James Matthews, Nathaniel Watson, M. D., J. Rogers Maxwell, Miss Lillie L. S. Mayer, Professor W. A. McAndrew, James J. McCabe, Miss Helen A. McCarthy, Mrs. Julia R. McCay, Samuel S. McCurdy, James McCurrach, John McNamee, George McNaughton, M. D., Daniel W. McWilliams, Mrs. Mary Meade, Charles P. Metcalf, Professor Julius E. Meyer, Henry A. Louis Mollenhauer, Mrs. Stuart H. Moore, Miss Grace Morgan, Henry Montgomery, Mrs. Clarence Moore, David M. Morrison, Charles H. Morse, Henry H. Morton, M. D., Frank J. Mulligan, R. J. Murphy, Miss R. I. Martha, Miss Dora Naeher, Carl Naeser, Charles F. Napier, William A. Nash, Miss Bertha G. Nason, William Neidlinger, William H. Neidlinger, Thomas Newcomb, E. E. Newell, Miss J. A. Nichols, J. W. North, Miss Caroline P. Oakley.

George W. Oakley, Miss Julia L. O'Connor, Willis L. Ogden, George M. Olcott, A. I. Ormsbee, Robert Ormiston, M. D., Herman W. Ormsbee, Alexander E. Orr, Mrs. Sarah E. Ostrander, Charles H. Otis, Mrs. Louise Ovington, Edwin Packard, Charles R. Paddock, Adrian Paradis, Miss Jennie Patterson, George F. Peabody, Miss Maud L. Peck, Miss Cora Webb Peet, Alfred A. Peck, Miss E. Penney, Oscar Pfeiffer, William H. Perry, Mrs. Bernard Peters, Hon. James F. Pierce, Henry E. Pierrepont, Miss Julia J. Pierrepont, Mrs. W. B. Pierson, L. S Pilcher, M. D., E. C. Platt, Millard H Platt, Milton J. Platt, Mrs. Caroline H. Polhemus, Miss Jennie T. Pollard, Arthur R. Pollock, Mrs. Daniel Pomeroy, Joseph C. Pool, Robert Porterfield, Thomas Potts, Mrs. Charles Pratt, Mrs. C. A. Preller, George H. Prentice, Mrs. Eloise W. Prentice, Miss M. H. Prescott, George A. Price, Robert Proddow, Henry L. Quick, James Quinlan, William J. Quinlan, Jr., E. A. Race, John Rae, Anton A. Raven, Miss Louise E. Rawson, Mrs. J. E. Raymond, B. T. Read, M. D. S., Frededic Reddall, A. L. Reid, Jr., Victor H. Reid.

Mrs. Frank Reynolds, F. St. J. Richards, John E. Richardson, M. D., William C. Richardson, Miss Johanna L. Ris, George H. Roberts, Jr., Mrs. John J. Roberts, Miss Emma F. Robinson, Mrs. S. C. Robinson, Henry M. Rogers, Miss Louise E. Root, Miss Gertrude Rose, William G. Rothe, Miss Christina Rounds, J. H. Rowland, Mrs. Charles E. Russell, Miss Harriet L. Ryder, Mrs. J. L. Salter, E. R. Sammis, Z. S. Sampson, the Hon. Charles A. Schieren, Henry Sheldon, Henry K. Sheldon, Miss G. O. Schelker, Mrs. August Schlegel, Carl G. Schmidt, Miss Beatrice Scholes, Miss M. Scholes, Edward M. Shepard, Julius Schubert, F. H. Scoville, John E. Searles, Miss Theresa Seidenberg, George W. Shiebler, Mrs. L. W. Shiff, Mrs. H. T. Shotwell, Miss Caroline Shyell, Charles H. Simmons, Nelson B. Sizer, M. D., Alexander J. C. Skene, M. D., Charles M. Skinner, Miss Florence R. Slocum, Frank Slocum, Miss M. Evangeline Slosson, Bryan H. Smith, Cyrus P. Smith, Freeeborn G. Smith, Frederick W. Smith, Mrs. Herbert C. Smith, Miss Mildred P. Smith, William H. Smith, Mrs. Charles H. Smithers, Miss Mary Snedeker, Arthur S. Somers, George H. Southard, H. B. Speer, M. D., the Hon. Frank Squier, A. L. Stanley, David Stanley.

Miss Lena Stanton, Miss Florence Starr, F. A. Stearns, G. Waring Stebbins, Mrs. Aibert Steiner, Miss Elizabeth Stephens, William H. Stevens, Miss Edith M. Stikeman, Thomas E. Stillman, Miss A. Cora Stone, George C. Stout, Jeremiah T. Story, George Stowe, the Hon. J. S. T. Stranahan, Mrs. J. S. T. Stranahan, Miss Emma Straut, George W. Street, Mrs. J. B. Summerfield, Mrs. J. H. Sutphin, Frank C. Swan, James S. Swan, Miss Estelle Sweet, Mrs. Jessie M. Sweet, Charles H. Taft, Mrs. E. N. Taft, John Tagg, Franklin E. Taylor, Ira Preston Taylor, Pope C. Tefft, Mrs. L. D. Terhune, Mrs. Edmund Terry, Miss Rebecca Terry, Miss Florence N. Thallon, Mrs. John Thallon, Robert Thallon, Miss Margaret Thayer, William A. Thayer, Miss Alice Thomas, the Hon. Edward B. Thomas, Mrs. Ludlow Thomas, Edward Thompson, Miss Lida V. Thompson, Miss Grace Tienken, Miss Charlotte A. Todd, Miss Julia M. Toomey, John Q. Tower, Spencer Trask, G. C. Travis, Mrs. Warren C. Tredwell, Hugo L. Troetschel, Miss Louise E. Tucker, Miss Adelaide Turnbull, Silas Tuttle, Abram Ray Tyler, William E. Uptegrove, Mrs. William E. Uptegrove, Miss Louise D. Vail, William D. Vanderbilt, C. V. C. Van Deusen, Miss Kate Vandeveer.

D. W. Van Ingen, Willis Van Valkenburgh, Mrs. A. H. Vermilye, Miss Grace C. Voorhees, Mrs. Kate B. Vrooman, Miss Lillian C. Wakeman, Howard T. Walden, Miss J. Florence Walford, Mrs. Robert S. Walker, William H. Wallace, Miss Emma L. Walton, Frederick J. Warburton, Sidney Ward, Henry L. Wardwell, B. J. Warner, Charles E. Warner, Miss S. E. V. Waterman, Horace Waters, Miss Jessie K. Watson, Miss Anna Weddigen, George F. Weedon, Walter L. Wellington, N. Dana Wells, Miss Grace W. Wells, Robert Gilbert Welsh, Henry Wenzel, Jr., Hayden W. Wheeler, Mrs. F. H. Wheelock, George H. Whitbeck, Alfred T. White, Francis L. White, Stanford White, Hon. Stephen V. White, Mrs. S. V. White, Mrs. Isabella S. Whiton, Miss Grace Whitmarsh, Henry N. Whitney, Howard Whittlesey, Miss Anna M. Wilbur, James E. Wight, Edward W. Williams, Mrs. J. O. Williams, Mrs. Joseph P. Williams, C. L. Williston, Charles R. Williamson, Mrs. J. A. Wisner, Cornelius D. Wood, Henry A. Wood, Miss Alice Woodbury, Miss D. Woods, R. Huntington Woodman, General John B. Woodward, Robert W. Woodward, Mrs. Mary B. Woodward, Charles P. Woodruff, Timothy L. Woodruff, Miss Marie Wundram, Charles T. Young, Walter H. Young.

The officers and Board of Directors of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, with which the Department of Music co-operates, are as follows:

Henry K. Sheldon, president; L. S. Burnham, vice-president; B. T. Frothingham, secretary; George H. Prentiss, Carll H. DeSilver, John F. Praeger, Alexander E. Orr, William R. Bunker, Frederick A. Ward, W. W. Goodrich, C. T. Christensen, John S. Frothingham, Henry N. Whitney, John D. Elwell, Theodore F. Jackson, Samuel R. Probasco, William A. Nash and John S. James.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCT. 19, 1895

The Symphony Orchestra will open its fifteenth season in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Thursday evening, October 31. The other dates will be November 21, December 12, January 2 and 16, February 6 and 20, March 12, April 9, and 30, and the solo artists already announced are Mme. Devere Sapio, Marie Brema, Antoinette Szumowska, Rafael Joseffy and Ben Davies. The sale of seats will open next Saturday morning, October 26, at the University bookstore.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 20, 1895.

THE FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

If seeing so many of the familiar faces in the usual places in Music Hall were not sufficient to make one feel as if time had turned backward again in its flight and stopped about midway of almost any past Symphony season, a glance at the programme might have completed the illusion. For that was just one of the regular Boston sort—good, standard and respectable, to be sure, but without any apparent consciousness of the fact that the world of music has a motion onward through space, like all the other worlds, and that it ought to sing up together with the other morning and evening stars if it be desirous of keeping the place it held in creation's dawn.

For this was the programme provided: Brahms's first symphony; an andante theme with variations from a divertimento by Mozart—now played in these concerts for the first time, but offering nothing unfamiliar in treatment or color; Beethoven's "Leonora" overture, No. 3; Dvorak's Scherzo Capriccioso in D-flat major, opus 66. If Mr. Paur meant to bridge over the months which have intervened since May and put his audience into an old frame of mind, he hit it off well. But if he had any notion of helping them to begin a new season with fresh enthusiasm and piquant anticipation, he made a miss. It was a good programme to get his men into vigorous working order, to be sure, for there was lots of hard, solid toil in it, from the steady pull and the intricate scoring of the Brahms to the stern chords and rushing sweeps of the Beethoven and the eccentric vagrancies of the Dvorak.

Yet let not exceptions be taken too seriously, for out of this new hearing of the symphony came a novel notion about it, as music, even when intentionally of the "programme" sort, constantly suggests a change in imagery and in meaning. This time it seemed as if that symphony might be called "Fr. Crispius Day," for it stirred up so many associations in the Shakespeare's "Henry the Fourth," the valiant eloquence of the young King, the great battle and all that he foresaw following on after the wonderful victory which he predicted and conjured his soldiers by. In the fierce, assertive first movement are the incitements, the shock of onset and the harsh fury of resolute fighters. In the andante,

"The storm subsides to calm,
Hearts that bled are staunched with balm."

and rest and truce come soothingly. The allegretto sings sweetly of peace, prosperity and good augary. The fourth comes as "Harry the King" promised that the feast of Crispin should come in after years, with glorious reminiscences of feats and wounds and triumphs, solemn honors for the dead, the reawakening of the sleeping spirits of heroes, and the stirring, sonorous pæans of conquest and possession. Such fancies come to at least one listener, and, as fancies go, they do not seem very unreasonable.

The performance was unusually good for the first one of a season. It had almost always energy, unanimity and accuracy, the only real blurred parts being some bits of the complicated last movements of the symphony. The allegros of the overture were clear, although Mr. Paur pushed them on at a great pace, the strong chords were seized with a firm grip, there were some actual pianissimi, the half-fantastic effects in the scherzo came out sharply, and, for a wonder, the kettle-drums showed a sense of due proportion.

The programme-books will come again from under the editorship of Mr. Apthorp, whose ideas of fitness were illustrated by his filling the "Entr' Acte" portion with seven pages of a ponderous essay on "Form in Music." As if Mr. Irving should provide for the intermezzi of one of his series plays a sombre lecture on the philosophy of dramatic composition! If Mr. Apthorp would do the programme readers a service, he would say less about the themes and motives and would have them printed in music type, as is done in the best foreign programme-books and as the New York Tribune does in its special analytical articles.

At next Saturday's concert the orchestra will play Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture, Beethoven's fifth symphony and a suite of E. A. MacDowell. Mrs. Clementine DeVere Sapio, who has not been heard in an important concert in Boston for a long time, will sing the "Mad" scene from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet" and the great soprano air from "Fidelio."

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

[21]

The Brooklyn Citizen.

Nos. 397 to 403 FULTON ST.
Opposite the City Hall.

Receiving the Entire United Press Telegraphic Service.
Entered at the Brooklyn, N. Y., Post Office as second-class matter.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 12.

MUSIC PATRONS.

LIST OF THOSE WHO WILL AID SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Department of Music of the Brooklyn Institute to Lend Its Help in Herr Paur's Season at the Academy of Music—Great Orchestral Works and Famous Soloists.

Few events in recent years have been of so much moment to the musical interests of Brooklyn as the determination of the Department of Music of the Brooklyn Institute to actively support the Boston Symphony concerts. This determination presents both a climax and an opportunity. The Department has reached a higher rung of the ladder, and the large membership stands at the threshold of unrivalled advantages in musical education.

A condition, precedent to the management of the Symphony concerts by the Institute, was that the best vocalists and instrumentalist performers obtainable in America or abroad should be engaged to supplement the orchestra. With Melba, Scalchi, DeVere-Sapio, Joseffy, Ben Davies and Campanari on the solo list, it can be seen that this aim has been accomplished.

Some idea of the strength the Department of Music will bring to the concerts may be gathered from the roll of its officers and members. The controlling force of the Department is as follows:

Officers—Walter S. Carter, president; Charles H. Morse, first vice-president; R. Huntington Woodman, second vice-president; John Hyatt Brewer, secretary; Perlee V. Jervis, librarian.

Advisory Board—August Arnold, T. Merrill Austin, John F. Anderson, H. E. H. Benedict, Edward M. Bowman, Edwin W. Bray, John Hyatt Brewer, Henry Eyre Browne, Walter S. Carter, Edwin Cary, Arthur Claassen, Gustav Dannreuther, Carl Fique, E. J. Grant, Walter Henry Hall, Henry G. Hanchett, M. D., William S. Haskell, William Heaton, Franklin W. Hooper, Perlee V. Jervis, Louis Mollenhauer, Albert Mildenberg, Frank J. Mulligan, Charles H. Morse, Frederic Reddall, G. Waring Stebbins, Frank Taft, Abram Ray Tyler, R. Huntington Woodman and Charles S. Yerbury.

Honorary Members—Dudley Buck, Alexandre Guilmant.

Executive Committee—Walter S. Carter, John F. Anderson, Charles H. Morse, H. E. H. Benedict, Arthur Claassen, John Hyatt Brewer, R. Huntington Woodman, Perlee V. Jervis, T. Merrill Austin and Professor Franklin W. Hooper.

Committee on Membership—Frederic Reddall, Carl Fique, E. J. Grant, Frank J. Mulligan and Abram Ray Tyler.

Committee on Receptions—Arthur Claassen, Albert Mildenberg, Henry G. Hanchett, M. D., G. Waring Stebbins and Chas. S. Yerbury.

The members of the department are: The Hon. Geo. B. Abbott, the Rev. Lyman Abbott, D.D., Abram Abraham, Fritz Achelis, Miss Eloise Adams, the Rev. J. Coleman Adams, Mrs. J. H. Adams, F. O. Affeld, the Rev J. C. Ager, Miss Amanda W. Alexander, William H. Allee, Jr., Franklin Allen, John P. Allen, Miss Marie A. Almirall, Miss A. L. Anderson, John F. Anderson, Mrs. H. S. Anderson, William Anderson, Miss Maud Andrews, Mrs. W. W. Andrews, Mrs. James F. Atkinson, Robert B. Atterbury, Miss Edna Atterbury, C. G. Atwood, Mrs. Charles Auel, Miss Harriet Austin, T. Merrill Austin, Frank M. Avery, Miss Mary L. Avery, Miss Fannie H. Ayres, Frank L. Babbott, Mrs. Catherine M. Babcock, Truman J. Backus, LL. D., Colonel Alexander S. Bacon, Miss Virginia B. Bailey, Mrs. William R. Bailey, Henry C. Bainbridge, the Rev. Charles R. Baker, Miss Kate C. Baldwin, Mrs. Lilian Palmer Ball, Miss A. W. Banta, Theodore M. Banta, Mrs. J. E. Barber, Almon G. Bardin, Miss Alice Barlow, Clinton W. Barlow, Raymond S. Barlow, General Alfred C. Barnes, Thomas A. Barrett, Miss S. M. Barstow, the Hon. Willard Bartlett, William C. Bartlett, Jas. H. Bates, Henry Batterman, Miss A. C. Baxter, Miss Clara F. Baxter, Miss Minnie Bayer, Frank D. Beattys, Heinrich C. Beck, Miss Agnes E. Becker.

Frank C. Beckwith, Henry W. Beebe, Miss Mary T. Beebe, Mrs. Edwin Beers, Miss Carrie L. Belcher, F. P. Bellamy, Henry Belden, H. E. H. Benedict, Frederick von Benkendorff, Miss Myra M. Bennett, Frank Sherman Benson, Miss Mary Benson, John Bentley, Mrs. Cornelia M. Bergen, Tunis G. Bergen, William Berri, Louis E. Berger, Miss Nellie M. Bessey, Mrs. Annie L. Betts, John H. Betts, Miss Mary Betts, Mrs. J. C. Billwiller, N. J. Bishoprick, Alexander Black, Benjamin F. Blair, Miss Edith Blaisdell, Sylvester L. Blood, Miss Josephine E. Blydenburgh, D. G. Bodkin, M. D., Mrs. W. P. Boggs, T. J. Boland, Miss Minerva Bon, Samuel W. Boocock, Hon. David A. Boody, Mrs. David A. Boody, William B. Boorum, Miss Louise Borchers, Miss Rita Bowdoin, Edwin William Bray, John Hyatt Brewer, S. Edgar Briggs, W. B. Brinsmade, Harvey N. Brooks, Miss Cornelia Brown, Miss Estellie C. Brown, Miss Evelyn B. Brown, Mrs. Florence S. Brown, Miss Florence S. Brown, Hersey Brown, Joseph E. Brown, William M. Brown, E. T. Brownson, Miss Freda M. Brunn, F. E. Bruns, Miss Minnie C. Bruns, George W. Brush, M. D., William C. Bryant, Mrs. Dudley Buck.

Miss S. M. Buckalew, Walter L. Burchett, William H. Burger, James S. Burke, Miss Alice G. Burling, Arthur T. Burnett, Henry W. Burnett, Mrs. Agnes Burns, A. L. Burns, Miss Mary Burns, Joseph A. Burr, the Rev. Joseph D. Burrell, D. D., Miss Julia A. Burt, Miss Carrie L. Bush, Mrs. C. W. Butler, W. P. Callaghan, Alexander Cameron, the Rev. Stephen H. Camp, the Hon. Felix Campbell, Flamen B. Candler, Mrs. G. W. Cann, Mrs. Clara H. Carhart, Adolph C. Carpenter, Miss Mabel V. Carpenter, W. A. Carpenter, Mrs. Harriet C. Carter, Walter S. Carter, Edwin Cary, Isaac H. Cary, Miss Alice Casamajor, Miss Marie Champney, A. B. Chandler, Frank H. Chandler, Henry Chapin, Jr., the Rev. M. B. Chapman, D. D., Miss S. B. Chase, S. B. Chittenden, Paul T. Cheriton, General C. T. Christensen, Mrs. C. T. Christensen, Arthur Claassen, Mrs. M. D. Ellison, Miss Belle A. Ennis, Mrs. Q. N. Evans, George E. Fahys, Joseph Fahys, Rev. William B. Farrell, Mrs. Theodore W. Field, Frederick Fischer, Louis G. Fisher, Carl Fique, Miss Theresa Ford, W. Edward Foster, Arthur W. Fox, William B. Fox, Henry Franke, H. E. Frankenberg, Benjamin T. Frothingham, William F. Fuller, Miss M. H. Fullerton, Robert Gair, Mrs. W. F. Gardiner, Charles T. Geyer, Mrs. Emma E. Gibb, Howard Gibb, Mrs. Emmeline Gibson, Mrs. E. C. Gibson, William Hamilton Gibson, William Gilfillan, M. D., Thomas Gill, Miss Virginia S. Goddard, Miss Anna Goessling, A. Goldmark, Miss C. T. Goll, Rev. A. H. Goodnough, William W. Goodrich, Frederick P. Gordon, E. J. Grant, Miss Anna K. Green, Rev. David Gregg, D. D., O. B. Gregory, Miss Charlotte L. Gulick, Mrs. Helena D. Gunther, Miss Mary Hagar, Albert Haley, Mrs. R. B. Hall, Miss A. T. Hallock, David F. Halstead, Miss Isabel Halstead, James M. Ham, James Hamblet, H. G. Hanchett, M. D., Edward E. Hand, Henry S. Hand, Mrs. J. W. Handren, Miss M. S. Handren, William H. Hanning, Henry E. Hard, Mrs. Olive T. Hardy, Miss Annie Hart.

Miss Amelia S. Hart, James H. Hart, Charles C. W. Harvey, Miss Julia P. Harwood, Miss Annie S. Hawes, Mrs. Clara Hawkins, Mrs. Mary R. Hawley, A. Augustus Healy, Henry R. Heath, Charles W. Henderson, Skidmore Hendrickson, M. D., Henry Hentz, W. F. Herbert, Mrs. Luther Hildreth, Miss Marian Hildreth, William B. Hill, Gustav Hillmann, John Hills, William E. Hinds, Miss Florence P. Hines, Miss Norma Heage, Cornelius N. Hoag'and, M. D., Mrs. M. E. Hobart, Edward H. Hobbs, Miss Clara E. Holland, Mrs. J. W. Hollenbeck, Frederick C. Holmes, Miss Ida H. Holmes, Mrs. J. S. Holmes, M. D., Miss Sarah W. Holmes, Miss Martha W. Hooper, Miss Adele E. Hopkins, Miss Clara L. Hopkins, Edward I. Horsman, Miss Julia R. Hotchkiss, David H. Houghtaling, Mrs. C. W. House, Mrs. Lucy E. Howard, William C. Howard, Miss Lulu Howell, Charles A. Hoyt, Miss Adelia A. Hudson, Joseph D. Huggins, Henry C. Hulbert, Washington Hull, Miss Mary Hunter, Henry E. Hutchinson, Mrs. John W. Hutchinson, Mrs. Catherine E. Hyatt, Miss Elizabeth H. Ilgen, Miss Fannie A. Irvine, W. H. Irwin, Mrs. John N. Ives, Hon. Darwin R. James, John S. James, William Jarvie, M. D. S., Perlee V. Jervis, D. Clinton Johnson, Mrs. R. H. Johnson, Miss Sadie Johnson, Miss Annie M. Jones, Miss G. E. Jones, Henry R. Jones.

Samuel B. Jones, Miss Sarah E. Jones, Miss C. Juchau, Miss Alice M. Judge, Mrs. Harriet Judson, Mrs. Russel Keith, William B. Kendall, Mrs. Clarence Kenyon, Robert J. Kimball, General Horatio C. King, Miss Helen F. Kingsbury, Mrs. T. S. Knapp, Mrs. A. M. Kneeland, Mrs. M. Koehl, Albert Korber, Henry C. Kuhns, Edward B. Ladd, Francis P. Ladd, John B. Ladd, Miss Annie E. Lampe, Miss Caroline P. Latimer, John A. Latimer, Mrs. A. C. Lawrence, Mrs. John H. Lawrence, Miss Marion Ledger, Miss Mary Lee, John Leech, Mrs. S. K. Lees, William F. Leffingwell, Miss Lillian S. Leitch, Theodore A. Liebler, Jr., Mrs. J. L. Ling, Edward H. Litchfield, Miss M. J. Lloyd, Herbert E. Locke, Miss Lydia A. Lockwood, Stephen O. Lockwood, Frederick Loeser, Gustav Loeser, Albert E. Loomis, Edward M. Loomis, J. Pierpont Lord, Loftin Love, F. W. Lovejoy, Frank H. Lovell, A. A. Low, Hon. Seth Low, William G. Low, Sidney V. Lowell, E. F. Lozier, Miss K. Ludwig, Frank M. Lupton, Miles K. Lynch, E. H. R. Lyman, Rev. A. J. Lyman, D. D., Mrs. Clarence Lyon, Le Roy M. Lyon, Miss Josephine M. Mackintosh, Miss Alice B. MacNary, Mrs. William Maddren, Rev. George P. Mains, D. D., Mrs. Jessie N. Mainwaring.

William H. Male, H. L. Mallory, Charles J. Mann, Frederick C. Manvel, George G. Martin, George W. Martin, Charles D. Marvin, Miss Mary A. Mason, John W. Mason, Miss Della A. Masters, Miss Harriet Matchett, Frank J. Mather, Mrs. A. M. Matheson, Albert H. Matthews, James Matthews, Nathaniel Watson, M. D., J. Rogers Maxwell, Miss Lillie L. S. Mayer, Professor W. A. McAndrew, James J. McCabe, Miss Helen A. McCarthy, Mrs. Julia R. McCay, Samuel S. McCurdy, James McCurrach, John McNamee, George McNaughton, M. D., Daniel W. McWilliams, Mrs. Mary Meade, Charles P. Metcalf, Professor Julius E. Meyer, Henry A. Meyer, [illegible] Mitchbrook, Albert Mildenberg, Miss Annie Mildenberger, Mrs. William Miles, John W. Millard, Miss Clara Millington, Francis L. Minton, Miss Isabella A. Mitchell, Frazer Muir Moffat, Louis Mollenhauer, Mrs. Stuart H. Moore, Miss Grace Monroe, Henry Montgomery, Mrs. Clarence Moore, David M. Morrison, Charles H. Morse, Henry H. Morton, M. D., Frank J. Mulligan, R. J. Murphy, Miss R. I. Murtha, Miss Dora Naeher, Carl Naeser, Charles F. Napier, William A. Nash, Miss Bertha G. Nason, William Neidlinger, William H. Neidlinger, Thomas Newcomb, E. E. Newell, Miss J. A. Nichols, J. W. North, Miss Caroline P. Oakley.

George W. Oakley, Miss Julia L. O'Connor, Willis L. Ogden, George M. Olcott, A. I. Ormsbee, Robert Ormiston, M. D., Herman W. Ormsbee, Alexander E. Orr, Mrs. Sarah E. Ostrander, Charles H. Otis, Mrs. Louise Ovington, Edwin Packard, Charles R. Paddock, Adrian Paradis, Miss Jennie Patterson, George F. Peabody, Miss Maud L. Peck, Miss Cora Webb Peet, Alfred A. Peck, Miss E. Penney, Oscar Pfeiffer, William H. Perry, Mrs. Bernard Peters, Hon. James F. Pierce, Henry E. Pierrepont, Miss Julia J. Pierrepont, Mrs. W. B. Pierson, L. S Pilcher, M. D., E. C. Platt, Millard H Platt, Milton J. Platt, Mrs. Caroline H. Polhemus, Miss Jennie T. Pollard, Arthur R. Pollock, Mrs. Daniel Pomeroy, Joseph C. Pool, Robert Porterfield, Thomas Potts, Mrs. Charles Pratt, Mrs. C. A. Preller, George H. Prentice, Mrs. Eloise W. Prentice, Miss M. H. Prescott, George A. Price, Robert Proddow, Henry L. Quick, James Quinlan, William J. Quinlan, Jr., E. A. Race, John Rae, Anton A. Raven, Miss Louise E. Rawson, Mrs. J. E. Raymond, B. T. Read, M. D. S., Freddie Reddall, A. L. Reid, Jr., Victor H. Reid.

Mrs. Frank Reynolds, F. St. J. Richards, John E. Richardson, M. D., William C. Richardson, Miss Johanna L. Ris, George H. Roberts, Jr., Mrs. John J. Roberts, Miss Emma F. Robinson, Mrs. S. C. Robinson, Henry M. Rogers, Miss Louise E. Root, Miss Gertrude Rose, William G. Rothe, Miss Christina Rounds, J. H. Rowland, Mrs. Charles E. Russell, Miss Harriet L. Ryder, Mrs. J. L. Salter, E. R. Sammis, Z. S. Sampson, the Hon. Charles A. Schieren, Henry Sheldon, Henry K. Sheldon, Miss G. O. Schelker, Mrs. August Schlegel, Carl G. Schmidt, Miss Beatrice Scholes, Miss M. Scholes, Edward M. Shepard, Julius Schubert, F. H. Scoville, John E. Searles, Miss Theresa Seidenberg, George W. Shiebler, Mrs. L. W. Shiff, Mrs. H. T. Shotwell, Miss Caroline Shyell, Charles H. Simmons, Nelson B. Sizer, M. D., Alexander J. C. Skene, M. D., Charles M. Skinner, Miss Florence R. Slocum, Frank Slocum, Miss M. Evangeline Slosson, Bryan H. Smith, Cyrus P. Smith, Freeeborn G. Smith, Frederick W. Smith, Mrs. Herbert C. Smith, Miss Mildred P. Smith, William H. Smith, Mrs. Charles H. Smithers, Miss Mary Snedeker, Arthur S. Somers, George H. Southard, H. B. Speer, M. D., the Hon. Frank Squier, A. L. Stanley, David Stanley.

Miss Lena Stanton, Miss Florence Starr, F. A. Stearns, G. Waring Stebbins, Mrs. Aibert Steiner, Miss Elizabeth Stephens, William H. Stevens, Miss Edith M. Stikeman, Thomas E. Stillman, Miss A. Cora Stone, George C. Stout, Jeremiah T. Story, George Stowe, the Hon. J. S. T. Stranahan, Mrs. J. S. T. Stranahan, Miss Emma Straut, George W. Street, Mrs. J. B. Summerfield, Mrs. J. H. Sutphin, Frank C. Swan, James S. Swan, Miss Estelle Sweet, Mrs. Jessie M. Sweet, Charles H. Taft, Mrs. E. N. Taft, John Tagg, Franklin E. Taylor, Ira Preston Taylor, Pope C. Tefft, Mrs. L. D. Terhune, Mrs. Edmund Terry, Miss Rebecca Terry, Miss Florence N. Thallon, Mrs. John Thallon, Robert Thallon, Miss Margaret Thayer, William A. Thayer, Miss Alice Thomas, the Hon. Edward B. Thomas, Mrs. Ludlow Thomas, Edward Thompson, Miss Lida V. Thompson, Miss Grace Tienken, Miss Charlotte A. Todd, Miss Julia M. Toomey, John Q. Tower, Spencer Trask, G. C. Travis, Mrs. Warren C. Tredwell, Hugo L. Troetschel, Miss Louise E. Tucker, Miss Adelaide Turnbull, Silas Tuttle, Abram Ray Tyler, William E. Uptegrove, Mrs. William E. Uptegrove, Miss Louise D. Vail, William D. Vanderbilt, C. V. C. Van Deusen, Miss Kate Vandeveer.

D. W. Van Ingen, Willis Van Valkenburgh, Mrs. A. H. Vermilye, Miss Grace C. Voorhees, Mrs. Kate B. Vrooman, Miss Lillian C. Wakeman, Howard T. Walden, Miss J. Florence Walford, Mrs. Robert S. Walker, William H. Wallace Miss Emma L. Walton, Frederick J. Warburton, Sidney Ward, Henry L. Wardwell, B. J. Warner, Charles E. Warner, Miss S. E. V. Waterman, Horace Waters, Miss Jessie K. Watson, Miss Anna Weddigen, George F. Weedon, Walter L. Wellington, N. Dana Wells, Miss Grace W. Wells, Robert Gilbert Welsh, Henry Wenzel, Jr., Hayden W. Wheeler, Mrs. F. H. Wheelock, George H. Whitbeck, Alfred T. White, Francis L. White, Stanford White, Hon. Stephen V. White, Mrs. S. V. White, Mrs. Isabella S. Whiton, Miss Grace Whitmarsh, Henry N. Whitney, Howard Whittlesey, Miss Anna M. Wilbur, James E. Wight, Edward W. Williams, Mrs. J. O. Williams, Mrs. Joseph P. Williams, C. L. Williston, Charles R. Williamson, Mrs. J. A. Wisner, Cornelius D. Wood, Henry A. Wood, Miss Alice Woodbury, Miss D. Woods, R. Huntington Woodman, General John B. Woodward, Robert W. Woodward, Mrs. Mary B. Woodward, Charles P. Woodruff, Timothy L. Woodruff, Miss Marie Wundram, Charles T. Young, Walter H. Young.

The officers and Board of Directors of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, with which the Department of Music co-operates, are as follows:

Henry K. Sheldon, president; L. S. Burnham, vice-president; B. T. Frothingham, secretary; George H. Prentiss, Carll H. DeSilver, John F. Praeger, Alexander E. Orr, William R. Bunker, Frederick A. Ward, W. W. Goodrich, C. T. Christensen, John S. Frothingham, Henry N. Whitney, John D. Elwell, Theodore F. Jackson, Samuel R. Probasco, William A. Nash and John S. James.

[21]

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCT. 19, 1895

The Symphony Orchestra will open its fifteenth season in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Thursday evening, October 31. The other dates will be November 21, December 12, January 2 and 16, February 6 and 20, March 12, April 9, and 30, and the solo artists already announced are Mme. Devere Sapio, Marie Brema, Antoinette Szumowska, Rafael Joseffy and Ben Davies. The sale of seats will open next Saturday morning, October 26, at the University bookstore.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 20, 1895.

THE FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

If seeing so many of the familiar faces in the usual places in Music Hall were not sufficient to make one feel as if time had turned backward again in its flight and stopped about midway of almost any past Symphony season, a glance at the programme might have completed the illusion. For that was just one of the regular Boston sort—good, standard and respectable, to be sure, but without any apparent consciousness of the fact that the world of music has a motion onward through space, like all the other worlds, and that it ought to sing up together with the other morning and evening stars if it be desirous of keeping the place it held in creation's dawn.

For this was the programme provided: Brahms's first symphony; an andante theme with variations from a divertimento by Mozart—now played in these concerts for the first time, but offering nothing unfamiliar in treatment or color; Beethoven's "Leonora" overture, No. 3; Dvorak's Scherzo Capriccioso in D-flat major, opus 66. If Mr. Paur meant to bridge over the months which have intervened since May and put his audience into an old frame of mind, he hit it off well. But if he had any notion of helping them to begin a new season with fresh enthusiasm and piquant anticipation, he made a miss. It was a good programme to get his men into vigorous working order, to be sure, for there was lots of hard, solid toil in it, from the steady pull and the intricate scoring of the Brahms to the stern chords and rushing sweeps of the Beethoven and the eccentric vagrancies of the Dvorak.

Yet let not exceptions be taken too seriously, for out of this new hearing of the symphony came a novel notion about it, as music, even when intentionally of the "programme" sort, constantly suggests a change in imagery and in meaning. This time it seemed as if that symphony might be called "Fr. Crispius Day," for it stirred up so many associations in the Shakespeare's "Henry the Fourth," the valiant eloquence of the young King, the great battle and all that he foresaw following on after the wonderful victory which he predicted and conjured his soldiers by. In the fierce, assertive first movement are the incitements, the shock of onset and the harsh fury of resolute fighters. In the andante, and rest and truce come soothingly. The allegretto sings sweetly of peace, prosperity and good augary. The fourth comes as "Harry the King" promised that the feast of Crispin should come in after years, with glorious reminiscences of feats and wounds and triumphs, solemn honors for the dead, the reawakening of the sleeping spirits of heroes, and the stirring, sonorous pæans of conquest and possession. Such fancies come to at least one listener, and, as fancies go, they do not seem very unreasonable.

"The storm subsides to calm,
Hearts that bled are staunched with balm."

The performance was unusually good for the first one of a season. It had almost always energy, unanimity and accuracy, the only real blurred parts being some bits of the complicated last movements of the symphony. The allegros of the overture were clear, although Mr. Paur pushed them on at a great pace, the strong chords were seized with a firm grip, there were some actual pianissimi, the half-fantastic effects in the scherzo came out sharply, and, for a wonder, the kettle-drums showed a sense of due proportion.

The programme-books will come again from under the editorship of Mr. Apthorp, whose ideas of fitness were illustrated by his filling the "Entr' Acte" portion with seven pages of a ponderous essay on "Form in Music." As if Mr. Irving should provide for the intermezzi of one of his series plays a sombre lecture on the philosophy of dramatic composition! If Mr. Apthorp would do the programme readers a service, he would say less about the themes and motives and would have them printed in music type, as is done in the best foreign programme-books and as the New York Tribune does in its special analytical articles.

At next Saturday's concert the orchestra will play Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture, Beethoven's fifth symphony and a suite of E. A. MacDowell. Mrs. Clementine DeVere Sapio, who has not been heard in an important concert in Boston for a long time, will sing the "Mad" scene from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet" and the great soprano air from "Fidelio."

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVIII., NO. 112.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1895.

SYMPHONY SEASON OPENING.

Large Audience Enjoys the Concert in Music Hall.

Mr. Paur Given Cordial Welcome by the Brilliant Company—Orchestra Plays in Its Best and Most Brilliant Style—Two New Plays at the Hollis Street Theatre.

The 15th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra began last evening in Music Hall, with the following programme:

Symphony No. 1, in C minor.....Brahms
Andante, with variations.....Mozart
(First time.)
Overture, "Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven
Scherzo Capriccioso, op. 66.....Dvorak

The audience was large, and seemingly in the best of moods to enjoy the performances, and that it did so was amply evidenced by the fervor of their plaudits through the whole concert. Mr. Paur's entrance on his way to the conductor's stand, was the signal for an exceptionally cordial and prolonged welcome at the hands of the brilliant company assembled, and he was kept bowing his acknowledgments for some moments. The orchestra is substantially the same as that of last season, the only notable exception being the leader of the contrabasses, who is a newcomer, and apparently the right man in the right place. There was some difference in the distribution of the players. This season the wind instruments occupy the centre of the orchestra, the flutes being in the front rank, and the others spreading out in wedge form. The strings are massed on either side, and surround the wind, the basses, as before, stretching across the back. This gives a greater compactness and unity to the body of tone emitted by the wind, and judging by the effect produced last night, the innovation is a decided improvement.

The performances of the orchestra gave no indication of its long vacation, the playing throughout being in its best and most brilliant style, which means that nothing more able and more perfect in technical skill, in ready response to the conductor's every indication and in beauty of ensemble could be desired. The selections, with one exception, have become familiar enough here, but they were well balanced with each other and presented all necessary contrast. The Brahms symphony, despite some dull and dryly pedantic moments, is certainly the best of contemporary works in its kind, and the splendid reading it obtained from Mr. Paur brought out every point in a masterly manner. In color, spirit, phrasing, dignity of style, nothing was lacking to impart all possible interest to the symphony. The first allegro was never more clearly and more satisfyingly interpreted here, and the andante was given with a warmth, a grace of phrasing and a broad delicacy of color that were fascinating. The noble adagio that precedes the finale was read with impressive largeness, and the stirring climax to the whole with great fire.

The Motzart andante and variations are from the Divertimento in D major, No. 17. The theme is in D minor and is thoroughly characteristic in its flow and its simplicity of the composer. The variations are six in number and are very beautiful. Mozart is not familiar as a writer of variations for the orchestra, and this work presented him in an unaccustomed light. These variations do not in any way resemble those in his pianoforte compositions. They are larger in style and do not adhere as closely to the mere embroidering of the theme. In some respects, especially in seriousness and in ingenuity in presenting a subject under constantly varying aspects they foreshadow, even if lightly, the method of Beethoven the unsurpassed master of the variation. The third variation with its close imitations between the violins and the basses, and the fourth and fifth variations with their charming contrapuntal devices, and the fascinating touches that are given to the horns are notably interesting. The work was splendidly played and served to show at its fullest the magnificent resources of the orchestra in its strings.

The "Leonore" overture was interpreted gloriously, and with a fine appreciation of its dramatic sentiment. It was Beethoven reading in its most intelligent and sympathetic sense, and the beauty and finish of the performance have never been surpassed by the orchestra. The Dvorak scherzo, despite its padding and here and there a bit of commonplace, is a spirited and attractive work, more interesting, however, for its glowing and brilliant orchestration, its rhythmic emphasis, its elaborate richness and varied contrasts of tone color, and its occasional strongly accented grotesqueness than for its themes. Here, again, Mr. Paur's sympathy with the marked peculiarities of the work and the fluent and inspiriting playing of the orchestra call for prompt recognition and praise without stint. The concert initiated the season felicitously and to the vigorously manifested pleasure of the audience.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner; "Mad Scene," from "Hamlet," Thomas; symphony No. 8, Beethoven; aria from "Fidelio," Beethoven; suite, MacDowell. Mme. De Vere-Sapio is to be the soloist.

again in the Music Hall Friday afternoon for the opening rehearsal of the 15th season of the symphony concerts. Although not so crowded as it will be later when the grande monde have come back to town for good, there was a surprisingly large audience, and Mr. Paur received the warmest kind of a reception. He is looking remarkably well after his summer in Europe, and we could but think as he stood, baton in hand, with his well-fitting Prince Albert and gray trousers, his hair and beard well trimmed, how much his years in America had done for him in the way of externals.

Among the familiar faces that were seen on the floor and in the balconies of the season's subscribers were Col. [illegible] and Mr. and Mrs. C. P. Cur-[illegible] Montgomery Sears, Mr. Lothrop Thorndike and his daughter, Mrs. Paur, Mr. and Mrs. Francis I. Amory, Mrs. George Shattuck, Mrs. Herbert Dumaresq, Mr. and Mrs. Russell Sturgis, Mr. Henry Grew, Mr. Henry Wainwright and his sister, Mrs. Henry Howe, Mrs. Zerrahn, Mr. Carl Zerrahn, Mrs. Otis Kimball and Miss Kimball, Mrs. James Davis, Mrs. Matthew Luce, Miss Florence Lyman, Mr. Templeman Coolidge and his young daughter, Miss Mary Bigelow, Miss Alice Stackpole, Miss Marianna Guild and Mr. George Barnard.

Mrs. Gardner, whose seats this season are a little farther back from the platform than they were last year, had Sig. Tirindelli with her. She was looking very well in a cloth costume of golden brown, with coat opening over a white blouse, and a white stock. Her hat was a large black one, and her veil was, as usual, of sprigged white lace.

Mrs. F. H. Prince is at the Holland House, in New York.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, OCT. 20, 1895.

First of This Season's Symphony Concerts.

Conductor Paur Cordially Welcomed by a Brilliant Audience.

Another season of symphony concerts has begun, much to the gratification of the cultured music lovers of Boston, who are justly proud of their incomparable orchestra. The Boston symphony orchestra has long been regarded as the best-trained and most capable orchestra in this country, and during the last two or three years is not believed to have had a superior in any other country.

The 15th season begins with most favorable prospects and every indication that the splendid records of the past will be maintained. Mr Emil Paur remains as conductor, this being his third year in control of the orchestra. He has won the respect and regard of his patrons who have come to consider him as perhaps the most efficient leader that the orchestra has ever had.

EMIL PAUR.

The audiences which attended the Friday afternoon rehearsal and last evening's concert were extremely cordial in giving welcome to the director and applauding his orchestra's splendid performance of a well chosen program.

Music hall was, of course, crowded to its capacity on both occasions, for almost all the desirable seats had sometime since been purchased for the season. Familiar faces were seen everywhere about the hall, the same faces which have been seen year after year at these concerts. Enthusiasm for symphony concerts is something which, having once been thoroughly developed, is likely to continue indennitely.

The program last evening seemed to meet with general approval. The first number was Brahms' famous symphony No. 1 in C minor. It is a superb work, and has been admirably played here in the past, but never with better effect than under Mr Paur's direction. The introduction to the first movement, so replete with melodic grace, was given with exquisite taste. Its harmony was impressive, and the gradual swelling in the power of tone, as it developed a new theme, was extremely imposing. The wood winds and horns executed beautiful work and combined to produce a grand effect, in spite of the abrupt and almost harsh character of the strings and winds which followed them.

The subsidiary passage work is rather apt to detract from the impression of beauty which the opening of the movement produces. The working out of the themes is excessively elaborate, even if necessary in the composer's design. Though the figures change at times from rhythm to episode and were very effective in their transitions, their development is too long and too intricate. The finale is full of force, and the gradually increasing fury of the climax is startlingly effective.

The second movement is pregnant with pathetic melody. It begins with a thoughtful theme, and though the oboe and the violas try to force a more lively melody to the front, it relapses into the melancholy with which it is clouded in the beginning. The middle of this movement is a rambling, free phantasy, permeated with sentiment and beauty, and the cheerful melody into which it develops is very pleasing.

The third movement is simple and quiet in effect, and the themes are graceful. The fourth movement is elaborate in design and development. The themes are stately, and the energetic passage work, with the abrupt climaxes, produce a wonderful and bewildering effect of beauty and force. The transitions from the solemn harmonics to the soft melodies with which the movement concludes is very impressive.

Mozart's "Andante," with variations, in D minor, from Divertimento, was the second number, and was played by the orchestra with remarkable effect. It was played at these concerts for the [illegible] Paur's interpretation [illegible] what is best in the composition. It afforded an excellent opportunity for good work to the first violins, and the ease and grace with which they executed the difficult, elaborate figures of the different variations was remarkably effective.

Beethoven's overture No. 3, to "Leonore," called forth the most delicate skill of the orchestra. The overture is full of startling effects. The transitions from the most delicate and sighing melodies to tremendously vigorous passage work are highly dramatic. The changes from the pathetic and tender cadences to furious tones, swelling almost into raging outbursts, are intensely exciting and interesting. The composition is permeated with nervous force and wonderful charm, and the orchestra played it with striking effect.

The concert concluded with Dvorak's scherzo cappriceioso, which was thoroughly appreciated by the audience.

Mr Paur and the members of the orchestra are to be congratulated on the effective work they displayed at the first of this season's concerts. If possible, the members of the orchestra gave evidence of improvement in the discipline of their bearing, and the almost faultless execution of their work. They apparently have become better acquainted with the talent of their leader, and have learned to follow him more unhesitatingly in the individual interpretations he puts on the composition before them.

The program for the second concert will be as follows: Overture, "Der Fliegende Hollander," Wagner; "Mad Scene," from "Hamlet," A. Thomas; symphony No. 5, Beethoven; aria from "Fidelio," Beethoven; suite, MacDowell. Soloist, Mme DeVere-Sapio.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, OCT. 20, 1895.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The second rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in Music hall on Friday afternoon, October 21, at 2.30 o'clock and Saturday evening, October 26, at 8.00 o'clock, when the following programme will be given:

Overture, "Der Fliegende Hollander," Wagner
"Mad Scene" from Hamlet.....A. Thomas
Symphony No. 5.....Beethoven
Aria from "Fidelio".....Beethoven
Suite.....MacDowell

Soloist, Mme. DeVere-Sapio.

[22]

...Journal.
...DAY, OCTOBER 20, 1895.

FIRST SYMPHONY

A Respectable Program Brilliantly Played.

Worship of Composer Brahms Renewed.

View of the Audience That Was Present.

Mr. Paur Talks of His Recent Trip Abroad.

The first concert of the 15th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Music Hall. Mr. Emil Paur began his third year as conductor. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 1, in C minor, op. 68.....Brahms
Andante with variations, in D minor, from Divertimento in D major, No. 17, (Koechel, No. 334). (First time.)....Mozart
Overture to "Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven
Scherzo Capriccioso in D flat major, op. 66 .....Dvorak

The worship of Brahms was resumed last evening with pomp and ceremony. The altar was decked with flowers. The faithful were present and devoutly disposed. The compiler of the program-book was the chief thurifer and fugleman. The trumpet was sounded even before the concert, and due notice was given of the performance of the C minor Symphony, which, it appears, is not only the fulfillment of the prophecy of Schumann that Brahms was "one destined to give expression in an ideal manner to the deepest feelings of the age," but also is the "keynote of the musical character" of the Symphony concerts. So no hearer could possibly go wrong.

This same C minor Symphony has from its first performance excited discussion. It is a singular fact that while Brahms is the Glorious Apollo of absolute music, his admirers, both the ferocious and the timid, discover much that is pictorial in this symphony. Thus Mr. Sittard gives a motto: "Durch Kampf zun Sieg, durch Nacht zum Licht;" which, being interpreted, means that in the first movement there is a tremendous soul-struggle, in which the Powers of Darkness seem victors. The second and third movements are breathing spells in which the composer loafs at his ease and invites his soul. In the last movement he girds up his loins and puts his enemies to fight, plucking triumph from the very movement that to the ordinary modern builder of symphonies is apt to be a disastrous defeat. Mr. Ehrlert finds that the symphony is like unto "a medium range of peaks without glaciers and abysses," and then he returns to earth by stating that it lacks "the gift of dramatic interruption and agitation."

This topographical comparison leads the compiler of the program book to indulge himself in a fine burst. Every musician knows the passages in the introduction to the finale where the first horn is answered by the flute. They have always been regarded as pretty and effective. It now turns out that they are "indescribably dramatic." Nay, more. The compiler says: "To me this wonderful horn and flute episode has always brought a vivid suggestion of the notes and distant echoes of the Alpine horn amid the cloud-capped snow-peaks of the Bernese Oberland. The whole scene is suggested—not servilely and prosaically copied—by the music; you see and hear it all; the ringing horn-tones, the repeated echoes, the bright sunlight and shifting cloud shadows on the mountains!" I wonder if Brahms knew at the time that he was painting so big a picture on a little canvas.

But as the compiler says, every one is at liberty to put what "extra musical interpretation he pleases," and if Mr. Apthorp finds a Swiss scene, with real glaciers, and bread and honey for breakfast, another may hear in it only some charming music. And here it may be said that such episodes give the clue to Ehrlert's application of the word "mosaic" to the symphonic talent of Brahms.

There are two thoughts irresistibly suggested by this symphony: (1) Pathos in the large sense of the word; (2) A revolt from pessimism and a return to optimism. I use these latter terms because pessimism is a favorite charge against Brahms. This term is, of course, dear to Germans and German-Americans who are forever talking about "intellectuality" in music. This charge is perhaps true of much of the chamber music of this composer. Crabbedness seems a better term. There is, however, neither crabbedness nor pessimism in the andante or the finale. Worshippers of Brahms have reason to exult in their faith when they can point to such noble music. And he that is not moved by certain portions of the first movement—especially the slow introduction—must indeed be strong-hearted. There are lines by Dante Gabriel Rossetti that find their answer in the greater pages of this symphony:

"O what is this that knows the road I came,
. . . . . .
And in regenerate rapture turns my face
Upon the devious coverts of dismay."

Do you find these lines vague, obscure? So is the music that gives the answer. And perhaps there is no truly great music or poetry into which criticism does not enter. So that when Ehrlert accused Brahms of having "no melody," he paid him a glowing tribute.

Brahms, after the danse-poèmes, in which the bacchante dances, but with tightly fitting stays, the selection from the Divertimento of Mozart was a delightful contrast and relief. Of course, its effect was exaggerated by the great number of players, for it was written only for a handful, and the purist might cry out against the lack of proportion in its modern performance.

A Divertimento, we are told, is a composition written to engage the attention in a cheerful manner, and to furnish genteel entertainment. Many Divertimenti are so called because they do not divert on the principle of lucus a non. We know little about the circumstances attending the composition of this particular piece. It was written in 1779 or 1780, and it is probably the one in which Mozart played at Munich, "as if he were the greatest fiddler in Europe." The whole Divertimento, with its allegro, andante and variations, two minuets, adagio and rondo might well induce sleep. The excerpt gave much pleasure and also showed the admirable quality of the strings.

* * *

There is nothing to be said at this late day about the Leonore overture except to praise the performance of last night. Even those who always wait with joyful hope to hear the trumpeter crack were this time disappointed. Is it worth while to write an essay on the four overtures to "Fidelio," or to question the use of the flute in the return to the measures of thanksgiving after the prison episode? Suffice it to say, that glorious music was gloriously played.

* * *

And so the Capriccioso of Dvorak was played most brilliantly. It is not one of his inspired works. There are moments when it seems as though the capriciousness of the composer consisted in his wild and perplexed thought, "What shall I do next?" But the compiler of the program-book assures us that "by very little stretching of terms, the scherzo proper—with its brilliant principal theme and light second theme—may stand as the first theme and first subsidiary of the sonata-form, the trio standing as the second theme and second subsidiary."

* * *

That nothing might be lacking in the enjoyment of the evening a lecture on "Form in Music" was put before the reader for instruction and amusement during the waits, or possibly to beguile the time while Brahms was played. Local color was given by quotations from Messrs. R. W. Emerson and H. T. Finck, and many kind and generous words were spoken in behalf of our old friend, that venerable fetich, the Sonata Form.

* * *

In spite of the fact that the program itself could not justly be called brilliant—say rather it was eminently respectable—the concert was a brilliant one, worthy of the great reputation of the orchestra. The performance of the orchestra was superb in ensemble and in solo work throughout the evening.

PHILIP HALE.

A VIEW OF THE AUDIENCE.

Story of Various Happenings, Also an Interview With Mr. Paur.

Standing at any of the doors of Music Hall last night, the spectator saw pass, and an hour and a half afterward repass him, almost identically the same persons who pushed the same stiff doors every Saturday night season after season ago. Greetings, as a rule, were as casual as though not five months, but a week, had elapsed since the last similar show of recognition. The only ones who seemed really glad to see one another were the coachmen and the "cops" outside.

At the stations, which appear to be theirs by right of permanent and eminent domain, stood the hall attendants, who punch tickets and frowned with rigid and invariable alternation. As unchangeable as they appeared the hall—the same up stairs and down stairs, and in the old-fashioned corridors and at the feet of the much-abused statue. That is the flavor of Music Hall—its familiarity-breeding unchangeableness. The desk of Mr. Paur was girt with smilax, and fastened to the shelf was a bunch of white chrysanthemums, with an enormous saffron sash hanging from it.

By and by the musicians began to bob out, trap-door like, from Bumstead Hall and to tune their fiddles and trill their flutes and clarinets. They, too, were the same men that scraped and puffed in the orchestra last May. There was one strange face and figure in the arc of contra bass players; but he is a man of abundant physical characteristics, so he will not long be among the unknown. His name is K. Keller, and the report is that he comes from abroad.

There was a new bassoon player, though probably few knew it. He is ycleped A. Kirchner, and is from New York. Otherwise the personnel of the orchestra is unchanged, absolutely. Mr. Timothee Adamowski, the self-same Timothee Adamowski who played in the orchestra last year, and the year before that, and so on, sat in the first chair of the second row of first violins. None of the musicians, not even of the favorite musicians, was noticed by the still rustling audience. Mr. Paur, however, was flatteringly applauded as he smiled his way across the platform. Then the conductor, standing on his desk's little box, watched the people squeezing along to their seats.

The audience was as large and fashionable and unalterably interested as ever. Some of the new patrons of the concerts came late, bringing with them a draught and a slight commotion; but this theatre habit will soon wear away. Right in the middle of the floor rows sat a group of girls from one of the city's private schools. They were ostensibly, almost uniquely, discriminating in the admiration of everything worth admiring, and besides, they set the fashion for hatlessness. Among the other listeners were the following-named:

Col. and Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. J. Montgomery Sears, Mr. and Mrs. S. Lothrop Thorndike, Mr. and Mrs. John L. Gardner, Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Bancroft, Dr. and Mrs. J. W. Elliot, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Head, Mr. and Mrs. Henry M. Rogers, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Foote, Mr. and Mrs. Robert M. Morse, Mr. and Mrs. G. D. Low, Mr. and Mrs. E. H. Clement, Mr. B. J. Lang, Miss Lang, Miss Stackpole, Miss Lyman, Mr. B. F. Keith, Mr. A. Paul Keith, Mr. and Mrs. H. Pratt McKean, Dr. and Mrs. Henry Morse, Mr. and Mrs. Charles P. Curtis, Mr. and Mrs. Gardner M Lane, Miss Pauline Shaw, Mr. Clayton Johns, Mr. Frank B. Sanborn, Mr. William P. Blake, Mr. and Mrs. George W. Chadwick, Mr. Ignace Gaugengigl.

Mrs. Emil Paur and her two sons heard the performance from behind the screen which hides the entrance to the conductor's room.

...ed into his room, a ...reporter sought him. The conductor was very happy, in fact, he could not express the fullness of his happiness except in German. He welcomed heartily the friends who gushed in to congratulate him. Finally he found time to light a cigarette. Then he greeted the Journal reporter.

"I, sir, have had a very pleasant time this year, this journey," and his voice was gutturally joyful. "Yes, I went abroad with all my family, and we went from city to city. I played a concerto of mine and conducted an orchestra at Leipsig. Oh, it was a success! I think the people there liked my composition very much. Then we went to Mannheim, where I formerly lived, and where the people were very kind to us. And then we went from place to place, having a pleasant time. Mrs. Paur was unwell for a short while, but we crossed over to Switzerland, and she is very well now and so are the young fellows. We went over to Germany in May and came back in the last week of September.

"Yes, I found many new and rare compositions for orchestra, and brought many of them home with me. I think they will make the programs much more interesting—very interesting.

"But the people were pleased tonight, were they not? They seemed very pleased. They received me so well; that pleased me. Yes, it was a fine audience. Indeed, I was glad to see it. I think that the prospects for a successful season are good, oh! yes, very good. The orchestra played splendidly. Yes, we will have a good season."

Mr. Paur was sincerely delighted—as sincerely delighted as the audience had appeared to be.

NOTES OF MUSIC.

The feuilleton and sundry notes are on page 13.

The first of the Symphony concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will be given Thursday evening, Oct. 31.

The program of the Symphony Concert Saturday evening will be as follows: Overture, "Flying Dutchman," Wagner; Beethoven's Fifth Symphony; MacDowell's Suite. Mrs. De Vere Saplo will sing the Mad Scene from Thomas's "Hamlet" and the grand air from "Fidelio."

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 20.

The Symphony Concert.

The Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season at Music Hall, last evening. There was the usual large audience, with its usual reserved enthusiasm, Mr. Paur receiving unmistakable signs of friendly recognition and approval. Everybody felt comfortable and magnanimous as at a meeting of friends where each knows the other's weaknesses, and accepts them with smiling amiability.

Once comfortably settled in its seat, the audience consulted the programme, which was as follows:

Symphony No. 1, op. 68.....Brahms
Andante and Variations, D-minor.....Mozart
Overture, "Lenore," No. 3.....Beethoven
Capriccio, op. 69.....Dvorak

A good, comfortable programme, with no novelty to disturb old traditions, and a promise of the good, solid, well known work of the future. A meek, gracious programme that posed itself on neutral ground, appealing to classic and romantic bias at one and the same time, and connected in a straight line with programmes of twenty-five years ago; a programme covered with reassuring and authentic dust and cobwebs, like good port wine that has rested undisturbed in a dark cellar for two full generations.

We were told and told again that Mr. Paur travelled to Europe for the special purpose of looking up musical novelties, but neither the first concert nor the advertised second and third concerts gives any hint as to how he succeeded in his quest. Perhaps he discovered no worthy novelties, and perhaps he did not look in the right direction to discover novelties; perhaps he too hastily concluded because, at present, the German musical intellect lies fallow, there was no active musical intellect to be found in the rest of the civilized world. This conclusion is hard on France and Italy, where just now musical talent is very active and where it is very possible that a sympathetic and intelligent search would have unearthed several good things worthy of being immortalized by our Symphony orchestra. But perhaps it is wiser and juster to wait; the unexpected sometimes happens even with a Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it is more than probable that one or two new overtures may be sprung unexpectedly on a peaceful and non-expectant public.

Of the interpretation of the music of the first concert little else than the highest praise can be given. The noble Brahms symphony was read superbly, and played with a dignity and finish beyond praise. On listening to the delightful work, written before Brahms had frozen into statuesqueness, one almost regrets that the symphony is nearly twenty years old, and its many beauties long since described. Mr. Paur has a special fondness for this master, whose first and third manner will doubtless be abundantly illustrated in the near future. The Mozart andante also received full justice in Mr. Paur's hands, and perhaps it would be hypercriticism to suggest that there was a trace of heaviness in the interpretation as of one swathing Ariel in heavy Roman drapery and thus robbing him of a certain grace while impeding the dainty upward curve of his flight. No possible objection could be urged against Mr. Paur's treatment of the Lenore Overture which was characterized by massive broadness, dignity, fire, and self-restraint. The masterly playing of this work called forth the first spontaneous enthusiasm of the evening, and Mr. Paur was compelled to come forward and acknowledge the more than deserved applause. The Dvorak work hardly seems worth the care he stowed on it, and it seemed pretentious, naked and not ashamed, even under Mr. Paur's loving devotion. Probably its beauties were destroyed by its position on the programme, and one can only wonder how it got there. It is a shock to hear the sound of a cowbell after the pealing of silver chimes.

The programme for the second concert is: Wagner's Overture to the Flying Dutchman; Beethoven's Symphony No. 5; a suite by MacDowell, and the soloist, Mme. DeVere Saplo will sing the "Mad Scene" from A. Thomas's Hamlet, and an aria from Fidelio.

MONDAY, OCT. ..., 1895.

BOSTON STANDARD.

Boston Symphony Orchestra's 15th Season Opens.

The first concert of the 15th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall Saturday evening with brilliant success. On this occasion, as on the opening rehearsal Friday afternoon, Music Hall was enthusiastically filled, and rarely in the illustrious career of this musical organization, which has few peers and no superiors, have the initial programmes achieved a more brilliant or artistic success.

Conductor Emil Paur, now commencing his third season, made his way to his desk, to which clung a mass of white chrysanthemums and smilax, amid admiring plaudits. Herr Paur's perfect control over his musicians was the more apparent at the opening concert in view of this work immediately upon the recent gathering of the players after a five months' interim. A difference in the distribution of the players is noticeable this season—an innovation which seemed to give perfect satisfaction to the audience. In the centre of the orchestra are placed the wind instruments, while the flutes are in the front rank. The strings are arranged on either side and surround the wind instruments, while the basses, as in previous seasons, stretch across the back.

The orchestra is almost identically the same as last season, two exceptions being a new face among the contra bass players and a new bassoon.

This programme was given:

Symphony No. 1, in C minor, op. 68....Brahms
Andante with variations, in D minor, from Divertimento in D major, No. 17, (Koechel, No. 334). (First time).....Mozart
Overture to "Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven
Scherzo Capriccioso in D flat major, op. 66 .....Dvorak

While the selections, with one exception, are familiar to those who have followed closely the rich musical offerings this city affords, the excellent rendering given Saturday night under Mr. Paur's conductorship allowed no thought of intrusion. The first number was Brahms Symphony No. 1, in C minor. The theme is elaborated on a grand and inspiriting scale, characteristic of its composer, in what may be called his middle manner. The first movement opens with a slow introduction, un pocosostenuto, in C minor. The peculiar distribution of the four parts of the harmony among the different instruments is productive of a powerful volume of tone, which makes the passage uniquely impressive. Mozart's Andante, with variations, in D minor, from Divertimento, No. 17, the second number of the programme, introduces the orchestra, in many respects at its best, presenting the elaborate figuration in the first violins, followed by close imitations between the first violins and the basses, with a free accompanying part in the other instruments. Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," in C major, was the third number.

This is described as one of the original master's richest, most imposing and difficult compositions, as well as one of his strangest. The latter is its strongest point, being fraught with fancy, ever new and surprising. The weird harmonies in the strings have a strangely pleasing effect upon the listener. The last number on the programme, Scherzo Capriccioso in D flat major, by Antonin Dvorak, if peculiar, had a more popular sound and fittingly closed the concert with a bang—if the expression is not too harsh for Symphonic usage—or, let us say musical bang. The odd passages disappearing and reappearing, hardly twice exactly the same, yet at once recognizable, accompanied by abrupt and capricious shiftings of tonalities, makes this work genuinely refreshing in many ways.

For the second rehearsal and concert on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week, Mme. De Vere-Sapio will appear as soloist, and this programme will be given:

Overture, "Der Fliegende Holländer"..Wagner
"Mad Scene" from "Hamlet".....A. Thomas
Symphony No. 5.....Beethoven
Aria, from "Fidelio".....Beethoven
Suite .....Macdowell
Soloist, Mme. DeVere-Sapio.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give 10 concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Thursday evenings, Oct. 31, Nov. 21, Dec. 12, Jan. 2, Jan. 16, Feb. 6, Feb. 20, March 12, April 9, and April 30. The solo artists will be Mme. De Vere-Sapio, Rafael Joseffy, Miss Marie Brema, Miss Antoinette Szumowska and Ben Davie.

[23]

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1895.

FIRST SYMPHONY

A Respectable Program Brilliantly Played.

Worship of Composer Brahms Renewed.

View of the Audience That Was Present.

Mr. Paur Talks of His Recent Trip Abroad.

The first concert of the 15th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Music Hall. Mr. Emil Paur began his third year as conductor. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 1, in C minor, op. 68.... Brahms
Andante with variations, in D minor, from Divertimento in D major, No. 17, (Koechel, No. 334). (First time.)....Mozart
Overture to "Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven
Scherzo Capriccioso in D flat major, op. 66 .....Dvorak

The worship of Brahms was resumed last evening with pomp and ceremony. The altar was decked with flowers. The faithful were present and devoutly disposed. The compiler of the program-book was the chief thurifer and fugleman. The trumpet was sounded even before the concert, and due notice was given of the performance of the C minor Symphony, which, it appears, is not only the fulfillment of the prophecy of Schumann that Brahms was "one destined to give expression in an ideal manner to the deepest feelings of the age," but also is the "keynote of the musical character" of the Symphony concerts. So no hearer could possibly go wrong.

This same C minor Symphony has from its first performance excited discussion. It is a singular fact that while Brahms is the Glorious Apollo of absolute music, his admirers, both the ferocious and the timid, discover much that is pictorial in this symphony. Thus Mr. Sittard gives a motto: "Durch Kampf zun Sieg, durch Nacht zum Licht," which, being interpreted, means that in the first movement there is a tremendous soul-struggle, in which the Powers of Darkness seem victors. The second and third movements are breathing spells in which the composer loafs at his ease and invites his soul. In the last movement he girds up his loins and puts his enemies to fight, plucking triumph from the very movement that to the ordinary modern builder of symphonies is apt to be a disastrous defeat. Mr. Ehrlert finds that the symphony is like unto "a medium range of peaks without glaciers and abysses," and then he returns to earth by stating that it lacks "the gift of dramatic interruption and agitation."

This topographical comparison leads the compiler of the program book to indulge himself in a fine burst. Every musician knows the passages in the introduction to the finale where the first horn is answered by the flute. They have always been regarded as pretty and effective. It now turns out that they are "indescribably dramatic." Nay, more. The compiler says: "To me this wonderful horn and flute episode has always brought a vivid suggestion of the notes and distant echoes of the Alpine horn amid the cloud-capped snow-peaks of the Bernese Oberland. The whole scene is suggested—not servilely and prosaically copied—by the music; you see and hear it all; the ringing horn-tones, the repeated echoes, the bright sunlight and shifting cloud shadows on the mountains!" I wonder if Brahms knew at the time that he was painting so big a picture on a little canvas.

But as the compiler says, every one is at liberty to put what "extra musical interpretation he pleases," and if Mr. Apthorp finds a Swiss scene, with real glaciers, and bread and honey for breakfast, another may hear in it only some charming music. And here it may be said that such episodes give the clue to Ehrlert's application of the word "mosaic" to the symphonic talent of Brahms.

There are two thoughts irresistibly suggested by this symphony: (1) Pathos in the large sense of the word; (2) A revolt from pessimism and a return to optimism. I use these latter terms because pessimism is a favorite charge against Brahms. This term is, of course, dear to Germans and German-Americans who are forever talking about "intellectuality" in music. This charge is perhaps true of much of the chamber music of this composer. Crabbedness seems a better term. There is, however, neither crabbedness nor pessimism in the andante or the finale. Worshippers of Brahms have reason to exult in their faith when they can point to such noble music. And he that is not moved by certain portions of the first movement—especially the slow introduction—must indeed be strong-hearted. There are lines by Dante Gabriel Rossetti that find their answer in the greater pages of this symphony: "Oh what is this that knows the road I came,

. . . . . .

And in regenerate rapture turns my face
Upon the devious coverts of dismay."

Do you find these lines vague, obscure? So is the music that gives the answer. And perhaps there is no truly great music or poetry into which mysticism does not enter. So that when Ehrlert accused Brahms of having "no profile," he paid him a glowing tribute.

* * *

After the ponderous mysteries of Brahms, after the dance-episodes in which the bacchante dances, but with tightly fitting stays, the selection from the Divertimento of Mozart was a delightful contrast and relief. Of course, its effect was exaggerated by the great number of players, for it was written only for a handful, and the purist might cry out against the lack of proportion in its modern performance.

A Divertimento, we are told, is a composition written to engage the attention in a cheerful manner, and to furnish genteel entertainment. Many Divertimenti are so called because they do not divert on the principle of lucus a non. We know little about the circumstances attending the composition of this particular piece. It was written in 1779 or 1780, and it is probably the one in which Mozart played at Munich, "as if he were the greatest fiddler in Europe." The whole Divertimento, with its allegro, andante and variations, two minuets, adagio and rondo might well induce sleep. The excerpt gave much pleasure and also showed the admirable quality of the strings.

* * *

There is nothing to be said at this late day about the Leonore overture except to praise the performance of last night. Even those who always wait with joyful hope to hear the trumpeter crack were this time disappointed. Is it worth while to write an essay on the four overtures to "Fidelio," or to question the use of the flute in the return to the measures of thanksgiving after the prison episode? Suffice it to say, that glorious music was gloriously played.

* * *

And so the Capriccioso of Dvorak was played most brilliantly. It is not one of his inspired works. There are moments when it seems as though the capriciousness of the composer consisted in his wild and perplexed thought, "What shall I do next?" But the compiler of the program-book assures us that "by very little stretching of terms, the scherzo proper—with its brilliant principal theme and light second theme—may stand as the first theme and first subsidiary of the sonata-form, the trio standing as the second theme and second subsidiary."

* * *

That nothing might be lacking in the enjoyment of the evening a lecture on "Form in Music" was put before the reader for instruction and amusement during the waits, or possibly to beguile the time while Brahms was played. Local color was given by quotations from Messrs. R. W. Emerson and H. T. Finck, and many kind and generous words were spoken in behalf of our old friend, that venerable fetich, the Sonata Form.

* * *

In spite of the fact that the program itself could not justly be called brilliant—say rather it was eminently respectable—the concert was a brilliant one, worthy of the great reputation of the orchestra. The performance of the orchestra was superb in ensemble and in solo work throughout the evening.

PHILIP HALE.

A VIEW OF THE AUDIENCE.

Story of Various Happenings, Also an Interview With Mr. Paur.

Standing at any of the doors of Music Hall last night, the spectator saw pass, and an hour and a half afterward repass him, almost identically the same persons who pushed the same stiff doors every Saturday night season after season ago. Greetings, as a rule, were as casual as though not five months, but a week, had elapsed since the last similar show of recognition. The only ones who seemed really glad to see one another were the coachmen and the "cops" outside.

At the stations, which appear to be theirs by right of permanent and eminent domain, stood the hall attendants, who punch tickets and frowned with rigid and invariable alternation. As unchangeable as they appeared the hall—the same up stairs and down stairs, and in the old-fashioned corridors and at the feet of the much-abused statue. That is the flavor of Music Hall—its familiarity-breeding unchangeableness. The desk of Mr. Paur was girt with smilax, and fastened to the shelf was a bunch of white chrysanthemums, with an enormous saffron sash hanging from it.

By and by the musicians began to bob out, trap-door like, from Bumstead Hall and to tune their fiddles and trill their flutes and clarinets. They, too, were the same men that scraped and puffed in the orchestra last May. There was one strange face and figure in the arc of contra bass players; but he is a man of abundant physical characteristics, so he will not long be among the unknown. His name is K. Keller, and the report is that he comes from abroad.

There was a new bassoon player, though probably few knew it. He is ycleped A. Kirchner, and is from New York. Otherwise the personnel of the orchestra is unchanged, absolutely. Mr. Timothee Adamowski, the self-same Timothee Adamowski who played in the orchestra last year, and the year before that, and so on, sat in the first chair of the second row of first violins. None of the musicians, not even of the favorite musicians, was noticed by the still rustling audience. Mr. Paur, however, was flatteringly applauded as he smiled his way across the platform. Then the conductor, standing on his desk's little box, watched the people squeezing along to their seats.

The audience was as large and fashionable and unalterably interested as ever. Some of the new patrons of the concerts came late, bringing with them a draught and a slight commotion; but this theatre habit will soon wear away. Right in the middle of the floor rows sat a group of girls from one of the city's private schools. They were ostensibly, almost uniquely, discriminating in the admiration of everything worth admiring, and besides, they set the fashion for hatlessness. Among the other listeners were the following-named:

Col. and Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. J. Montgomery Sears, Mr. and Mrs. S. Lothrop Thorndike, Mr. and Mrs. John L. Gardner, Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Bancroft, Dr. and Mrs. J. W. Elliot, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Head, Mr. and Mrs. Henry M. Rogers, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Foote, Mr. and Mrs. Robert M. Morse, Mr. and Mrs. G. D. Low, Mr. and Mrs. E. H. Clement, Mr. B. J. Lang, Miss Lang, Miss Stackpole, Miss Lyman, Mr. B. F. Keith, Mr. A. Paul Keith, Mr. and Mrs. H. Pratt McKean, Dr. and Mrs. Henry Morse, Mr. and Mrs. Charles P. Curtis, Mr. and Mrs. Gardner M Lane, Miss Pauline Shaw, Mr. Clayton Johns, Mr. Frank B. Sanborn, Mr. William P. Blake, Mr. and Mrs. George W. Chadwick, Mr. Ignace Gaugengigl.

Mrs. Emil Paur and her two sons heard the performance from behind the screen which hides the entrance to the conductor's room.

After the bowing at the concert and after Mr. Paur, bowing long bows and smiling big smiles, had retreated into his room, a Journal reporter sought him. The conductor was very happy, in fact, he could not express the fullness of his happiness except in German. He welcomed heartily the friends who gushed in to congratulate him. Finally he found time to light a cigarette. Then he greeted the Journal reporter.

"I, sir, have had a very pleasant time this year, this journey," and his voice was gutturally joyful. "Yes, I went abroad with all my family, and we went from city to city. I played a concerto of mine and conducted an orchestra at Leipsig. Oh, it was a success! I think the people there liked my composition very much. Then we went to Mannheim, where I formerly lived, and where the people were very kind to us. And then we went from place to place, having a pleasant time. Mrs. Paur was unwell for a short while, but we crossed over to Switzerland, and she is very well now and so are the young fellows. We went over to Germany in May and came back in the last week of September.

"Yes, I found many new and rare compositions for orchestra, and brought many of them home with me. I think they will make the programs much more interesting—very interesting.

"But the people were pleased tonight, were they not? They seemed very pleased. They received me so well; that pleased me. Yes, it was a fine audience. Indeed, I was glad to see it. I think that the prospects for a successful season are good, oh! yes, very good. The orchestra played splendidly. Yes, we will have a good season."

Mr. Paur was sincerely delighted—as sincerely delighted as the audience had appeared to be.

NOTES OF MUSIC.

The feuilleton and sundry notes are on page 13.

The first of the Symphony concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will be given Thursday evening, Oct. 31.

The program of the Symphony Concert Saturday evening will be as follows: Overture, "Flying Dutchman," Wagner; Beethoven's Fifth Symphony; MacDowell's Suite. Mrs. De Vere Sapio will sing the Mad Scene from Thomas's "Hamlet" and the grand air from "Fidelio."

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 20.

The Symphony Concert.

The Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season at Music Hall, last evening. There was the usual large audience, with its usual reserved enthusiasm, Mr. Paur receiving unmistakable signs of friendly recognition and approval. Everybody felt comfortable and magnanimous as at a meeting of friends where each knows the other's weaknesses, and accepts them with smiling amiability.

Once comfortably settled in its seat, the audience consulted the programme, which was as follows:

Symphony No. 1, op. 68.....Brahms
Andante and Variations, D-minor.....Mozart
Overture, "Lenore," No. 3.....Beethoven
Capriccio, op. 69.....Dvorak

A good, comfortable programme, with no novelty to disturb old traditions, and a promise of the good, solid, well known work of the future. A meek, gracious programme that posed itself on neutral ground, appealing to classic and romantic bias at one and the same time, and connected in a straight line with programmes of twenty-five years ago; a programme covered with reassuring and authentic dust and cobwebs, like good port wine that has rested undisturbed in a dark cellar for two full generations.

We were told and told again that Mr. Paur travelled to Europe for the special purpose of looking up musical novelties, but neither the first concert nor the advertised second and third concerts gives any hint as to how he succeeded in his quest. Perhaps he discovered no worthy novelties, and perhaps he did not look in the right direction to discover novelties; perhaps he too hastily concluded because, at present, the German musical intellect lies fallow, there was no active musical intellect to be found in the rest of the civilized world. This conclusion is hard on France and Italy, where just now musical talent is very active and where it is very possible that a sympathetic and intelligent search would have unearthed several good things worthy of being immortalized by our Symphony orchestra. But perhaps it is wiser and juster to wait; the unexpected sometimes happens even with a Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it is more than probable that one or two new overtures may be sprung unexpectedly on a peaceful and non-expectant public.

Of the interpretation of the music of the first concert little else than the highest praise can be given. The noble Brahms symphony was read superbly, and played with a dignity and finish beyond praise. On listening to the delightful work, written before Brahms had frozen into statuesqueness, one almost regrets that the symphony is nearly twenty years old, and its many beauties long since described. Mr. Paur has a special fondness for this master, whose first and third manner will doubtless be abundantly illustrated in the near future. The Mozart andante also received full justice in Mr. Paur's hands, and perhaps it would be hypercriticism to suggest that there was a trace of heaviness in the interpretation as of one swathing Ariel in heavy Roman drapery and thus robbing him of a certain grace while impeding the dainty upward curve of his flight. No possible objection could be urged against Mr. Paur's treatment of the Lenore Overture which was characterized by massive broadness, dignity, fire, and self-restraint. The masterly playing of this work called forth the first spontaneous enthusiasm of the evening, and Mr. Paur was compelled to come forward and acknowledge the more than deserved applause. The Dvorak work hardly seems worth the care be stowed on it, and it seemed pretentious, naked and not ashamed, even under Mr. Paur's loving devotion. Probably its beauties were destroyed by its position on the programme, and one can only wonder how it got there. It is a shock to hear the sound of a cowbell after the pealing of silver chimes.

The programme for the second concert is: Wagner's Overture to the Flying Dutchman; Beethoven's Symphony No. 5; a suite by MacDowell, and the soloist, Mme. DeVere Sapio will sing the "Mad Scene" from A. Thomas's Hamlet, and an aria from Fidelio.

MONDAY, OCT. 21, 1895.

BOSTON STANDARD.

Boston Symphony Orchestra's 15th Season Opens.

The first concert of the 15th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall Saturday evening with brilliant success. On this occasion, as on the opening rehearsal Friday afternoon, Music Hall was enthusiastically filled, and rarely in the illustrious career of this musical organization, which has few peers and no superiors, have the initial programmes achieved a more brilliant or artistic success.

Conductor Emil Paur, now commencing his third season, made his way to his desk, to which clung a mass of white chrysanthemums and smilax, amid admiring plaudits. Herr Paur's perfect control over his musicians was the more apparent at the opening concert in view of this work immediately upon the recent gathering of the players after a five months' interim. A difference in the distribution of the players is noticeable this season—an innovation which seemed to give perfect satisfaction to the audience. In the centre of the orchestra are placed the wind instruments, while the flutes are in the front rank. The strings are arranged on either side and surround the wind instruments, while the basses, as in previous seasons, stretch across the back.

The orchestra is almost identically the same as last season, two exceptions being a new face among the contra bass players and a new bassoon.

This programme was given:

Symphony No. 1, in C minor, op. 68....Brahms
Andante with variations, in D minor, from Divertimento in D major, No. 17, (Koechel, No. 334). (First time).....Mozart
Overture to "Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven
Scherzo Capriccioso in D flat major, op. 66 .....Dvorak

While the selections, with one exception, are familiar to those who have followed closely the rich musical offerings this city affords, the excellent rendering given Saturday night under Mr. Paur's conductorship allowed no thought of intrusion. The first number was Brahms Symphony No. 1, in C minor. The theme is elaborated on a grand and inspiriting scale, characteristic of its composer, in what may be called his middle manner. The first movement opens with a slow introduction, un pocosostennto, in C minor. The peculiar distribution of the four parts of the harmony among the different instruments is productive of a powerful volume of tone, which makes the passage uniquely impressive. Mozart's Andante, with variations, in D minor, from Divertimento, No. 17, the second number of the programme, introduces the orchestra, in many respects at its best, presenting the elaborate figuration in the first violins, followed by close imitations between the first violins and the basses, with a free accompanying part in the other instruments. Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," in C major, was the third number.

This is described as one of the original master's richest, most imposing and difficult compositions, as well as one of his strangest. The latter is its strongest point, being fraught with fancy, ever new and surprising. The weird harmonies in the strings have a strangely pleasing effect upon the listener. The last number on the programme, Scherzo Capriccioso in D flat major, by Antonin Dvorak, if peculiar, had a more popular sound and fittingly closed the concert with a bang—if the expression is not too harsh for Symphonic usage—or, let us say musical bang. The odd passages disappearing and reappearing, hardly twice exactly the same, yet at once recognizable, accompanied by abrupt and capricious shiftings of tonalities, makes this work genuinely refreshing in many ways.

For the second rehearsal and concert on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week, Mme. De Vere-Sapio will appear as soloist, and this programme will be given:

Overture, "Der Fliegende Holländer"..Wagner
"Mad Scene" from "Hamlet".....A. Thomas
Symphony No. 5.....Beethoven
Aria, from "Fidelio".....Beethoven
Suite .....Macdowell
Soloist, Mme. DeVere-Sapio.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give 10 concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Thursday evenings, Oct. 31, Nov. 21, Dec. 12, Jan. 2, Jan. 16, Feb. 6, Feb. 20, March 12, April 9, and April 30. The solo artists will be Mme. De Vere-Sapio, Rafael Joseffy, Miss Marie Brema, Miss Antoinette Szumowska and Ben Davie.

[23]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 21, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Matters began with a holy calm! The entrance of the conductor, the performance of the opening allegro and the interpretation of the andante which followed, occasioned nothing approaching to a popular tumult. The nature of the programme had something to do with this, for it was ultra-classical and not new save in one brief instance. Had a little of Bach been added to the programme, Bulow's "Three great Bs of Music" (Bach, Beethoven, Brahms) would all have been present. One recognizes the difficulty attendant on a first performance of the season: it would certainly be wrong to demand brilliant new works or extraordinary achievements on such an occasion; but just this Brahms first symphony with which the concert and the season began, is one of the most difficult of masterpieces and its first movement carries the sonata form to the verge of asceticism. Scarcely the best "Weihe des Hauses." The above objection may be but a cavil, for the programme was made up of most substantial numbers and its performance was remarkably affective, yet when one scans the history of the Boston Symphony Concerts, one must needs confess that the first, and least, of the conductors, was by far the best programme-maker.

The performance of Brahms' first symphony at once showed that no concessions needed to be made by the reviewer on account of the summer vacation, it was one of the few really great interpretations which the work has had in Boston. It proved our orchestra in unimpaired condition and it impressed the fact that the conductor was in absolute control. The clear execution of the tremendous development of the first movement was more than an augury, it was a fulfilment.

It is quite right to call this the "tenth symphony," for not one of Beethoven's nine overtops it in treatment of themes; if Brahms had only just a little of emotional force, that which we are accustomed to call "temperament" nowadays, one might set him on a pedestal as high as that occupied by his predecessor. As it is, his intellect dominates everywhere and in everything; calm, powerful brain work, with very few heart-throbs to interfere with it; the most skilful composer that has lived in the last 50 years.

The andante proved the excellence of the oboe and clarinet soloists. There was a time when the woodwind was the Achilles heel of our orchestra. The contrabasses gave a sturdy tone in this movement, yet it would be an improvement to our almost perfect orchestra if it possessed two more contrabasses to balance against the great power of the upper strings. The new first contrabass has, however, improved this department perceptibly.

The third movement is one of the first of those intermezzi with which Brahms replaced the scherzo. It is practically an abbreviated scherzo. Brahms knew his own limitations well when he established this shorter form; the element of humor is not in him and he does not endeavor to express playfulness at any length. The scherzo (free though its form may be) is often a peculiar test of composers; although Beethoven established it he never achieved the true spirit of its humor, his playfulness always leaning a trifle towards the grotesque or the fierce, as witness the drunken bassoonist of the sixth or the sudden drumstrokes of the ninth symphony scherzo,—a musical Aristophanes; Schumann took all his scherzo movements very seriously, and his humor seldom extended beyond bold syncopations; it was Mendelssohn who above all others caught the true musical humor of the scherzo, and it is Brahms who understands it least. In this particular movement, which takes the place of the scherzo, one finds some pretty pastoral treatment, but no very definite humor.

But it is the finale of this symphony which ought to awaken the enthusiasm of the musician; the finale of symphony or grand sonata has always been the crux of even the great composers; the trump card is played first, the strongest possible form has been used in the opening movement; what is left for the composer to do in his finale? Beethoven tried sonata-rondo, and a duplication of the sonata-form of the first movement, but finally chose grand variation (often crossing the boundary of thematic development) as the best possible counterpoise to the power of the first movement, and he also bound the finale to the preceding movements by giving reminiscences of some of their themes as in the variations which end the third and ninth symphonies.

Brahms has folowed this lead to some extent, for his fourth symphony ends with variations that are definitely made upon the Beethoven plan, while, as regards producing homogeneity by recapitulation of themes, this finale does even more, for it becomes an epitome of the whole symphony. It is a glorious climax, in some senses the most successful finale in the symphonic repertoire. And it was gloriously played, too; caprice and power were both magnificently displayed, the former in the freedom of the contrabass pizzicati, the latter in the working up of the chorale theme which gives such infinite majesty to this movement.

The audience recognized the high achievement by throwing off the reserve which was evident in the earlier part of the evening and bursting into the heartiest applause, approbation that was earned, every bit of it, by both conductor and orchestra. A man who can give such an interpretation of so trying a movement has not said his last word yet; it is evident that Mr. Paur is not standing still.

Now followed an andante with variations from Mozart's "Divertimento in D major" (although this movement was in D minor) which was very graceful although intended for a much smaller force than our great body of strings. It was the right thing in the wrong place, and after the mighty finale of Brahms it came much as diluted [illegible]

[illegible] proved, what needed no proof, that our string brigade is about perfect. Some of our older inhabitants have heard the "Leonore Overture No. 3" before, but they have never heard a better performance of it. The first violins covered themselves with glory, and Mr. Mueller and Mr. Mole gave the important trumpet and flute obligato very finely. It is exceptional that the trumpet has anything important to do in Beethoven's scores; during the composer's lifetime trumpet-playing was at a low ebb, and there are no difficult trumpet passages to be found in Beethoven or in Mozart.

At the end of the concert came Dvorak's "Scherzo Capriccioso," the only work of a red-blooded modern on the list, the only composition that displayed all the resources of the modern orchestra. The audience clutched at it like a thirsty—at least a drowning—man clutches at a straw, and seemed to enjoy every note of it, although it is not a very equal composition. Every concert ought to contain one or more numbers illustrative of this latterday treatment of the orchestra: as we possess a fully equipped modern orchestra the great resources of the organization should be displayed with a certain frequency.

Mr. Schuecker's work upon the harp in this scherzo was worthy of especial mention, for this instrument has most important obligati in this number. One must also pay tribute to the elasticity with which Mr. Paur took up the themes of this capricious composition, and the balance was perfect, every little subtheme standing out clearly and every department of the orchestra doing its work well.

On the whole, then, a good start for the new season; Boston still has the leading orchestra of the country, and an organization which may take rank with the famous orchestras of the world.

Louis C. Elson.

The Boston Traveler
MONDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY AGAIN.

Season Opens Very Successfully at Music Hall.

A PROGRAMME OF MUCH MERIT.

Brahms, Mozart, Beethoven and Dvorak the Composers Represented—Slight Changes in the Orchestra—How They Played.

Fifteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; first concert. The programme:
Brahms.....Symphony No. 1, in C minor, op. 68
Mozart....Andante with variations, in D minor, from Divertimento in D major, No. 17. (First time.)
Beethoven.....Overture to "Leonore," No. 3
Dvorak.....Scherzo Capriccioso in D flat major

It was a hearty but decorous welcome that greeted Conductor Paur as he appeared upon the Music Hall platform to inaugurate a new season of Symphony concerts. Decorous, too, may be called the programme, which was of solid worth and well sustained interest, rather than one of great emotional force. The orchestra itself has nearly the same personnel as last year, about the only noticeable change being made in the leadership of the bass viols. The woodwind is in closer column and further front in the centre, the arrangement appearing to be a slight improvement in the solidity of their tones.

Mr. Paur's firm hand must have had some mystic influence over the players during their summer respite from work, for at the very first sweeping attack at the Brahm's symphony the band displayed all its wonted precision, volume and perfect balance, as if vacations were unknown quantities in its existence, and, indeed, throughout the whole concert the playing was of so brilliant, lofty and impressive a character as to strike unwilling conviction to the minds of those who have affected to discover that the noble organization has deteriorated under the leadership of Mr. Paur. However, we may differ with his interpretations at times, it must be said without reserve that he has a fine power in transmitting those interpretations to his players, that they answer his will as by electricity, and that slovenly work is not and will not be tolerated.

If I am not mistaken, Brahms' position as herald is a new honor; certainly he has not opened a Symphony season in recent years. The power and beauty of his No. 1 symphony justifies the choice, and the close attention paid it and the evident enjoyment it gave showed pretty well how the modern master is wearing. This work illustrates the heights to which the mechanics of music may rise, nor is it devoid of inspiration. Even the chronic Brahms-hater is silent before the melodious beauty of the third movement and the stirring heroics of the final allegro. The whole symphony was magnificently played, and showed that Mr. Paur knows and loves his Brahms.

From Brahms to Mozart is like traveling back from the broad river to the clear spring that is at the fountain head of the stream. Only, in this case, the difference was not quite marked enough, mainly because of the over-large volume of sound caused by playing the variations with so many instruments. The selection is essentially chamber music, and some of its delicate aroma is certain to be dissipated in a large hall. But the playing was quite refined and full of the simplicity demanded.

A more brilliant and thrilling performance of the "Leonore" overture has not been heard in Music Hall. This work, which in 1806 was called "the product of an over-brimming fancy.....new and surprising," is as unhackneyed and strange today as it was ninety years ago. Repetition does not dull nor age weaken the effect of those marvelous trumpet calls nor the furious violin rushes in the coda. If it were a composition of this week I doubt if it would be called very old-fashioned in style, such is the perennial freshness of Beethoven at his highest level. Once more did the splendid body of strings show their great technical skill, and once more did the conductor prove his abilities as a reader of Beethoven.

Dvorak's scherzo capriccioso, with its one haunting movement, like a waltz of goddesses, seems of better stuff than when it was heard before. It may be that it has needed time for digestion, or it may be that Mr. Paur reads it more earnestly. At all events, the effect is more solid, and its apparent mixing of the scherzo and sonata form seems clearer. It is in keeping with the ever-wandering tonality of the piece, and if the result is not admired by sticklers for "form," it at least pleased nine-tenths of its hearers by its grace and spirit. The orchestra gave a fine account of itself, and thus worthily ended a concert of more than ordinary interest.

W. D. QUINT.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, brought the following programme:

Brahms: Symphony No. 1, in C minor, opus 68.
Mozart: Andante with Variations, in D minor, from Divertimento No. 17 (Koechel, No. 334). (First time.)
Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, in C major, opus 72.
Dvorak: Scherzo capriccioso in D-flat major, opus 66.

The more one hears the great Brahms C minor symphony, the more entirely great does the wonderful work seem. Like other truly great works, it always has some new beauty to surprise you with, no matter how well you may have thought you knew it before; every fresh hearing adds something to your knowledge of and admiration for Brahms. What may be called Brahms's musical heredity has, from the beginning, been immensely interesting to us. He is a wholly unique apparition in the musical life of our times. No other contemporary composer has shown himself at once so classical and so modern; or perhaps we should rather say that no other composer has allowed his inborn spirit of classicism to interfere so little with his being and remaining completely in sympathy with what is most essential in the musical spirit of our own day. He is no mere epigone, no "classicist born half a century too late"—as was once said of our own Washington Allston, the painter. He represents a new and modern phase of intrinsically classical musical thought, a step forward in the continuous evolution of the Art of Music, severing none of its connections with the past, but pursuing its path toward the future none the less boldly and independently.

To take but one item of Brahms's artwork, what he has done in the matter of orchestration—often supposed to be a distinctly modern art. He makes perfectly free use of all the means which modern ingenuity of invention has put at the disposal of composers, and which composers, from Berlioz down, have exploited with such wonderful results. Without chromatic horns and trumpets, without perfected flutes and reed-instruments, and that ease and security which modern string players have acquired in the highest shifts of their instruments — without all these things, Brahms's orchestra is unimaginable; as unimaginable as Wagner's or Saint-Saens's. And yet, with all his quite modern use of these modern means, Brahms has managed to preserve one of the finest points in classical orchestration, the point which—were it not for him—might be taken as marking the distinctive difference between classical and modern instrumentation. This is that he almost invariably uses every instrument in the orchestra strictly according to its own nature. With him a trumpet, for instance, is always a trumpet; it does not occur to him to treat it as a magnified oboe or clarinet.

Modern orchestration has, in general, gone somewhat over-far in the direction of a cunning blending of orchestral tints; but Brahms has well preserved the individuality of what may be called the primary orchestral colors: the normal effects to be drawn from the peculiar tone of each instrument, of and by itself. Now and then, to be sure, one finds in his scores instances of what seems at first sight a sort of wilfully classicizing preciosity. Take, for example, the way he has of putting his two trumpets in unison on their high D (just as Beethoven and Mozart had to do), instead of letting the second trumpet double the first in the lower octave (as almost any other modern composer would do). This looks at first like a wanton neglect of modern opportunity, like a rather dandified imitation of what the old masters had perforce to do, their trumpets having no low D in their scale. But, when we consider the effect of this old-fashioned device of Brahms's, how entirely admirable it is! How brilliantly this occasional high unison of the trumpets stands out from the general mass of orchestral tone! how thoroughly idiomatic it is in the trumpet language! This is an effect which almost all other modern orchestral writers have neglected; it is old, to be sure, but none the worse for that. This is only a single instance, out of many, of Brahms's classicism in orchestration; there are others which are quite as striking, but which we have no time to mention here. Upon the whole, what is most admirable in Brahms's orchestration is that, while neglecting none of the characteristically modern mass-effects or cunning blendings of clang-tints, he never so uses an instrument as a mere reinforcing agent, to add to the general volume and richness of tone, that it loses the power of speaking effectively in its own peculiar idiom, when called upon to speak for itself. Richard Strauss will so abuse his trumpet, for instance, to reinforce his wood-wind in giving prominence to a particular phase that, when he wants to write an essentially trumpet passage, he has nothing to fall back upon. Brahms never does this.

The "Mozart Variations" were new here. This movement from one of the composer's many divertimenti has, we blieve, long been a favorite in Vienna. At first, it seemed to us a sufficiently characteristic example of Mozart, but in no wise showing the higher side of his genius. To be sure, one could admire the indescribable something that prevents the first variation (running triplets in the first violins) from falling into mere triviality—as some similar variations by Schubert too evidently do. But it was not till the fourth and fifth variations that the real genius of the man was revealed in all its beauty; these two are incomparable.

It seemed to us a mistake to play the Dvorak Capriccio after the great "Leonore" overture; it would have been better to invert the order of the two pieces. Nothing under the sun can kill the "Leonore" No. 3; but the Dvorak piece sounded rather trivial after it, and vulgarly scored. Yet the Capriccio has much to recommend it: it is bright, full of invention, and replete with charming effects of color; but it cannot hold its own with the other mighty things on the programme.

Of the general quality of the performance last Saturday, we do not care to speak. It was the first concert of the season, and it often takes some time for an orchestra to come to an understanding with itself, and with its conductor, after a summer's vacation. The audience was larger than one often sees so early in the season, and seemed in very good and enthusiastic humor. Mr. Paur was warmly greeted as he stepped up to his desk at the beginning of the concert.

The next programme is: Wagner, overture to "Der fliegende Holländer;" Ambroise Thomas, mad-scene from "Hamlet;" Beethoven, symphony No. 5, in C minor, opus 67; Beethoven, recitative, "Abscheulicher!" and aria, "Komm Hoffnung," from "Fidelio;" MacDowell, suite, opus 48. Mme DeVere-Sapio will be the singer.

The Independent Oct. 23. 95.

Music.

BY E. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.

LAST week brought, for the most part, more announcements as to the season, tolerably completing the usual extremely long series. The Boston Symphony Orchestra publishes the dates of its five concerts under Mr. Paur's direction, which will occur in the Metropolitan Opera House on the evenings of Friday, November 15th, and on the Thursday evenings, December 19th, January 23d, February 27th and March 26th. The programs are not sketched; but the soloists announced include Mme Melba, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Timothée Adamofski. Former subscribers can retain their seats at E. Schuberth's music store, this week only. In connection with the Boston orchestra named, a special announcement is made from Brooklyn that the concerts hitherto given by Mr. Paur and his band under the auspices of that vague and most shy organization, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society—which pays, not plays—will now be associated with the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, and made a part of that excellent organization's departmental work. Five concerts will be heard at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on these dates, Tuesday evening November 12th, and on the Friday evenings, December 20th, January 24th, February 28th and March 27th. An admirable selection of soloists is to be offered, including Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, Mme. Melba, Mme. de Vere Sapio, Mme. Scalchi, and the Messrs. Rafael Joseffy, Franz Kneisel, Timothée Adamofski, Alwin Schroeder, Ben Davies, Lloyd d'Aubigné and Giuseppe Campanari. The prices for the course tickets to the series are noticeably low, ranging from four to seven dollars. Also the notification of the official season of our opera at the Metropolitan is current from the management. The evening set for the opening is November 18th; the opera not yet named. The expected rentrée of Mme. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler is the concert incident of the present week; and an interesting one. The present week has only the less serious tho grateful presence of a new operetta "His Excellency" written to a text of W. S. Gilbert, by not Sir Arthur Sullivan but the clever English composer in the same field and vein, Dr. Osmond Carr.

Well, well, 'tis just as we expected—no fiddling is to be neglected—to violinists here in batches—will add himself Tivadar Nachès. It's only by a tonal slip he—can be referred to Mississippi. Not from our South as from his name—one might suppose, but just the same—superior European article, that stirs one's blood in every particle (either by talent's domination, or else because an importation): Rivarde, Ondricek, Sauret, Marsick, and possibly Ysaye—what has one done that he deserves such fiddle-stringing with his nerves? And what a country, where an A string—an E or D or G's a pay-string; where every squeak and every trill—produceth its five-dollar bill. One season, pianism rules—the cits, as connoisseurs or fools; another, and we come to know—Appollo drawing his long bow. Would that we all such wealth might see—as Tweedle-dum and Tweedle-dee.

And apropos of the violinistic excess of the winter, by no means are all the racontars of the artists visiting New York this season as diverting as this one anent Rivarde, the young Frenchman. Rivarde has often been compared with the mysterious Paganini. According to an Italian newspaper, a few months ago, while Rivarde was in Italy, and at the tomb of Paganini, he was presented to the son of the maestro. After spending a pleasant time together, Rivarde was requested by Paganini, junior, to play some of his great father's compositions; which he did, and young Paganini was deeply affected, declaring that he recognized many of the peculiar technical qualities of his poor father; Mr. Rivarde also was allowed to play on a number of Paganini's violins, which the son treasures very highly, and, finally, even was presented with one of them. Rivarde then interpreted one of Paganini's concertos. The son, in a paroxysm of generosity, went immediately to the trustees of the cemetery, and implored them to open his father's tomb, that Rivarde might have the honor of being the only violinist who had ever enjoyed the curious, if sacred consequences. Leave was accorded. On beholding the bones, Rivarde wept. (All violinists can weep.) But alas! one wo doth tread upon another's heels. To Rivarde's disgust, on leaving the cemetery, he was assessed five dollars! Worse still, on his return to the village he found that he was the four thousand eight hundred and fiftieth violinist who had "wept" at this sacred shrine. And, last, he was further surprised on learning that it was not Paganini's son, nor Paganini's bones at all, that had led him to so fraudulent and ludicrous an experience. "Paganini's son" was a roguish impostor!

A new and very handsomely dressed periodical monthly, and dealing in chief with musical and dramatic subjects of discussion has begun its appearance from Messrs. Whittingham & Atherton, 8 Broad Street, in this city. The leading article of the initial number is a study of Paderefski by Mr. Henry T. Finck, which offers an enthusiastic critical appreciation and a record of Mr. Paderefski's American successes, in special, of value as musical history. Mr. W. F. Apthorp contributed an excellent paper on Italian opera, exceptionally well illustrated in photogravure. The proof-reading of the Looker-On we observe is hardly as careful as it should be, which trait is likely, however, to be amended in future issues. The marginal illustrations add so little to the publication that they may well be omitted in future numbers.

Two new books in the line of popularizing information as to the plots and characters in Wagner's operas and music-dramas are to be noted: Miss Guerber's Stories of the Wagner Operas (New York, Dodd, Mead & Co.), and Wagner's Heroes, by Constance Maud (London and New York, Edward Arnold). Miss Guerber follows more closely than the writer second named, the textual contents of Wagner's librettos, and her book is suitably informing. Miss Maud's story-telling is in freer scope, and cleaves less to the letter of the law, as the composer's verse has laid it down. The drawback to the acceptability of both these volumes, however, is their superfluity. There is a mass of explanatory Wagnerian literature already in the market, for all ages, that needs no increment.

[24]

perience, her French accent in the Romance du Sommeil, from Psyché, and other songs was unimpeachable.—The Standard.

Mme. Inverni's name will soon become a highly popular one. She has evidently been trained in the best Italian schools, and reveals a contralto voice whose production is excellent, and whose quality is eminently sympathetic. In Mon cœur s'ouvre à ta voix the artist showed the range and quality of her voice to considerable advantage, while later on she proved herself endowed with great powers of expression in a song cycle entitled Elle et Lui.—Society.

Mme. Inverni possesses a fine resonant mezzo soprano voice, which is well worth any extra pains and trouble which she may take.—Court Circular.

Mme. Elise Inverni is a mezzo soprano with a powerful voice of good quality.—Musical Times.

Mme. Inverni has some good lower notes, and her voice in its medium register is singularly clear. Her production is good, and we should imagine that she is well fitted for dramatic rôles in opera. She sang with much expression the Romance du Sommeil and Romance d'Eros, from Ambroise Thomas's Psyché, and put much feeling into her rendering of C. M. Widor's mélodie À toi, with words by Victor Hugo. Excellent qualities of method were displayed in the fine air Printemps qui Commence, from Saint-Saëns' Samson et Dalila, and there was pathos again in her pleading delivery of Meyerbeer's Lamenta della Mendicante.—The Stage.

One of the most interesting recitals of the week was that given by Mme. Inverni and Herr Sauer. Mme. Inverni, who possesses a magnificent mezzo soprano voice, chose to exhibit her powers in selections from Widor, Ambroise Thomas, Saint-Saëns and Meyerbeer.—The People.

It was Italian opera, out-and-out Italian, at Covent Garden on Saturday night. For once in a while we had an opera by an Italian composer, sung in pure Italian by Italian singers. There was only one member of the caste who was not Italian, though she was as good as the rest, and that was Mme. Inverni.—The Man of the World.

Mme. Inverni's contributions to the program were acceptable to a degree. She sang first, with much expression and finish, When Twilight Comes; her next contribution was Che Faro, and the sad abandonment which characterizes the piece was admirably interpreted. Though twice recalled, Mme. Inverni resolutely declined an encore, but the renewed enthusiasm that was evoked by her charming exposition of Cowen's beautiful composition Because induced her to unbend, and she repeated the second verse.—The Portsmouth Evening News.

Mme. Inverni, who with a high and sonorous contralto voice unites dramatic powers of vocalization, which her presence largely aids, sang with excellent effect. In Gluck's fine Scena she achieved a triumph of vocal effect, pealing out the high F's in a manner rarely equaled by its most renowned singers.—Leamington Spa Courier.

Mme. Inverni has a rich mezzo soprano voice, and her brilliant execution fairly captivated her audience. It was certainly the greatest musical treat that the people of Workington have had the pleasure of listening to for some time.—The Carlisle Evening Journal.

The program included lovely songs by the prima donna, Mme. Elise Inverni, whose splendid voice and finished style it was delightful to witness.—The York Evening Press.

The gem of the evening was perhaps Arditi's valse, Il Bacio, which secured for Mme. Inverni an irresistible encore, for which she sang When Twilight Comes, a charming melody by Strelezki. It is rarely that a mezzo soprano can successfully interpret such different styles of composition; but Mme. Inverni combines with the deep rich notes of a contralto the facile execution of a light soprano, and the high notes which she takes pianissimo are marked by extreme delicacy and finish.—The Whitehaven News.

Elise Inverni, il cui nome andò cercato in numerosi concerti, ha bellissima voce di contralto, e cantò stupendamente la sua parte. Nel quartetto e nel duetto susseguente del terzo atto, confermò il buon nome che la precedeva, per cui è sperabile che la brava Maddalena si produca in qualche opera a far valere i suoi talenti.—Il Trovatore.

La parta di Maddelena sostenuta da una Signora Inglese ci parve bene stare con le altre per correttezza di canto ed espressione; il quartetto famoso dell' ultimo atto ebbe, anche mercè sua, una esecuzione lodevole.—Il Progresso.

Miss Marie Brema,

DRAMATIC SOPRANO.

One of the World's Famed Artists.

For Terms and Dates address

MORRIS RENO,

144 West 74th Street, New York.

MUSIC IN BOSTON

BOSTON, Mass., October 20, 1895.

SULLIVAN'S incidental music to King Arthur, a play by J. C. Carr, was heard here for the first time October 1 at the Tremont Theatre. I did not go to the play, for I do not care for Mr. Irving; he is too Gothic, and then I do not understand the English language when it is mumbled or shrieked by him.

A well-known musician told me that the music to King Arthur was a misch-masch of Sullivan's religious music—as Turn Thy Face from My Sins—and the music of The Mikado.

The Mikado was given at the Castle Square Theatre October 14 with the following cast:

The Mikado of Japan	Arthur Wooley
Nanki-Poo	Thomas H. Persse
Ko-Ko	William Wolff
Pooh-Bah	J. K. Murray
Pish-Tush	John Read
Yum-Yum	Clara Lane
Pitti-Sing	Edith Mason
Peep-Bo	Hattie Ladd
Katisha	Kate Davis

The performance of the first act was admirable. In the second act Messrs. Wolff and Wooley yielded at last unconditionally to their inherent love for buffoonery. The audience encouraged them, roaring when Pooh-Bah fell and displayed flesh tights, convulsed by such gags as "What 's his address? Cambridge." And yet let us rather remember with pleasure the delightful and thoroughly Gilbertian Yum-Yum of Miss Lane, the Pitti-Sing of Miss Mason, the consistent and effective Pooh-Bah of Mr. Murray and the singing of Mr. Persse.

* * *

My esteemed friend and colleague, Mr. Apthorp, of the Transcript, was present at this performance, and he wrote an article, which appeared the 15th. The title might have been The Supreme Eulogy of the Castle Square. Now as to his opinions concerning the merits of the performance I have nothing to say. In his remarks about the advantages of a stock company I fully agree with him. But I cannot allow one statement of fact to go unchallenged. Mr. Apthorp says: "From Pinafore down, no Gilbert and Sullivan operetta has had an indisputable success here, without adventitious help—in the way of local gags or dances—to catch the gallery."

This statement is not true. In the first place, dances are an integral part of Gilbert and Sullivan operettas. The librettos would tell Mr. Apthorp as much. See also The Savoy Opera and the Savoyards, by Percy Fitzgerald, M. A., F. S. A., a stupid, poorly arranged book, yet one that gives much information concerning the preparation for a Savoy production. Fitzgerald says on page 67: "One of the regular forms of the Gilbertian opera is the fantastic dance into which the gravest, most decorous characters burst tumultuously. These measures have yet a quaint reserve, as though extorted from the personages in question by the irresistible entrain of the situation."

In the first and eminently successful performances of these operettas given here by the so-called D'Oyly Carte companies, and in the performances soon afterward given by American companies schooled in Gilbertian fashion, no gag was tolerated, no extra business was introduced. The pieces were played absolutely straight. Witness the long run of Iolanthe here, one of the longest runs known in the history of comic opera in Boston. In the run there was no "adventitious help." It was not until these operettas were unduly familiar that persons who had just left the variety stage took upon themselves to freshen Gilbert's lines and fat their parts.

The operetta this week at the Castle Square is The Chimes of Normandy. Somebody says that Carmen is in rehearsal. It is possible, then, that The Huguenots will be produced this season with Mr. Wolff in his great impersonation of Marcel, with a topical song in place of the choral, or that everlasting "Piff-Paff."

* * *

Mr. John Hermann Loud gave an organ recital the afternoon of the 17th in the Ruggles Street Church. He played these pieces:

Toccata in G	Dubois
Prière in G flat	Lemaigre
Sonata No. 5 in C minor	Guilmant
Fugue in D minor	Bach
Intermezzo in G	Loud
Allegro assai, from Sonata No. 2	Merkel
Finale in D	Lemmens

I know of nothing drearier than an ordinary organ recital in this city. No wonder that this form of musical entertainment is not popular, although there are good organs and some excellent concert organists in Boston. The attendant circumstances are apt to be dispiriting. In a modern Protestant church, carpeted, with pews thoughtfully stocked with hymn books and appeals for contributions, with a kitchen provided with hot and cold water, with parlors and "lavatories" and all the modern improvements, the solemn organ seems out of place. I do not refer here particularly to the Ruggles Street Church; I refer to many churches. There is a feeling of uneasiness. People seem in doubt concerning the propriety of applause. The church is chilly; or it is damp or stuffy, reminding one of the grave. The atmosphere affects organ and organist. Reeds are traitors. Pneumatic action suddenly shirks its work. There is ciphering.

Mr. Loud, however, was not handicapped seriously by any of the evils in this catalogue. There was a good sized and favorably disposed audience. The organ behaved itself, although the reeds were inclined toward hoarseness and untunefulness. Did you ever hear an organ in this country that was steadily and thoroughly in tune for a month? The New England climate does not favor organ tuners in their work.

Mr. Loud showed many results of faithful study under such an instructor as Guilmant. He has the sure foundation of a true legato. He understands the art of releasing as well as attacking chords. His technic, while it was not startling, seemed adequate to the appointed task. His registration was generally effective, although the pieces by French composers suffered at times inevitably in the attempt to fit them to an American organ. While his performance was not wholly without flaw or blemish, the few cloudy passages or too violent changes in dynamic power might justly have been attributed to comparative unfamiliarity with the organ, especially after long study on organs differing radically in scheme and mechanical appliances.

Then Mr. Loud will play still better, with more freedom, more spontaneity, when he realizes fully that he is his own

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1895.

The first of the Symphony concerts was given the evening of the 19th in Music Hall. It is the fifteenth season. Mr. Emil Paur is the conductor. There is a new second bassoon player—A. Kirchner, from New York, I am told. There is also a new double-bass player—Mr. Keller.

The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 1, C minor	Brahms
Andante with variations, from Divertimento in D major (K 334) (First time)	Mozart
Overture to Leonore, No. 3	Beethoven
Scherzo, Capriccioso	Dvorák

The musical season of Boston is supposed to open with

(DECKER BUILDING.)

JAMES FITCH

THOMSON,

Scotch-Canadian Baritone.

ORATORIO, ... CONCERT, SONG RECITALS.

DIRECTION

JOHNSTON & ARTHUR,

33 Union Square,

NEW YORK CITY.

ORGAN recital programmes and all other printing for musicales are artistically done by the Lotus Press. Mr. Sumner Salter has had his work done by us for over five years, with uniform satisfaction and promptness. The same service awaits others. : : :

THE LOTUS PRESS

140 W. 23d STREET, N. Y.

first Symphony concert. Last night it opened in an eminently respectable manner. The members of the audience took their seats as though they were entering family pews in a genteel and well established meeting house. They bore with them program books, which they read solemnly at intervals or steadily throughout the service. For last evening the worship of Brahms was celebrated in due state after summer exile, solaced only by the piano music or the songs or the very thought of Saint Johannes.

Now I do not propose to dilate at length on the character of the pieces played. With the exception of the excerpt from the Divertimento, they are familiar to all concert goers. Least of all do I intend to speak about the symphony of Brahms, for I remember that about two years ago I pained deeply good Mr. Bennett, of London, by certain irreverent remarks concerning the architecture of the shrine and the decoration of the idol. Let it be said first of all that the performance throughout, in ensemble and in solo work, was brilliant, and when you consider the fact that it was the first of the season it was remarkably good. To particularize in such connection always seems invidious, yet I cannot refrain from paying tribute to the first horn, the first bassoon, the first clarinet and the flutes.

The excerpt from the Divertimento was played here for the first time. The intelligent listener, in order to advance himself as much as possible in musical knowledge, turned at once to the program book for copious draughts of information. But the well was dry. Not a word as to the character of the piece or its history. The intelligent listener, however, discovered that the theme was "simply exposed" and of the "regulation length." He also learned that the sixth variation is thus constituted: "Rapid running passages in thirty-second notes in the first violins, against counterpoint in the other parts pizzicati. This variation ends with a free coda."

Many have thought, not without reason, that a divertimento is so called because it seldom diverts. I find on examination that this conclusion is erroneous; that a divertimento is "a composition of a light, pleasing character, whether vocal or instrumental, written to engage the attention in a cheerful manner." This definition by Stainer and Barrett reminds one of the declaration of Athenæus, that music should produce "affability and a sort of gentleman-like joy."

We know little about this particular work of Mozart. It was composed in 1779 or 1780, and it is thought to be the one in which he played at Munich "as though he were the greatest fiddler in Europe." To hear and enjoy the whole work, with its allegro, two minuets, andante with six variations, adagio and rondo, might be impossible in these nervous days. The variations pleased last night: they also showed the strings to great advantage. The purist might object to the lack of proportion, when such pieces, written for a few string instruments and two horns, are played by a great body of strings and two horns.

* * *

To write a wholly satisfactory program book is difficult, yes, almost impossible. Mr. Apthorp, the present compiler, has many qualifications for the task; learning, enthusiasm, an interesting if occasionally aggressive style, and what is known to the French as esprit. There is no one in this city that is better equipped for this severe and thankless labor.

It is the more to be regretted that Mr. Apthorp is growing more and more pedantic, and that in a book which should state facts or gossip in an entertaining fashion he writes in more and more opinionated critical fashion. He has at his command a newspaper wherein he may criticise to his heart's content. He should confine his criticism to his reviews of concerts.

That he should occasionally make slips in statements of fact is not surprising, for we are all mortal, and a sudden attack of heterophemy is not uncommon in the literary world. Thus he speaks (page 10) in his article in the program book about the C minor symphony of Brahms as follows:

"The first part (corresponding to the scherzo) is based upon two contrasted themes, the first of which (given out by the clarinet and other wind instruments over a pizzicato bass in the 'celli) has been said to resemble the Prayer in Hérold's Zampa; but the resemblance is evanescent." Mr. Apthorp knew better; for in his program book of '94–5, in describing Brahms' third symphony, he comes to the andante and says: "A certain melodic resemblance has often been noticed between this theme and the prayer in Hérold's Zampa, a resemblance, however, which does not hold good beyond the first half measure." Such a slip is, after all, a trifling matter.

But when in the same article on the C minor symphony we find this description of the horn and flute passages in the introduction to the finale: "Everyone is at liberty to put what extra-musical interpretation he pleases upon orchestral music. To me this wonderful horn and flute episode has always brought a vivid suggestion of the notes and distant echoes of the Alpine horn amid the cloud capped snow peaks of the Bernese Oberland. The whole scene is suggested—not servilely and prosaically copied—by the music; you see and hear it all; the ringing horn tones, the repeated echoes, the bright sunlight and shifting cloud shadows on the mountains! Nothing in all Wagner, greatest of musical landscapists, is more entrancingly and poetically picturesque"—then we have a right to say this is a species of criticism, and however beautifully worded it may be its place is in the Transcript, not in a program book.

Such passages are no doubt introduced to give a relief to dry-as-dust analysis which is so dear to him. Now, of what earthly interest to any human or inhuman being are such sentences as these (I quote at random):

"In this key the second phrase (antithesis) of the theme begins, but ends with a modulation to A flat major (dominant of the principal key), thus allowing the third phrase (repetition of the thesis) to begin in the tonic. This is soon followed by a light, dancing second theme, which begins in G major, but passes on to A major and other keys almost as soon as its tonality has been established. With the return of the first theme we get back again to B flat major and D flat major, but in the course of some elaborate working out the tonality shifts about quite as capriciously as before."

Or these on the same page (27):

"It will be seen that by very little stretching of terms the scherzo proper—with its brilliant principal theme and light second theme—may stand as the first theme and first subsidiary of the sonata form, the trio standing as the second theme and second subsidiary. Here the first part of the form ends without a conclusion theme. Then follows the free fantasia, and then, with the return of the scherzo, the third part and coda."

And mind you, this is all about Dvorák's Scherzo Capriccioso.

Such analysis without printed themes is of no value to the student. Such analysis is a stumbling block and a confusion to the layman, simple lover of music, who, tempted by curiosity to see whether he can verify his suspicions, pores over the book, while the music on the stage in large measure escapes him.

Ah! if Mr. Apthorp would only be a little more frivolous and less learned.

Now in the Entr'acte he has full scope for his invention and his wit. Why turn it always into a lecture? Last week the lecture was entitled Form in Music. Let me give you a few extracts:

"Music is full of the unknown, of the unknowable, and in face of this unknown we, like Adam in the Garden of Eden, find ourselves irresistibly impelled to give its various manifestations a name that, as the common phrase is, they may 'mean something' to us."

"That entrancing phantasmagoria of picture and incident which we see rising from the billowing sea of music is in reality nothing more than an enchanting fata morgana, visible at no other angle than that of our own eye."

And then Mr. Apthorp drapes a statue of Prometheus loosely in cloth, and gets "a cloth-form."

Mr. Apthorp quotes, like a good Bostonian, from Emerson, and then, to show his catholicity, he quotes from Mr. H. T. Finck. As he disputes in part a statement of the latter, the interest is no longer parochial; it is national; I may say it is international; even Japan may be shaken by it. So you will pardon the long quotation:

"When Mr. Henry T. Finck wrote of Chopin: 'It has been said that he never completely mastered the sonata form. Let us thank God that he never allowed himself to be mastered by the sonata form!' (or words to that effect; I quote from memory); he wrote something which contains a very valuable bit of truth—open, as it unfortunately is, to deplorable misconception. The truth in it is that if the true bent of Chopin's genius was not in the direction of the sonata form that great man did unspeakably well in not binding his genius down to a merely scholastic, pedantic and artificial conformity with its laws. In so far as the form was a shackle upon the free, natural expression of his genius, and not a source of artistic strength to him, he did well to let it alone. The possible misconception is that people might imagine, from what Mr. Finck wrote, that the sonata form was in any way unworthy of the splendor of Chopin's genius. One cannot but recognize that, where Chopin did have to do with the sonata form—as in his piano sonatas and concertos—he succeeded in being great in spite of, by no means because of, his lack of perfect mastery over it. Moreover, with and notwithstanding all the true greatness he shows in these compositions, his lack of complete mastery over the form introduces an unquestionable element of weakness into them; had he thoroughly mastered the sonata form, as Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven and Mendelssohn did, his sonatas and concertos would have been greater still. Whether he might not have sacrificed something else, and something infinitely valuable, in the process of attaining to this complete mastery, is another question; it is even quite likely that he might have forced his genius out of its most congenial channel. But this is apart from the real question; the fact remains that he was not entirely great in the sonata, and that his shortcomings in sonata writing are to be deplored—not so much because he did not fulfill the traditional requirements of the form as because, in falling short of or exceeding these requirements, he did not develop anything as strong, symmetrical and perfect as the sonata form in its traditional estate."

I confess that my sympathies are with Mr. Finck in this discussion.

Furthermore I acknowledge that such a lecture has its uses, and is not out of place, say once a month, in a program book. It excites argument; it stimulates thought; it instructs; and it also furnishes at times legitimate amusement.

* * * *

Mr. Paur in an interview published in the Boston Journal this morning says: "I found many new and rare compositions for orchestra and brought many of them home with me." Let us hope that he will not keep them in a trunk at Jamaica Plain. The only novelty of the first four concerts is the excerpt from the Divertimento of Mozart, and that is at least 115 years old.

* * * *

an orchestra leader. May his rare qualities find still larger development and even fuller appreciation in the new field!

PHILIP HALE.

CONCERT DIRECTION

DANIEL MAYER,

THE LEADING EUROPEAN AGENCY,

Representing the World's Greatest Artists, Vocal and Instrumental.

SOLE AGENT FOR MR. PADEREWSKI.

224 REGENT ST., LONDON W.

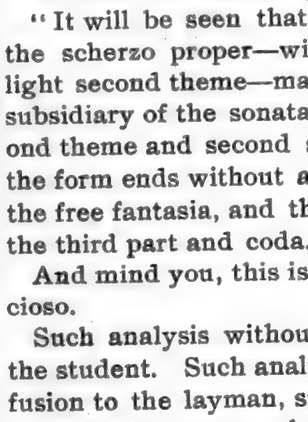
A, B, C. Code. Cables: "Liszt, London.

THE MUSICAL STANDARD.

A WEEKLY NEWSPAPER FOR MUSICIANS. Established 1862. Enlarged to 72 Columns 1894. The Only Independent Musical Weekly in Great Britain.

ONE PENNY WEEKLY (by post, 2d.)

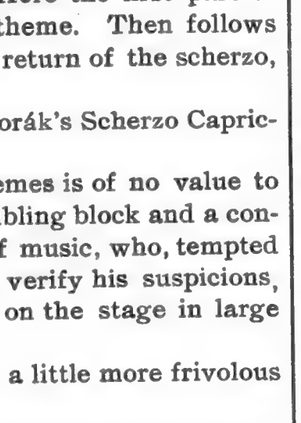
Annual Subscription (England), 6s. 6d.; half yearly, 3s. 3d.; abroad, 8s 9d. per year. THE MUSICAL STANDARD gives portraits on separate plate paper of musicians of the day; gives full page illustrations of British and foreign organs; gives anthems, violin music, organ music, &c., as special supplements, and has its own special correspondents in all parts of the world. Office: 185 Fleet St., London, England. THE MUSICAL STANDARD has other interesting features too numerous to mention. Send 5 cents for a copy and judge for yourself.



Albertini,

Greatest Spanish Violinist,

AND



Rosa Linde,

AMERICA'S GREATEST CONTRALTO,

SUPPORTED BY

Clementino DeMacchi, the Famous Young Italian Pianist.

DIRECTION

H. M. HIRSCHBERG, 156 Fifth Ave., NEW YORK.

ANITCHKOFF PALACE,
ST. PETERSBURG, DEC. 6, 1894.

"HER MAJESTY, EMPRESS MARIE FEODOROWNA, FINDING GREAT BENEFIT FROM THE USE OF YOUR TONIC-WINE, REQUESTS THAT A CASE OF 50 BOTTLES VIN MARIANI BE SENT IMMEDIATELY, ADDRESSED TO HER MAJESTY THE EMPRESS."

Anitchkoff Palace,
St. Petersburg, Russia.

To Mr. MARIANI.
41 Boulevard Haussmann,
Paris, France.

VIN MARIANI

"The Ideal Tonic Wine."

Fortifies, Nourishes and Stimulates the Body and Brain.

It restores Health, Strength, Energy and Vitality.

Avoid Substitutions. Ask for "Vin Mariani" at all Druggists.

For Descriptive Book with Portraits and testimony of noted Celebrities, write to MARIANI & CO., 52 W. 15th St., New York.

PARIS: 41 Bd. Haussmann.
LONDON: 239 Oxford Street.

MUSICAL COURIER.

BOSTON, October 19, 1895.

NIKISCH TRIUMPHANT.

IT must make some of our Boston contemporaries feel sad, sore and sick to read of Arthur Nikisch's triumphs in the very musical strongholds of Germany.

The Hungarian conductor, of whom Boston wearied, or to put it more correctly, who knew too much to tolerate the incessant critical warfare made upon him there, not only displayed his versatility first as conductor of opera at Budapest, but has been called to fill two of the most important musical positions in the world. He has succeeded Hans von Bülow as conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic concerts, and is besides nominated successor to Carl Reinecke, as conductor of the famous Gewandhaus concerts in Leipsic.

Now what has Boston to say for herself?

What can Boston say?

Nikisch we all remember as a man of marvelous musical organization, great magnetism and learning. For the year previous to his departure Boston critics—with a few honorable exceptions—systematically decried his work. He was too modern, yet he is to conduct Beethoven in Leipsic, the very heart of classical music in Germany; he was not a great musical authority.

Yet he follows Von Bülow in Berlin.

Now, doesn't all this strike one as supremely silly, the silliness of small boys that throw stones simply because of pure "cussedness"?

Boston rejected Nikisch, while New York, Budapest, Berlin and Leipsic fight for the honor of his presence. Pooh! pooh! you have Paur—King Log after King Stork (to reverse the fable)—and Paur is good enough for the sleepy town.

But even the virtuous Mr. Paur is not giving satisfaction. A sigh, a cultured sigh, has been exhaled by Boston's elect. Mr. Paur is voted a bore. His boots are too thick and his readings as opaque. He has no magnetism, and he is a little slow.

Boston had a magnetic conductor and was not satisfied. She got Mr. Paur and longs for Nikisch again.

Boston is coquettish.

We learn on the very best of authority that Mr. Paur will be asked to step down and out at the end of this season. We suppose Mr. Higginson will put his hand in his pocket willingly in order to accomplish this much desired event.

Then Mr. Higginson will look around for another conductor. There is Mr. Nikisch, an excellent successor to Mr. Paur, but we do not believe that he will come. He is better off in Germany, where his genius for conducting is appreciated at its full value. Besides he must conduct his concerts in Queen's Hall, London, England.

Arthur Nikisch, conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic concerts; Arthur Nikisch, conductor of the Gewandhaus concerts at Leipsic. What coals of fire he could heap on pettifogging Boston!

Mr. Nikisch's time is better employed.

There now remains nothing but Mr. Paur for Boston to contemplate.

But then THE MUSICAL COURIER some years ago fought valiantly against the deposition of Nikisch and the appearance of Paur.

Boston, however, thought differently.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 27, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The second Symphony concert at Music Hall, last evening, presented the following programme:

Overture to "Der Fliegende Hollander," Wagner; Ophelie's mad scene from "Hamlet," Thomas; suite in A minor, op. 42, MacDowell; scena and aria, "Ah! Perfido," op. 65, Beethoven; symphony No. 5, in C minor, op. 67, Beethoven. Soloist, Mme. DeVere-Sapio.

The programme, taken with the almost flawless work of the orchestra aroused more than polite applause, there being a hearty response to each number, the greatest part of which, however, fell to MacDowell's Suite in A minor, op. 42, in five numbers. It was exquisitely suggestive and unconventional, but in the elaboration of its romantic themes is satisfying to the imagination and sense of harmony. The third number, "In October," was the most popular. Mme. DeVere-Sapio, the soloist, was not heard at her best, and, while she sang with excellent phrasing and was true to the key, her voice was only full and assuring in its lower tones, and hard and thin in the upper ones.

She pleased most in the "Hamlet" music, which she sang as her second song, because of its attractive and difficult writing, although she appeared at the least advantage in it.

Wagner's overture, with its brilliant construction and tempestuous passages, was of uneven performance, the swelling chords being now and then unevenly taken. Beethoven's Symphony was splendidly given, and the characteristic methods of the author and its evenness were well received.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Orchestra Opens Its Fourteenth Season in This City.

At Infantry Hall, last evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its 14th season in Providence. The retrospect of the past 13 years is, in many ways, an interesting one. It was a matter of grave doubt at first whether a sufficient patronage could be enlisted to make the yearly visits of the orchestra a permanent thing. Fortunately for the musical health of this vicinity that question finally received an affirmative answer, and the increase of attendance has been sufficient to afford us at present double the number of concerts given at first. The influence which these concerts have exerted toward the development and broadening of musical taste is well understood and fully recognized. Nor is it to be overlooked that the work of the orchestra itself, though of a high order from the very beginning, has constantly improved with the passing of the years. This involves no criticism upon or comparison between any of the four conductors who have presided over this famous organization; it is simply the natural result of keeping practically intact for a long period what was originally a band of picked players, the few changes in the personnel made from time to time having usually meant the introduction of a superior performer. There are pleasant memories, too, of the many soloists who have assisted in these concerts; with hardly an exception they have been well worth hearing, while not a few have been in the front rank of the world's greatest vocal or instrumental artists. But, after all, the orchestra is the main thing, with its steady presentation of the master works of music's giants and interesting exhibit of the trend of modern musical ideas. The regular attendant upon the concerts of these 13 years has had brought to his notice and heard superbly performed about all that is best worth hearing in the highest form of musical composition, and a wealth of other things beside.

There was a large and interested audience last night. Though the capacity of Infantry Hall was in no degree tested, yet the ratio of empty seats at the rear seemed appreciably smaller than usual, the room being perhaps two-thirds filled. The following programme was given.

Symphony, No. 3, in A minor (Scotch), Op. 56.....Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
I. Introduction: Andante con moto (A minor) Allegro un poco agitato (A minor)
II. Vivace non troppo (F major)
III. Adagio (A major)
IV. Allegro vivacissimo (A minor) Allegro maestoso assai (A minor)
Ophelia's Mad Scene (Act IV., Scene 2) from "Hamlet".....Ambroise Thomas
Overture, "Der Fliegende Hollander".....Richard Wagner
Aria, "Ah Perfido".....Ludwig von Beethoven
Scherzo capriccioso in D-flat major, Op. 66.....Antonin Dvorak
Scherzo: Allegro con fuoco (D-flat major)
Trio: Poco tranquillo (D major)

Mendelssohn's so-called "Scotch" symphony, like some of his earlier works, shows really less of the spontaneousness of genius than of skill in scholastic forms. This is especially true of the first movement, the others, and especially the second and third, containing much that is of interest, elegantly scored and in the unmistakable Mendelssohn vein. The work is said to have been suggested by a trip to Scotland, taken when he was about 20 years old. It was, however, but sketched at that time, and not fully scored till over 10 years later. The symphony was dedicated to the young Queen Victoria, who, together with her consort, Prince Albert, was a warm friend and faithful patron of the composer, and first performed in London in 1842. It was well played last evening, though exception might be taken to the funereal character which Mr. Paur imparted to the opening movement.

Wagner's familiar and stormily weird "Flying Dutchman" overture was played with immense elan and fire, and brought out a hearty round of applause. The scherzo capriccioso by Dvorak, which closed the programme, is a number somewhat difficult to classify or describe. Mr. Apthorp, in his very elaborate programme notes, professes to find in it characteristics of the sonata form. Possibly they might be detected in an analysis of the score, but the average hearer would be far more likely to fancy a family likeness to a potpourri by that prince of the bass drum and cymbals, John Philip Sousa. It is lively, it is ear-tickling, and, above all, it is noisy.

The soloist of the evening was Madame Clementine De Vere-Sapio, newly returned from a long series of European triumphs, and making her initial reappearance here. If it were possible to gild refined gold, one might be tempted to say that she has broadened both in art and voice during her year or two of absence. Certainly we seldom hear such singing as she gave us last night in her two sharply contrasted numbers. The stupendously difficult aria of the mad Ophelia was sung with a brilliancy and certainty of technic, a perfect control of dynamics and a wealth of voice and expression that call for the highest praise. Beethoven's well-known concert aria offered her opportunities for the display of breadth and dignity of style and skillful phrasing, which she grasped as readily and successfully as she did the marvellous floratura of Ophelia's song. It was a triumphal re-entry for Madame Sapio and so acknowledged by her hearers.

The concert began somewhat late, owing to a slight accident to the train which had the orchestra on board. Everybody seemed glad to welcome the players again, and Mr. Paur was given a hearty round of applause when he stepped to the conductor's desk.

The second concert will be given on the evening of Wednesday, Nov. 27.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1895.

MUSIC.

Second Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—MacDowell's Suite Was the Feature of the Evening—Mrs. DeVere-Sapio Was the Soloist.

The program of the second Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, "Flying Dutchman".....Wagner
"Ah! Perfido,".....Beethoven
Suite, A minor.....MacDowell
Ophelia's Mad Scene.....Thomas
Symphony No. 5.....Beethoven

Four movements of MacDowell's suite were first given at the Worcester Festival of 1891, Sept. 24. They were given for the first time at a Symphony concert in Boston, Oct. 24, 1891. "In October" was played here last night for the first time.

Charming as was the suite as played here four years ago, the reproach might then have been made gently that the "Summer Idyl" and the "Shepherdess's Song" suffered by immediate juxtaposition. This reproach cannot now be made. "In October" supplies balance and contrast. And what exquisite music this suite is! What fancy and imagination are herein displayed! Passages recall descriptions of tree life in Thomas Hardy's "Woodlanders."

There is the dark mystery of the forest, as well as its open, opulent summer joy. Here is romantic music without taint of affectation, without desire to startle. The wealth of the composer's resources is used modestly. A suggestion made by MacDowell is worth more than a complete syllogism of many estimable composers who apply the rule of three and the measuring rod to the product of wrenched thought.

How admirable his self-control, that of the master, who knows exactly what he wishes to say and how to say it! How unerring his sense of color, how exact his knowledge of the value of a nuance! To hear such music is a rare pleasure. For such music comes not to us by mere plodding labor or by mere assiduous devotion to what other men have said in music. Labor is in this suite, and so is devotion to that which is pure and noble and eternal; but the motive power is inspiration, the intensity of the born musician, which must out. And lo, a thing of beauty!

***

Mrs. De Vere-Sapio was known to us before her marriage as a brilliant singer, exulting in trills and roulades. She comes back after her European experiences with broader voice and more dramatic style. It is true that she sang at the Paris Opéra before she first visited us; but although her operatic début was successful, she did not tarry long in Paris.

Last evening she sang "Ah! Perfido" with breadth, and yet with great attention to detail. If the dazzling brilliancy of her upper tones is in a measure dulled, her lower tones have gained immeasurably. In pathetic entreaty, as in frenzied denunciation, she sang with the authority of the true artist. A performance conspicuous for its dignity, musical conception, intelligent workmanship and sincerity.

And then she sang the scene in which Ophelia, crazed by the strange events—the irregular decease of Hamlet's father, the inexplicable behavior of the Prince, and the stupid death of Polonius—sings now sadly, now distractedly—Ophelia, "chére petite glu," as Laforgue describes her, sings while peasants dance. The Wagnerites make merry at such mad scenes; but have you noticed that several of the most famous Wagnerphones, male and female, went mad; while they that sing Italian or French mad scenes wax fat and live to a wheezy old age?

There is no argument in this proposition; it is merely the statement of an historical fact. In this scene Mrs. Sapio had an opportunity to display the excellence of her technique. Surprising were certain of her vocal feats; yet agility and bravura seemed only the natural expression of hysteria, not the teacher's exercises learned carefully by Ophelia when she was educating for the Prince.

***

The performance of the orchestra throughout the evening left much to be desired. There was frequently indecision in attack; there was much that was raw, and coarse. The accompaniments to Mrs. Sapio's solos were almost steadily indiscreet.

The 5th symphony has been flippantly described by someone as an old War-horse of music. Now a War-horse in politics is apt to be a venerable, familiar, imposing person, who leaks oratory, and is apt to be a bore.

One memorable night—it was Nov. 9, 1889—Mr. Nikisch gave a spectacular performance of this symphony, and he did all manner of wild, irregular, extraordinary things with it, so that the more hysterical of his male admirers dashed their silk hats upon the floor and danced upon them in corybantic frenzy, forgetting for once that they were Bostonians and in Boston. Whatever may be said about that performance from the musician's point of view, there is no denying that it was an exciting event. Sleep, at least, was impossible.

Now, last evening the performance of the symphony was unrefined, unpoetic, dull and tedious. It was eminently burgess. If the fifth symphony is anything, it is certainly not burgess, yet last evening it was burgess, like horse-hair furniture, mourning wreaths or Hume's History of England bound in half-calf. And for once the flippant person seemed right, and, indeed, eminently judicious, when he described Beethoven's work as an "old War-horse."

PHILIP HALE.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVIII., NO. 119.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mme Sapio in Two Selections—MacDowell's Suite a Success.

The programme for the second concert in this season's series by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall was:

Overture, "The Flying Dutchman".....Wagner
Scena and aria, "Ah! Perfido".....Beethoven
Suite in A minor, op. 42.....MacDowell
Ophelia's mad scene, "Hamlet".....A. Thomas
Symphony No. 5, C minor.....Beethoven

The soloist was Mme. De Vere-Sapio.

Mr. MacDowell's suite made even a more favorable impression than it did when it was heard here before. It is a charming work pervaded by a fine poetic fancy. There is in it a delightful absence of that diluted Rheinberger flavor which characterizes so much of the music of home manufacture and a refreshing originality. The composer has a positive genius for orchestral color. His instrumentation, while elaborate, is never overcrowded, but is always clear, and in many movements of this work has a daintiness and a piquancy that are exquisite in effect. Another admirable quality is the artistic discretion shown by Mr. MacDowell in knowing exactly when he has said what he has to say, and ceasing then and there, instead of padding out his music with extraneous matter for the mere sake of making it longer.

The five movements which constitute this composition are all so equally interesting that it is difficult to express a preference for any one of them, but perhaps a special admiration may go out to "The Summer Idyl" for its tender grace, and to "The Shepherdess' Song" for its suave and simple loveliness. The suite was sympathetically read and beautifully played, and the applause at its close was vigorous and prolonged, an effort being made to call the composer forward, but in vain. The Wagner overture received spirited and effective treatment at the hands of both conductor and orchestra, powerful dramatic feeling being finely emphasized. The symphony seemed to drag and to be lacking in its familiar impressiveness. The opening movement was over "jerky" and disjointed in effect, and at times moved laboriously. The pace at which it was taken appeared to be over slow and spiritless, and the result was far from satisfying. The andante received better treatment, and was, on the whole, the most praiseworthy feature in the performance. The scherzo lost something of its customary animation under the interpretation put upon it, notably in the slacking of the time at the opening of the trio by the basses.

The two selections made by Mme. Sapio represented the extremes of vocal art and style, and it would be a phenomenal artist indeed, who could do equal justice to both compositions. The Beethoven aria, with its large and emphatic recitative, its broad adagio and its fiery allegro and its nobility of character generally, and the Momas scene, with its thin declamatory passages and its florid waltz tune, intended only to show off the skill of the artist in coloratur, could not possibly be more widely apart nor call for more directly opposite latents for their adequate performance. Mme. Sapio, whose voice has become somewhat worn and tired since it was last heard here, has scarcely the dramatic quality for the satisfying rendering of the Beethoven aria. In the recitation she was lacking in largeness of declamation and breadth of style. The adagio was sung with musicianly feeling, but in a somewhat dry manner, and with over much of unmeaning explosiveness in attacking the upper notes.

The performance was, on the whole, uninteresting. The only excuse for an artist singing this work is the possession of a large dramatic voice and the grand style, neither of which was illustrated by Mme. Sapio on this occasion. She sang the music fairly well, but she failed to interpret it. In the "Hamlet" scene she was heard with pleasing effect in the more cantabile moments, but her bravura was without the necessary lightness and flexibility, and was frequently thick, stiff and labored in effect, while now and then a lapse from correct intonation jarred on the ear. Mme. Sapio has been heard to much more advantage here than she was last evening, and has also aroused much more enthusiasm. She was recalled once after each effort.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony, "Harold in Italy," Berlioz; symphonic poem, "Francesca" (first time), Tschaikowsky; "Dream Music," from "Hansel and Gretel" (first time), Humperdinck; overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark. There will be no soloist on this occasion.

---

[26]

MUSICAL COURIER.

BOSTON, October 19, 1895.

NIKISCH TRIUMPHANT.

IT must make some of our Boston contemporaries feel sad, sore and sick to read of Arthur Nikisch's triumphs in the very musical strongholds of Germany.

The Hungarian conductor, of whom Boston wearied, or to put it more correctly, who knew too much to tolerate the incessant critical warfare made upon him there, not only displayed his versatility first as conductor of opera at Budapest, but has been called to fill two of the most important musical positions in the world. He has succeeded Hans von Bülow as conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic concerts, and is besides nominated successor to Carl Reinecke, as conductor of the famous Gewandhaus concerts in Leipsic.

Now what has Boston to say for herself?

What can Boston say?

Nikisch we all remember as a man of marvelous musical organization, great magnetism and learning. For the year previous to his departure Boston critics —with a few honorable exceptions—systematically decried his work. He was too modern, yet he is to conduct Beethoven in Leipsic, the very heart of classical music in Germany; he was not a great musical authority.

Yet he follows Von Bülow in Berlin.

Now, doesn't all this strike one as supremely silly, the silliness of small boys that throw stones simply because of pure "cussedness"?

Boston rejected Nikisch, while New York, Budapest, Berlin and Leipsic fight for the honor of his presence. Pooh! pooh! you have Paur—King Log after King Stork (to reverse the fable)—and Paur is good enough for the sleepy town.

But even the virtuous Mr. Paur is not giving satisfaction. A sigh, a cultured sigh, has been exhaled by Boston's elect. Mr. Paur is voted a bore. His boots are too thick and his readings as opaque. He has no magnetism, and he is a little slow.

Boston had a magnetic conductor and was not satisfied. She got Mr. Paur and longs for Nikisch again.

Boston is coquettish.

We learn on the very best of authority that Mr. Paur will be asked to step down and out at the end of this season. We suppose Mr. Higginson will put his hand in his pocket willingly in order to accomplish this much desired event.

Then Mr. Higginson will look around for another conductor. There is Mr. Nikisch, an excellent successor to Mr. Paur, but we do not believe that he will come. He is better off in Germany, where his genius for conducting is appreciated at its full value. Besides he must conduct his concerts in Queen's Hall, London, England.

Arthur Nikisch, conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic concerts; Arthur Nikisch, conductor of the Gewandhaus concerts at Leipsic. What coals of fire he could heap on pettifogging Boston!

Mr. Nikisch's time is better employed.

There now remains nothing but Mr. Paur for Boston to contemplate.

But then THE MUSICAL COURIER some years ago fought valiantly against the deposition of Nikisch and the appearance of Paur.

Boston, however, thought differently.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 27, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The second Symphony concert at Music Hall, last evening, presented the following programme.

Overture to "Der Fliegende Hollander," Wagner; Ophelie's mad scene from "Hamlet," Thomas; suite in A minor, op. 42, MacDowell; scena and aria, "Ah! Perfido," op. 65, Beethoven; symphony No. 5, in C minor, op. 67, Beethoven. Soloist, Mme. DeVere-Sapio.

The programme, taken with the almost flawless work of the orchestra aroused more than polite applause, there being a hearty response to each number, the greatest part of which, however, fell to MacDowell's Suite in A minor, op. 42, in five numbers. It was exquisitely suggestive and unconventional, but in the elaboration of its romantic themes is satisfying to the imagination and sense of harmony. The third number, "In October," was the most popular. Mme. DeVere-Sapio, the soloist, was not heard at her best, and, while she sang with excellent phrasing and was true to the key, her voice was only full and assuring in its lower tones, and hard and thin in the upper ones.

She pleased most in the "Hamlet" music, which she sang as her second song, because of its attractive and difficult writing, although she appeared at the least advantage in it.

Wagner's overture, with its brilliant construction and tempestuous passages, was of uneven performance, the swelling chords being now and then unevenly taken. Beethoven's Symphony was splendidly given, and the characteristic methods of the author and its evenness were well received

---

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1895.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Orchestra Opens its Fourteenth Season in This City.

At Infantry Hall, last evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its 14th season in Providence. The retrospect of the past 13 years is, in many ways, an interesting one. It was a matter of grave doubt at first whether a sufficient patronage could be enlisted to make the yearly visits of the orchestra a permanent thing. Fortunately for the musical health of this vicinity that question finally received an affirmative answer, and the increase of attendance has been sufficient to afford us at present double the number of concerts given at first. The influence which these concerts have exerted toward the development and broadening of musical taste is well understood and fully recognized. Nor is it to be overlooked that the work of the orchestra itself, though of a high order from the very beginning, has constantly improved with the passing of the years. This involves no criticism upon or comparison between any of the four conductors who have presided over this famous organization; it is simply the natural result of keeping practically intact for a long period what was originally a band of picked players, the few changes in the personnel made from time to time having usually meant the introduction of a superior performer. There are pleasant memories, too, of the many soloists who have assisted in these concerts; with hardly an exception they have been well worth hearing, while not a few have been in the front rank of the world's greatest vocal or instrumental artists. But, after all, the orchestra is the main thing, with its steady presentation of the master works of music's giants and interesting exhibit of the trend of modern musical ideas. The regular attendant upon the concerts of these 13 years has had brought to his notice and heard superbly performed about all that is best worth hearing in the highest form of musical composition, and a wealth of other things beside.

There was a large and interested audience last night. Though the capacity of Infantry Hall was in no degree tested, yet the ratio of empty seats at the rear seemed appreciably smaller than usual, the room being perhaps two-thirds filled. The following programme was given.

Symphony, No. 3, in A minor (Scotch), Op. 56.....Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
I. Introduction: Andante con moto (A minor)
Allegro un poco agitato (A minor)
II. Vivace non troppo (F major)
III. Adagio (A major)
IV. Allegro vivacissimo (A minor)
Allegro maestoso assai (A minor)
Ophelia's Mad Scene (Act IV., Scene 2) from "Hamlet".....Ambroise Thomas
Overture, "Der Fliegende Holländer".....Richard Wagner
Aria, "Ah Perfido".....Ludwig von Beethoven
Scherzo capriccioso in D-flat major, Op. 66.....Antonin Dvorak
Scherzo: Allegro con fuoco (D-flat major)
Trio: Poco tranquillo (D major)

Mendelssohn's so-called "Scotch" symphony, like some of his earlier works, shows really less of the spontaneousness of genius than of skill in scholastic forms. This is especially true of the first movement, the others, and especially the second and third, containing much that is of interest, elegantly scored and in the unmistakable Mendelssohn vein. The work is said to have been suggested by a trip to Scotland, taken when he was about 20 years old. It was, however, but sketched at that time, and not fully scored till over 10 years later. The symphony was dedicated to the young Queen Victoria, who, together with her consort, Prince Albert, was a warm friend and faithful patron of the composer, and first performed in London in 1842. It was well played last evening, though exception might be taken to the funereal character which Mr. Paur imparted to the opening movement.

Wagner's familiar and stormily weird "Flying Dutchman" overture was played with immense elan and fire, and brought out a hearty round of applause. The scherzo capriccioso by Dvorak, which closed the programme, is a number somewhat difficult to classify or describe. Mr. Apthorp, in his very elaborate programme notes, professes to find in it characteristics of the sonata form. Possibly they might be detected in an analysis of the score, but the average hearer would be far more likely to fancy a family likeness to a potpourri by that prince of the bass drum and cymbals, John Philip Sousa. It is lively, it is ear-tickling, and, above all, it is noisy.

The soloist of the evening was Madame Clementine De Vere-Sapio, newly returned from a long series of European triumphs, and making her initial reappearance here. If it were possible to gild refined gold, one might be tempted to say that she has broadened both in art and voice during her year or two of absence. Certainly we seldom hear such singing as she gave us last night in her two sharply contrasted numbers. The stupendously difficult aria of the mad Ophelia was sung with a brilliancy and certainty of technic, a perfect control of dynamics and a wealth of voice and expression that call for the highest praise. Beethoven's well-known concert aria offered her opportunities for the display of breadth and dignity of style and skillful phrasing, which she grasped as readily and successfully as she did the marvellous fioratura of Ophelia's song. It was a triumphal re-entry for Madame Sapio and so acknowledged by her hearers.

The concert began somewhat late, owing to a slight accident to the train which had the orchestra on board. Everybody seemed glad to welcome the players again, and Mr. Paur was given a hearty round of applause when he stepped to the conductor's desk.

The second concert will be given on the evening of Wednesday, Nov. 27.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1895.

MUSIC.

Second Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—MacDowell's Suite Was the Feature of the Evening—Mrs. DeVere-Sapio Was the Soloist.

The program of the second Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, "Flying Dutchman".....Wagner
"Ah! Perfido,".....Beethoven
Suite, A minor.....MacDowell
Ophelia's Mad Scene.....Thomas
Symphony No. 5.....Beethoven

Four movements of MacDowell's suite were first given at the Worcester Festival of 1891, Sept. 24. They were given for the first time at a Symphony concert in Boston, Oct. 24, 1891. "In October" was played here last night for the first time.

Charming as was the suite as played here four years ago, the reproach might then have been made gently that the "Summer Idyl" and the "Shepherdess's Song" suffered by immediate juxtaposition. This reproach cannot now be made. "In October" supplies balance and contrast. And what exquisite music this suite is! What fancy and imagination are herein displayed! Passages recall descriptions of tree life in Thomas Hardy's "Woodlanders."

There is the dark mystery of the forest, as well as its open, opulent summer joy. Here is romantic music without taint of affectation, without desire to startle. The wealth of the composer's resources is used modestly. A suggestion made by MacDowell is worth more than a complete syllogism of many estimable composers who apply the rule of three and the measuring rod to the product of wrenched thought.

How admirable his self-control, that of the master, who knows exactly what he wishes to say and how to say it! How unerring his sense of color, how exact his knowledge of the value of a nuance! To hear such music is a rare pleasure. For such music comes not to us by mere plodding labor or by mere assiduous devotion to what other men have said in music. Labor is in this suite, and so is devotion to that which is pure and noble and eternal; but the motive power is inspiration, the intensity of the born musician, which must out. And lo, a thing of beauty!

* * *

Mrs. De Vere-Sapio was known to us before her marriage as a brilliant singer, exulting in trills and roulades. She comes back after her European experiences with broader voice and more dramatic style. It is true that she sang at the Paris Opéra before she first visited us; but although her operatic début was successful, she did not tarry long in Paris.

Last evening she sang "Ah! Perfido" with breadth, and yet with great attention to detail. If the dazzling brilliancy of her upper tones is in a measure dulled, her lower tones have gained immeasurably. In pathetic entreaty, as in frenzied denunciation, she sang with the authority of the true artist. A performance conspicuous for its dignity, musical conception, intelligent workmanship and sincerity.

And then she sang the scene in which Ophelia, crazed by the strange events—the irregular decease of Hamlet's father, the inexplicable behavior of the Prince, and the stupid death of Polonius—sings now sadly, now distractedly—Ophelia, "chére petite glu," as Laforgue describes her, sings while peasants dance. The Wagnerites make merry at such mad scenes; but have you noticed that several of the most famous Wagnerphones, male and female, went mad; while they that sing Italian or French mad scenes wax fat and live to a wheezy old age?

There is no argument in this proposition; it is merely the statement of an historical fact. In this scene Mrs. Sapio had an opportunity to display the excellence of her technique. Surprising were certain of her vocal feats; yet agility and bravura seemed only the natural expression of hysteria, not the teacher's exercises learned carefully by Ophelia when she was educating for the Prince.

* * *

The performance of the orchestra throughout the evening left much to be desired. There was frequently indecision in attack: there was much that was raw, and coarse. The accompaniments to Mrs. Sapio's solos were almost steadily indiscreet.

The 5th symphony has been flippantly described by someone as an old War-horse of music. Now a War-horse in politics is apt to be a venerable, familiar, imposing person, who leaks oratory, and is apt to be a bore.

One memorable night—it was Nov. 9, 1889—Mr. Nikisch gave a spectacular performance of this symphony, and he did all manner of wild, irregular, extraordinary things with it, so that the more hysterical of his male admirers dashed their silk hats upon the floor and danced upon them in corybantic frenzy, forgetting for once that they were Bostonians and in Boston. Whatever may be said about that performance from the musician's point of view, there is no denying that it was an exciting event. Sleep, at least, was impossible.

Now, last evening the performance of the symphony was unrefined, unpoetic, dull and tedious. It was eminently burgess. If the fifth symphony is anything, it is certainly not burgess, yet last evening it was burgess, like horse-hair furniture, mourning wreaths or Hume's History of England bound in half-calf. And for once the flippant person seemed right, and, indeed, eminently judicious, when he described Beethoven's work as an "old War-horse."

PHILIP HALE.

NOTES

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVIII., NO. 119.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mme Sapio in Two Selections—MacDowell's Suite a Success.

The programme for the second concert in this season's series by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall was:

Overture, "The Flying Dutchman".....Wagner
Scena and aria, "Ah! Perfido".....Beethoven
Suite in A minor, op. 42.....MacDowell
Ophelia's mad scene, "Hamlet".....A. Thomas
Symphony No. 5, C minor.....Beethoven

The soloist was Mme. De Vere-Sapio.

Mr. MacDowell's suite made even a more favorable impression than it did when it was heard here before. It is a charming work pervaded by a fine poetic fancy. There is in it a delightful absence of that diluted Rheinberger flavor which characterizes so much of the music of home manufacture and a refreshing originality. The composer has a positive genius for orchestral color. His instrumentation, while elaborate, is never overcrowded, but is always clear, and in many movements of this work has a daintiness and a piquancy that are exquisite in effect. Another admirable quality is the artistic discretion shown by Mr. MacDowell in knowing exactly when he has said what he has to say, and ceasing then and there, instead of padding out his music with extraneous matter for the mere sake of making it longer.

The five movements which constitute this composition are all so equally interesting that it is difficult to express a preference for any one of them, but perhaps a special admiration may go out to "The Summer Idyl" for its tender grace, and to "The Shepherdess' Song" for its suave and simple loveliness. The suite was sympathetically read and beautifully played, and the applause at its close was vigorous and prolonged, an effort being made to call the composer forward, but in vain. The Wagner overture received spirited and effective treatment at the hands of both conductor and orchestra, powerful dramatic feeling being finely emphasized. The symphony seemed to drag and to be lacking in its familiar impressiveness. The opening movement was over "jerky" and disjointed in effect, and at times moved laboriously. The pace at which it was taken appeared to be over slow and spiritless, and the result was far from satisfying. The andante received better treatment, and was, on the whole, the most praiseworthy feature in the performance. The scherzo lost something of its customary animation under the interpretation put upon it, notably in the slacking of the time at the opening of the trio by the basses.

The two selections made by Mme. Sapio represented the extremes of vocal art and style, and it would be a phenomenal artist indeed, who could do equal justice to both compositions. The Beethoven aria, with its large and emphatic recitative, its broad adagio and its fiery allegro and its nobility of character generally, and the Momas scene, with its thin declamatory passages and its florid waltz tune, intended only to show off the skill of the artist in coloratur, could not possibly be more widely apart nor call for more directly opposite latents for their adequate performance. Mme. Sapio, whose voice has become somewhat worn and tired since it was last heard here, has scarcely the dramatic quality for the satisfying rendering of the Beethoven aria. In the recitation she was lacking in largeness of declamation and breadth of style. The adagio was sung with musicianly feeling, but in a somewhat dry manner, and with over much of unmeaning explosiveness in attacking the upper notes.

The performance was, on the whole, uninteresting. The only excuse for an artist singing this work is the possession of a large dramatic voice and the grand style, neither of which was illustrated by Mme. Sapio on this occasion. She sang the music fairly well, but she failed to interpret it. In the "Hamlet" scene she was heard with pleasing effect in the more cantabile moments, but her bravura was without the necessary lightness and flexibility, and was frequently thick, stiff and labored in effect, while now and then a lapse from correct intonation jarred on the ear. Mme. Sapio has been heard to much more advantage here than she was last evening, and has also aroused much more enthusiasm. She was recalled once after each effort.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony, "Harold in Italy," Berlioz; symphonic poem, "Francesca" (first time), Tschaikowsky; "Dream Music," from "Hansel and Gretel" (first time), Humperdinck; overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark. There will be no soloist on this occasion.

---

[26]

ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 28, 1895.

The Symphony Concert---Criticism, Suggestion, Tribute.

The first symphony concert gave us a well-known Brahms symphony as piece de resistance, the second presented a standard symphony (the fifth) by Beethoven as its chief number. On both occasions the works were splendidly performed, and there can scarcely be any question but that both selections were entirely legitimate. But, viewed from a certain standpoint, some objection may be taken to the frequent repetition of masterpieces which have become familiar in a musical city. Recognizing most heartily the fact that the Boston symphony concerts are in their nature educational, one might safely add that the truest public musical education of this sort must extend in three directions.

Firstly, it should present sufficient opportunities to become acquainted with the great classical works of acknowledged worth.

Secondly, a great orchestra of such an equipment as ours, should give plenty of chances for the study of the modern style of rich tone-coloring, the usage made of the "grand orchestra" in that fuller state of development to which it has attained since the classical epoch; every programme should present something in the nature of full scoring as understood at present.

Thirdly, the steady concert-goer should be kept abreast of the progress of the musical world (at least on its orchestral side) through these concerts. The orchestral growth of Russia, France, Norway, and England, (not to speak of other countries which are beginning to work in this field) should be interspersed even if they fall below the high standard of Germany; the programmes should be a mirror of the chief orchestral events of the present as well as of the past. The standard of intrinsic worth should not prevail alone.

During the season an average of 100 orchestral works (or somewhat less) can be produced; if 50 are devoted to standard classics the utmost care and economy is necessary with the remaining fifty. There are so many compositions that are known in Europe which have not had a hearing here that it would not be unreasonable to desire one representative of this vast school on each programme. The lesser works of the great classical composers are scarcely necessary where such a pressure is exercised by the modern school. Richard Strauss, Bruckner, Svendsen, Borodin, Stanford, Cowen, etc., etc., may not be as great as Beethoven, or Mozart, but they have a claim to be heard occasionally when they have done something important in the modern field. Of the American school it is unnecessary to speak; the present writer does not believe in coddling it, or that the orchestra should become wet-nurse to an infant art. Very few works of real importance in the larger forms of orchestral music have been achieved as yet on this side of the water, yet great and undeniable progress towards a good standard of composition has been made (as was proved by a composition on the programme of Saturday), not enough, however, to form a regular factor in every programme as yet.

Having presumed thus much in the direction of suggestion it behooves the reviewer to at once pay tribute to the solidity of the selections already made and to the excellent manner in which they are being interpreted. It is the beginning of the season, yet the ensemble is about as good as it ever has been, and Mr. Paur shows a control of his forces that augurs an advance even from the high standard of the past.

It must also be added that the programme announced for next Saturday about fulfils the requirements outlined above, since Berlioz's "Harold Symphony" represents the most modern scoring and a taste of the new opera, "Hansel and Gretel," is to be given.

The interest in these concerts was never so great as now; a very large audience was present, and scarcely one of the number of those standing along the outer aisles left before the last chord of the final number,—the Fifth Symphony.

The overture to "The Flying Dutchman" began this concert. It was given with clearness and sufficient turbulence, although the theme suggesting Senta and the salvation of "The Flying Dutchman" was taken in rather too deliberate a fashion. The careful balance deserves commendation; the sailor's chorus theme was not lost amid the tumult, as it generally is.

Now followed Mme. De Vere Sapio. The programme announced her first number as Ophelia's "Mad Scene," but she interchanged her two arias and began with "Ah Perfido." One may justly protest against unannounced changes in such concerts; while no musically-educated auditor would mistake Beethoven for Ambroise Thomas, there must have been many present who dilated with the wrong emotion. The artist did not rise to the height of Beethoven's great aria; there was spasmodic power rather than true breadth in the fiery recitatives and at the end of the aria, but the portions in cavatina style, such as "Per Pieta non mi dir Addio" went much better. Mme. De Vere Sapio was better and more at ease in the "Mad Scene" from Thomas' "Hamlet." Here again, however, the cantabile "Ballade" was the best portion. In the coloratur work there was an occasional slip of intonation, but much can be pardoned to insanity.

Somehow this operatic Ophelia does not appeal to the feelings of the Shakespearian. Shakespeare has so beautifully brought music to the aid of his pictures of mental alienation by means of snatches of ballads, by the once pure mind tending even to the indelicate and impure side of the repertoire, by the extraordinary lines of songs and the intermixation of irrelevant thoughts, that one revolts from this conventional pic-age was laughed to scorn by Weber, who wrote delicious (but untrue) satire upon it, and it shows the sturdiness of Beethoven's artistic nature that he again threw down the gauntlet by a similar passage in this, his next symphony. The lagging spoken of in the second movement was entirely absent from the finale which went with abundant spirit and power, in fact the ending of the great symphony has seldom had a better reading or performance.

Louis C. Elson.

NOTES.

It is proposed to give a concert (with the Symphony Orchestra) for the benefit of the former leader of the contrabasses, Goldstein, who has become hopelessly insane. A popular programme will probably be arranged, and this, with the object of the concert, should ensure a crowded house.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 27.

MUSIC.

The Symphony Concert.

The second symphony concert of the season was given last evening, at Music Hall, with the following programme:

Overture, "The Flying Dutchman" .....Wagner
Mad Scene from "Hamlet"..... .....A. Thomas
Mme. De Vere Sapio.
Suite A-minor, op. 42.....MacDowell
Aria, "Ah perfido".....Beethoven
Mme. De Vere Sapio.
Symphony, No. 5, op. 67.....Beethoven

"Old friends, old wines, old memories." Mr. Paur has the happy knack of realizing two thirds of this proverb; he gives us old friends and old memories, and he loses none of his old and exuberant enthusiasm in introducing them to us. The world may grow older, taste may change; novelties may be abundant; but what better company can one have than Beethoven and Wagner. Fate eloquently tapping on the door and Legend pathetically blowing in a bass tuber? The new æsthetic Hoyle solemnly insists that when a conductor is in doubt he must lead Beethoven. Novelties in music are always ticklish things to deal with; one can never tell if they are classic or if they have the proper educational value and have the unimpeachable morality which will allow of them being played before our daughters and sweethearts. Even the most exacting of plaguey critics cannot deny that Beethoven's fifth symphony is a most excellent and approved work, and that it deserves from its conductor all the superfluity of energy and excess of perspiration that he gives to present day works when he serves them up. A less careful conductor than Mr. Paur would give his orchestra the credit of knowing something of their Beethoven by this time, and content himself with beating time in a quiet and conventional manner; but Mr. Paur has faith in gesture and energy, and he is as conscientiously gymnastic with the works of the old masters as if they had been written only yesterday. Aside from ts æsthetic worth there is a practical value in this system of treatment, for if the hearer is in danger of neglecting Beethoven, he cannot banish Mr. Paur from his sight or memory. Aside from their reverence for what is old there is another merit in the symphony programmes, and that is, every week they present a problem in the nature of an unanswerable puzzle. Last week the audience amused itself by trying to discover why the theatrical scherzo of Dvorak was tagged on the end of a classical programme, and this week lovers of charades and rebuses lost themselves in the mazes of conjecture, seeking for the link that connected the Flying Dutchman overture with the fifth symphony. Mr. Paur's programmes are always orthodox, but at the same time they have the peculiarity of shocking in some way orthodox taste; they unaccountably suggest the inconsistency of improving the statue of Apollo with a pair of Wellington boots or of affixing Gothic gargoyles to the Parthenon. One regrets these little lapses in taste, for of all the conductors yet vouchsafed to Boston, Mr. Paur is the most able, the most catholic in taste, the most conscientious in execution. The symphony was superbly read, and, of course, superbly played—color, power, finish could go no further.

The MacDowell suite is well worth the rehearing. It is a most artistic and most dainty piece of work; learned without ostentation. It is not the work of an inspired giant who hurls out his ideas in passion, and fashions them while they are white-hot; but it is marked with careful poetic daintiness, super-excellent in taste, and reserved in treatment. There is no wearing of the subject threadbare through over-elaboration. Of all our composers, Mr. MacDowell possesses in the highest degree the gift of knowing when to stop. He is also melodious, a demonstration that he is gifted with ideas, and he does not beat the gold of his imagination too thin, nor rigidly compress it into one unyielding form. The suite is a most charming work, one of several of a composer who in imagination and fertility of ideas holds a very high, if not the highest place in American musical art.

The soloist of the evening did not interfere with Mr. Paur's intentions by adding anything new to the programme; both her contributions are only too well known to concert goers and those gave an opportunity for comparison that did not tell always in favor of the soloist. Mme. De Vere Sapio was most effective in Hamlet selection the Beethoven Scena and aria being, seemingly beyond her power. She sings always like an artist, but at times overestimates her endurance and so loses control over her voice at critical moments. In listening to her one feels a sense of effort, the machinery producing singing is more prominent than feeling and interpretative imagination, and when the singer is at her best, one listens unmoved. Mme. De Vere Sapio has a voice of pleasant quality, particularly pleasant in its lower portion, and it may be that such faults as were revealed last evening are due to our treacherous Boston climate and not to lack of skill in the singer, who aroused a large amount of enthusiasm, and was recalled after each song.

The programme for the next concert is: Berlioz, "Harold in Italy;" Tschaikowsky's Symphonic Poem, "Dream Music from Humperdinck's Hansel and Gretel," and Goldmark's Overture, Sakuntala.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, OCT. 27, 1895.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Echoes from Yesterday's Symphony Concert.

"Billie Taylor" to be Sung by the Castle Sq Opera Company.

Kneisel Quartet—Current and Coming Musical Attractions.

The program of last night's symphony concert was varied and enjoyable. It began with Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman." The orchestra played it with remarkable skill, Mr Paur's interpretation elucidating the stormy grandeur characteristic of the composition. It afforded some excellent work for the wind instruments, especially in the working up of the second theme in the main body, while the strings and trombones in holding and developing the themes produced a wonderful effect of triumphant force.

MacDowell's suite in A minor is calculated to test some of the best qualities of the orchestra. The first movement "In a Haunted Forest" is replete with suggestive beauties. The somber nature of the theme and its delicate development is full of poetic charm. The second movement, "Summer Idyl," is full of life and grace. "In October," the third movement, which was played here for the first time last night, is in F major. It is a strange and fascinating little fantasy, extremely effective to the ear, and suggestive to the imagination. The orchestra enhanced the fourth movement, "The Shepherdess' Song," with an additional charm, while the last movement, "The Forest Spirits," afforded the orchestra opportunity to display some excellent work in the production of more delicate effects.

Mme De Vere-Sapio was the soloist of the occasion, and her voice produced an excellent impression on the audience. She sang the mad scene from Ambroise Thomas' "Hamlet" with great effect. Her voice is flexible and clear and capable of expressing the transitions from the lively to the plaintive notes of the scene in which Ophelia tells the merry gathering by the river about her love for Hamlet and his love for her. Mme Vere-Sapio sang the ballad which follows this scene with exquisite grace. Her voice trilled sweetly, and her phrasing was clear and well modulated. At the conclusion of this song she was recalled with continuous and warm applause by an appreciative and attentive audience.

Her rendering of Beethoven's grand concert scene, "Ah, Traitor!" was highly meritorious. Her voice was not as expressive in recitative as in aria; still, she sang those lines with dramatic force and interpreted the aria with striking effect. The orchestra's accompaniment was excellent.

The concert concluded with Beethoven's symphony No. 5, in C minor, which Mr Paur's interpretation made interesting, even in the elaborate grandeur of the third movement. The orchestra was in splendid form, and the audience was large and appreciative.

The program of the next concert will be as follows: Symphony, "Harold in Italy," Berlioz, viola solo by Mr Franz Kneisel; symphonic poem, "Francesca," Tschaikowsky; "Dream music," from the opera "Hansel and Gretel," Humperdinck; overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark.

—Every available inch of room in Music hall was filled at the Friday afternoon symphony rehearsal, and the concert was very interesting. Mme de Vere-Sapio was the soloist, and wore an afternoon toilet of black, with corsage of revers of cream chiffon, and a black hat, with black ostrich tips. Her singing was enthusiastically received.

BOSTON
HOME JOURNAL
A PAPER OF TO-DAY

SATURDAY, OCT. 26, 1895.

THE musical season of Boston has received its formal opening. With the Symphony concert of last week the musical chrysalis became a butterfly. To be be sure it is as yet a butterfly of neutral tints and tender wings, but still a butterfly. Of course the Symphony concert was a brilliant success, every one and her grandmother being there, and of course Emil Paur, its conductor, was received with just as much cordiality and enthusiasm as if every one and her grandmother, aided and abetted by the critics, adored him unspeakably, instead of finding fault with everything from his choice of programme and soloists and his readings of the selections making up the aforementioned programmes down to the way he cuts his beard and dresses his children. It goes without saying that Adonis Adamowski's recovery from his severe attack of Melbaitis and consequent return to the orchestral fold caused many cardiac palpitations among the matinee girls.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 28, 1895.

The Symphony Concert---Criticism, Suggestion, Tribute.

The first symphony concert gave us a well-known Brahms symphony as piece de resistance, the second presented a standard symphony (the fifth) by Beethoven as its chief number. On both occasions the works were splendidly performed, and there can scarcely be any question but that both selections were entirely legitimate. But, viewed from a certain standpoint, some objection may be taken to the frequent repetition of masterpieces which have become familiar in a musical city. Recognizing most heartily the fact that the Boston symphony concerts are in their nature educational, one might safely add that the truest public musical education of this sort must extend in three directions.

Firstly, it should present sufficient opportunities to become acquainted with the great classical works of acknowledged worth.

Secondly, a great orchestra of such an equipment as ours, should give plenty of chances for the study of the modern style of rich tone-coloring, the usage made of the "grand orchestra" in that fuller state of development to which it has attained since the classical epoch; every programme should present something in the nature of full scoring as understood at present.

Thirdly, the steady concert-goer should be kept abreast of the progress of the musical world (at least on its orchestral side) through these concerts. The orchestral growth of Russia, France, Norway, and England, (not to speak of other countries which are beginning to work in this field) should be interspersed even if they fall below the high standard of Germany; the programmes should be a mirror of the chief orchestral events of the present as well as of the past. The standard of intrinsic worth should not prevail alone.

During the season an average of 100 orchestral works (or somewhat less) can be produced; if 50 are devoted to standard classics the utmost care and economy is necessary with the remaining fifty. There are so many compositions that are known in Europe which have not had a hearing here that it would not be unreasonable to desire one representative of this vast school on each programme. The lesser works of the great classical composers are scarcely necessary where such a pressure is exercised by the modern school. Richard Strauss, Bruckner, Svendsen, Borodin, Stanford, Cowen, etc., etc., may not be as great as Beethoven, or Mozart, but they have a claim to be heard occasionally when they have done something important in the modern field. Of the American school it is unnecessary to speak; the present writer does not believe in coddling it, or that the orchestra should become wet-nurse to an infant art. Very few works of real importance in the larger forms of orchestral music have been achieved as yet on this side of the water, yet great and undeniable progress towards a good standard of composition has been made (as was proved by a composition on the programme of Saturday), not enough, however, to form a regular factor in every programme as yet.

Having presumed thus much in the direction of suggestion it behooves the reviewer to at once pay tribute to the solidity of the selections already made and to the excellent manner in which they are being interpreted. It is the beginning of the season, yet the ensemble is about as good as it ever has been, and Mr. Paur shows a control of his forces that augurs an advance even from the high standard of the past.

It must also be added that the programme announced for next Saturday about fulfils the requirements outlined above, since Berlioz's Harold Symphony" represents the most modern scoring and a taste of the new opera, "Hansel and Gretel," is to be given.

The interest in these concerts was never so great as now; a very large audience was present, and scarcely one of the number of those standing along the outer aisles left before the last chord of the final number,—the Fifth Symphony.

The overture to "The Flying Dutchman" began this concert. It was given with clearness and sufficient turbulence, although the theme suggesting Senta and the salvation of "The Flying Dutchman" was taken in rather too deliberate a fashion. The careful balance deserves commendation; the sailor's chorus theme was not lost amid the tumult, as it generally is.

Now followed Mme. De Vere Sapio. The programme announced her first number as Ophelia's "Mad Scene," but she interchanged her two arias and began with "Ah Perfido." One may justly protest against unannounced changes in such concerts; while no musically-educated auditor would mistake Beethoven for Ambroise Thomas, there must have been many present who dilated with the wrong emotion. The artist did not rise to the height of Beethoven's great aria; there was spasmodic power rather than true breadth in the fiery recitatives and in the end of the aria, but the portions in Cavatina style, such as "Per Pieta non mi dir Addio" went much better. Mme. De Vere Sapio was better and more at ease in the "Mad Scene" from Thomas' "Hamlet." Here again, however, the cantabile "Ballade" was the best portion. In the coloratur work there was an occasional slip of intonation, but much can be pardoned to insanity.

Somehow this operatic Ophelia does violence to the feelings of the Shakespearian. Shakespeare has so beautifully brought music to the aid of his picture of mental alienation by means of snatches of ballads, by the once pure mind tending even to the indelicate and coarse side of the repertoire, by the fragmentary lines of songs and the interpolation of irrelevant thoughts, that one revolts from this conventional pic- [illegible] of insanity to the old-fa[illegible] operatic fashion. The diagnosis of operatic insanity (carefully compiled from the cases of Dinorah, Linda di Chamounix, Lucia, and this present Ophelia) is a tendency to thrill, to sing staccato in high register, to give at least one very tender cavatina (tender even to mushiness) and to end with a high note; all very well, so long as it does not destroy Shakespeare's carefully painted picture, and a good chance to display brilliant vocal exercises in public.

MacDowell's suite in A minor is one of the American compositions that does not stand in need of a protector. Massenet once spoke enthusiastically to the writer of this, regarding MacDowell's work, and seemed to consider him the best of American composers. The prestidigitator Hermann makes nothing of rolling two rabbits into one; if sometime he could thus roll MacDowell and H. W. Parker into one we would possess the absolute great American composer. Add just a little more of counterpoint, of classic reserve, of musical asceticism to MacDowell and he would take the highest rank; the romance, the grace and daintiness, the abundance of ideas and the brilliancy of orchestration he possesses already. The Suite in A minor is altogether a beautiful composition with a scoring that puts it into the front rank and a degree of poetry that gives a charm to its every movement.

It begins with a "Haunted Forest," which we commend to the Society for Physical Research. The forest is haunted by the ghost of a piccolo-player. The movement is dark and sombre but entirely attractive. The "Summer Idyl" (the second movement) is the perfection of grace and daintiness, and if there be art in it it is well concealed, for the music flows as naturally as a country brook. "In October" (third movement) is not essentially programme-music, for it would fit quite as well to September or November; it contains some fine use of woodwind and of horn. It ends as suddenly as if it were February. This, by the way, is a little mannerism of the work, for in other movements one finds the same brusque final cadence. In the "Shepherdess Song" one finds again that absolutely unforced pastoral style which MacDowell and Ethelbert Nevin (the latter in song or piano music) among American composers fully attain. The final movement, "Forest Spirits," sparkles like champagne; it is tricksy from beginning to end. The spirits have regained their spirits and are making a night of it. The piccolo-player did splendid work in this and deserves especial commendation.

The concert ended with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Fate knocked at the door in the first four notes with considerable resolution and good ensemble, but the horn passage which began the second theme might have been louder. The oboe cadenza in the recapitulation of the chief theme was beautifully played. The second movement seemed rather slow in tempo and grew somewhat tame thereby. The violas and violoncellos gave a beautiful tone to their theme and variations, and the pizzicato of the contrabasses did magnificent work in their basses (one of the most effective touches of the movement) was prominent enough. The contrabasses did magnificent work in their very difficult passages in the trio of the scherzo. Their work here is scarcely less trying than in that fearful contrabass passage that ends the fourth symphony. The latter passage was laughed to scorn by Weber, who wrote delicious (but untrue) satire upon it, and it shows the sturdiness of Beethoven's artistic nature that he again threw down the gauntlet by a similar passage in this, his next symphony. The lagging spoken of in the second movement was entirely absent from the finale which went with abundant spirit and power, in fact the ending of the great symphony has seldom had a better reading or performance.

Louis C. Elson.

NOTES.

It is proposed to give a concert (with the Symphony Orchestra) for the benefit of the former leader of the contrabasses, Goldstein, who has become hopelessly insane. A popular programme will probably be arranged, and this, with the object of the concert, should ensure a crowded house.

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 27.

MUSIC.

The Symphony Concert.

The second symphony concert of the season was given last evening, at Music Hall, with the following programme:

Overture, "The Flying Dutchman" .....Wagner
Mad Scene from "Hamlet"..... .....A. Thomas
Mme. De Vere Sapio.
Suite A minor, op. 42.....MacDowell
Aria, "Ah perfido".....Beethoven
Mme. De Vere Sapio.
Symphony, No. 5, op. 69.....Beethoven

"Old friends, old wines, old memories." Mr. Paur has the happy knack of realizing two thirds of this proverb; he gives us old friends and old memories, and he loses none of his old and exuberant enthusiasm in introducing them to us. The world may grow older, taste may change; novelties may be abundant; but what better company can one have than Beethoven and Wagner. Fate eloquently tapping on the door and Legend pathetically blowing in a bass tuber? The new æsthetic Hoyle solemnly insists that when a conductor is in doubt he must lead Beethoven. Novelties in music are always ticklish things to deal with; one can never tell if they are classic or if they have the proper educational value and have the unimpeacheable morality which will allow of them being played before our daughters and sweethearts. Even the most exacting of plaguey critics cannot deny that Beethoven's fifth symphony is a most excellent and approved work, and that it deserves from its conductor all the superfluity of energy and excess of perspiration that he gives to present day works when he serves them up. A less careful conductor than Mr. Paur would give his orchestra the credit of knowing something of their Beethoven by this time, and content himself with beating time in a quiet and conventional manner; but Mr. Paur has faith in gesture and energy, and he is as conscientiously gymnastic with the works of the old masters as if they had been written only yesterday. Aside from ts æsthetic worth there is a practical value in this system of treatment, for if the hearer is in danger of neglecting Beethoven, he cannot banish Mr. Paur from his sight or memory. Aside from their reverence for what is old there is another merit in the symphony programmes, and that is, every week they present a problem in the nature of an unanswerable puzzle. Last week the audience amused itself by trying to discover why the theatrical scherzo of Dvorak was tagged on the end of a classical programme, and this week lovers of charades and rebuses lost themselves in the mazes of conjecture, seeking for the link that connected the Flying Dutchman overture with the fifth symphony. Mr. Paur's programmes are always orthodox, but at the same time they have the peculiarity of shocking in some way orthodox taste; they unaccountably suggest the inconsistency of improving the statue of Apollo with a pair of Wellington boots or of affixing Gothic gargoyles to the Parthenon. One regrets these little lapses in taste, for of all the conductors yet vouchsafed to Boston, Mr. Paur is the most able, the most catholic in taste, the most conscientious in execution. The symphony was superbly read, and, of course, superbly played—color, power, finish could go no further.

The MacDowell suite is well worth the rehearing. It is a most artistic and most dainty piece of work; learned without ostentation. It is not the work of an inspired giant who hurls out his ideas in passion, and fashions them while they are white-hot; but it is marked with careful poetic daintiness, super-excellent in taste, and reserved in treatment. There is no wearing of the subject threadbare through over-elaboration. Of all our composers, Mr. MacDowell possesses in the highest degree the gift of knowing when to stop. He is also melodious, a demonstration that he is gifted with ideas, and he does not beat the gold of his imagination too thin, nor rigidly compress it into one unyielding form. The suite is a most charming work, one of several of a composer who in imagination and fertility of ideas holds a very high, if not the highest place in American musical art.

The soloist of the evening did not interfere with Mr. Paur's intentions by adding anything new to the programme; both her contributions are only too well known to concert goers and those gave an opportunity for comparison that did not tell always in favor of the soloist. Mme. De Vere Sapio was most effective in Hamlet selection the Beethoven Scena and aria being, seemingly beyond her power. She sings always like an artist, but at times overestimates her endurance and so loses control over her voice at critical moments. In listening to her one feels a sense of effort, the machinery producing singing is more prominent than feeling and interpretative imagination, and when the singer is at her best, one listens unmoved. Mme. De Vere Sapio has a voice of pleasant quality, particularly pleasant in its lower portion, and it may be that such faults as were revealed last evening are due to our treacherous Boston climate and not to lack of skill in the singer, who aroused a large amount of enthusiasm, and was recalled after each song.

The programme for the next concert is: Berlioz, "Harold in Italy;" Tschaikowsky's Symphonic Poem, "Dream Music from Humperdinck's Hansel and Gretel," and Goldmark's Overture, Sakuntala.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, OCT. 27, 1895.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Echoes from Yesterday's Symphony Concert.

"Billie Taylor" to be Sung by the Castle Sq Opera Company.

Kneisel Quartet—Current and Coming Musical Attractions.

The program of last night's symphony concert was varied and enjoyable. It began with Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman." The orchestra played it with remarkable skill, Mr Paur's interpretation elucidating the stormy grandeur characteristic of the composition. It afforded some excellent work for the wind instruments, especially in the working up of the second theme in the main body, while the strings and trombones in holding and developing the themes produced a wonderful effect of triumphant force.

MacDowell's suite in A minor is calculated to test some of the best qualities of the orchestra. The first movement "In a Haunted Forest" is replete with suggestive beauties. The somber nature of the theme and its delicate development is full of poetic charm. The second movement, "Summer Idyl," is full of life and grace. "In October," the third movement, which was played here for the first time last night, is in F major. It is a strange and fascinating little fantasy, extremely effective to the ear, and suggestive to the imagination. The orchestra enhanced the fourth movement, "The Shepherdess' Song," with an additional charm, while the last movement, "The Forest Spirits," afforded the orchestra opportunity to display some excellent work in the production of more delicate effects.

Mme De Vere-Sapio was the soloist of the occasion, and her voice produced an excellent impression on the audience. She sang the mad scene from Ambroise Thomas' "Hamlet" with great effect. Her voice is flexible and clear and capable of expressing the transitions from the lively to the plaintive notes of the scene in which Ophelia tells the merry gathering by the river about her love for Hamlet and his love for her. Mme Vere-Sapio sang the ballad which follows this scene with exquisite grace. Her voice trilled sweetly, and her phrasing was clear and well modulated. At the conclusion of this song she was recalled with continuous and warm applause by an appreciative and attentive audience.

Her rendering of Beethoven's grand concert scene, "Ah, Traitor!" was highly meritorious. Her voice was not as expressive in recitative as in aria; still, she sang those lines with dramatic force and interpreted the aria with striking effect. The orchestra's accompaniment was excellent.

The concert concluded with Beethoven's symphony No. 5, in C minor, which Mr Paur's interpretation made interesting, even in the elaborate grandeur of the third movement. The orchestra was in splendid form, and the audience was large and appreciative.

The program of the next concert will be as follows: Symphony, "Harold in Italy," Berlioz, viola solo by Mr Franz Kneisel; symphonic poem, "Francesca," Tschaikowsky; "Dream music," from the opera "Hansel and Gretel," Humperdinck; overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark.

—Every available inch of room in Music hall was filled at the Friday afternoon symphony rehearsal, and the concert was very interesting. Mme de Vere-Sapio was the soloist, and wore an afternoon toilet of black, with corsage of revers of cream chiffon, and a black hat, with black ostrich tips. Her singing was enthusiastically received.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL
A PAPER OF TO-DAY
SATURDAY, OCT. 26, 1895.

THE musical season of Boston has received its formal opening. With the Symphony concert of last week the musical chrysalis became a butterfly. To be be sure it is as yet a butterfly of neutral tints and tender wings, but still a butterfly. Of course the Symphony concert was a brilliant success, every one and her grandmother being there, and of course Emil Paur, its conductor, was received with just as much cordiality and enthusiasm as if every one and her grandmother, aided and abetted by the critics, adored him unspeakably, instead of finding fault with everything from his choice of programme and soloists and his readings of the selections making up the aforementioned programmes down to the way he cuts his beard and dresses his children. It goes without saying that Adonis Adamowski's recovery from his severe attack of Melbaitis and consequent return to the orchestral fold caused many cardiac palpitations among the matinee girls.

[27]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 27, 1895.

MUSIC

THE SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Paur began his second concert with the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," which, like the opera to which it is prefixed, makes people who are fond of real music wonder why Wagner left off, entirely writing in that vein and wandered away into the wearisome and wearing pages that are so frequent in his subsequent scores. At the end of the programme stood Beethoven's fifth symphony, and midway was placed that woodland suite by Mr. E. A. MacDowell which has been already heard with approbation and delight in these concerts. It is a work which maintains itself honorably, even when heard between two such compositions as inclosed it on this occasion. Mr. MacDowell's talent is peculiarly interesting, for it treats easily and strongly very different phases of musical expression, as in this suite, where the trickey, scurrying, sudden, expeditious traits of spirits and fairies, flashing off into space with a keen dart, are contrasted with the rich depth which portrays the fulness of autumnal life and the bland shepherdess songs which melt away into silence. Melody of fine and original moulding prevails, and yet the orchestration is large, firm and ample in its recognition of the many voiced disposition of the time. A new movement, entitled "In October," was played for the first time, and proved to be a genial allegro with a softer and more pensive second part. The performance of these things was altogether fine, the orchestra yielding no less responsively to the requirements of fancy than to these of energy; the overture was remarkably ready and true in its changeful moods, the mysterious movements of the suite were thoroughly picturesque, and the symphony was conservatively and nobly read. And the drummer really played with care, taste and reserve.

Mrs. Clementine De Vere Sapio, whom we do not remember to have heard in these concerts, was the soloist, and upheld well the reputation she has enjoyed for some years of being in the very first rank of the singers resident in this country. She respected the dignity and responsibility of her opportunity by choosing the great scene "Ah! Perfido," from Beethoven's "Fidelio," and the "Mad" scene of Ophelia in the "Hamlet" of Ambroise Thomas. Each suited technically her far-reaching, beautiful and resonant voice, the upper register of which, so brilliant, strong, searching, clear and agreeable, is easily equal to the constant demands made by these soaring airs, while the honesty, faithfulness and genuineness of her method are competent for coping with their difficulties of execution. She seems to have quite equalized her scale, which was inclined to reediness in its lower tones, and to have gained in warmth and variety of dramatic expression. She sang unaffectedly and earnestly, and evidently gave great satisfaction to her audience, deserving entirely the liberal applause which recalled her after each scene.

The next programme will begin with the "Harold in Italy" symphony of Berlioz, Mr. Kneisel playing the viola obbligato, and will end with Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture. Between these will be placed two novelties—Tschaikowsky's symphonic poem "Francesco" and the "Dream-Music," from Humperdinck's much discussed opera, "Hansel and Gretel."

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

MUSIC HALL: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the second symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Wagner: Overture to "Der fliegende Holländer," in D minor.
Beethoven: Scena and Aria, "Ah! perfido," opus 65.
MacDowell: Suite in A minor, opus 42.
Thomas: Ophélie's Mad-Scene, from "Hamlet."
Beethoven: Symphony No. 5, in C minor, opus 67.
Mme. DeVere-Sapio was the singer.

Wagner's romantic and effective overture was very brilliantly played; with all due regard for effects of light and shade, and at the same time with fine dash and vigor. It would not be an uninteresting experiment, some day, to play this overture in its original shape, as it was before Wagner had made his later additions to the Coda,—if a copy of the original score is obtainable. No doubt the later additions are, in one way, an improvement; they have undeniably great beauty. But, in another way, they have the same drawback as the "Paris" version of the scene between Tannhäuser and Venus in the first act of "Tannhäuser"; their whole style contrasts too sharply with that of the rest of the work; you find the Wagner of "Der fliegende Holländer" and "Tannhäuser" suddenly transformed into the Wagner of "Tristan" and the "Nibelungen," and without any intermediate connecting link between the two.

This is the second time Mr. MacDowell's suite has been given here; the first was, if we mistake not, in the season of 1890-91. The work shows the composer, perhaps more clearly and unmistakably than anything else we know of his, as a consummate virtuoso of the orchestra. We can call to mind nothing by the greatest French or German masters of instrumentation—not even by Berlioz nor Wagner — that shows more genuine imaginativeness in the matter of orchestral coloring; and, saving a few passages of boisterous fortissimo—which savor a little too strongly of the old Meyerbeer tintamarre—the scoring is eminently distinguished and elegant. The work, too, shows a quite distinct individuality; to be sure, you can put your finger upon occasional passages, and say that this smacks of Raff, and that of Berlioz, and so on; but such passages speak more of sympathy of point of view than of imitation or reminiscence; what might once have been Raff or Berlioz has become unmistakably and indefeasibly MacDowell, and bears his private seal-mark. We have said that this suite of Mr. MacDowell's shows distinct individuality; indeed, well-nigh all his compositions show that. And we find this individuality essentially genial and sympathetic; bright, imaginative, distinguished and entirely sincere; the composer never for a moment seems to be merely showing off, nor posing before a mirror. Yet, with all this, we cannot but find Mr. MacDowell's musical individuality exceedingly puzzling and hard to understand; perhaps we should rather have called it attractive than sympathetic, for with the uncomprehended one can have but little real sympathy. We have never before met with a talent so evident and convincing as Mr. MacDowell's, with which it was so difficult, so apparently impossible, for us to sympathize in the matter of general artistic point of view. We own to not understanding this suite of his in the least. It makes us feel very old and narrow, something as Colonel Newcome must have felt in face of Clive's enthusiasm for the young Tennyson—who seemed so different from and irreconcilable with Scott! We feel, in listening to this suite, as if the world of music were slipping from our grasp, as if the art were already walking with very firm step on ground too slippery for us to stand on, and going whither we cannot follow it. Were we not circumspect, we should be in danger of putting ourselves in the ridiculous position of the academic critics who stultified themselves by calling Beethoven nonsense. This, however, we shall by no means do. Very possibly, if we were to ask Mr. MacDowell what this suite of his means, and he were able to tell us, we might open our eyes in astonishment, and cry out, "Is that all!" It may be, in the end, nothing more than a difference of artistic point of view that stands as an opaque wall between Mr. MacDowell and us. Such differences of point of view often play sad havoc with artistic appreciation. For instance, all that sublime energy of feeling which makes English poetry so great to us seems to the French of little artistic account, when divorced from logic and complete elegance of diction; just in the same way, the irrefragable logic and rhetorical perfection of classic French poetry do not seem to us Anglo-Saxons to atone for its lack of vital energy and ideality. Let us comfort ourselves as best we may by being able to feel that Mr. MacDowell really does say something in his music, that it is not mere idle chatter; and this we do feel very strongly. Only, what this something is we cannot yet, for the life of us, make out! The suite, as far as we could judge, was admirably, beautifully, superbly played.

The great C minor symphony was, upon the whole, grandly given; there were points in the rendering with which we could not agree, but that is not a matter of much importance. We liked the playing of the slow movement best, and, next to that, the way the great Finale was given—by the way, in this last movement, the piccolo-flute made some very brilliant effects not written by Beethoven.

Mme. DeVere-Sapio shines as a singer by her sweet and brilliant soprano sfogato and her superbly developed technique. What detracts from the effectiveness of her singing is her apparent inability to appreciate the character of a musical phrase; she seems to take a phrase as a mere succession of notes, not held together by any internal musical organism. To us, it is her unintelligent phrasing far more than any lack of emotional force or dramatic power that makes her performance ineffective; for she sings neither coldly nor undramatically.

The next programme is: Berlioz, symphony No. 2, "Harold en Italie," opus 16 (viola solo by Mr. Franz Kneisel); Tschaikowsky, symphonic poem, "Francesca da Rimini," opus 32 (first time); Humperdinck, dream-music from "Hansel and Gretel" (first time); Goldmark, overture to "Sakuntala," opus 18.

SUNDAY, [illegible] 1895.

MUSIC HALL: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fourth Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall, last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Richard Strauss: Preludes to acts i. and ii. of "Guntram," opus 25. (First time.)
Raff: Concerto for the pianoforte, in C minor, opus 185.
Mozart: Symphony No. 39, in D major, "Parisian" (Köchel, No. 297).
Beethoven: Overture, "Die Weihe des Hauses," opus 124.
Mr. Carl Faelten was the pianist.

After Tschaikowsky, what? Echo answers: Richard Strauss! When the opera "Guntram" had been brought out with no ordinary success at the Tonkünstler-Fest at Weimar, in 1894, one of the German newspapers spoke of the composer as "travelling for the most part in the paths of Wagner and Liszt," and urged this as an additional reason why it was eminently proper for the Munich Court Opera to obtain the score—Strauss having been a pupil at the Music School in Munich (our own Horatio W. Parker was a pupil there at the same time, by the way), and Munich being the home of homes of the Wagnerian music-drama. The opera was accordingly given there on April 20, 1895; at least, it was billed for that night, and, for all we know, really given then.

As far as we can judge from a single hearing, the prelude to the first act travels unmistakably in Wagnerian paths. This is worth noting; for, of all the various modern compositions that have been called more or less "Wagnerian," this one is the first we have heard that seems really to deserve the epithet: it is the first really and essentially Wagnerian thing we have heard, outside of the Bayreuth master's own works. It is Wagnerian in conception, style, harmony and orchestration; and in this respect it is singularly noteworthy. Assuming, for the moment, that Strauss really set out to follow Wagner in his treatment of the orchestra, one finds that he has done so more intelligently, and with a somewhat deeper and more penetrating glance into that great master's manner, than any other composer who has tried it before him. He shows that he well appreciates the not too commonly recognized fact that, apart from certain characteristic effects of purely homophonic tone-coloring—like the glowing of the Rhine-Gold, or the Rainbow-music in "Das Rheingold"—the peculiar coloring of Wagner's phraseology that reveals the real Strauss orchestration does not depend wholly upon a particular method of treating the various instruments as such, but very largely upon the essentially polyphonic character of his writing. After the rich homophonic exordium of this prelude, Strauss falls into an essentially Wagnerian polyphonic style; and this is what makes his orchestration sound so truly and unmistakably "Wagnerian." The trouble is, though, that, in thus launching out into the Wagnerian style, Strauss cannot quite keep it up; you feel that it is, after all, an assumed dialect with him, and that he does not speak it quite as to the manner born. Every now and then there comes a turn of melodic phraseology that reveals the rael Strauss himself; it reminds you of the resplendent Irish super who was once cast for the French Herald in "King John," and upset the gravity of the audience by spouting:

"You men of Angiers, open wide your gates,
And let young Arthur, Duke of Bretagne—
threwgh!"

In the midst of his pompous Wagnerian style, he every now and then makes a "slump" into his own musical diction; and the effect is mainly comic! Still it must be admitted that there is no little beauty, especially beauty of color, in this first prelude.

But the prelude to the second act! Ah! here is where Tschaikowsky comes in; and "Tschaikowsky" in the sense implied by Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, when he once said: "Tschaikowsky is a composer for whose works I have a holy—respect!" A good many years ago, an irreverent German critic once wrote about something of Wagner's: "Wenn die Musik stinken könnte, würde sie ungefähr so riechen (If music could st-nk, it would smell about so);" this prelude to the second act of Strauss's "Guntram" brought this irresistibly up before our mind! Anything so unreservedly horrible we have never heard before!

Raff's pianoforte concerto has not been heard here for a good many years, if we mistake not. Raff dedicated it to Bülow—probably out of gratitude for the latter's playing his "Ode au Printemps," opus 76, in earlier days—and Bülow took it triumphantly the rounds of European concert-halls. At one time it almost bid fair to become one of the great concertos in the repertory; but, now that it comes back to us after a longish absence, how terribly old, withered and weak in the knees it seems! The very Klaviersatz seems as of a by-gone age. We doubt if even old Moscheles's G minor concerto would not sound newer and fresher today. One almost feels as if all that is still left of Raff's once fascinating freshness and vigor is to be found in the "Im Walde" symphony; we doubt if even the "Lenore" is destined to last much longer. And this C minor concerto cannot be said to belong to that once noble army of compositions which can say: "Fuimus Troes!" Once a Trojan, always a Trojan; this one can only have been a sham-Trojan. Mr. Faelten played it admirably, with sincere truth and feeling, musicianly judgment, and brilliancy. But the work is a corpse, no longer to be revived.

After Strauss's pompous Wagnerianism and noisy Billingsgate, and Raff's debility, Mozart stepped in young, fresh, blooming and strong as on Corpus Christi day over a hundred years ago. The "Parisian" symphony is by no means one of his greatest works; it has dash and brilliancy, but little genuine depth; the terrible persistency with which it adheres to tonic and dominant becomes a trifle monotonous after a while; with anyone but Mozart it would have been trivial. But the work is full to the brim of true genius; it has the authority, the sustained power, the royal ease, and also the continual [illegible] resource of genius.

[illegible] third part of the first movement there is one modulation from D major to E minor (thence through E major to A major) that scales the very topmost heights of Parnassus, and makes all the Muses shout for joy! Neither Handel nor Beethoven could have done it more grandly.

Beethoven's "Weihe des Hauses" overture is another work that has eternal life in it. What an all-absorbing genius his was! Here he takes a thoroughly Handelian figure for his theme, and works it out quite in the Handel manner; in free, continuous contrapuntal development, without a hint at the sonata-form (his own best stamping ground); and yet the whole piece, theme, development, and all, seems all his own, all Beethoven and nothing but Beethoven! It is like when—in some of his quartets and symphonies—he takes a Russian, Magyar, or Croatian theme; there is the theme, note for note; but neither Russia, Hungary, nor Croatia would recognize its own child; the theme has gone through Beethoven's crucible, and has come out Bethoven's and nobody else's.

Upon the whole, the concert gave one a brilliant picture of the transient and the eternal in immediate juxtaposition. There was the Mozart symphony and the Beethoven overture, absolutely unscarred by time, seeming stronger and fresher than ever; they might almost say, as one of the company on the Defender said last summer: "Why! we've only just begun to start!" Then there was the diaphanous spectre of the Raff concerto, with the stars dimly twinkling through it, the ghost of "gigmanity dis-gigged;" and the two Strauss preludes, just rubbing their eyes on the threshold of existence and waiting for the oracle to speak. What will the Delphic sibyl say to these? Probably some "Aio te, Aeacide, Romanos vincere posse;" the faint echo of which may, however, sound to some ears very like "You be d——d!"

The next programme (for Friday afternoon, Nov. 22, and Saturday evening, Nov. 23) is: Weber, overture to "Oberon;" Wagner, Brünnhilde's dying speech from Götterdämmerung;" Mendelssohn, symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch," opus 56; songs; Brahms, tragic overture, opus 81. Miss Marie Brema will be the singer. There will be no symphony concert this week.

[28]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 27, 1895.

MUSIC

THE SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Paur began his second concert with the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," which, like the opera to which it is prefixed, makes people who are fond of real music wonder why Wagner left off, entirely writing in that vein and wandered away into the wearisome and wearing pages that are so frequent in his subsequent scores. At the end of the programme stood Beethoven's fifth symphony, and midway was placed that woodland suite by Mr. E. A. MacDowell which has been already heard with approbation and delight in these concerts. It is a work which maintains itself honorably, even when heard between two such compositions as inclosed it on this occasion. Mr. MacDowell's talent is peculiarly interesting, for it treats easily and strongly very different phases of musical expression, as in this suite, where the trickey, scurrying, sudden, expeditious traits of sprites and fairies, flashing off into space with a keen dart, are contrasted with the rich depth which portrays the fulness of autumnal life and the bland shepherdess songs which melt away into silence. Melody of fine and original moulding prevails, and yet the orchestration is large, firm and ample in its recognition of the many voiced disposition of the time. A new movement, entitled "In October," was played for the first time, and proved to be a genial allegro with a softer and more pensive second part. The performance of these things was altogether fine, the orchestra yielding no less responsively to the requirements of fancy than to these of energy; the overture was remarkably ready and true in its changeful moods, the mysterious movements of the suite were thoroughly picturesque, and the symphony was conservatively and nobly read. And the drummer really played with care, taste and reserve.

Mrs. Clementine De Vere Sapio, whom we do not remember to have heard in these concerts, was the soloist, and upheld well the reputation she has enjoyed for some years of being in the very first rank of the singers resident in this country. She respected the dignity and responsibility of her opportunity by choosing the great scene "Ah! Perfido," from Beethoven's "Fidelio," and the "Mad" scene of Ophelia in the "Hamlet" of Ambroise Thomas. Each suited technically her far-reaching, beautiful and resonant voice, the upper register of which, so brilliant, strong, searching, clear and agreeable, is easily equal to the constant demands made by these soaring airs, while the honesty, faithfulness and genuineness of her method are competent for coping with their difficulties of execution. She seems to have quite equalized her scale, which was inclined to reediness in its lower tones, and to have gained in warmth and variety of dramatic expression. She sang unaffectedly and earnestly, and evidently gave great satisfaction to her audience, deserving entirely the liberal applause which recalled her after each scene.

The next programme will begin with the "Harold in Italy" symphony of Berlioz, Mr. Kneisel playing the viola obbligato, and will end with Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture. Between these will be placed two novelties—Tschaikowsky's symphonic poem "Francesco" and the "Dream-Music," from Humperdinck's much discussed opera, "Hansel and Gretel."

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, OCTOBER 28, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the second symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Wagner: Overture to "Der fliegende Holländer," in D minor.
Beethoven: Scena and Aria, "Ah! perfido," opus 65.
MacDowell: Suite in A minor, opus 42.
Thomas: Ophélie's Mad-Scene, from "Hamlet."
Beethoven: Symphony No. 5, in C minor, opus 67.
Mme. DeVere-Sapio was the singer.

Wagner's romantic and effective overture was very brilliantly played; with all due regard for effects of light and shade, and at the same time with fine dash and vigor. It would not be an uninteresting experiment, some day, to play this overture in its original shape, as it was before Wagner had made his later additions to the Coda,—if a copy of the original score is obtainable. No doubt the later additions are, in one way, an improvement; they have undeniably great beauty. But, in another way, they have the same drawback as the "Paris" version of the scene between Tannhäuser and Venus in the first act of "Tannhäuser"; their whole style contrasts too sharply with that of the rest of the work; you find the Wagner of "Der fliegende Holländer" and "Tannhäuser" suddenly transformed into the Wagner of "Tristan" and the "Nibelungen," and without any intermediate connecting link between the two.

This is the second time Mr. MacDowell's suite has been given here; the first was, if we mistake not, in the season of 1890-91. The work shows the composer, perhaps more clearly and unmistakably than anything else we know of his, as a consummate virtuoso of the orchestra. We can call to mind nothing by the greatest French or German masters of instrumentation—not even by Berlioz nor Wagner — that shows more genuine imaginativeness in the matter of orchestral coloring; and, saving a few passages of boisterous fortissimo—which savor a little too strongly of the old Meyerbeer tintamarre—the scoring is eminently distinguished and elegant. The work, too, shows a quite distinct individuality; to be sure, you can put your finger upon occasional passages, and say that this smacks of Raff, and that of Berlioz, and so on; but such passages speak more of sympathy of point of view than of imitation or reminiscence; what might once have been Raff or Berlioz has become unmistakably and indefeasibly MacDowell, and bears his private seal-mark. We have said that this suite of Mr. MacDowell's shows distinct individuality; indeed, well-nigh all his compositions show that. And we find this individuality essentially genial and sympathetic; bright, imaginative, distinguished and entirely sincere; the composer never for a moment seems to be merely showing off, nor posing before a mirror. Yet, with all this, we cannot but find Mr. MacDowell's musical individuality exceedingly puzzling and hard to understand; perhaps we should rather have called it attractive than sympathetic, for with the uncomprehended one can have but little real sympathy. We have never before met with a talent so evident and convincing as Mr. MacDowell's, with which it was so difficult, so apparently impossible, for us to sympathize in the matter of general artistic point of view. We own to not understanding this suite of his in the least. It makes us feel very old and narrow, something as Colonel Newcome must have felt in face of Clive's enthusiasm for the young Tennyson—who seemed so different from and irreconcilable with Scott! We feel, in listening to this suite, as if the world of music were slipping from our grasp, as if the art were already walking with very firm step on ground too slippery for us to stand on, and going whither we cannot follow it. Were we not circumspect, we should be in danger of putting ourselves in the ridiculous position of the academic critics who stultified themselves by calling Beethoven nonsense. This, however, we shall by no means do. Very possibly, if we were to ask Mr. MacDowell what this suite of his means, and he were able to tell us, we might open our eyes in astonishment, and cry out, "Is that all!" It may be, in the end, nothing more than a difference of artistic point of view that stands as an opaque wall between Mr. MacDowell and us. Such differences of point of view often play sad havoc with artistic appreciation. For instance, all that sublime energy of feeling which makes English poetry so great to us seems to the French of little artistic account, when divorced from logic and complete elegance of diction; just in the same way, the irrefragable logic and rhetorical perfection of classic French poetry do not seem to us Anglo-Saxons to atone for its lack of vital energy and ideality. Let us comfort ourselves as best we may by being able to feel that Mr. MacDowell really does say something in his music, that it is not mere idle chatter; and this we do feel very strongly. Only, what this something is we cannot yet, for the life of us, make out! The suite, as far as we could judge, was admirably, beautifully, superbly played.

The great C minor symphony was, upon the whole, grandly given; there were points in the rendering with which we could not agree, but that is not a matter of much importance. We liked the playing of the slow movement best, and, next to that, the way the great Finale was given—by the way, in this last movement, the piccolo-flute made some very brilliant effects not written by Beethoven.

Mme. DeVere-Sapio shines as a singer by her sweet and brilliant soprano sfogato and her superbly developed technique. What detracts from the effectiveness of her singing is her apparent inability to appreciate the character of a musical phrase; she seems to take a phrase as a mere succession of notes, not held together by any internal musical organism. To us, it is her unintelligent phrasing far more than any lack of emotional force or dramatic power that makes her performance ineffective; for she sings neither coldly nor undramatically.

The next programme is: Berlioz, symphony No. 2, "Harold en Italie," opus 16 (viola solo by Mr. Franz Kneisel); Tschaikowsky, symphonic poem, "Francesca da Rimini," opus 32 (first time); Humperdinck, dream-music from "Hänsel und Gretel" (first time); Goldmark, overture to "Sakuntala," opus 13.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fourth Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall, last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Richard Strauss: Preludes to acts i. and ii. of "Guntram," opus 25. (First time.)
Raff: Concerto for the pianoforte, in C minor, opus 185.
Mozart: Symphony No. 39, in D major, "Parisian" (Köchel, No. 297).
Beethoven: Overture, "Die Weihe des Hauses," opus 124.
Mr. Carl Faelten was the pianist.

After Tschaikowsky, what? Echo answers: Richard Strauss! When the opera "Guntram" had been brought out with no ordinary success at the Tonkünstler-Fest at Weimar, in 1894, one of the German newspapers spoke of the composer as "travelling for the most part in the paths of Wagner and Liszt," and urged this as an additional reason why it was eminently proper for the Munich Court Opera to obtain the score—Strauss having been a pupil at the Music School in Munich (our own Horatio W. Parker was a pupil there at the same time, by the way), and Munich being the home of homes of the Wagnerian music-drama. The opera was accordingly given there on April 20, 1895; at least, it was billed for that night, and, for all we know, really given then.

As far as we can judge from a single hearing, the prelude to the first act travels unmistakably in Wagnerian paths. This is worth noting; for, of all the various modern compositions that have been called more or less "Wagnerian," this one is the first we have heard that seems really to deserve the epithet: it is the first really and essentially Wagnerian thing we have heard, outside of the Bayreuth master's own works. It is Wagnerian in conception, style, harmony and orchestration; and in this respect it is singularly noteworthy. Assuming, for the moment, that Strauss really set out to follow Wagner in his treatment of the orchestra, one finds that he has done so more intelligently, and with a somewhat deeper and more penetrating glance into that great master's manner, than any other composer who has tried it before him. He shows that he well appreciates the not too commonly recognized fact that, apart from certain characteristic effects of purely homophonic tone-coloring—like the glowing of the Rhine-Gold, or the Rainbow-music in "Das Rheingold"—the peculiar coloring of Wagner's phraseology that reveals the real Strauss orchestration does not depend wholly upon a particular method of treating the various instruments as such, but very largely upon the essentially polyphonic character of his writing. After the rich homophonic exordium of this prelude, Strauss falls into an essentially Wagnerian polyphonic style; and this is what makes his orchestration sound so truly and unmistakably "Wagnerian." The trouble is, though, that, in thus launching out into the Wagnerian style, Strauss cannot quite keep it up; you feel that it is, after all, an assumed dialect with him, and that he does not speak it quite as to the manner born. Every now and then there comes a turn of melodic phraseology that reveals the rael Strauss himself; it reminds you of the resplendent Irish super who was once cast for the French Herald in "King John," and upset the gravity of the audience by spouting:

"You men of Angiers, open wide your gates,
And let young Arthur, Duke of Bretagne—
threwgh!"

In the midst of his pompous Wagnerian style, he every now and then makes a "slump" into his own musical diction; and the effect is mainly comic! Still it must be admitted that there is no little beauty, especially beauty of color, in this first prelude.

But the prelude to the second act! Ah! here is where Tschaikowsky comes in; and "Tschaikowsky" in the sense implied by Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, when he once said: "Tschaikowsky is a composer for whose works I have a holy—respect!" A good many years ago, an irreverent German critic once wrote about something of Wagner's: "Wenn die Musik stinken könnte, würde sie ungefähr so riechen (If music could st-nk, it would smell about so);" this prelude to the second act of Strauss's "Guntram" brought this irresistibly up before our mind! Anything so unreservedly horrible we have never heard before!

Raff's pianoforte concerto has not been heard here for a good many years, if we mistake not. Raff dedicated it to Bülow—probably out of gratitude for the latter's playing his "Ode au Printemps," opus 76, in earlier days—and Bülow took it triumphantly the rounds of European concert-halls. At one time it almost bid fair to become one of the great concertos in the repertory; but, now that it comes back to us after a longish absence, how terribly old, withered and weak in the knees it seems! The very Klaviersatz seems as of a by-gone age. We doubt if even old Moscheles's G minor concerto would not sound newer and fresher today. One almost feels as if all that is still left of Raff's once fascinating freshness and vigor is to be found in the "Im Walde" symphony; we doubt if even the "Lenore" is destined to last much longer. And this C minor concerto cannot be said to belong to that once noble army of compositions which can say: "Fuimus Troes!" Once a Trojan, always a Trojan; this one can only have been a sham-Trojan. Mr. Faelten played it admirably, with sincere truth and feeling, musicianly judgment, and brilliancy. But the work is a corpse, no longer to be revived.

After Strauss's pompous Wagnerianism and noisy Billingsgate, and Raff's debility, Mozart stepped in young, fresh, blooming and strong as on Corpus Christi day over a hundred years ago. The "Parisian" symphony is by no means one of his greatest works; it has dash and brilliancy, but little genuine depth; the terrible persistency with which it adheres to tonic and dominant becomes a trifle monotonous after a while; with anyone but Mozart it would have been trivial. But the work is full to the brim of true genius; it has the authority, the sustained power, the royal ease, and also the continual fertility of resource of genius. And, for the matter of modulation, when the man does, once in a while, modulate, what an enormous effect he makes! In the third part of the first movement there is one modluation from D major to E minor (thence through E major to A major) that scales the very topmost heights of Parnassus, and makes all the Muses shout for joy! Neither Handel nor Beethoven could have done it more grandly.

Beethoven's "Weihe des Hauses" overture is another work that has eternal life in it. What an all-absorbing genius his was! Here he takes a thoroughly Handelian figure for his theme, and works it out quite in the Handel manner; in free, continuous contrapuntal development, without a hint at the sonata-form (his own best stamping ground); and yet the whole piece, theme, development, and all, seems all his own, all Beethoven and nothing but Beethoven! It is like when—in some of his quartets and symphonies—he takes a Russian, Magyar, or Croatian theme; there is the theme, note for note; but neither Russia, Hungary, nor Croatia would recognize its own child; the theme has gone through Beethoven's crucible, and has come out Bethoven's and nobody else's.

Upon the whole, the concert gave one a brilliant picture of the transient and the eternal in immediate juxtaposition. There was the Mozart symphony and the Beethoven overture, absolutely unscarred by time, seeming stronger and fresher than ever; they might almost say, as one of the company on the Defender said last summer: "Why! we 've only just begun to start!" Then there was the diaphanous spectre of the Raff concerto, with the stars dimly twinkling through it, the ghost of "gigmanity dis-gigged;" and the two Strauss preludes, just rubbing their eyes on the threshold of existence and waiting for the oracle to speak. What will the Delphic sibyl say to these? Probably some "Aio te, Aeacide, Romanos vincere posse;" the faint echo of which may, however, sound to some ears very like "You be d——d!"

The next programme (for Friday afternoon, Nov. 22, and Saturday evening, Nov. 23) is: Weber, overture to "Oberon;" Wagner, Brünnhilde's dying speech from Götterdämmerung;" Mendelssohn, symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch," opus 56; songs; Brahms, tragic overture, opus 81. Miss Marie Brema will be the singer. There will be no symphony concert this week.

---

[28]

THE NEW-YORK TIMES.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 27,

New-York is especially favored by the visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and a few words about the career of this admirable organiation may not prove amiss at the opening of its tenth season in this city.

In 1881 a music-loving citizen of Boston, actuated solely by a desire to present good music in the best way, and fortunately possessed of means ample to carry out his most commendable impulse, conceived the idea of establishing a large permanent orchestra, which should give each year an extended series of concerts in Music Hall, Boston, with an occasional visit to the adjacent New-England cities. This idea was at once acted upon, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra began its existence, and what was then a Boston organization has grown to-day to be a National pride—an orchestra second to none in the world, whose name and fame are known in every cultured city on the globe, dependent upon no subsidy from the public exchequer, as is the case in all of the European cities, but rather upon the generous liberality of a music-loving Bostonian.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra had been in existence five years, and was already half way through its sixth season, before it paid its first visit to New-York, on the evening of Monday, Feb. 14, 1887. A total of forty-two concerts has been given here—fifteen in Steinway Hall, fifteen in Chickering Hall, five in the Carnegie Music Hall, five in the Metropolitan Opera House in regular series, with two extra concerts, one on the evening of Sunday, March 27, 1892, at the Metropolitan Opera House, given jointly with Paderewski in aid of the Washington Arch Fund, and the second at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall on the evening of Monday, May 2, of the same year, when d'Albert was the soloist.

The programme of the first concert at Steinway Hall was as follows:

Overture, "Oberon".....C. M. von Weber
Concerto for violin.....L. von Beethoven
Mr. Franz Kneisel.
Largo.....G. F. Haendel
Symphony in C minor, No. 5, Opus 67.....L. von Beethoven

Of the forty-two concerts mentioned, eleven were given under the leadership of Wilhelm Gericke, twenty-one under Nikisch, and ten under the leadership of the present conductor, Mr. Emil Paur.

Mr. Georg Henschel was the first conductor of the orchestra, and retained this position for three years, and on his retirement, in 1885, went to London, where he met with his usual success as a composer and teacher, and in a few years assumed the leadership of a large orchestra there, giving twelve concerts each year in St. James's Hall.

Mr. Henschel's successor was Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who came from Vienna, and to this second leader can be attributed much of the wonderful precision and finish of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. After five years of untiring zeal and persistent striving for absolute perfection of ensemble, during which time he spared neither the orchestra nor himself, Mr. Gericke returned to Vienna, leaving behind him the stamp of a skill so marvelous that it cannot be effaced. It was indeed a gracious compliment to Mr. Gericke that on his arrival in Vienna he at once assumed the leadership of the Gesellschaft Musikfreund, a society not unlike the Händel and Haydn Society in Boston, the orchestra, however, playing a much more important part. The above society having offered its leadership to Mr. Gericke just as he was leaving Vienna for America said it would keep the offer open to him until he should return, and it kept its word. Mr. Gericke retained this position until last season, a period of six years, and is at present resting on his well-deserved laurels.

The third and youngest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was Arthur Nikisch, a Hungarian, leader of the orchestra at the Stadt Theatre, at Leipsic, the first opera house in that city. His reign was for four years, a year longer than that of Mr. Henschel, and a year less than Mr. Gericke. One thing the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always done for its conductors—it has given to them a greater renown than was theirs when they assumed control. Henschel, Gericke, and Nikisch must all own that a greater fame attended their return to Europe because of their association with America's first orchestra. Nikisch, on leaving Boston, was appointed Director of the Royal Opera, and also conductor of the orchestra at Buda-Pesth, but has just accepted a more congenial position as the conductor of the Gewandhaus Concerts, in Leipsic, and the Berlin Philharmonic.

When Arthur Nikisch left the Stadt Theatre, in Leipsic, to come to Boston he was succeeded by the same man who followed him as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the present leader, Mr. Emil Paur. It is also worthy of comment that Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur played at the same desk as first violinists under Mr. Gericke at the very same Stadt Theatre several years before. Mr. Paur enters upon his third year with the orchestra this season. The first concert will be given on Nov. 15, at the Metropolitan Opera House.

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

(87 Players.)
MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.
FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.
Friday evening, Nov. 15, and Thursday evenings, Dec. 19, Jan. 23, Feb. 27, and March 26.
Solo Artists: MME. MELBA, MR. BEN DAVIES, MR. T. ADAMOWSKY, AND OTHERS.
The sale of season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, will commence MONDAY, OCT. 28, at Schuberth's, 23 Union Square.
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The Sun.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1895.

BOSTON'S FAMOUS ORCHESTRA.

Its Foundation, Its Achievements, and the Promise for Its Present Season.

In 1881 a music-loving citizen of Boston, actuated only by a desire to present good music in the best way, and fortunately possessed of means to carry out his desire, conceived the idea of a large permanent orchestra which should give each year an extended series of concerts in Music Hall, Boston, and make an occasional visit to the adjacent New England cities. The idea was acted upon, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra thus began its existence. To-day what was then a Boston organization has grown to be a national pride; an orchestra whose name and fame are known in every cultured city in the world, and one dependent upon no subsidy from the public exchequer, as is the case in all of the European cities.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra had been in existence five years, and was already half way through its sixth season, before it paid its first visit to New York, Feb. 14, 1887. Since then forty-two concerts have been given here, fifteen in Steinway Hall, fifteen in Chickering Hall, five in the Carnegie Music Hall, and five in the Metropolitan Opera House, in regular series, and two extra concerts, one on the evening of Sunday, March 27, 1892, at the Metropolitan Opera House, given jointly with Paderewski in aid of the Washington Arch fund, and the second at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall on the evening of Monday, May 2, of the same year, when D'Albert was the soloist.

Of the forty-two concerts, eleven were given under the leadership of Wilhelm Gericke, twenty-one under Nikisch, and ten under the leadership of the present conductor, Mr. Emil Paur.

Mr. Georg Henschel was the first conductor of the orchestra and retained the position for three years. In 1885 he went to London, and in a few years became the leader of a large orchestra there.

Mr. Henschel's successor was Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who came from Vienna, and to this second leader can be attributed much of the wonderful precision and finish of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Five years of untiring zeal and persistent striving for absolute perfection of ensemble, during which time he spared neither the orchestra nor himself, and Mr. Gericke returned to Vienna, leaving behind him the stamp of a skill so marvellous that it cannot be effaced.

The third and youngest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was Arthur Nikisch, a Hungarian, leader of the orchestra at the Stadt Theatre at Leipsic, the first opera house in that city. His leadership continued four years. One thing the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always done for its conductors, it has given to them a greater renown than was theirs when they assumed control. Henschel, Gericke, and Nikisch must all own that a greater fame attended their return to Europe because of their association with America's first orchestra. Nikisch, on leaving Boston, was appointed director of the Royal Opera and also conductor of the orchestra at Budapest, but has just accepted a more congenial position as the conductor of the Gewandhaus Concerts at Leipsic.

When Arthur Nikisch left the Stadt Theatre in Leipsic to come to Boston he was succeeded by the same man who followed him as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the present leader, Mr. Emil Paur. It is also worthy of comment that Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur played at the same desk as first violinists under Mr. Gericke, at the very same Stadt Theatre, several years before. Mr. Paur enters upon his third year with the orchestra this season.

Some of the famous soloists who have appeared with the orchestra in New York are: Lilli Lehmann, Eames, Nordica, Mme. Henschel, Emma Juch, Mme. Nikisch, Wyman, Brema, Edmands, Aus der Ohe, Rivé-King, Suza Doane, Eugenia Castellano, Madge Wickham, Eugen d'Albert, Ignace Paderewski, Rafael Joseffy, Vladimir de Pachmann, F. Busoni, Pol Plancon, Georg Henschel, Max Heinrich, Anton Schott, Paul Kalisch, Watkin Mills, Cesar Thomson, Franz Kneisel, T. Adamowski, Fritz Giese, Anton Hekking, Alwin Schroeder.

This season the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give five concerts in New York, in the Metropolitan Opera House. They will be on the evenings of Nov. 15, Dec. 19, Jan. 23, Feb. 27, and March 26. Some of the soloists already engaged are Mme. Melba, Ben Davies, E. A. MacDowell, and T. Adamowski. The works to be performed during the season comprise the following:

Beethoven.....Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 4
Schumann.....Symphony No. 1, in B flat major
Schubert.....Unfinished Symphony
Tschaikowsky.....Symphony No. 6
(First time.)
Beethoven.....Overture, "Dedication of the House"
Humperdinck.....Overture, "Hänsel und Gretel"
(First time.)
Cornelius.....Overture, "Barber of Bagdad"
Berlioz.....Overture, "Corsair"
(First time.)
Berlioz.....Menuet des Follets" and "Valse des Sylphes'" from "Le Damnation de Faust."
Rezniceck.....Overture, "Donna Diana"
(First time.)
Tschaikowsky.....Variations
Richard Strauss...Prelude and entr'acte, "Guntram"
(First time.)
Zöllner.....Midnight of Sedan"
(First time.)
Wagner.....Kaisermarsch

THE WORLD: SUNDAY OCTOBER 27, 1895.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its tenth annual visit to New York during the coming winter. Its first concert here was given Feb. 14, 1887. Since then forty-two concerts have been given—eleven under Gericke, twenty-one under Nikisch and ten under Paur. The works performed have represented the master pieces of classical music. As soloists every celebrity has appeared. All of the orchestra's leaders have been musicians of note. One curious coincidence is to be noted in this respect. Nikisch and Paur played at the same desk as first violinists at the Leipsic Stadt Theatre when Gericke was its conductor. Five concerts are to be given by this standard orchestra in New York. They will be given at the Metropolitan Opera-House on the evenings of Nov. 15, Dec. 19, Jan. 23, Feb. 27 and March 26. The soloists include Mme. Melba and Miss T. Ladamowski, Ben Davies and E. A. MacDowell. The works to be performed include, in addition to symphonies by Beethoven, Schumanna and Tschaikowsky, novelties by Humperdinck, Rezniceck, Richard Strauss and Heinrich Zoellner.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1895.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Emil Paur, will give five concerts in the Metropolitan Opera House on the evenings of November 15, December 19, January 23, February 27 and March 26. Among the solo artists who are to take part in these concerts are Mme. Melba, Ben Davies, E. A. MacDowell and T. Adamowski. The orchestral works to be performed are Beethoven's third and fourth symphonies, and the overture, "Consecration of the House," Schumann's Symphony in B flat, Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony and the variations from his suite, the prelude to Humperdinck's "Hänsel and Gretel," overture to Cornelius's "Barber of Bagdad," overture, "Corsair," by Berlioz, and the minuet and waltz from the same composer's "Damnation de Faust," an overture, "Donna Diana," by Reznicek; a prelude and entr'acte from Richard Strauss's "Guntram"; "Midnight of Sedan," by Heinrich Zöllner, and Wagner's "Kaisermarsch." The Boston Orchestra, which was founded by Mr. Higginson in 1881, was halfway through its sixth season before it paid its first visit to New-York. Its first concert here took place in Steinway Hall, on February 14, 1887. Since then the band has given forty-two concerts in New-York—fifteen in Steinway Hall, fifteen in Chickering Hall, five in Carnegie Hall, five in regular series in the Metropolitan Opera House, one concert with Mr. Paderewski in the same place for the benefit of the Washington Arch Fund, and one with Mr. D'Albert in the concert hall of Madison Square Garden. Of these concerts eleven were directed by Wilhelm Gericke, twenty-one by Arthur Nikisch, and ten by Emil Paur. Mr. Henschel, who was the orchestra's first conductor, from 1881 to 1885, did not have the privilege of conducting here. His successor was Mr. Gericke, who came from Vienna, and to whom much of the finish and precision of the orchestra's playing is due. After five years of untiring zeal and persistent striving for absolute perfection of ensemble, during which time he spared neither the orchestra nor himself, Mr. Gericke returned to Vienna, leaving behind him the stamp of a skill so marvellous that it cannot be effaced. It was, indeed, a gracious compliment to Mr. Gericke that on his arrival in Vienna he at once assumed the leadership of the Geselschaft der Musikfreunde, a society not unlike the Handel and Haydn Society in Boston, the orchestra, however, playing a much more important part. The above society having offered its leadership to Mr. Gericke just as he was leaving Vienna for America, promised to keep the offer open to him until he should return, and kept its word. Mr. Gericke retained this position until last season, a period of six years, and is at present resting on his well-deserved laurels. The third and youngest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was Arthur Nikisch, a Hungarian, leader of the orchestra at the Stadt Theatre at Leipsic. His reign endured four years, a year longer than that of Mr. Henschel and a year less than Mr. Gericke's. When Nikisch left the Stadt Theatre in Leipsic to come to Boston he was succeeded by the same man who followed him as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the present leader, Emil Paur. It is also worthy of comment that Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur played at the same desk as first violinists under Mr. Gericke at the very same Stadt Theatre several years before.

The New York Recorder.

BY GEORGE W. TURNER.

SUNDAY, OCT. 27, 1895.

"FIRST OF ALL—THE NEWS."

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

1895—(87 Players)—1896
MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.
Friday evening Nov. 15, and Thursday evenings, Dec. 19, Jan. 23, Feb 27 and March 26.
Solo Artists: MME. MELBA, MR. BEN DAVIES, MR. T. ADAMOWSKY and others.
The sale of season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, will commence MONDAY, OCT. 28, at Schuberth's, 23 Union Square.
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FIVE CONCERTS.

Thursday evening, Nov. 14; Tuesday evenings, Dec. 17, Jan. 21, Feb. 25, March 24. At 8 o'clock.
Solo artists—Mr. G. Campanari, of Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau's Opera Co.; Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. Ben Davies, and others to be announced.
Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7 and $5, according to location.
The sale of tickets will open Tuesday morning, November 5, at Metzerott's Music Store.
Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The Republican.

SPRINGFIELD, SUNDAY, OCT. 27.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WILL VISIT SPRINGFIELD SOON.

The Kneisel Quartet's Season—Other Matters of Musical Interest.

It is good news for the music-lovers of the city that the full Boston Symphony orchestra has been engaged for a concert December 4 in City hall. It will be an orchestral concert the like of which has not been heard in Springfield for many a year. The Boston orchestra has never been heard here in its full strength, and the only other one of the same rank that has played here is Thomas's, and that has not been here for nearly a decade. The Boston symphony orchestra now disputes with the Chicago organization and the Gewandhaus orchestra, which is taking on new life under Mr. Nikisch's administration, the reputation of being the finest in the world, and it will be heard here in its full force of about 80, capable of rendering any music ever written with its full effect. Opinions differ as to Mr Paur's rank as a conductor, but Boston never has had and never will have a conductor of whom that might not be said. The question of conductors is one that never fails to split the musical world as with a two-edged sword, and to be an adherent of one seems to make it necessary to be an opponent of all the rest. But all agree that the orchestra is doing great work under Mr Paur, and the concert will be as good as it can be made.

The managers wish to have it distinctly understood that the interest of Springfield in good music, as shown by the fine festivals, is fully appreciated, and as fine a program will be given as can be arranged. The program will be given out early, in order that all may know just what there is to look forward to. The soloists have not yet been decided upon, but probably either Marie Bremer or Mme DeVere will sing, this depending somewhat on conditions which cannot yet be fully foreseen. There will also be an instrumental soloist of the first rank, probably Alwin Schroeder, the 'cellist of the Kneisel quartet, who is the finest artist in his line in the country. He played here last May with the Kneisel quartet, but has never appeared in solo work, and everyone would be glad to hear him. If he does not play the choice will probably be Mr Kneisel, whose great abilities as a violinist are well known. It will be in every way a concert of the highest character, and deserves the patronage of every one who is at all interested in music. The only reason why the orchestra has not been heard here before is the great necessary expense of a concert by so large and costly a body of musicians, and it is to be hoped that the result of this courageous experiment will not only reward the promoters, but give encouragement for similar ventures in the future.

The Washington Post.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Music lovers will greet with pleasure the announcement in another column of the series of five concerts to be given in Metzerott Music Hall this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the accomplished leadership of Mr. Emil Paur. The first concert will be given on the night of Thursday evening, November 14, and the dates of the succeeding entertainments being December 17, January 21, February 25, and March 24. Among the soloists already announced are Mr. G. Campanari, who created such a furore here in opera last spring, and whose wonderful barytone voice is said to be richer and more musical than ever; Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. Ben Davies, and others. Reserved seats for the series will be $7 and $5, according to location, and the sale will open Tuesday morning, November 5, at 9 o'clock, at Metzerott's music store.

It is hardly necessary to say anything to the Washington public in praise of this superb orchestra, for it is, beyond doubt, the greatest aggregation of talent in the world to-day. Some idea of the musical feast to be provided by the five concerts this season may be gathered from the following lists of works to be performed:

Beethoven.....Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"
Schubert.....Symphony in C major
Haydn..... Symphony
Brahms.....Symphony No. 2, in D major
Tschaikowsky.....Symphony No. 6
(First time.)
Beethoven.....Overture, "Dedication of the House"
Humperdinck.....Entr'acte, "Hansel and Gretel"
(First time.)
Auber.....Overture, "Carlo Broschi"
(First time.)
Berlioz
"Menuet des Follets" and "Valse des Sylphes," from "La Damnation de Faust"
Rezniceck.....Overture, "Donna Diana"
(First time.)
Delibes.....Suite, "Sylvia"
Haendel..... Largo
Mozart..... Variations
Mozart.....Turkish March
Dvorak..... Capriccio
Richard Strauss.Prelude and Entr'acte, "Guntram"
(First time.)
Wagner..... Kaisermarsch
Wagner.....Ride of the Valkyries"
Johann Strauss...Musical Joke, "Perpetuo Moto"
Haydn..... Variations
Liszt.....Rhapsody No. 2

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1895.

The program of the second Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Overture, Flying Dutchman.....Wagner
Ah! Perfido.....Beethoven
Mrs. de Vere-Sapio.
Suite, A minor, op. 48.....MacDowell
(The third movement In October, first time at these concerts.)
Ophelia's mad scene, Hamlet.....Thomas
Mrs. de Vere-Sapio.
Symphony No. 5.....Beethoven

If I am not mistaken, Mr. MacDowell's suite was first played in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in January, 1892. The suite then consisted of four movements: In a Haunted Forest; Summer Idyl; the Shepherdess's Song; Forest Spirits. Perhaps the second and third movements then suffered from lack of contrast. The introduction of In October, a charming number, with its suggestions of the hunt and the open air and the melancholy that enters into all autumnal sports—animate or inanimate—now provide balance and contrast, if they were really missed before.

After hearing this beautiful, romantic music I went to the Journal office and babbled in superlatives, to use the phrase of an English colleague. Then came cool midnight; then came rigid self-examination over a clay pipe and a pot of beer; and the ghosts of Gushing and Hifalutin held out slippers and candle, saying: "To bed! to bed! We are pleased with you this night!"

The night is over; the ghosts have fled; I find that I did not babble enough in superlatives. But of what avail to speak again of MacDowell's exquisite sense of the one fit and appropriate color, of the suggestion of a nuance, of the bubbling, spontaneous, fresh melody, of the skill that is forgotten in open eared delight. And all these gifts of nature developed by experience and study are used and shared so modestly! There are composers who overwhelm you with the gorgeousness of the tokens of their esteem; and you shrink back, and fear to take them, and little by little you feel suspicious, and you say to yourself, "Why that man never meant to give them to me; he only wanted to show how rich he was." And there are composers who labor till they sweat and then press their vegetables upon you, saying: "See these turnips. I have had much trouble with them; but here they are. What! You don't care for turnips—but you ought to—you must. Jones was over here yesterday and he said he had never seen better turnips. He knows what he is talking about." And some even show vexation because MacDowell does not deal in turnips.

* * *

I wonder if the people of Boston know that a genius lives on Beacon Hill. I don't mean a Boston genius—the Back Bay alone is full of them—but a real genius. I fear not. Mr. MacDowell is too modest. He does not sit on Mr. Paur's doorstep. He is not continually running against Mr. Lang in the street. He has no push cart with yelping dog or clamorous bell. He does not believe that a social club should be used in musical intrigue and self-advancement. He does not belong to any one of the little mutual admiration societies in town, where a half dozen meet and talk about music, each composer chiefly about his own. I never heard of his asking hustling singers to sing his songs. I doubt if he knows how to pull a clerical leg. Furthermore, I do not believe that it ever occurred to Mr. MacDowell that he was the one man divinely appointed to lead the Händel and Haydn, that venerable band of enthusiastic plodders and moilers, through desert wastes of oratorio. "How should I know that Mr. MacDowell is a genius?" cries some noble dame who patronizes musicians who are musicians in a social way. "He never told me that he was!" Ah, madam, listen to his music!

* * *

And the subtle, haunting beauty of MacDowell's suite was not destroyed or effaced by a happy-go-lucky performance. Not that I accuse Mr. Paur of slighting the exquisite pieces; he looked as though he enjoyed them; he nodded his head, and made all manner of signs with his stick, and the performance of course should have been perfect. It was not. It was not in full sympathy with the composer's music. Here is music where nothing can be slighted; for there is no conventional padding. Too often there was logyness where there should have been demoniac fire. Or the simplicity of a melody was stretched in hope to make it "mean something more." As though someone should read a "complainte" of Laforgue as if it were sesquipedalian verse telling of Nero's death or the Indian mutiny. Then add that the performance was not technically above reproach.

I have heard the fifth symphony led by Bilse in his dullest moments. I have heard the andante con moto played in a beer garden on the Elbe, in a garden where a sheet iron landscape with real water excited the admiration of beer drinking men and women as they smoked or knit. Never have I heard such a perfunctory, tedious, unrefined, unimaginative performance of it as that given under Mr. Paur last night. I doubt if the famous three-eighth notes were played twice alike. The melos at the beginning of the first allegro was not to be recognized. The opening theme of the andante con moto was neither piano nor dolce, nor were the same indications observed in the viola and 'cello passages flowing against sustained flute, oboe and bassoon, while violins and double basses are "pizz." For once the third movement, falsely called a scherzo, was heavy as lead. Some may say that Berlioz compared the double bass passages to elephants, &c. Yes, it's an old story. And where, pray, are the warrants for any such idea and corresponding treatment in Beethoven's music? There is a "forte," nothing more. Why should the basses be here torn asunder? But enough. The performance was not technically up to the standard of the orchestra. The interpretation was essentially and hopelessly burgess.

* * *

Mrs. de Vere-Sapio has gained in breadth of style and dramatic delivery. This was shown conclusively in her treatment of the recitative in Ah! Perfido. The air was sung with the authority of the true artist. Anger, denunciation, pathetic entreaty, love that forgives—each emotion, each passion, found her voice its instrument. Her technical proficiency was displayed in the familiar scene from Hamlet. If the brilliancy of her upper tones is not as dazzling as it was a few years ago, her lower tones have gained in body.

How they disagreed in opinion as to the merits of Josephine Duschek, for whom Beethoven wrote Ah! Perfido! Many speak of her full, round voice; her admirable phrasing, especially in recitative; "the glorious rival of any Italian prima donna." Then Leopold Mozart could not endure her "screeching;" her exaggerated "expressions-kraft"; her other failings, "so many that I was sorry such a powerful voice had not been better trained. Who's to blame? Her husband, who knows no better; he taught her, and now says she alone has true taste." Körner said she was a caricature. Leopold Mozart spoke also of her "broad face," and said "she was slovenly dressed." A duke of Weimar compared her to a "maîtresse out of service," in his ineffable, courtly fashion. But Reichardt, no mean judge, liked her singing even in 1808, when she was fifty-two years old.

* * *

Mr. Claudius Deslouis, "of the Paris Conservatoire, and first baritone of the Théâtre des Italiens, Paris," gave a concert under the auspices of the faculty of the Daudelin Music School in Association Hall the 25th. Mr. Deslouis is a gentleman of much experience, who has sung in Paris and neighboring towns, as well as in Australia. I have no doubt that some years ago he was a good all round operatic singer, for now, when his voice is that of middle age, he shows excellent schooling, intelligence and dramatic spirit. He sang Dubois' Deus Meus, airs by Meyerbeer and Mercadante and one of Paddock's airs from La Coupe du Roi de Thulé, by Diaz. Did not Eliot Hubbard sing this last air a few seasons ago? There were two monarchs who were worth meeting. One was Cophetua, of Africa. The other was this King of Thule. The latter, as described by the librettists Gallet and Blau, is far from being the "immaculate one" of Laforgue,

Qui, loin des jupes et des choses,
Pleurait sur la métempsychose
Des lys en roses.

For he died of grief because he could not overcome the indifference of Myrrha, and left his cup to the buffoon Paddock, with the injunction to give it to the most worthy.

Mr. Leon Pourtau played with his surpassing skill and wondrous tone Fantasiestücke for clarinet by Gade, and Mr. Charles Molé astonished an audience already familiar with his brilliancy by the performance of flute pieces by Terschek and Godard. The two were heard in Saint-Saëns' tarantelle for flute and clarinet. Miss Anna M. Stovall played piano pieces by Liszt and Chopin. Mrs. Molé, Dr. Kelterborn and Mrs. C. L. Capen assisted by accompanying.

* * *

The program of the Symphony Concert this week is as follows: Symphony, Harold in Italy, Berlioz (viola solo by Mr. Kneisel); Francesca da Rimini, Tschaikowsky; Dream music from Hänsel and Gretel, Humperdinck; overture, Sakuntala, Goldmark.

There have been changes in the programs since I wrote to you a week ago about the "novelties." Tschaikowsky's Francesca is announced as "first time." This probably means at these concerts, for it was first played here at the Tremont Theatre by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Mr. Bernhard Listemann December 31, 1891.

PHILIP HALE.

The Von Buelow Monument.

Editors The Musical Courier:

I DO not wish to discourage your Berlin correspondent, who in his letter of October 1 to your valuable journal informs "American admirers of the late Hans von Bülow who desire to contribute to the monument fund that he will gladly forward anything sent and acknowledge receipt of same in THE MUSICAL COURIER columns"; but I must tell him that even more of an inducement must be offered or I fear those "admirers" will continue to remain silent.

During her stay in this country the past year the Baroness von Overbeck—one of the most intimate friends and greatest admirers of the dead master—made it her work to try in every way to collect funds for this monument. The committee abroad having the matter in charge made her its agent here, and not a stone did she leave unturned. At her own expense she had printed and sent out almost 1,000 circulars and letters informing these "admirers" of the great work, and asking for even the smallest contribution. The fact was published in THE MUSICAL COURIER—in many other papers. Those who had known the master, many who owed much to him—his pupils, musicians, artists, patrons of music, hundreds were asked to contribute money or talent or interest.

Mr. Higginson was appealed to for his permission to have the Boston Symphony Orchestra give a performance and have the proceeds forwarded as coming from this great American organization; as usual his generosity was equal to the demand and he expressed interest. That great (?) conductor, Mr. Emil Paur, was also appealed to, and as the fact had issued from his own lips that he had been a friend (perhaps a pupil even), owed much anyhow to the master, some effort was expected of him. The matter was finally placed before the members of the orchestra, and, as I learned from a reliable but private source, favorably considered, when who should kill it but the conductor himself; and listen, please, to the narrow, unjust reason given—that it would be impossible to contribute to a fund for a monument to a reproductive artist when so many other greater masters remained unhonored. Unfortunately I have not Mr. Paur's letter near me or I could give it to you in full, but imagine if everything was done in this world by priority perchance Mr. Paur himself would not occupy the position he now does?

So this orchestra for that reason (could it have been only that?) refused to sanction a project that Brahms, Joachim, d'Albert and many other great men have given their aid, talent, names anything to further. The Kneisel Quartet was asked to play, but as their master (Paur) had opposed even the erection of the monument itself they had to decline. Damrosch kindly sent $25, and hoped to be able to give a concert in New York—do something—but he failed, too; however, there the spirit was willing at least. Other artists were appealed to to give their talent, but in all this broad land not a society, not a musical organization, not an individual—except, be it said to her credit, Currie Duke, who was willing and anxious any minute to help in any way—came forward or was even willing to aid. But could you hope for anything from Americans when Germans, artists, musicians, in this country took no interest in the matter?

And how much do you suppose was raised after this year of effort? I blush to tell you—barely $160, and $100 of that was given by the Knabes, and $25, as I have said, by Damrosch! Let us be thankful at least that the dead, generous master is spared the pain of knowing of so much ingratitude, lack of interest and selfishness. A. D. P.

The Philadelphia Press.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The musical prospectus would be incomplete without reference to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as the tenth season in this city will be ushered in by a concert on Monday evening, November 11. The dates of the other four concerts are as follows: December 16, January 20, February 24 and March 23. The tenth season suggests a barking back to the first season, with its small attendance and general listless interest on the part of Philadelphians. But, as we know so well, all that is changed, and now none are too old or too young to pass it by, and in consequence the Academy is often just a little uncomfortably crowded. The programme arranged by Mr. Paur includes the works of the great masters, whose symphonies have been made familiar to Philadelphians by this great organization. The novelties are Tschaikowsky's Sympathy No. 6, Humperdinck's overture to "Hansel and Gretel," Berlioz's overture, "Corsair," Rezniceck's overture, "Donna Diana;" a Godard suite and Richard Strauss' prelude and entr'acte to "Guntram." Among the soloists will be Melba and among the pianists Joseffy. The sale of seats begins next week.

A CONCERT OF MUSIC.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

(60 Performers.)
Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.
Fifteenth Season, 1895-96. Eleventh Season in Philadelphia.

FIVE CONCERTS
MONDAY EVENINGS { NOV. 11. DEC. 16. JAN. 20. FEB. 24. MARCH 23.
At 8 o'clock.

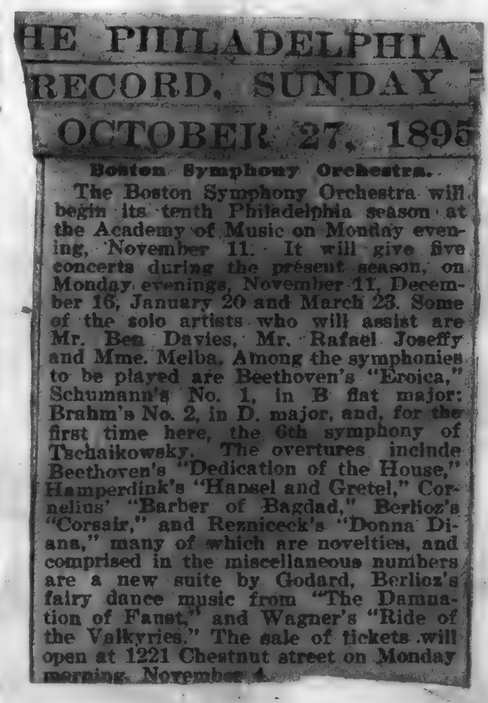
Solo Artists:
Mme. Melba
Mr. Rafael Joseffy
Mr. Ben Davies
and others to be announced.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7, $5 and $3.50, according to location.

The sale of tickets will open Monday morning, November 4, at Fischer's Music Store, 1221 Chestnut Street.

Programme books with descriptive notes on the works to be performed will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchaser of season tickets.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.



THE PHILADELPHIA RECORD, SUNDAY

OCTOBER 27, 1895

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its tenth Philadelphia season at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 11. It will give five concerts during the present season, on Monday evenings, November 11, December 16, January 20 and March 23. Some of the solo artists who will assist are Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Rafael Joseffy and Mme. Melba. Among the symphonies to be played are Beethoven's "Eroica," Schumann's No. 1, in B flat major; Brahm's No. 2, in D, major, and, for the first time here, the 6th symphony of Tschaikowsky. The overtures include Beethoven's "Dedication of the House," Hamperdink's "Hansel and Gretel," Cornelius' "Barber of Bagdad," Berlioz's "Corsair," and Rezniceck's "Donna Diana," many of which are novelties, and comprised in the miscellaneous numbers are a new suite by Godard, Berlioz's fairy dance music from "The Damnation of Faust," and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries." The sale of tickets will open at 1221 Chestnut street on Monday morning, November 4.

[30]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1895.

The program of the second Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Overture, Flying Dutchman.....Wagner
Ah! Perfido.....Beethoven
Mrs. de Vere-Sapio.
Suite, A minor, op. 42.....MacDowell
(The third movement In October, first time at these concerts.)
Ophelia's mad scene, Hamlet.....Thomas
Mrs. de Vere-Sapio.
Symphony No. 5.....Beethoven

If I am not mistaken, Mr. MacDowell's suite was first played in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in January, 1892. The suite then consisted of four movements: In a Haunted Forest; Summer Idyl; the Shepherdess's Song; Forest Spirits. Perhaps the second and third movements then suffered from lack of contrast. The introduction of In October, a charming number, with its suggestions of the hunt and the open air and the melancholy that enters into all autumnal sports—animate or inanimate—now provide balance and contrast, if they were really missed before.

After hearing this beautiful, romantic music I went to the Journal office and babbled in superlatives, to use the phrase of an English colleague. Then came cool midnight; then came rigid self-examination over a clay pipe and a pot of beer; and the ghosts of Gushing and Hifalutin held out slippers and candle, saying: "To bed! to bed! We are pleased with you this night!"

The night is over; the ghosts have fled; I find that I did not babble enough in superlatives. But of what avail to speak again of MacDowell's exquisite sense of the one fit and appropriate color, of the suggestion of a nuance, of the bubbling, spontaneous, fresh melody, of the skill that is forgotten in open eared delight. And all these gifts of nature developed by experience and study are used and shared so modestly! There are composers who overwhelm you with the gorgeousness of the tokens of their esteem; and you shrink back, and fear to take them, and little by little you feel suspicious, and you say to yourself, "Why that man never meant to give them to me; he only wanted to show how rich he was." And there are composers who labor till they sweat and then press their vegetables upon you, saying: "See these turnips. I have had much trouble with them; but here they are. What! You don't care for turnips—but you ought to—you must. Jones was over here yesterday and he said he had never seen better turnips. He knows what he is talking about." And some even show vexation because MacDowell does not deal in turnips.

* * *

I wonder if the people of Boston know that a genius lives on Beacon Hill. I don't mean a Boston genius—the Back Bay alone is full of them—but a real genius. I fear not. Mr. MacDowell is too modest. He does not sit on Mr. Paur's doorstep. He is not continually running against Mr. Lang in the street. He has no push cart with yelping dog or clamorous bell. He does not believe that a social club should be used in musical intrigue and self-advancement. He does not belong to any one of the little mutual admiration societies in town, where a half dozen meet and talk about music, each composer chiefly about his own. I never heard of his asking hustling singers to sing his songs. I doubt if he knows how to pull a clerical leg. Furthermore, I do not believe that it ever occurred to Mr. MacDowell that he was the one man divinely appointed to lead the Händel and Haydn, that venerable band of enthusiastic plodders and moilers, through desert wastes of oratorio. "How should I know that Mr. MacDowell is a genius?" cries some noble dame who patronizes musicians who are musicians in a social way. "He never told me that he was!" Ah, madam, listen to his music!

* * *

And the subtle, haunting beauty of MacDowell's suite was not destroyed or effaced by a happy-go-lucky performance. Not that I accuse Mr. Paur of slighting the exquisite pieces; he looked as though he enjoyed them; he nodded his head, and made all manner of signs with his stick, and the performance of course should have been perfect. It was not. It was not in full sympathy with the composer's music. Here is music where nothing can be slighted; for there is no conventional padding. Too often there was logyness where there should have been demoniac fire. Or the simplicity of a melody was stretched in hope to make it "mean something more." As though someone should read a "complainte" of Laforgue as if it were sesquipedalian verse telling of Nero's death or the Indian mutiny. Then add that the performance was not technically above reproach.

I have heard the fifth symphony led by Bilse in his dullest moments. I have heard the andante con moto played in a beer garden on the Elbe, in a garden where a sheet iron landscape with real water excited the admiration of beer drinking men and women as they smoked or knit. Never have I heard such a perfunctory, tedious, unrefined, unimaginative performance of it as that given under Mr. Paur last night. I doubt if the famous three-eighth notes were played twice alike. The melos at the beginning of the first allegro was not to be recognized. The opening theme of the andante con moto was neither piano nor dolce, nor were the same indications observed in the viola and 'cello passages flowing against sustained flute, oboe and bassoon, while violins and double basses are "pizz." For once the third movement, falsely called a scherzo, was heavy as lead. Some may say that Berlioz compared the double bass passages to elephants, &c. Yes, it's an old story. And where, pray, are the warrants for any such idea and corresponding treatment in Beethoven's music? There is a "forte," nothing more. Why should the basses be here torn asunder? But enough. The performance was not technically up to the standard of the orchestra. The interpretation was essentially and hopelessly burgess.

* * *

Mrs. de Vere-Sapio has gained in breadth of style and dramatic delivery. This was shown conclusively in her treatment of the recitative in Ah! Perfido. The air was sung with the authority of the true artist. Anger, denunciation, pathetic entreaty, love that forgives—each emotion, each passion, found her voice its instrument. Her technical proficiency was displayed in the familiar scene from Hamlet. If the brilliancy of her upper tones is not as dazzling as it was a few years ago, her lower tones have gained in body.

How they disagreed in opinion as to the merits of Josephine Duschek, for whom Beethoven wrote Ah! Perfido! Many speak of her full, round voice; her admirable phrasing, especially in recitative; "the glorious rival of any Italian prima donna." Then Leopold Mozart could not endure her "screeching;" her exaggerated "expressions-kraft"; her other failings, "so many that I was sorry such a powerful voice had not been better trained. Who's to blame? Her husband, who knows no better; he taught her, and now says she alone has true taste." Körner said she was a caricature. Leopold Mozart spoke also of her "broad face," and said "she was slovenly dressed." A duke of Weimar compared her to a "maîtresse out of service," in his ineffable, courtly fashion. But Reichardt, no mean judge, liked her singing even in 1808, when she was fifty-two years old.

* * *

Mr. Claudius Deslouis, "of the Paris Conservatoire, and first baritone of the Théâtre des Italiens, Paris," gave a concert under the auspices of the faculty of the Daudelin Music School in Association Hall the 25th. Mr. Deslouis is a gentleman of much experience, who has sung in Paris, and neighboring towns, as well as in Australia. I have no doubt that some years ago he was a good all round operatic singer, for now, when his voice is that of middle age, he shows excellent schooling, intelligence and dramatic spirit. He sang Dubois' Deus Meus, airs by Meyerbeer and Mercadante and one of Paddock's airs from La Coupe du Roi de Thulé, by Diaz. Did not Eliot Hubbard sing this last air a few seasons ago? There were two monarchs who were worth meeting. One was Cophetua, of Africa. The other was this King of Thule. The latter, as described by the librettists Gallet and Blau, is far from being the "immaculate one" of Laforgue,

Qui, loin des jupes et des choses,
Pleurait sur la métempsychose
Des lys en roses.

For he died of grief because he could not overcome the indifference of Myrrha, and left his cup to the buffoon Paddock, with the injunction to give it to the most worthy.

Mr. Leon Pourtau played with his surpassing skill and wondrous tone Fantasiestücke for clarinet by Gade, and Mr. Charles Molé astonished an audience already familiar with his brilliancy by the performance of flute pieces by Terschek and Godard. The two were heard in Saint-Saëns' tarantelle for flute and clarinet. Miss Anna M. Stovall played piano pieces by Liszt and Chopin. Mrs. Molé, Dr. Kelterborn and Mrs. C. L. Capen assisted by accompanying.

* * *

The program of the Symphony Concert this week is as follows: Symphony, Harold in Italy, Berlioz (viola solo by Mr. Kneisel); Francesca da Rimini, Tschaikowsky; Dream music from Hänsel and Gretel, Humperdinck; overture, Sakuntala, Goldmark.

There have been changes in the programs since I wrote to you a week ago about the "novelties." Tschaikowsky's Francesca is announced as "first time." This probably means at these concerts, for it was first played here at the Tremont Theatre by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Mr. Bernhard Listemann December 31, 1891.

PHILIP HALE.

The Von Buelow Monument.

Editors The Musical Courier:

I DO not wish to discourage your Berlin correspondent, who in his letter of October 1 to your valuable journal informs "American admirers of the late Hans von Bülow who desire to contribute to the monument fund that he will gladly forward anything sent and acknowledge receipt of same in THE MUSICAL COURIER columns"; but I must tell him that even more of an inducement must be offered or I fear those "admirers" will continue to remain silent.

During her stay in this country the past year the Baroness von Overbeck—one of the most intimate friends and greatest admirers of the dead master—made it her work to try in every way to collect funds for this monument. The committee abroad having the matter in charge made her its agent here, and not a stone did she leave unturned. At her own expense she had printed and sent out almost 1,000 circulars and letters informing these "admirers" of the great work, and asking for even the smallest contribution. The fact was published in THE MUSICAL COURIER—in many other papers. Those who had known the master, many who owed much to him—his pupils, musicians, artists, patrons of music, hundreds were asked to contribute money or talent or interest.

Mr. Higginson was appealed to for his permission to have the Boston Symphony Orchestra give a performance and have the proceeds forwarded as coming from this great American organization; as usual his generosity was equal to the demand and he expressed interest. That great (?) conductor, Mr. Emil Paur, was also appealed to, and as the fact had issued from his own lips that he had been a friend (perhaps a pupil even), owed much anyhow to the master, some effort was expected of him. The matter was finally placed before the members of the orchestra, and, as I learned from a reliable but private source, favorably considered, when who should kill it but the conductor himself; and listen, please, to the narrow, unjust reason given—that it would be impossible to contribute to a fund for a monument to a reproductive artist when so many other greater masters remained unhonored. Unfortunately I have not Mr. Paur's letter near me or I could give it to you in full, but imagine if everything was done in this world by priority perchance Mr. Paur himself would not occupy the position he now does?

So this orchestra for that reason (could it have been only that?) refused to sanction a project that Brahms, Joachim, d'Albert and many other great men have given their aid, talent, names anything to further. The Kneisel Quartet was asked to play, but as their master (Paur) had opposed even the erection of the monument itself they had to decline. Damrosch kindly sent $25, and hoped to be able to give a concert in New York—do something—but he failed, too; however, there the spirit was willing at least. Other artists were appealed to to give their talent, but in all this broad land not a society, not a musical organization, not an individual—except, be it said to her credit, Currie Duke, who was willing and anxious any minute to help in any way—came forward or was even willing to aid. But could you hope for anything from Americans when Germans, artists, musicians, in this country took no interest in the matter?

And how much do you suppose was raised after this year of effort? I blush to tell you—barely $160, and $100 of that was given by the Knabes, and $25, as I have said, by Damrosch! Let us be thankful at least that the dead, generous master is spared the pain of knowing of so much ingratitude, lack of interest and selfishness. A. D. P.

The Philadelphia Press.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The musical prospectus would be incomplete without reference to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as the tenth season in this city will be ushered in by a concert on Monday evening, November 11. The dates of the other four concerts are as follows: December 16, January 20, February 24 and March 23. The tenth season suggests a barking back to the first season, with its small attendance and general listless interest on the part of Philadelphians. But, as we know so well, all that is changed, and now none are too old or too young to pass it by, and in consequence the Academy is often just a little uncomfortably crowded. The programme arranged by Mr. Paur includes the works of the great masters, whose symphonies have been made familiar to Philadelphians by this great organization. The novelties are Tschaikowsky's Sympathy No. 6, Humperdinck's overture to "Hansel and Gretel," Berlioz's overture, "Corsair," Reznicek's overture, "Donna Diana;" a Godard suite and Richard Strauss' prelude and entr'acte to "Guntram." Among the soloists will be Melba and among the pianists Joseffy. The sale of seats begins next week.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

(90 Performers.)
Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.
Fifteenth Season, 1895-96. Eleventh Season in Philadelphia.

FIVE CONCERTS
MONDAY EVENINGS { NOV. 11. DEC. 16. JAN. 20. FEB. 24. MARCH 23.
At 8 o'clock.

Solo Artists:
Mme. Melba
Mr. Rafael Joseffy
Mr. Ben Davies
and others to be announced.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7, $5 and $3.50, according to location.
The sale of tickets will open Monday morning, November 4, at Fischer's Music Store, 1221 Chestnut Street.
Programme books with descriptive notes on the works to be performed will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchaser of season tickets.
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

THE PHILADELPHIA RECORD, SUNDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1895

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its tenth Philadelphia season at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 11. It will give five concerts during the present season, on Monday evenings, November 11, December 16, January 20 and March 23. Some of the solo artists who will assist are Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Rafael Joseffy and Mme. Melba. Among the symphonies to be played are Beethoven's "Eroica," Schumann's No. 1, in B flat major; Brahm's No. 2, in D. major, and, for the first time here, the 6th symphony of Tschaikowsky. The overtures include Beethoven's "Dedication of the House," Hamperdink's "Hansel and Gretel," Cornelius' "Barber of Bagdad," Berlioz's "Corsair," and Reznicek's "Donna Diana," many of which are novelties, and comprised in the miscellaneous numbers are a new suite by Godard, Berlioz's fairy dance music from "The Damnation of Faust," and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries." The sale of tickets will open at 1221 Chestnut street on Monday morning, November 4.

[30]

The Philadelphia Inquirer

SUNDAY - - - OCTOBER 27, 1895

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, of ninety performers, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, will begin its tenth Philadelphia season at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 11. It will give five concerts during the present season, on Monday evenings, November 11, December 16, January 20 and March 23. Emil Paur will be the conductor, and some of the solo artists who will assist are Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Rafael Joseffy and Mme. Melba. Among the symphonies to be played are Bethoven's "Eroica," Schumann's No. 1, in B flat major, Brahm's No. 2, in D major, and, for the first time here, the sixth symphony of Tschaikowsky. The overtures include Beethoven's "Dedication of the House," Hamperdink's "Hansel and Gretel," Cornelius' "Barber of Bagdad," Berlioz's "Corsair," and Reznicek's "Donna Diana," many of which are novelties, and comprised in the miscellaneous numbers are a new suite by Godard, Belioz's fairy dance music from "The Damnation of Faust," and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries." The sale of tickets will open at 1221 Chestnut street on Monday morning, November 4.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 3, 1895.

Third of This Season's Symphony Concerts.

The large audience that crowded Music hall last night enjoyed the very pleasurable program which Mr Paur arranged for the third Symphony concert.

The first number was Berlioz' symphony in G major, entitled "Harold in Italy." The first movement, "Harold in the Mountains," begins with a slow and attractive introduction, which gradually develops the subject of the composition. The melody the solo viola introduces enters with beautiful tenderness, thrown into more conspicuous relief by the full force of the orchestra which it follows. The theme developed by the viola in the main body of the movement is replete with sweetness and dreamy charm. The change from the melancholy to a more lively theme toward the end of the first movement is full of delicate effects.

But it is in the second movement, "The march of Pilgrims singing their evening prayer," where Berlioz displays his wonderful delicacy of conception as a composer. With the beginning of the march the whole poetic picture of pilgrims singing their evening prayers is vividly held before the imagination by the most complex use of instruments, while the strings sing the melody two bells keep constantly chiming, and the effect produced by the horns and harp ringing the second bell in C is entrancingly picturesque. If anything were necessary to enhance the beauty of this effect, the solo viola keeps singing the melancholy melody without in the least interfering with the development of the theme, while the second bell striking in at the end of each phrase helps to conjure up an enchanting picture of poetic effect. The whole movement taxed the most delicate skill of the orchestra, and the burst of applause which the musicians received at the conclusion was well deserved both by Mr Paur and the orchestra.

The third movement, "Serenade of a Mountaineer to His Mistress," is full of vivacity and grace. The theme is lively and entertaining, and the second part, which is more pastoral, is made more effective by the return of the solo viola.

The fourth movement, "Orgy of the Brigands," introduces snatches from all the preceding movements. The alternate triumphs of the melancholy and thoughtful themes over the more boisterous and more forcible songs of the brigand is highly dramatic and full of life and energy. And the effect is strikingly hightened by the introduction in the midst of the furious passage work of two solo violins and cellos playing behind the stage the Pilgrims' march.

The solo viola, which is supposed to represent Harold throughout the composition, was played by Mr Kneisel and he acquitted himself with great skill. This popular musician received the hearty applause of the audience and elicited the beaming approbation of Mr Paur.

There were two pieces played by the symphony orchestra last night for the first time at these concerts. The first one, "Dream Pantomime," from Hansel and Gretel by Engelbert Humperdink, was played for the first time in December, 1893, at Weimar. It has been compared to "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Il Pagliacci." The selection played last night is from the closing scene of the first act in the opera. The movement begins in D major and contains strong elements of grace and charm. But the themes are not so attractive as either of those two popular operas and its development is somewhat monotonous. Mr Paur's interpretation of it elucidated some of its excellent qualities, but the audience did not display the enthusiasm "Cavalleria Rusticana" would have excited.

The second piece, played for the first time at these concerts, was Tchaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini." It is a free, fantastic composition, characteristic of the style of the Russian composer. It is full of storm and whirlwind, and not without those outbursts of passionate grief and love so inherent to the Russian genius. The development of the theme is somewhat elaborate, but it is replete with striking effects, and allows opportunities for some brilliant passage work for the violins and some picturesque and forcible fingering. It was received warmly by the audience, and Mr Paur made plain the strongest and best qualities of the composition.

The concert concluded with Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala." It was played in F major, and the orchestra's work in developing the themes, in representing the different scenes and in interpreting the subject of the composition was highly effective. Especially in bringing out the rich harmonics, and contrasting it with the gurgling sounds, supposed to represent running brooks, did the orchestra display wonderful ability in changing from the most delicate to the most forcible and impressive work.

The audience was more than ordinarily attentive, and extremely appreciative of the whole concert.

The program for the next concert will be as follows: Symphony No. 9, Mozart; overture, "Dedication of the House," Beethoven; concerto for pianoforte, Raff; Rhapsody, Svendsen. Soloist, Mr [illegible]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 4, 1895.

The Symphony Concert---List of Works Almost an Ideal One.

Mr. Paur has been quick to respond to the desire for more catholic programmes, and the list of works presented on Saturday was almost an ideal one; Berlioz for grand scoring, Humpendinck for novelty, Goldmark for most modern melodic treatment, and Tschaikowsky thrown in as "Lagnlappe," as they would say in New Orleans. It was a good proof that such a programme was in line with the public desire, that a very large audience attended, spite of most disagreeable weather, and that even the standing auditors did not depart until the very end of a long concert. It is pleasant to bear in mind, also, that there was no soloist (the great viola obligato of the Berlioz symphony coming close to this however, and that the interest therefore was centered upon the orchestra alone. It would not have harmed if a Beethoven or Mozart number had taken the place of the rather prolix Tschaikowsky work, but it would be very ungracious to carp when so much has been given; the present writer however, would by no means give the impression that he desires the modern school to crowd out the classics, he only has hoped that the classics may not prevent the moderns from having due recognition and hearing.

The concert began with Berlioz's great symphony,—"Harold in Italy," a work which demands all the resources of the grand orchestra, and which becomes unintelligible if given with any but a perfect ensemble. Never has this difficult composition received clearer treatment in this city; the performance was a triumph for Mr. Paur, Mr. Kneisel, and the entire orchestra. Such a work played in such a manner is educational in a high degree and a keen delight besides. Mr. Kneisel played the viola part which personifies Childe Harold, and the brooding wanderer was depicted to the very life by the dreamy melancholy which is the predominant tone-color of the instrument.

This symphony is the best presentation the viola has ever had as an independent instrument; here it is no longer the poor relation of the violin or violoncello, but stands forth as the typification of something which neither of these two, more versatile, instruments could give as well. It would be futile to attempt to trace the Byron poem through the Berlioz work, for the composer has taken liberties which were his prerogative in a tone-picture, although they might have been wrong in a cantata built upon the poet's words. But the outline of the character remains intact, and the constant sorrow of the hero had most romantic expression in Mr. Kneisel's masterly performance. The difficult passages upon the bridge ("sull' ponticello") in the second movement, the tender muted phrases, as well as the broad theme which becomes a species of leit-motif, were all given with great effect. Mr. Schuecker gave the accompaniment to the entrance of the last-mentioned theme with much delicacy, and the orchestra performed the odd distortions of the same melody at the close of the first movement with perfect ensemble in spite of the capricious style which makes the passages almost unconquerable.

The second movement is always a popular one, for its more direct and intelligible than any other part of the symphony. The bell-tones in this were a great inspiration; the composer desired the effect of a great cathedral bell, such as would be impossible to hang upon the stage. Although the bell was unattainable, its tone was not, and a combination of harp (for the impact of the hammer) and of horn (for the reverberation) gave the deep bell-tones with marvellous exactness. The horn, however, played too loud to give this touch its best results, save in the end of the movement where a reasonable diminuendo brought forth all its beauty. The tinier bell, produced by harp and flute, was also best at the end of the movement.

It was an evening for harp and for English horn, for these two instruments had work to do in almost every number. The English horn was especially commendable in its personification of the rustic lover in the third movement, and the flute was also admirable in its performance of the Harold theme, which is here transferred to it from the viola.

The finale was splendidly performed, certainly up to the level of any previous performance in Boston. What a hurly-burly it is! It is no longer Byron, but Berlioz pure and simple. Byron causes his hero to vanish from the scene with a mystical stanza, but Berlioz must needs give us a detailed picture of his death, and adds the trifling suggestion that he has turned in despair to dissipation and dies a broken man amidst blasphemous revelry. It is very graphic music, the tender strains of the Pilgrim's Litany wafted across the Brigand's revelry like a whiff of pure air in a foul atmosphere, the faint sobs of Childe Harold, the brutality of the orgie that is uninterrupted by his fate, but one may question whether it is the highest art. Here was the beginning in music of that morbid tendency which has been brought to fruition by the Ibsens, Zolas, Maeterlincks, ed id genus omne, today. Berlioz loved this style of finale; in the Symphonie Fantastique he ended with a revel of demons, in his "Faust" he sent his hero to perdition instead of saving him, a la Goethe, and here he gives us a similar instance of his sound and fury, which however, signifies much more than nothing; but one may question the legitimacy of that art, be it poetry, painting or music, in which evil preponderates over good, shadow over light, or discord over concord. One might sum up Berlioz as the Edgar Allan Poe of Music.

A couple of years ago, when some short orchestral works bearing the name of an unknown composer began to appear upon our symphony programme, it was considered in order to inquire, not without some sarcasm, "Who is Humperdinck?" The question has been abundantly answered. Humperdinck is a genius of the modern school who holds out a little better promise than Mascagni did. He is under Wagnerian influence, but can scarcely be called a copyist or plagiarist, save in a few orchestral devices in which Wagner has so thoroughly covered the field that everybody who essays music is bound to copy in some degree. Muted violins in high positions, continuity of melody, rich interweaving of themes is there galore, but the oddest of all is that juvenile simplicity is at the base of it all. It is folk-music under a magnifying glass. There will be further opportunities to review Humperdinck when his famous opera comes to Boston, but in the meanwhile thanks to Mr. Paur for giving us a foretaste of it in so excellent a manner.

After the next number, Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" (orchestral fantasie), one could exclaim: "I have supped full of horrors!" for to Berlioz's picture of dissipation was added Tschaikowsky's sketch of hades, which sounded like its subject, too. It was a tone-picture that would have convinced an Ingersoll. There is a tremendous amount of wood-wind played in the infernal regions, and it is evident that several piccolo teachers have taken up their permanent abode there. But Tschaikowsky is too great a master to jest about; spite of the prolixity of the work, spite of its intentionally spasmodic style and its constant chromatics and explosions, there are moments of genius in the picture, and a mastery of the orchestra is constantly exhibited. This mastery is perhaps pushed too far, there is an overconfidence in combinations, and Tschaikowsky here out-Berliozs Berlioz.

As usual the composer does great things with the woodwind, and clarinet, flute, oboe and English horn, all have their obbligato touches, and each of the soloists on these instruments deserves mention for artistic work. The episode of the appearance of the unhappy lovers is most picturesque and the tender passages become the more beautiful because of the dark surroundings.

The concert ended with rich orchestration, for once combined with direct, intelligible and attractive melody. Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture never seemed half so beautiful as after the turmoil by which it had been preceded. Perhaps such work, and the pleasure it gave, is a foreshadowing of what the future may bring forth. There may yet be a composer who will reconcile the grandeur of the modern orchestra, the complex interweaving of latterday harmony, with pure and delightful melody (as Wagner did in some parts of "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" and other of his operas), and the school of the future may be founded on such a combination. It is doubtful if even the greatest composer can escape from the need of furnishing pleasing melody with his work. "Sakuntala" was excellently played, and the whole evening was an exhibition of our orchestra in its most brilliant light, even if it did furnish rather an excess of emotional agitation and scenes of terror. Louis C. Elson.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 3, 1895.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

For the third Symphony concert at Music Hall last evening there were two novelties, one of which will be gladly welcomed when Conductor Paur chooses to again place it on the programme, while the other will never become especially popular. The first referred to is the "Hansel and Gretel" music by Engelbert Humperdinck, which in its operatic form has been immensely popular in German for two years and which was heard in this country but a few weeks ago at Daly's Theatre, New York. The fragment selected for last night's concert is the closing scene of the first act and is a charming bit of melody throughout. Considering that the opera is founded on a fairy tale, the music is by no means of that light order which one would naturally expect, but is on the other hand of a rather serious order without being in the least dull. Stately and moderate, it has the ability to closely hold the attention of an audience, who, at its conclusion, showed their appreciation most unmistakably.

The other new piece was the "Francesca da Rimini" fantasia, by Tschaikowski. It is weird and strong and is one of those compositions which taxes to the utmost the endurance of an orchestra. It strongly suggests the "Ride of the Walkures" as given to the world by Wagner, although it is far more diabolic in its intense significance. Occasionally the orchestra lapses into sweet and harmonic passages, especially where the beautiful solo is given to the clarinet; but for the most part it is one of those pieces which leaves an unpleasant impression, and considering its generally heavy character it is rather too long. But as a piece to show what an orchestra is capable of it amply fulfils its purpose, and it goes without saying that it was magnificently played.

The other numbers on the programme were the Berlioz Symphony No. 3, "Harold in Italy," in which the viola solo was beautifully and skilfully played by Mr. Kneisel, and Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala."

For the next concert the programme will be Mozart's symphony No. 9; Beethoven's overture, "Dedication of the House"; Raff's piano concerto, and a rhapsody by Svendsen. The soloist will be Carl Faelten.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVIII., NO. 126.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Very Fine Programme Splendidly Interpreted—A Bit of "Hansel and Gretel."

The selections for the third of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, last evening, in Music Hall, were:

Symphony, "Harold in Italy".....Berlioz
Symphonic Poem, "Francesca"...Tschaikowsky
(First time.)
"Dream-Music," "Hansel and Gretel"....Humperdinck
(First time.)
Overture, "Sakuntala".....Goldmark

It was an admirable programme, well balanced and wholly interesting. Curiously enough, in all this modern music, the innovator and iconoclast Berlioz should have sounded the most old-fashioned. It is true that the "Harold" symphony was first heard fifty-one years ago, but it was then considered vague, extravagant and almost incomprehensible, and up to a comparatively recent date was deemed to be in the van of the so-called "bizarre music that has intruded into art and fastened itself upon it like an ugly wen." Today it is as plain sailing and as easy of comprehension as a nursery rhyme, and is exceeded in extravagance by every fledgling who has been innoculated with the "music of the future." In fact, the music of the period has caused it to shrink nearly to the aspect of a light symphony. The instrumentation, however, still retains its original impressiveness in effect, and though more modern composers have increased the power and scope of the orchestra, none of them have equalled Berlioz in clearness. Even in his most massive effects he never degenerates into mere noise. Every instrument is heard distinctly, every note is in the best place to produce the intended results, and the cloudiness of the modern score is never present in Berlioz. The work was splendidly rendered. It is doubtful if it has ever had a finer and more lucid reading than Mr. Paur accorded it, and the performance by the orchestra was of exceptional beauty and finish. The Pilgrim march was given with especial charm. The solo viola part was played by Mr. Kneisel delightfully and with a keen artistic discretion that avoided every temptation to force it into undue prominence. There was great applause after each movement and the audience expressed its appreciation at the close of the work with vigorous enthusiasm.

The two novelties on the programme were full of interest. The "Hansel and Gretel" selection is lively and poetical in melody, and often exquisite in instrumentation. It is among the most fascinating features of the opera, and may be heard with genuine pleasure in the concert room, but its charm, effect and meaning are largely dimmed when the music is heard apart from the situation and the action for which it was written. That it is a page out of Wagner, as far as the scoring is concerned, is undeniable, but it has in its themes a grace and a suave delicacy peculiarly its own. It was beautifully read and played.

The "Francesca" fantasia is in quite another vein. It has a mad furnace glow from beginning to end, and burns with a white heat even into its cantabile movements. The work is, perhaps, spun out to an unnecessary length, and its exciting tornadoes of noise at length become tiresome, but the work is intense in power and immensely effective, despite the turmoil of brass, bass drum and gong. The theme depicting the meeting of Dante with Francesco and Paolo has a broad tenderness and is appealing in its pathos, but it soon disappears to make way for the wild frenzy that is the distinctive characteristic of the work. The orchestration is amazingly brilliant and of trying difficulty for the performers, and its dramatic effect is really stirring. There are many fine and masterly movements in this composition, but there is also more that is purely sensational; that is mere searching for startling and novel effects and that force one into thinking constantly of the composer instead of absorbing one's attention in the music itself. The orchestration attracts more attention than do the themes with which it is associated. In fact, except the calmer love episode already alluded to, there is little else that dwells on the memory. The exacting score was vigorously read and grandly played. A remarkably warm and sympathetic rendering of Goldmark's masterly overture brought this wholly fine concert to a fitting end.

The next programme is: Prelude and entr'acte, "Guntrum" (first time), Richard Strauss; concerto for the pianoforte, Raff; symphony, No. 9, Mozart; overture, "Dedication of the House," Beethoven. Mr. Carl Faelten is to be the soloist.

[31]

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1895.

Third Symphony Concert in Music Hall Last Evening, Emil Paur, Conductor—A Brilliant Program of Extreme Modernity.

The program of the third Symphony Concert was as follows:

Symphony No. 3, "Harold in Italy"...Berlioz
Viola solo by Mr. Kneisel.
Dream pantomime from "Haensel and Gretel" .....Humperdinck
First time.
Fantasia for orchestra, "Francesca da Rimini," Op. 32.....Tschaikowsky
First time.
Overture, "Sakuntala," Op. 13.....Goldmark

The selections showed the praiseworthy desire of Mr. Paur to be modern and catholic. They also showed his lack of appreciation of the value that lies in contrast. Why give the public one Saturday night a rigidly classical program, and the next dazzle and stun it by a mass of ultra-modern music? A judicious mixture of old and new would be more to the purpose. I grant cheerfully that the concert last evening was a brilliant one, and the performance put in clear light the technical proficiency of the orchestra. But the brilliancy was well-nigh incessant. There was promise of grateful relief and a breathing spell in the announcement of Humperdinck's "Dream-Pantomime," with its little children asleep, and angels "dancing a stately measure" around the children and their guardian spirits—alas! The children showed Wagnerian proclivities, and the angels trod heavily in the dance.

* * *

It is over 60 years since the Harold Symphony was first given, and naturally one may answer, "And you say the program was of extreme modernity?" Yes, for the symphony of Berlioz seemed newer and fresher than the music that followed. Much of the work of Berlioz is still intensely modern, almost prophetic of that which is to come, although all great modern composers have studied Berlioz and learned of him. Think a moment: the Harold Symphony was performed about eight years before Wagner's opera "Rienzi" saw the footlights. Wagner could study the instrumentation of Berlioz. But Berlioz invented his orchestral effects. Take the concert last night: How clear, how distinct, how natural seemed the orchestral expression of the great Frenchman in comparison with the thickness of Humperdinck and the restless labor of Tschaikowsky.

Perhaps many musicians pass through this experience in studying Berlioz. At first they wonder blindly they then begin to doubt; they talk of melodic poverty, tiresome tricks; they listen in preference to the men who borrowed from him freely; and after a while they again wonder at the genius of the Frenchman and they bow the knee. When Harold was heard here last, I confess I wrote words that I would now retract. The symphony as it was played last night seemed, as it did many years ago, a marvelously romantic and powerful composition. Even the Orgy of Brigands, which is still a stumbling block to some—Hanslick, for example—has its reason for existence; surely no musician, however great his genius may have been, has equaled with such simple means in symphonic music the weird reminiscence of the pilgrim's march toward the very close of this Orgy. The symphony was played with great care and with remarkable effect. Mr. Kneisel was in his happiest vein.

* * *

A Humoreske by Humperdinck—his name then appeared in the program book without the c—was played at a Symphony concert Nov. 12, 1892. It was a poor, foolish thing, not worth remembering; and it seems hardly possible that the composer of that piece is the Humperdinck of "Hänsel and Gretel." An excerpt from an opera given without voice parts and without scenic accessories must suffer inevitably by the separation. Even such an entr'acte as that in the "Cavalleria Rusticana," a pretty bit of sentimentalism, gains immeasurably when heard in the opera house, and when it appears as the one tranquil episode in a tale of passion, blood, and death. As "Hänsel and Gretel" is to be given here soon, let us defer any remarks about this Dream-Pantomime until then. Suffice it to say that the music is Wagnerian through and through in the best meaning of that word as it respects instrumentation.

* * *

Tschaikowsky, one of the greatest composers of these latter years, died Nov. 6, 1893, and his Fantasia last night awakened keen regret for his death, and also the wish that either his "Romeo and Juliet" or "Hamlet" had been played in memoriam instead of the "Francesca;" for the latter work is not the equal of either of the two named in connection with it. There are overpowering moments, as in the tone-painting of the "cruelest winds under a dark and gloomy air." There is the ever present thought of an original thinker and a master of the resources of the orchestra. But the love episode, or whatever you are pleased to call it, is for the most part forced and without deep, genuine pathos. There is no such sublime chant of triumphant love that mocks Time and Space, that cares not for Heaven and laughs at Hell, as there is in the "Romeo;" nor is there such an exhibition of unearthly imagination as there is in the ghost episode in "Hamlet." Furthermore, in "Francesca" there is a suspicion of padding, of experimenting. The work is not firmly knit. It takes a long time for Tschaikowsky to tell the sad story of Madonna Francesca. The music is not Dantesque.

* * *

After the fret and fury, the raving and the pother of the "Francesca"—and yet do not mistake me, there are gigantic moments in it—the Oriental sensuousness of Goldmark was welcome, although at first it might have seemed an anti-climax. But this overture could hardly be called a contrast; it was rather a gradual letting-down, an unscrewing of strained pegs. It is the fashion for some to rail at Goldmark with his Eastern color, his suggestion of sacred groves, and blinding heat, venerable priests and Eastern love. Such music as the "Sakuntala" undoubtedly cloys if it is heard week in, week out; but it is a good thing occasionally to be reminded of the turban and the lotos, camels and waving palms.

* * *

The performance of the orchestra throughout was brilliant in solo work and in ensemble.

Mr. Apthorp makes the following statement concerning the Harold Symphony in the program book:

[illegible] theatre in Paris on Nov. 23, 1834, but Berlioz introduced many alterations into the score afterwards. Paganini was present at the first performance; he expressed his delight with the work by sending Berlioz a check for 20,000 francs the next day, which sum the poor composer devoted to paying off some crying debts, but especially to buying leisure to write his Roméo et Juliette symphony, which he dedicated to Paganini."

This statement is incorrect. The Harold symphony was given first in public at the Conservatory, Paris, Nov. 23, 1834; but Paganini was not there. In 1833, Dec. 22, he had heard Berlioz's Symphonie fantastique. Some weeks after this concert in 1833 he asked Berlioz for a piece for his viola (Stradivarius); the result was the Harold symphony. Not liking the first movement, which was written first, he left Paris, and he did not return to that city for three or four years.

Paganini did hear the Harold symphony; but it was not until Dec. 16, 1838, when the Fantastique and the Harold were played, Berlioz conducting, at the Conservatory. Then Paganini and his son Achille appeared at the orchestra door. The letter in which Paganini asked him to present an inclosed note to Rotchschild—the order to deliver to Berlioz 20,000 francs—was handed the next day to Berlioz by Achille, and yet the letter was dated the 18th.

A year or two ago a story went the rounds of the European musical press that there is not a word of truth in this extraordinary episode in the life of an artist. Affirmations of the reality of Paganini's generosity followed.

Let me add that the date of the concert in 1833 was Dec. 22, according to Berlioz (see Memoires, vol. 1., p. 301). Hippeau in his "Berlioz Intime" says it was Dec. 23.

PHILIP HALE.

NEW YORK HERALD,

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 3,

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Emil Paur, conductor, will give five concerts at the Metropolitan Opera House this season on the following dates:—November 15, December 19, January 23, February 27 and March 26. The soloists will be Mme. Melba, Ben Davies, E. A. McDowell and T. Adamowski.

THE NEW-YORK TIMES,

NOVEMBER 3, 1895.—1

—The Boston Orchestra.—The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Metropolitan Opera House on Nov. 15. Mme. Melba will be the soloist, and will sing Handel's "Sweet Bird" and the mad scene from "Hamlet." The orchestra will play the Eroica Symphony, two movements from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," and Wagner's "Kaiser March."

THE WORLD: SUNDAY.

NOVEMBER 3, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The prospectus issued by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose first concert takes place on Friday, Nov. 15, does not offer much in the way of absolute novelty. It will be interesting certainly to hear what Mr. Paur will make of Tschaikowsky's Sixth Symphony, which the orchestra is to play for the first time. Other novelties for the orchestra, at any rate, wil be Berlioz's overture, "The Corsair;" an overture, "Donna Diana," by Reznicceck, a composer utterly unknown in this country: the prelude and entr'acte to Richard Strauss's "Guntram," and the "Midnight of Sedan," by Zollner.

I notice with some interest that one or two of the Boston critics have begun to discover that Mr. Paur's work is not always so absolutely perfect as they would have us believe, but, as he will continue to direct the fortunes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for three more seasons, it will be as well for them to make the best of it. After the many detrimental things said in regard to his work, the surpassing success which Mr. Nikisch has been meeting with both in Leipsic and Berlin must be rather gall and wormwood to some critics. After the dry-as-dust classicism of Reinecke, Nikisch has fairly electrified the Gewandhaus audiences, and if his success in Berlin was not quite that of Von Bulow, whose personnel was perhaps even stronger, it was certainly most marked. What would they have said in Boston to personal eccentricities like those of Von Bulow, who would always conduct the "Funeral March" from the Eroica Symphony in black gloves, which he put on for the movement, and thought nothing of playing an entire movement from one of Haydn's symphonies with the strings pizzicato, in a way entirely unauthorized by the score?

THE SUN, SUNDAY,

NOVEMBER 3, 1895.

RIC[illegible]

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concert of this season will be given in the Metropolitan Opera House on Friday evening, Nov. 15. Melba is to be the soloist, and she is to sing the famous mad scene from "Hamlet" and Handel's "Sweet Bird." The orchestral numbers on the programme are the Beethoven "Eroica" symphony, two excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust," the "Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps" and the "Waltz of the Sylphs," and Wagner's "Kaiser March."

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(87 Players),

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.

Friday evening, Nov. 15, and Thursday evenings, Dec. 19, Jan. 23, Feb. 27, and March 26.

Solo artists: MME. MELBA, MR. BEN DAVIES, MR. T. ADAMOWSKY, and others.

The sale of season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, is now progressing at Schuberth's, 23 Union square. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

AMERICAN—

BALTIMORE, SUNDAY,

NOVEMBER 3, 1895.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Its Coming Concert.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first appearance in Baltimore, on the evening of April 12, 1886, The American, in speaking of the performance the morning after, said that the symphony was "artistically rendered and unspeakably beautiful." Brief as was this compliment, it sounded the keynote of the welcome extended to the orchestra, and it is safe to say that in ten seasons during which the orchestra has continued its visits to Baltimore, this welcome has never been withdrawn. The orchestra will give its thirty-fourth concert in Baltimore on Wednesday, November 13. Of the previous concerts six have been under Wilhelm Gericke, seventeen under Arthur Nikisch and ten under the present conductor, Emil Paur. When Arthur Nikisch left the Stadt Theater in Leipsic, to come to Boston, he was succeeded by the same man who followed him as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the present leader, Mr. Emil Paur. It is also worthy of comment that Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur played at the same desk as first violinists under Mr. Gericke at the very same Stadt Theater several years before. Mr. Paur enters upon his third year with the orchestra this season.

In 1881 a music-loving citizen of Boston, actuated solely by a desire to present good music in the best way, and fortunately possessing means ample to carry out his most commendable impulse, formed the idea of a large permanent orchestra, which should give each year an extended series of concerts in Music Hall, Boston, with an occasional visit to the adjacent New England cities. This idea was at once acted upon, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra began its existence, and today what was then a Boston organization has grown to be a national pride—an orchestra second to none in the world, whose name and fame are known in every cultured city on the globe, dependent upon no subsidy from the public exchequer, as is the case in all the European cities, but rather upon the generous liberality of a music-loving Bostonian.

During the visits of the orchestra to Baltimore the public has heard among the soloists, Mme. Melba, Mme. Nordica, Mme. Materna, Miss Emma Juch, Mme. Steinbach-Johns, Mr. Pol Plancon, Mr. Max Heinrich, Mr. Eugene d'Albert, Mr. Adamowski, Mr. Giese and many others as famous. The concert on Wednesday, November 13, will present a program from Weber, Verdi, Mendelssohn, Leoncavallo, Tschaikowsky and Wagner.

THE SALE OF SEASON TICKETS FOR THE FIVE CONCERTS BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, AT MUSIC HALL, OPENS AT ALBERT'S, 13 N. CHARLES STREET, NEXT TUESDAY, NOV. 5, AT NINE A. M. 81t

Record

The Boston Symphony Concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Emil Paur, will give its first concert for the season at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 11, when the programme will include Beethoven's third symphony, the well-known and majestic "Eroica," the will-o'-the wisp minuet and Dance of the Sylphs from Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust," and Wagner's grandiose "Kaisermarsch." The soloist will be Mme. Melba, who will be heard in Handel's famous aria "Sweet Bird," with flute obligato, and in the great mad scene from Ambroise Thomas' opera of "Hamlet." The Boston Orchestra will give five concerts in Philadelphia this season, the dates of the other four being December 16, January 20, February 24 and March 23, all Monday evenings. The sale of season tickets will begin at Fischer's, No. 1221 Chestnut street, on Monday morning, November 4, at 9 o'clock.

THE SALE OF SEASON TICKETS for the FIVE CONCERTS BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, at the ACADEMY OF MUSIC, OPENS AT FISCHER'S, 1221 CHESTNUT STREET, TOMORROW (MONDAY) MORNING, NOVEMBER 4, AT NINE.

[32]

MONDAY, NOV. 4, 1895.

BOSTON STANDARD.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

An audience that was uncommonly demonstrative and equally appreciative heard the third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall Saturday night. In the selection of the programme, the excellent reading of the orchestra under Conductor Paur's masterly guidance, and in the solo work of Mr. Kneisel, it was the most brilliant of the season, thus far. This was the programme:

Symphony No 3, "Harold in Italy".....Berlioz
Viola solo by Mr. Kneisel.
Dream pantomime from "Haensel and Gretel" .....Humperdinck
First time.
Fantasia for orchestra, "Francesca da Rimini," Op. 32.....Tschaikowsky
First time.
Overture, "Sakuntala," Op. 13.....Goldmark

"Harold in Italy," though first given 60 years ago, seemed distinctly modern. Not veiled in the intricate mystery characterizing those who have modelled their writings after Berlioz, and thus have thrust upon the musical world works from which only the deeply studied musical mind could extricate an idea of meaning, it is delightfully vivid, yet deep in thought. Passing from the first movement of "Harold in the Mountains; Scenes of Melancholy, Happiness and Joy," one is put thoroughly in touch with the composer's theme, and ready to revel in the musical picturesqueness of the second movement, "March of Pilgrims, Singing Their Evening Hymn."

The listener figures in his mind the pilgrims marching to the accompaniment of their chant and the mountain evening twilight. This music is repeatedly interrupted by the chiming of two bells, one in high B (represented by the flute, oboe and harp), and the other in medium C (represented by the horns and harp). In the C bell the booming resonance of a large church bell in the distance is vividly suggested. The third movement is "Serenade of the Mountaineer in the Avruzzi to His Mistress." The fanciful mind quickly catches in this a romantic picture of a serenade to the strumming accompaniment in the violas divise and long-sustained notes in the second oboe, clarinets and bassoons. The fourth movement is entitled "Orgy of Brigands; Recollections of Preceding Scenes," in which the only new thought is the revelry of the brigands. It is like playing the fourth act of Henry Arthur Jones' "The Masqueraders," or Henry Irving's playing the last act of "The Merchant of Venice"—adds nothing, and therefore unnecessary. Mr. Kneisel in his viola solos played with a fine discrimination, winning repeated encores at the close of each movement, and was finally compelled to bow his acknowledgments again and again to the enthusiastic assemblage.

The dream-pantomime from "Haensed and Gretel," which is the closing scene from the final act of the opera now playing in Daly's Theatre, New York, and soon to be seen here at the Hollis, doubtless suffered in its interpretation by the absence of the footlight accoutrements, though its rendering Saturday night was sufficient to test the composer's fairy fancy. One might have thought from the music in the dance of fairies that they stand six foot in their clogs, but that impression is erroneous.

In Tschaikowsky's fantasia, "Francesca da Remini," suggested by Dantes' Inferno V., the poetic keynote is "cruelest minds under a dark and gloomy air" of the second circle of hell. The meeting of Francesca and Paolo comes in as an episode. The emotion of grief and passionate love are disappointingly crushed out by the composer at every uprising in the almost constant "background of whirling storm-wind." The pandemonium of the hellish elements suggested by the instrumentation was a howling, windy and musical success. The wierd visions of Irving's "Brocken scene" were brought instantly to mind.

The programme closed with Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala," which, with its suggestion of gurgling springs, wood-nymphs and tender loves, was beautifully in contrast to the preceding numbers.

The programme of the Symphony rehearsal and concert next Friday and Saturday will be: Entr'acte "Guntrum," R. Strauss; concerto for piano, Raff; symphony No. 9, Mozart; overture, "Dedication of the House," Beethoven. Carl Faelten, soloist.

THE WASHINGTON POST
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 3,

TEN YEARS OF MUSIC

Interesting Review of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts.

WORK OF THE CONDUCTORS

Some of the Features Which Have Made the Forty-two Concerts Worthy of Note—Gericke, Nikisch and Paur Contrasted—A Remarkable List of Soloists—Washington Noticeable for the Frequent Change of Room, Church and Hall Being Utilized.

A thoroughly delighted audience listened with enthusiastic appreciation yesterday afternoon to the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Congregational Church. The organization was known here only by reputation, but the high praise which had preceded it was fully realized in every sense. Of the orchestra itself too much in the way of commendation cannot be said.

This was the welcome extended to the Boston Symphony Orchestra by The Post on the morning after its first concert in this city, Tuesday afternoon, April 13, 1886. It does not seem ten years ago since that event, so vividly does the mind recall its chief features. The Congregational Church—then the only available concert hall—was but fairly well filled. Up in Boston, to be sure, the orchestra had been known and appreciated for five years, but to Washington it was wholly new. We had seen Thomas, but Gericke was a stranger, and what we know of the the Boston organization was a matter of simple faith. We knew that in 1881 a music-loving citizen of Boston, actuated solely by a desire to present good music in the best way, and fortunately possessed of ample means to carry out his most commendable impulse, had conceived the idea of a large, permanent orchestra, and had brought his dream to a most successful realization. To-day this Boston organization—then gradually making its influence felt and its fame known—has grown to be a national pride, an orchestra absolutely second to none in the world, whose name and reputation commands respect in every cultured city on the globe, dependent upon no subsidy from the public exchequer, as is the case in all the European cities, but rather upon the generous liberality of a music-loving Bostonian.

Well, to go back again to that first concert, one recalls how the players glanced with curious interest around the church as they ascended the platform and with what eager interest the appearance of Herr Gericke was awaited. Broad-shouldered, well-built, black-bearded, this handsome and accomplished Austrian stepped upon the platform and into the regard of the Washington people.

For the sake of reminiscence, the programme of the first concert in this city is given, as follows:

Overture—"Oberon" ..... Weber
Hungarian Dances ..... Brahms
Largo ..... Handel
(Obligato solo by Mr. Kneisel.)
Overture—"Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Rondo Capriccioso ..... St. Saens
Mr. T. Adamowski.
Symphonic Poem—"Les Preludes" ..... Liszt
Overture—"Lenore, No. 3" ..... Beethoven

This concert was the first of the forty-two which have since been given by the orchestra. Thirteen were under Gericke, nineteen under Nikisch, and ten under the present leader, Mr. Paur. Four concerts were given jointly with the Washington Choral Society, one of these being the dedication of Lincoln Music Hall, in connection also with the National Conservatory of Music, under Mrs. Thurber. And what a roving time the orchestra has had in Washington, to be sure! Next to Baltimore, this city holds the record for change of audience room. Of the forty-two concerts fourteen were in the Congregational Church, fifteen in Metzerott Hall, ten in Lincoln Music Hall, two in the New National Theater, and one in Albaugh's Theater. From church to playhouse, then to hall and back again to church, the loyal clientele of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would no doubt have followed it even had it played in a tent.

And this devotion calls to mind the fact that year after year one sees the same faces at the concerts. Many music-lovers like to secure the same seats each season, but whether in the same place or not, they are sure to be seen somewhere in the hall. So marked is this feature of the concerts that for a regular habitue each appearance of the orchestra is the occasion for a reunion of familiar, friendly faces and sympathetic hearts.

Washington never knew George Henschel as a conductor. He had served three years, and had gone back to London before the orchestra came here. Mr. Gericke, his successor is well-remembered. To him can be attributed much of the wonderful precision and finish which the orchestra has attained. After five years of untiring zeal and persistent striving for absolute perfection of ensemble, during which time he spared neither himself nor the orchestra, he returned to Vienna, leaving behind him the stamp of a skill so marvelous that it cannot be effaced. In connection with his return an interesting incident is related. Just as he was about to leave Vienna for the United States, the "Geselschaft Musikfreund" offered him its leadership, and when he declined, promised to keep the position at his disposal until he should return. The society kept its word, and Mr. Gericke, upon reaching Vienna, assumed direction. He retained the place until last season, a period of six years, and is at present resting upon well-deserved laurels.

As a conductor, Mr. Gericke was noticeable for the perfection to which he brought the strings in the orchestra. Such smoothness and unanimity was a revelation in those days. It is true that this excellence seemed to be achieved at a loss of warmth and fire. The playing was like a polished crystal, beautiful to admire, but cold. In numbers where the violins, violas, and 'cellos were prominent, as in the dainty serenade by Volkman, and the Moszkowski suite, there was a finish that still lingers in the memory as a delight. The Moszkowski suite, by the way, deserves to be remembered as a record-breaker in the history of the orchestra. It was given at a concert on the afternoon of May 3, 1888, and created such a furore that it was repeated the next evening, being substituted for a Schumann symphony. This is the first, last, and only time the orchestra ever changed its programme under such circumstances.

Nikisch came next—Nikisch, the poetic, the romantic, the graceful Hungarian. He was the leader of the Stadt Theater at Leipsic, the first opera house in that city. His reign was for four years, a year longer than that of Mr. Henschel and a year less than Mr. Gericke. One thing, the Boston Syphony Orchestra has always done for its conductors—it has given to them greater renown than was theirs when they assumed control. Henschel, Gericke, and Nikisch must all admit that greater fame attended their return to Europe because of their association with America's foremost orchestra. Nikisch, on leaving Boston, was appointed director of the Royal Opera, and also conductor of the orchestra at Buda-Pesth, but has just accepted a more congenial position as the conductor of the Gewandhaus concerts at Leipsic.

Mr. Nikisch delighted in the picturesque—such odd expressions of musical fancy, for instance, as the Peer Gynt suite by Greig. His temperament was very different from Gericke's. He exercised to the highest degree the right of tempo rubato, as the musicians call it—the privilege of giving to each work an individual interpretation. He gave to Liszt's preludes a wonderful lucidity, he imparted to the fantastic creations of Saint-Saens a weird beauty. Wagner, too, he understood and appreciated, and the evenings he gave to the compositions of that master were among the most successful in his career. He was always self-contained and self-praised—indeed, sometimes his self-consciousness was almost too assertive.

When Nikisch left the Stadt Theater in Leipsic to go to Boston he was followed by the same man who succeeded him as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Mr. Emil Paur. It is also worthy of comment that Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur played at the same desk as first violinists at the very same Stadt Theater several years before. Mr. Paur is cast in a different mold from either of his predecessors, for his enthusiasm manifests itself in a most pronounced fashion whenever he takes the baton in his hand. He is catholic in his tastes, appreciative and intelligent in his reading, and a thorough musician in every sense.

It would take a column in itself to relate all that might be said interestingly of the soloists who have appeared at the concerts, Mme. Fursch-Madi, Mme. Nordica, Miss Emma Juch, Mme. Materna, Miss Mary Howe, Mme. Meilke, Mrs. Georg Henschel, Miss De Vere, Mrs. Nikisch, Mme. Bosta-Tavary, Miss Kutscherra, and Mrs. Wyman—what a world of melody these names evoke! It was Theodor Reichmann who gave a mystic sweetness to the "Evening Star" song from "Tannhauser." Georg Henschel sang the fire scene from "Die Walkure." Anton Schott and the love song from the same opera are still an inspiriting memory, and Mr. Dipple and Mr. Max Heinrich are also remembered. Carl Baerman's name recalls Beethoven's majestic Emperor Concerts, Ignace Paderewski and a dainty minuet come together in the mind. De Pachmann and Chopin are associated with each other, while Joseffy, Busoni, Sternberg, Mme. Steinbach—Jahns, Miss Aus der Ohe, Mrs. Bloomfield Zeisler, Mrs. Ernst Lent, and Miss Margilies form a list of eminent pianists. On the violin we have heard Cesar Thomson, Franz Kneisel, Boeffler, Lichtenberg, and Adamowski, while the cello has found its master in Mr. Schroeder and Mr. Schulz.

There was a time, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra first came among us ten years ago, when the people of Washington had to be educated by reiterated statement into a knowledge of the marvelous excellence of the organization. Thank heaven, that time has passed. From a single concert in the spring the series has grown to a concert every month during the winter season, and in no city in the country does the orchestra find a more intelligent, appreciative, and generous welcome than is now accorded it by the Washington public.

THE SALE OF SEASON TICKETS for the FIVE CONCERTS BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, at METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, OPENS NEXT TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 5, AT NINE A. M.

The Times
TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES
PHILADELPHIA, NOVEMBER 3, 1895.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

The Origin of the Fine Organization That Begins Its Eleventh Season Here.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give the first concert of its eleventh season in Philadelphia at the Academy of Music Monday evening of next week, affords an encouraging example of the success that may be won by thorough artistic effort when supported by adequate financial backing. Philadelphia, it must be recalled, was the first city outside of New England visited by this organization, its first concert at the Academy being given on Saturday evening, April 10, 1886. The programme embraced the "Oberon" overture, Handel's Largo, Brahms' Hungarian dances, the Beethoven violin concerto, with Mr. Kneisel as soloist, the march from the "Lenore" symphony and the "Tannhauser" overture, with two soprano solos by Madame Fursch-Madi. The impression made at that time has been increased and the audiences have grown to be the largest in the country, not excepting Boston, though consideration must be given to the two series of twenty-four concerts each given by the orchestra at home as against five here. And Philadelphia gives this orchestra the best place for its performances in America. Its Boston patrons would be glad to enjoy the concerts in so splendid an auditorium.

The history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is worthy of attention at this time. In 1881, a music-loving citizen of Boston, actuated solely by a desire to present good music in the best way, and happily possessed of ample means to carry out his impulse, conceived the idea of a large permanent orchestra, which should give each year a series of concerts in Music Hall, Boston, with an occasional visit to the adjacent New England cities. This idea was at once acted upon and the Boston Symphony Orchestra began its existence, and to-day what was then a Boston organization has grown to be a national pride, an orchestra second to none in the world, dependent upon no subsidy from the public exchequer, as is the case in all the European cities, but rather upon the generous liberality of a music-loving Bostonian, to whom it is no longer an expense but a source of profit, though Mr. Higginson has devoted its gains to its improvement. Forty-six concerts have been given in this city, fourteen under Wilhelm Gericke, twenty-two under Arthur Nikisch and ten under the present conductor, Emil Paur. On the weekly trips made by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Philadelphia and Brooklyn are the only two cities in which the concerts have been given in the same place from the start. In the same length of time the audience room in Baltimore has changed six times, in Washington five and in New York four.

Georg Henschel was the first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and retained this position for three years, and on his retirement in 1885 located in London, where he met with success as a composer and teacher, and in a few years assumed the leadership of a large orchestra in London, giving twelve concerts each year in St. James Hall. He is now conducting opera at Covent Garden. Mr. Henschel's successor was Wilhelm Gericke, who came from Vienna, and to this second leader can be attributed much of the remarkable precision and finish of the orchestra. Five years of untiring zeal and persistent striving for perfection of ensemble, during which time he spared neither the orchestra nor himself, and Mr. Gericke returned to Vienna, leaving behind him the stamp of a skill that cannot be effaced. It was a compliment to Mr. Gericke that on his arrival in Vienna he at once assumed the leadership of the "Geselschaft Musikfreund," a society not unlike the Handel and Haydn Society in Boston, the orchestra, however, playing a much most important part. The society having offered its leadership to Mr. Gericke just as he was leaving Vienna for America, they said they would keep the offer open to him until he should return, and they kept their word. Mr. Gericke retained this position until last season, a period of six years, and is at present resting on his laurels.

The third and youngest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was Arthur Nikisch, a Hungarian, leader of the orchestra at the Stadt Theatre, at Leipsic, the first opera house in that city. His reign was for four years, a year longer than that of Mr. Henschel and a year less than Mr. Gericke. One thing the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always done for its conductors—it has given to them a greater renown than was theirs when they assumed control. Henschel, Gericke and Nikisch must all own a greater fame attended their return to Europe because of their association with this orchestra. Nikisch, on leaving Boston, was appointed director of the Royal Opera and also conductor of the orchestra at Buda-Pesth, but has just accepted a more congenial position as the conductor of the Gewandhaus concerts in Leipsic.

When Arthur Nikisch left the Stadt Theatre in Leipsic to come to Boston he was succeeded by the same man who followed him as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the present leader, Emil Paur. It is also worthy of comment that Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur played at the same desk as first violinist under Mr. Gericke at the same Stadt Theatre several years before.

The list of soloists who have appeared at the concerts in this city from the beginning is a notable one. They are Lilli Lehmann, Emma Eames, Mme. Nordica, Mme. Fursch-Madi, Mme. Materna, Emma Juch, Mme. Mielke, Miss De Vere, Miss Meisslinger, Mrs. Georg Henschel, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mme. Basta-Tavary, Mrs. Wyman, Miss Blauvelt, Mme. Steinbach-Jahns, Miss Aus der Ohe, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, MinnieWetzler, Teresina Tua, Geraldine Morgan, Paul Kalisch, Max Heinrich, Mr. Dippel, Georg Henschel, Eugen D'Albert, Joseffy, De Pachmann, Baermann, Busoni, Grunfeld, Ysaye, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder, Hekking.

Madame Melba will be the soloist at the first concert this season, when the following programme will be given:

Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, Eroica; Haendel, Aria, "Sweet Bird;" Berlioz, Menuet des Follets and Valse des Sylphes from "La Damnation de Faust;" A. Thomas, Ophelia's Mad Scene from "Hamlet;" Wagner, Kaiser Marsch.

The list of works to be performed at subsequent concerts includes: Schumann, Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major; Brahms, Symphony No. 2, in D major; Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 6, first time; Beethoven, Overture, "Dedication of the House;" Humperdinck, Overture, "Hansel and Gretel," first time; Cornelius, Overture, "Barber of Bagdad;" Berlioz, Overture, "Corsair," first time; Rezniceck, Overture, "Donna Diana," first time; Godard, Suite, first time; Haendel, Largo; Mozart, Variations; Dvorak, Capriccio; Richard Strauss, Prelude and Entr'acte, "Guntram," first time; Wagner, Ride of the Valkyries.

[33]

HE PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER—SUNDAY
NOVEMBER 3. 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Something About the Results of the Past Ten Seasons.

At th beginning of the eleventh season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city, a condensed resume of the career of this now famous organization will prove of interest.

Forty-six concerts have been given in this city, fourteen under Wilhelm Gericke, twenty-two under Arthur Nikisch and ten under the present conductor, Emil Paur. It is a noteworthy fact that on the weekly trips made by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Philadelphia and Brooklyn are the only two cities in which the concerts have been given in the same place from the start. In the same length of time the audience room in Baltimore has changed six time, in Washington five, and in New York four.

Mr. George Henschel was the first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and retained this position for three years, and on his retirement in 1885 located in London, where he met with his usual success as a composer and teacher, and in a few years assumed the leadership of a large orchestra in London, giving twelve concerts each year in St. James' Hall.

Mr. Henschel's successor was Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who came from Vienna, and to this second leader can be attributed much of the wonderful precision and finish of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Five years of untiring zeal and persistent striving for absolute perfection of ensemble, during which time he spared neither the orchestra nor himself, Mr. Gericke returned to Vienna, leaving behind him the stamp of a skill so marvelous that it cannot be effaced.

The third and youngest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was Arthur Nikisch, a Hungarian, leader of the orchestra at the Stadt Theatre at Leipsic, the first opera house in that city. His reign was for four years, a year longer than that of Mr. Henschel and a year less than Mr. Gericke. One thing the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always done for its conductors—it has given to them a greater renown than was theirs when they assumed control. Henschel, Gericke and Nikisch must all own a greater fame attended their return to Europe because of their association with America's first orchestra. Nikisch on leaving Boston was appointed director of the Royal Opera and also conductor of the orchestra at Buda-Pesth, but has just accepted a more congenial position as conductor of the Gewandhous concerts in Leipsic.

When Arthur Nikisch left the Stadt Theatre in Leipsic to come to Boston he was succeeded by the same man who followed him as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the present leader, Mr. Emil Paur. It is also worthy of comment that Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur played at the same desk as first violinists under Mr. Gericke at the very same Stadt Theatre several years before.

Here is a list of the soloists who have appeared at the concerts in this city from the beginning, which is indeed a notable one: Mme. Lilli Lehmann, Mme. Emma Eames, Mme. Nordica, Mme. Fursch-Madi, Mme. Materna, Miss Emma Juch, Mme. Mielke, Miss De Vere, Miss Meisslinger, Mrs. George Henschel, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mme. Basta-Tavary, Mrs. Wyman, Miss Blauvelt, Mme. Steinbach-Jahns, Miss Aus der Ohe, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Miss Minnie Wetzler, Miss Teresina Tua, Miss Geraldine Morgan, Messrs. Paul Kalisch, Max Heinrich, Mr. Dippel, George Henschel, Eugen D'Albert, Mr. Joseffy, Mr. De Pachmann, Mr. Baermann, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Grunfeld, Mr. Ysaye, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Adamowski, Mr. Schroeder and Mr. Hekking.

Below is a program of the first concert for this season:

Beethoven—Symphony No. 3. . . . "Eroica"
Haendel—Aria. . . . . "Sweet Bird"
Berlioz—"Menuet des Follets" and "Valse des Sylphes," from "La Damnation de Faust."
A. Thomas—"Ophelia's Mad Scene" from "Hamlet."
Wagner. . . . . "Kaiser Marsch"
Soloist—Madame Melba.

THE SALE OF SEASON TICKETS for the FIVE CONCERTS BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, at the ACADEMY OF MUSIC, OPENS AT FISCHER'S, 1221 CHESTNUT STREET, TOMORROW (MONDAY) MORNING, NOVEMBER 4, AT NINE.

NOTE—E[illegible] be rece noon and Night, and returns, round by round and CORBETT-FITZSIMMONS FIGHT.

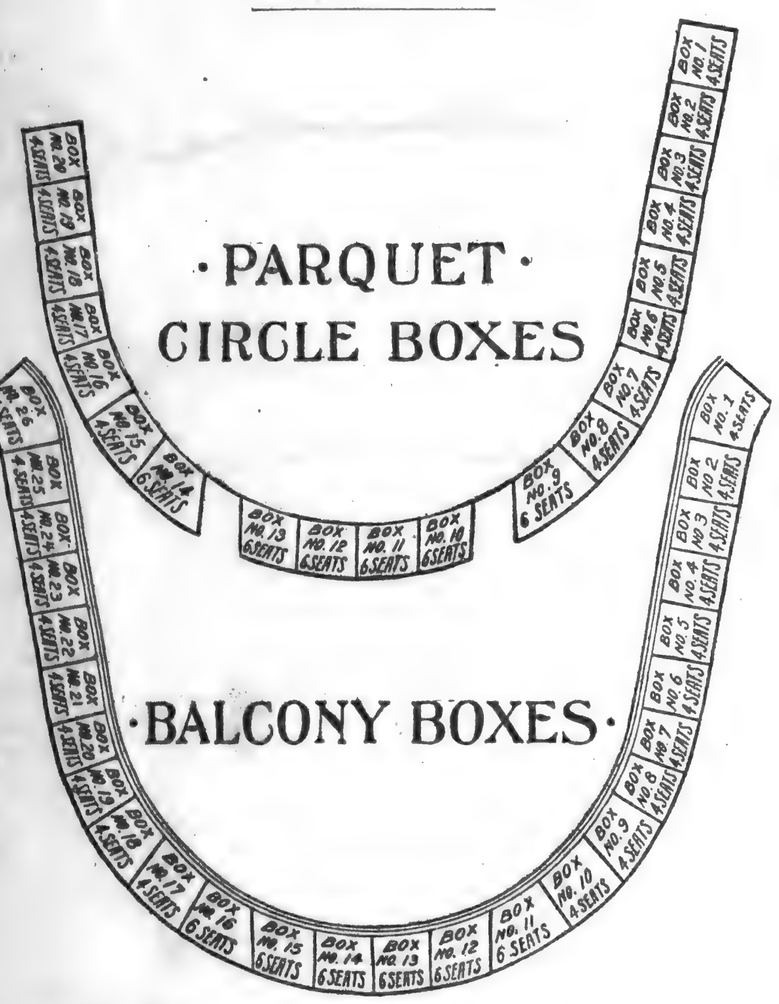
THE SALE OF SEASON TICKETS FOR THE FIVE CONCERTS BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC, OPENS AT FISCHER'S, 1221 CHESTNUT STREET, NEXT MONDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 4, AT NINE.

THE BOXES AT THE OPERA

Diagram of the Arrangement of Boxes at the Academy, With the Names of the Occupants for the Season.



PROSCENIUM BOXES.

No. 1. Mrs. John R. Fell.
No. 3. Mr. Anthony J. Drexel.

PARQUET CIRCLE BOXES.

1. Mrs. Charles S. Whelen.
2. Miss Christine W. Biddle.
3. Mrs. Harry C. Hart.
4. Mr. Charles H. Cramp.
5. Mr. Frank Thomson.
6. Mr. Clement A. Griscom.
7. The Misses Wheeler.
8. Mr. William W. Frazier.
9. Mr. Spencer Ervin.
10. Mr. Alfred C. Harrison.
11. Mr. Robert K. McNeely.
12. Mr. Craige Lippincott.
13. Mr. Thomas McKean.
14. Mrs. Thomas A. Scott.
15. Mr. C. Hartman Kuhn.
16. Mr. Beauveau Borie.
17. Mr. Andrew Wheeler, Jr.
18. Dr. S. Weir Mitchell.
19. Mr. Edward Morrell.
20. Hon. Edwin H. Fitler.

BALCONY BOXES.

1. Mrs. Floyd H. White, Mr. Byerly Hart.
2. Mrs. Jones Wister.
3. Mr. Edgar H. Butler.
4. Mrs. John E. Newbold.
5. Mr. A. J. Antelo.
6. Mr. John Cadwalader.
7. Mr. Charles Morton Smith.
8. Mr. William M. Singerly.
9. Mr. E. T. Stotesbury.
10. Miss Chew and Mr. Richard L. Ashhurst
11. Mr. James B. Markoe.
12. Miss A. L. Wright.
13. Mr. E. C. Knight.
15. Mrs. Henry C. Gibson.
16. Mr. George H. McFadden.
17. Mr. George C. Thomas.
18. Mrs. Laura Gilpin Hoopes.
19. Mr. William H. Staake.
20. Mr. William Ellis Scull.
21. Mr. Chancellor C. English.
22. Mr. James W. Paul, Jr.
23. Mr. Frank T. Patterson.
24. Mr. Sidney F. Tyler.
25. Mr. W. B. Burr.
26. Mr. W. C. Bullitt.

[illegible] PHILADELPHIA
SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 2

On Saturday evening, April 10, 1886, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert in Philadelphia at the Academy of Music. The programme was as follows, with the addition of two arias by Madame Fursch-Madi:—

Overture, Oberon.....Weber
Largo.....Handel
Hungarian Dances.....Brahms
Concerto for violin.....Beethoven
Mr. Franz Kneisel, Soloist.
March from "Lenore" Symphony.....Raff
Overture, Tannhaeuser.....Wagner

The Orchestra was already in the fifth year of its existence and in the second year of Mr. Gericke's regime. It is a noteworthy fact that this was the first concert given by the Orchestra outside of New England, as the opening concerts in Baltimore and Washington were held in the following week. Philadelphia has given a heartier support to this organization than any other city in the country, the audiences which in the last five or six years have filled the Academy of Music to overflowing excelling in point of numbers those in any other city visited. It is also acknowledged by the Orchestra managers and members of the Band that the Academy of Music is a place par excellence for a symphony concert, and that Bostonians would be delighted were they afforded as admirable an audience-room.

At the beginning of its eleventh season in this city, opening at the Academy Monday, November 11, a brief sketch of the career of the Orchestra will prove of interest. In 1881 Mr. Higginson, a music-loving citizen of Boston, actuated solely by a desire to present good music in the best way, and possessed of means ample to carry out this most commendable impulse, conceived the idea of a large permanent orchestra, which should give each year an extended series of concerts in Music Hall, Boston, with an occasional visit to the adjacent New England cities. This idea was at once acted upon, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra began its existence, and to-day what was then a Boston enterprise has grown to be a national pride—an orchestra second to none in the world.

Forty-six concerts have been given by it in this city—fourteen under Wilhelm Gericke, twenty-two under Arthur Nikisch, and ten under the present conductor, Emil Paur. In the trips made by the Orchestra, Philadelphia and Brooklyn are the only two cities in which the concerts have been given in the same place from the start. In the same length of time the audience-room in Baltimore has changed six times, in Washington five, and in New York four.

Mr. George Henschel was the first conductor of the Orchestra, and retained this position for three years. His successor was Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who came from Vienna, and to this second leader can be attributed much of the precision and finish of the Orchestra. After five years of untiring zeal and persistent striving for perfection of ensemble, Mr. Gericke returned to Vienna. The third and youngest conductor of the Orchestra was Arthur Nikisch, a Hungarian, leader of the orchestra at the Stadt Theatre at Leipsic. His reign was for four years, a year longer than that of Mr. Henschel and a year less than Mr. Gericke. One thing the Boston Orchestra has always done for its conductors—it has given to them a greater renown than was theirs when they assumed control. Henschel, Gericke, and Nikisch must all own a greater fame attended their return to Europe because of their association with it.

When Arthur Nikisch left the Stadt Theatre in Leipsic to come to Boston he was succeeded by the same man who followed him as conductor of the Boston Orchestra, the present leader, Mr. Emil Paur. It is also curious that Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur played at the same desk as first violinists under Mr. Gericke at the very same Stadt Theatre several years before.

Below is the programme of the first concert of the new Philadelphia season, November 11:—

Symphony No. 3, "Eroica".....Beethoven
Aria, "Sweet Bird".....Handel
"Menuet des Follets" and "Valse des Sylphes," from La Damnation de Faust.....
"Ophelia's Mad Scene," from Hamlet.....A. Thomas
"Kaiser March".....Wagner
Soloist—Madame Melba.

ILADELPHIA PRESS.
NOVEMBER 3, 1895

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Boston paid Philadelphia the compliment of sending to the latter city its favorite musical organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for its first concert outside of New England. This was now nearly ten years ago, on the evening of Saturday, April 10, 1886, and the programme was as follows: Weber, overture, "Oberon;" Aria, Mme. Fursch-Madi; Haendel, Largo; Brahms, Hungarian Dances; Beethoven, concerto for violin, Mr. Franz Kneisel; Raff, march from "Lenore" Symphony; Aria, Mme. Fursch-Madi; Wagner, overture, "Tannhauser." From that day to this the organization has grown in popularity, until to-day it is safe to say that the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia are as much a part of the musical season as in Boston. With due allowance for the greater number of concerts given in Boston the audience at the Philadelphia concerts compare most favorably with the attendance at home, and in points of numbers exceed those in any other city visited. It must be conceded to Philadelphia that the Academy of Music affords the very finest audience room in this country for a symphony concert, and Bostonians to-day are longing for an equally attractive auditorium. The feature of the first concert of the eleventh season on Monday night a week will be Madame Melba.

THE SALE OF SEASON TICKETS for the FIVE CONCERTS BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, at the ACADEMY OF MUSIC, OPENS AT FISCHER'S, 1221 CHESTNUT STREET, TOMORROW (MONDAY) MORNING, NOVEMBER 4, AT NINE.

[34]

PHILADELPHIA, PA.,

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1895.

A BIT OF MUSICAL HISTORY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concerts in This City.

FIRST HEARD HERE TEN YEARS AGO

Something About the Formation, Direction and Achievements of a Famous Organization.

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra was listened to through a most enjoyable concert with wondering delight. We hope it will visit us soon again." This was the hearty welcome extended to the Boston Symphony Orchestra by The North American after its first concert in Philadelphia on Saturday evening, April 10, 1886, and it is safe to say that not once during the ten years that this organization has visited Philadelphia has this welcome been repeated. Philadelphia compares more favorably with Boston than any other city in the United States in the generous support given to these concerts. In the last five years crowded houses have been the rule rather than the exception, and Bostonians envy the Philadelphia patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra their Academy of Music, which is the audience room par excellence in this country for symphony concerts.

At the beginning of the eleventh season in this city a brief sketch of the career of the orchestra, which was already in its fifth year when it made its debut here, will prove of interest. In 1881 a music-loving citizen of Boston, actuated solely by a desire to present good music in the best way, and fortunately possessed of means ample to carry out his most commendable impulse, conceived the idea of a large permanent orchestra, which should give each year an extended series of concerts in Music Hall, Boston, with an occasional visit to the adjacent New England cities. This idea was at once acted upon, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra began its existence, and today what was then a Boston organization has grown to be a national pride—an orchestra second to none in the world, whose name and fame are known in every cultured city on the globe, dependent upon no subsidy from the public exchequer, as is the case in all of the European cities, but rather upon the generous liberality of a music-loving Bostonian.

EMIL PAUR.

The programme of the first concert was as follows:

Overture, "Oberon".....Weber
Aria.....Mme. Fursch-Madi
Largo.....Haendel
Hungarian Dances.....Brahms
Concerto for Violin.....Beethoven
Mr. Franz Kneisel.
March from "Lenore" Symphony.....Raff
Aria.....Mme. Fursch-Madi
Overture, "Tannhauser".....Wagner

Forty-six concerts have been given in this city, fourteen under Wilhelm Gericke, twenty-two under Arthur Nikisch, and ten under the present conductor, Emil Paur. It is a noteworthy fact that on the weekly trips made by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Philadelphia, which is the only two cities in which these concerts have been given in the same place from the start, in the same length of time the audience room in Baltimore has changed six times, in Washington five and in New York four.

A few facts about the various conductors of the orchestra seems appropriate in a resume of this kind.

Mr. Georg Henschel was the first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and retained this position for three years, and on his retirement in 1885 located in London, where he met with his usual success as a composer and teacher, and in a few years assumed the leadership of a large orchestra in London, giving twelve concerts each year in St. James' Hall.

Mr. Henschel's successor was Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who came from Vienna, and to this second leader can be attributed much of the wonderful precision and finish of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Five years of untiring zeal and persistent striving for absolute perfection of ensemble, during which time he spared neither the orchestra nor himself, and Mr. Gericke returned to Vienna, leaving behind him the stamp of a skill so marvellous that it cannot be effaced.

BEN DAVIES.

The third and youngest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was Arthur Nikisch, a Hungarian, leader of the orchestra at the Stadt Theatre at Leipsic, the first opera house in that city. His reign was for four years, a year longer than that of Mr. Henschel, and a year less than Mr. Gericke. Nikisch on leaving Boston was appointed director of the Royal Opera and also conductor of the orchestra at Buda-Pesth, but has just accepted a more congenial position as the conductor of the Gewandhaus concerts in Liepsic.

When Arthur Nikisch left the Stadt Theatre in Leipsic to come to Boston he was succeeded by the same man who followed him as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the present leader, Mr. Emil Paur. It is also worthy of comment that Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur played at the same desk as first violinists under Mr. Gericke at the very same theatre several years before.

Here is a list of the soloists who have appeared at these concerts in this city from the beginning. It is indeed a notable one:

Mme. Lilli Lehman, Mme. Emma Eames, Mme. Nordica, Mme. Fursch-Madi, Mme. Materna, Miss Emma Juch,

RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

Mme. Mielke, Miss De Vere, Miss Meisslinger, Mrs. Georg Henschel, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mme. Basta-Tavary, Mrs. Wyman, Miss Blauvelt, Mme. Steinbach-Jahns, Miss Aus der Ohe, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Miss Minnie Wetzler, Miss Teresina Tua, Miss Geraldine Morgan, Mr. Paul Kalisch, Mr. Max Heinrich, Mr. Dippel, Mr. Georg Henschel, Mr. Eugen D'Albert, Mr. Joseffy, Mr. De Pachmann, Mr. Baermann, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Grunfeld, Mr. Ysaye, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Adamowski, Mr. Schroeder, Mr. Hekking.

MME. MELBA.

[35]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1895.

* * *

The program of the third Symphony concert given last night in Music Hall was as follows:

Symphony, Harold in Italy.....Berlioz
Viola solo, Mr. Kneisel.
Dream Pantomime, Hänsel and Gretel.....Humperdinck
First time.
Fantasia, Francesca da Rimini.....Tschaikowsky
First time.
Overture, Sakuntala.....Goldmark

As I wrote you last week the fantasia by Tschaikowsky was first played here December 31, 1891, by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Mr. Listemann.

It is a singular fact that, while Tschaikowsky's setting of the pitiable story of Madonna Francesca had never been played at a symphony concert before last night, and Bazzini's setting has been played, Mr. Arthur Foote's version has been played twice within four years. But Tschaikowsky has been dead two years, and Bazzini is an old man over there in Italy. Ah, the lucky composer who is always on the ground!

This fantasia of Tschaikowsky does not seem to be the equal of Romeo and Juliet or Hamlet. I think it preceded them, as well as Manfred, in date of composition. It shows more or less a constant desire to experiment in orchestral effects. There are wondrous bits of tone painting, as in the depictment of the black air that castigates the carnal malefactors: Semiramis and Dido; Helen and Cleopatra; Tristan and Paris; "dames of eld and cavaliers." There is occasionally a gigantic, overwhelming moment; but there is much detail of little interest; there is the suspicion of padding; and the love episode is remarkable neither for sensuousness nor for heroic passion. This episode becomes almost a theme and variations:

> As turtle doves, called onward by desire,
> With open and steady wings to the sweet nest
> Fly through the air by their volition borne.

This is clearly and sanely painted, but the continual chirping and cooing of the flutes becomes tiresome. How infinitely superior in its superb and noble sensuousness is the love theme in Romeo and Juliet! How higher the flights of imagination in Hamlet! And yet disappointing as is this work as a whole, there are pages that reveal the individuality of a rare genius.

* * *

You have heard Hänsel and Gretel and know the effect of the dream pantomime music in its proper place. We were obliged last evening to become acquainted with an excerpt stripped of its accessories, torn from its setting. And to me the music seemed like that of a faithful and intelligent student of Wagner. As the opera will be given here later, let us defer further discussion till its performance.

* * *

The performance of the orchestra was brilliant throughout the evening. The Harold Symphony was admirably given. Mr. Kneisel was in his happiest mood. One was not obliged to ask, with Byron:

> But where is he, the Pilgrim of my song,
> The being who upheld it through the past?
> Methinks he cometh late and tarries long.

When one reflects on the fact that Harold was first produced in 1834, several years before Rienzi saw the footlights, he marvels at the genius of Berlioz in orchestral invention. What Saint-Saëns said of the history of his feeling toward Schumann's piano quintet is true when applied to many students of Berlioz. At first they admire frenetically; later they question, they listen to the charges of "melodic poverty," "lack of thematic development," "dazzling tricks" and are half persuaded to underrate the colossal works; yet after hearing often the music of those who lean so heavily on his shoulders, they again marvel at the fiery, romantic genius of the eagle beaked Frenchman. The last time I heard Harold, it seemed something of a bore; last night I reproached myself for having entertained and expressed the thought. In comparison with the gropings and the occasional lucky discoveries of Tschaikowsky, the thick splendor of Humperdinck, the sultry Orientalism of Goldmark, the music of Berlioz stood out in clear and bold relief. Each instrument, even in the stormiest passage, was to be distinguished. What effects gained by simple means, as in the march, and in the weird reminiscence of the march that occurs in the coda of the Orgy!

The program of the concert this week will include entracte Guntrum, R. Strauss; concerto for piano, Raff; symphony No. 9, Mozart; overture, Dedication of the House, Beethoven.

* * *

I spoke two weeks ago of an acute attack of heterophemy that had attacked Mr. Apthorp. It would appear that he now suffers from a second attack, for in the program book of the third concert he says: "The work (Harold) was first given in public at the Conservatoire in Paris on November 23, 1834. * * * Paganini was present at the first performance; he expressed his delight with the work by sending Berlioz a check for 20,000 frs."

Now, these are the facts: Paganini was not present at the first performance. He did hear Berlioz's Symphonic Fantastique December 22, 1833. But he did not hear the Harold Symphony before December 16, 1838, when it was played with the Fantastique at a concert conducted by Berlioz at the Conservatory. Then Paganini and his son, Achille, appeared at the orchestra door. The next day Achille brought Berlioz a letter, in which Paganini asked him to hand an inclosed note to Rothschild.

* * *

I hope that the heterophemy will yield to heroic treatment. If it should become chronic we may have this season the unhappy spectacle of Mr. Apthorp finding fault with some choral performance conducted by Mr. Lang, or admitting gladly that he sees clearly into Mr. MacDowell's suite, whereas on the 28th ult. he remarked in his cockiest manner: "We own to not understanding this suite of his in the least."

Of course any such spectacle as this would shake Boston to its very foundations.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 10, 1895.

Fourth of This Season's Symphony Concerts.

The usual large audience crowded Music hall last evening and gave cordial evidence of thoroughly enjoying the program arranged by conductor Paur for the fourth of this season's symphony concerts. The selections consisted of the preludes to the first and second acts of the opera "Guntram," by Richard Strauss, concerto for pianoforte in C minor by Joachim Raff, the "Parisian" symphony in D major by Mozart, and the "Consecration of the House," overture by Beethoven.

Mr. Carl Faelton was the soloist, and he naturally received a very hearty greeting, for he is one of the ablest and most popular of local pianists. He is generally heard once during each season with the symphony orchestra, and his appearance is eagerly awaited by his numerous admirers. Particularly gratifying is this annual performance to the students of the N. E. conservatory of music, of which Mr Faelton is principal, and there was a notably large attendance of students at both the Friday afternoon rehearsal and last night's concert.

Mr Faelton's refinement of style and highly developed techniuqe were admirably displayed yesterday. His interpretation of Raff's interesting, but excessively elaborated concerto, was a finished and scholarly performance. It was the second time that he had played this work with the symphony orchestra, and it proved a very acceptable selection to the audience.

The andante is rather the most interesting of the three movements, and Mr Faelton played it with exceeding grace and delicacy of expression. The brilliant finale, allegro, was interpreted with splendid spirit and facility of execution. He was repeatedly recalled after the performance.

The preludes to the Strauss opera, "Guntram" were played here for the first time. The opera was produced at Weimer in 1894, and is the last important composition by the Viennese composer. The motive of the work is that the power of song is more potent than that of the sword, and the prelude to the first act is intended to portray divine love and exalted compassion, expressed in the pleading and caressing melody of song. The themes are simple, but are elaborately developed and ornamented with sugary effects. Certain passages are extremely beautiful, and they were interpreted with exquisite effect by the orchestra. The only adverse criticism to be made is that so much simple sweetness is likely to become monotonous. The prelude to the second act, the triumph of song, is more spirited and diversified. The work is elaborately scored for full modern orchestra. It was given a brilliant performance under Mr Paur's direction.

Mozart's delightful symphony was played with superb effect, probably better than ever before by the Boston orchestra. Beethoven's grand and impressive overture, "Consecration of the House," was intelligently and effectively interpreted by the orchestra.

There will be no symphony concert this week. For Nov 23 the program will be: Overture, "Oberon," Weber; Monologue from "Die Goetterdaemmerung;" Scotch symphony, Mendlessohn; Tragic overture, Brahms. Soloist, Miss Marie Brema.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 10, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The novelty of the Symphony concert last night was the first hearing of the preludes to Acts I. and II. of "Guntram," by Richard Strauss. It was very well received, in fact better than any of the better known and proven numbers of the attractive programme.

"Guntram" is founded upon an order of knights banded to fight for the cross and brotherly love by word and song, the movement of the first prelude expressing the uplifted calm of unity in the faith with appealing harmony in its evenness, and the second prelude presents the festival of victory, full of the spirit of triumph. Both of the numbers are unbound by technical orchestration and commonplace developments, but there is a reminder of Wagner at his loudest in the song of triumph, and one is reminded that the injunction is being obeyed to "shout aloud the good news to all nations." But there was contained in it a brilliance and spirit that proved contagious to the audience.

Carl Faelten, the soloist, played with admirable finish Joachim Raff's concerto for pianoforte in C minor, and the accompaniment of the orchestra was highly pleasing; indeed, it is to be noticed that the orchestra this season seems to enter more into the spirit of their work and play in better time than for many years. Mozart's "Parisian" symphony in D major and Beethoven's overture, "Consecration of the House," filled out the programme and were heartily applauded for the fineness of their presentation as much as their intrinsic worth. There will be no rehearsal and concert next week.

The North American.
PHILADELPHIA, PA.,
MONDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1895.

A BIT OF MUSICAL HISTORY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concerts in This City.

FIRST HEARD HERE TEN YEARS AGO

Something About the Formation, Direction and Achievements of a Famous Organization.

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra was listened to through a most enjoyable concert with wondering delight. We hope it will visit us soon again." This was the hearty welcome extended to the Boston Symphony Orchestra by The North American after its first concert in Philadelphia on Saturday evening, April 10, 1886, and it is safe to say that not once during the ten years that this organization has visited Philadelphia has this welcome been recalled. Philadelphia compares more favorably with Boston than any other city in the United States in the generous support given to these concerts. In the last five years crowded houses have been the rule rather than the exception, and Bostonians envy the Philadelphia patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra their Academy of Music, which is the audience room par excellence in this country for symphony concerts.

At the beginning of the eleventh season in this city a brief sketch of the career of the orchestra, which was already in its fifth year when it made its debut here, will prove of interest. In 1881 a music-loving citizen of Boston, actuated solely by a desire to present good music in the best way, and fortunately possessed of means ample to carry out his most commendable impulse, conceived the idea of a large permanent orchestra, which should give each year an extended series of concerts in Music Hall, Boston, with an occasional visit to the adjacent New England cities. This idea was at once acted upon, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra began its existence, and today what was then a Boston organization has grown to be a national pride—an orchestra second to none in the world, whose name and fame are known in every cultured city on the globe, dependent upon no subsidy from the public exchequer, as is the case in all of the European cities, but rather upon the generous liberality of a music-loving Bostonian.

EMIL PAUR.

The programme of the first concert was as follows:

Overture, "Oberon".....Weber
Aria.....Mme. Fursch-Madi
Largo.....Haendel
Hungarian Dances.....Brahms
Concerto for Violin.....Beethoven
Mr. Franz Kneisel.
March from "Lenore" Symphony.....Raff
Aria.....Mme. Fursch-Madi
Overture, "Tannhauser".....Wagner

Forty-six concerts have been given in this city, fourteen under Wilhelm Gericke, twenty-two under Arthur Nikisch, and ten under the present conductor, Emil Paur. It is a noteworthy fact that on the weekly trips made by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Philadelphia and Brooklyn are the only two cities in which the concerts have been given in the same place from the start. In the same length of time the audience room in Baltimore has changed six times, in Washington five and in New York four.

A few facts about the various conductors of the orchestra seems appropriate in a resume of this kind.

Mr. Georg Henschel was the first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and retained this position for three years, and on his retirement in 1885 located in London, where he met with his usual success as a composer and teacher, and in a few years assumed the leadership of a large orchestra in London, giving twelve concerts each year in St. James' Hall.

Mr. Henschel's successor was Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who came from Vienna, and to this second leader can be attributed much of the wonderful precision and finish of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Five years of untiring zeal and persistent striving for absolute perfection of ensemble, during which time he spared neither the orchestra nor himself, and Mr. Gericke returned to Vienna, leaving behind him the stamp of a skill so marvellous that it cannot be effaced.

BEN DAVIES.

The third and youngest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was Arthur Nikisch, a Hungarian, leader of the orchestra at the Stadt Theatre at Leipsic, the first opera house in that city. His reign was for four years, a year longer than that of Mr. Henschel, and a year less than Mr. Gericke. Nikisch on leaving Boston was appointed director of the Royal Opera and also conductor of the orchestra at Buda-Pesth, but has just accepted a more congenial position as the conductor of the Gewandhaus concerts in Liepsic.

When Arthur Nikisch left the Stadt Theatre in Leipsic to come to Boston he was succeeded by the same man who followed him as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the present leader, Mr. Emil Paur. It is also worthy of comment that Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur played at the same desk as first violinists under Mr. Gericke at the very same theatre several years before.

Here is a list of the soloists who have appeared at these concerts in this city from the beginning. It is indeed a notable one:

Mme. Lilli Lehman, Mme. Emma Eames, Mme. Nordica, Mme. Fursch-Madi, Mme. Materna, Miss Emma Juch,

RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

Mme. Mielke, Miss De Vere, Miss Meisslinger, Mrs. Georg Henschel, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mme. Basta-Tavary, Mrs. Wyman, Miss Blauvelt, Mme. Steinbach-Jahns, Miss Aus der Ohe, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Miss Minnie Wetzler, Miss Teresina Tua, Miss Geraldine Morgan, Mr. Paul Kalisch, Mr. Max Heinrich, Mr. Dippel, Mr. Georg Henschel, Mr. Eugen D'Albert, Mr. Joseffy, Mr. De Pachmann, Mr. Baermann, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Grunfeld, Mr. Ysaye, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Adamowski, Mr. Schroeder, Mr. Hekking.

MME. MELBA.

[35]

The Musical Courier.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1895.

* * *

The program of the third Symphony concert given last night in Music Hall was as follows:

Symphony, Harold in Italy.....Berlioz
Viola solo, Mr. Kneisel.
Dream Pantomime, Hänsel and Gretel.....Humperdinck
First time.
Fantasia, Francesca da Rimini.....Tschaikowsky
First time.
Overture, Sakuntala.....Goldmark

As I wrote you last week the fantasia by Tschaikowsky was first played here December 31, 1891, by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Mr. Listemann.

It is a singular fact that, while Tschaikowsky's setting of the pitiable story of Madonna Francesca had never been played at a symphony concert before last night, and Bazzini's setting has been played, Mr. Arthur Foote's version has been played twice within four years. But Tschaikowsky has been dead two years, and Bazzini is an old man over there in Italy. Ah, the lucky composer who is always on the ground!

This fantasia of Tschaikowsky does not seem to be the equal of Romeo and Juliet or Hamlet. I think it preceded them, as well as Manfred, in date of composition. It shows more or less a constant desire to experiment in orchestral effects. There are wondrous bits of tone painting, as in the depictment of the black air that castigates the carnal malefactors: Semiramis and Dido; Helen and Cleopatra; Tristan and Paris; "dames of eld and cavaliers." There is occasionally a gigantic, overwhelming moment; but there is much detail of little interest; there is the suspicion of padding; and the love episode is remarkable neither for sensuousness nor for heroic passion. This episode becomes almost a theme and variations:

> As turtle doves, called onward by desire,
> With open and steady wings to the sweet nest
> Fly through the air by their volition borne.

This is clearly and sanely painted, but the continual chirping and cooing of the flutes becomes tiresome. How infinitely superior in its superb and noble sensuousness is the love theme in Romeo and Juliet! How higher the flights of imagination in Hamlet! And yet disappointing as is this work as a whole, there are pages that reveal the individuality of a rare genius.

* * *

You have heard Hänsel and Gretel and know the effect of the dream pantomime music in its proper place. We were obliged last evening to become acquainted with an excerpt stripped of its accessories, torn from its setting. And to me the music seemed like that of a faithful and intelligent student of Wagner. As the opera will be given here later, let us defer further discussion till its performance.

* * *

The performance of the orchestra was brilliant throughout the evening. The Harold Symphony was admirably given. Mr. Kneisel was in his happiest mood. One was not obliged to ask, with Byron:

> But where is he, the Pilgrim of my song,
> The being who upheld it through the past?
> Methinks he cometh late and tarries long.

When one reflects on the fact that Harold was first produced in 1834, several years before Rienzi saw the footlights, he marvels at the genius of Berlioz in orchestral invention. What Saint-Saëns said of the history of his feeling toward Schumann's piano quintet is true when applied to many students of Berlioz. At first they admire frenetically; later they question, they listen to the charges of "melodic poverty," "lack of thematic development," "dazzling tricks" and are half persuaded to underrate the colossal works; yet after hearing often the music of those who lean so heavily on his shoulders, they again marvel at the fiery, romantic genius of the eagle beaked Frenchman. The last time I heard Harold, it seemed something of a bore; last night I reproached myself for having entertained and expressed the thought. In comparison with the gropings and the occasional lucky discoveries of Tschaikowsky, the thick splendor of Humperdinck, the sultry Orientalism of Goldmark, the music of Berlioz stood out in clear and bold relief. Each instrument, even in the stormiest passage, was to be distinguished. What effects gained by simple means, as in the march, and in the weird reminiscence of the march that occurs in the coda of the Orgy!

The program of the concert this week will include entracte Guntrum, R. Strauss; concerto for piano, Raff; symphony No. 9, Mozart; overture, Dedication of the House, Beethoven.

* * *

I spoke two weeks ago of an acute attack of heterophemy that had attacked Mr. Apthorp. It would appear that he now suffers from a second attack, for in the program book of the third concert he says: "The work (Harold) was first given in public at the Conservatoire in Paris on November 23, 1834. * * * Paganini was present at the first performance; he expressed his delight with the work by sending Berlioz a check for 20,000 frs."

Now, these are the facts: Paganini was not present at the first performance. He did hear Berlioz's Symphonic Fantastique December 22, 1833. But he did not hear the Harold Symphony before December 16, 1838, when it was played with the Fantastique at a concert conducted by Berlioz at the Conservatory. Then Paganini and his son, Achille, appeared at the orchestra door. The next day Achille brought Berlioz a letter, in which Paganini asked him to hand an inclosed note to Rothschild.

* * *

I hope that the heterophemy will yield to heroic treatment. If it should become chronic we may have this season the unhappy spectacle of Mr. Apthorp finding fault with some choral performance conducted by Mr. Lang, or admitting gladly that he sees clearly into Mr. MacDowell's suite, whereas on the 28th ult. he remarked in his cockiest manner: "We own to not understanding this suite of his in the least."

Of course any such spectacle as this would shake Boston to its very foundations.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, NOV. 10, 1895.

Fourth of This Season's Symphony Concerts.

The usual large audience crowded Music hall last evening and gave cordial evidence of thoroughly enjoying the program arranged by conductor Paur for the fourth of this season's symphony concerts. The selections consisted of the preludes to the first and second acts of the opera "Guntram," by Richard Strauss, concerto for pianoforte in C minor by Joachim Raff, the "Parisian" symphony in D major by Mozart, and the "Consecration of the House," overture by Beethoven.

Mr Carl Faelton was the soloist, and he naturally received a very hearty greeting, for he is one of the ablest and most popular of local pianists. He is generally heard once during each season with the symphony orchestra, and his appearance is eagerly awaited by his numerous admirers. Particularly gratifying is this annual performance to the students of the N. E. conservatory of music, of which Mr Faelton is principal, and there was a notably large attendance of students at both the Friday afternoon rehearsal and last night's concert.

Mr Faelton's refinement of style and highly developed techniuqe were admirably displayed yesterday. His interpretation of Raff's interesting, but excessively elaborated concerto, was a finished and scholarly performance. It was the second time that he had played this work with the symphony orchestra, and it proved a very acceptable selection to the audience.

The andante is rather the most interesting of the three movements, and Mr Faelton played it with exceeding grace and delicacy of expression. The brilliant finale, allegro, was interpreted with splendid spirit and facility of execution. He was repeatedly recalled after the performance.

The preludes to the Strauss opera, "Guntram" were played here for the first time. The opera was produced at Weimer in 1894, and is the last important composition by the Viennese composer. The motive of the work is that the power of song is more potent than that of the sword, and the prelude to the first act is intended to portray divine love and exalted compassion, expressed in the pleading and caressing melody of song. The themes are simple, but are elaborately developed and ornamented with sugary effects. Certain passages are extremely beautiful, and they were interpreted with exquisite effect by the orchestra. The only adverse criticism to be made is that so much simple sweetness is likely to become monotonous. The prelude to the second act, the triumph of song, is more spirited and diversified. The work is elaborately scored for full modern orchestra. It was given a brilliant performance under Mr Paur's direction.

Mozart's delightful symphony was played with superb effect, probably better than ever before by the Boston orchestra. Beethoven's grand and impressive overture, "Consecration of the House," was intelligently and effectively interpreted by the orchestra.

There will be no symphony concert this week. For Nov 23 the program will be: Overture, "Oberon," Weber; Monologue from "Die Goetterdaemmerung;" Scotch symphony, Mendlessohn; Tragic overture, Brahms. Soloist, Miss Marie Brema.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 10, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The novelty of the Symphony concert last night was the first hearing of the preludes to Acts I. and II. of "Guntram," by Richard Strauss. It was very well received, in fact better than any of the better known and proven numbers of the attractive programme.

"Guntram" is founded upon an order of knights banded to fight for the cross and brotherly love by word and song, the movement of the first prelude expressing the uplifted calm of unity in the faith with appealing harmony in its evenness, and the second prelude presents the festival of victory, full of the spirit of triumph. Both of the numbers are unbound by technical orchestration and commonplace developments, but there is a reminder of Wagner at his loudest in the song of triumph, and one is reminded that the injunction is being obeyed to "Shout aloud the good news to all nations." But there was contained in it a brilliance and spirit that proved contagious to the audience.

Carl Faelten, the soloist, played with admirable finish Joachim Raff's concerto for pianoforte in C minor, and the accompaniment of the orchestra was highly pleasing; indeed, it is to be noticed that the orchestra this season seems to enter more into the spirit of their work and play in better time than for many years. Mozart's "Parisian" symphony in D major and Beethoven's overture, "Consecration of the House," filled out the programme and were heartily applauded for the fineness of their presentation as much as their intrinsic worth. There will be no rehearsal and concert next week.

NOVEMBER [illegible], 1895

NINE YEARS OF CONCERT.

BROOKLYN RECORD OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

This Great Musical Aggregation Will Come Again Before Long With Emil Paur at Its Head—Some of the Selections to Be Played.

The announcement of the sale of seats for the first concert in Brooklyn this season by the Boston Symphony orchestra affords an opportunity to recall the first appearance of this now famous organization in this city nine years ago.

In 1881 a music loving citizen of Boston, actuated solely by a desire to present good music in the best way, and fortunately possessed of means ample to carry out his most commendable impulse, conceived the idea of a large permanent orchestra, which should give each year an extended series of concerts in Music hall, Boston, with an occasional visit to the adjacent New England cities. This idea was at once acted upon, and the Boston Symphony orchestra began its existence, and to-day what was then a Boston organization has grown to be a national pride—an orchestra second to none in the world, whose name and fame are known in every cultured city on the globe, dependent upon no subsidy from the public exchequer, as is the case in all of the European cities, but rather upon the generous liberality of a music loving Bostonian.

The Boston Symphony orchestra was already in its seventh season at the date of its first concert in Brooklyn, on the evening of December 12, 1887, and Wilhelm Gericke was in the fourth year of his reign as conductor. The soloist was Miss Gertrude Edmands, a Boston contralto, and the programme was as follows:

Overture—"Der Freyschutz" .....Weber
Aria—"The Dawn Still Lingers".....Bruch
Prelude—Adagio and gavotte for strings,
Bach-Baohrich
Funeral march.....Schubert-Liszt
Song—"The Old Song".....Grieg
Song—"The Young Nun".....Schubert
Symphony No. 2, in D.....Beethoven

With the exception of the two seasons of 1889-90 and 1890-91, the Boston Symphony orchestra has given concerts in Brooklyn every year since its first appearance. In the seven years that this organization has visited Brooklyn it has given a total of forty concerts, or to be more exact, nineteen public rehearsals and twenty-one concerts. Of these, two were under the direction of Wilhelm Gericke, twenty under Arthur Nikisch and eighteen under the present conductor, Emil Paur. Since 1892 the concerts have been given under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic society. A list of the soloists who have appeared at these concerts is appended: Mme. Eames, Mme. Nordica, Miss Juch, Mrs. Georg Henschel, Mme Materna, Miss Edmands, Mrs. Nikisch, Miss Desvignes, Miss Aus der Ohe, Mrs. Bloomfield Zeisler, Miss Wetzler, Georg Henschel Max Heinrich, M. Paderewski, M. D'Albert, Mr. Stavenhagen, M. Scharwenka, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Adamowski, Mr. Schroeder, Mr. Schulz.

Before mentioning a few interesting facts as to the careers of the various conductors, it seems only just to recall the excellent opportunities Brooklyn has enjoyed to hear the best orchestras in this country under the direction of the ablest conductors. Theodore Thomas, who more than any other one man in this country created a love of and desire for the best in music; Anton Seidl, who has for the past six years given his best energies to a most excellent series of concerts; Walter Damrosch, the talented son of a distinguished father, must not be forgotten in a resume of the past.

Georg Henschel was the first conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and retained this position for three years, and on his retirement in 1885, located in London, where he met with his usual success as a composer and teacher, and in a few years assumed the leadership of a large orchestra in London, giving twelve concerts each year in St. James' hall.

Mr. Henschel's successor was Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who came from Vienna, and to this second leader can be attributed much of the wonderful precision and finish of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Five years of untiring zeal and persistent striving for absolute perfection of ensemble, during which time he spared neither the orchestra nor himself, Mr. Gericke returned to Vienna, leaving behind him the stamp of a skill so marvelous that it cannot be effaced. It was indeed a gracious compliment to Mr. Gericke that on his arrival in Vienna he at once assumed the leadership of the Gesselschaft Musikfreund, a society not unlike the Handel and Haydn society, in Boston, the orchestra, however, playing a much more important part. The above society having offered the leadership to Mr. Gericke just as he was leaving Vienna for America, they said they would keep the offer open to him until he should return, and they kept their word. Mr. Gericke retained this position until last season, a period of six years, and is at present resting on his well deserved laurels.

The third and youngest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra was Arthur Nikisch, a Hungarian, leader of the orchestra at the Stadt theater at Leipsic, the first opera house in that city. His reign was for four years, a year longer than that of Mr. Henschel and a year less than Mr. Gericke's. One thing the Boston Symphony orchestra has always done for its conductors, it has given to them a greater renown than was theirs when they assumed control. Henschel, Gericke and Nikisch must all own a greater fame attended their return to Europe because of their association with America's first orchestra. Nikisch, on leaving Boston, was appointed director of the Royal opera, and also conductor of the orchestra at Buda Pesth, but has just accepted a more congenial position as the conductor of the Gewandhaus concerts in Leipsic.

When Arthur Nikisch left the Stadt theater in Leipsic to come to Boston he was succeeded by the same man who followed him as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the present leader, Emil Paur. It is also worthy of comment that Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur played at the same desk as first violinists under Mr. Gericke at the very same Stadt theater several years before.

Mr. Paur enters upon his third year with the orchestra this season and below will be found a summary of works he has promised the patrons of the Brooklyn concerts, a list of the soloists and a programme of the first concert.

[illegible] "Rienzi" .....Wagner
[illegible] "Meistersinger," act III.....Wagner
[illegible] "Tannhauser," act III.....Wagner
[illegible] "Feerie" and "Valse des [illegible]
[illegible] from "La Damnation de [illegible]
.....Berlioz
[illegible] "Carlo Broschi".....Auber

The above programme will be interspersed with solo numbers by Mme. Melba, Mme. [illegible], M. D'Aubigne and Signor Campanari, to be announced later. The following artists will also appear during the series: Mme. Vera-Saplo, Mme. Blauvelt, Mr. [illegible], Mr. Joseffy, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. [illegible], Mr. Schroeder and others. The [illegible] will be performed [illegible]

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVIII., NO. 133.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Two Interesting Novelties Presented Last Night.

Selections from Richard Strauss Heard Here for First Time—Both in Most Extreme Modern German Vein—Wild Vagaries of the Modern School—Brilliant Orchestral Playing.

The programme for the concert last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was:

Preludes to acts 1 and 2 of "Guntram"..
R. Strauss
Concerto, C minor, for pianoforte.....Raff
Symphony No. 39, "Parisian".....Mozart
Overture, "Consecration of the House"...
Beethoven

The soloist was Mr. Carl Faelten. The selections from Richard Strauss were heard here for the first time. Both are in the extremest modern German vein; in other words, there is a lavish affluence of orchestration and a barren poverty of ideas. The composer has avoided, studiously or otherwise, anything resembling what is generally understood as melody. There are brief themes, having no discoverable connection with each other and presented under a multitude of aspects in regard to tone color. Beyond this there is little that impresses itself on the mind except chaotic emptiness and bewildering noise. Strauss is generally claimed as a follower of the Wagner school, but he carries the Wogner method into the wildly grotesque, especially in orchestration. He seems to revel in causing ugly harmonies to break unexpectedly on the ear. He is unquestionably a master of instrumentation, but that is now a common crime, the indulgence in which enables even mediocrities to give a certain lurid pomp to their commonplaces in the sunburst of glowing tone color in which they envelop them. These preludes mean nothing and tell nothing distinctly. The prelude to act 1 meanders on its way with a vaguely voluptuous pretentiousness, but it is little else than musical sawdust served up with a rich and highly seasoned dressing. It might be considered as an effort to prove the truth of the French saying that it is the sauce which makes the fish, only that it is all sauce and no fish; unsubstantial froth, provocative of mental biliousness and indigestion generally.

The scoring is wonderfully ingenious and effective, even masterly in its originality and the knowledge it displays of all the resources of the modern orchestra, but otherwise it suggests the heathen raging and imagining a vain thing. This movement, however, is even tamely mild in its extravagances compared with the prelude to act 2. This opens with a lively theme that is abundant in promise of something better. It even takes on the aspect of a tune, but after a few bars its playfulness assumes a leviathan ponderousness; the lightness of an elephant in silk stockings disporting itself on a tight rope. Now and then the music becomes a miracle of cacophony; the bass drum rages, the tuba bellows, the trombones roar and the cymbals scream, the whole in grotesque savagery and suggesting the crack of doom. This is not music, but the raving of a mad degenerate. The gloomy essay in the programme book on "The Model System" became almost cheering and blithesome by comparison. The score makes the most exacting demands on the virtuosity of the players, but they were brilliantly met, and the performance was interesting, if the music was not. It was well, nevertheless, that an opportunity was given to hear these compositions, for they are much talked of in Germany, and their production here was useful in keeping the musical public in touch with contemporary art as illustrated by the more famous composers of the day.

The Mozart symphony, with its clearness, its tunefulness, its artistic use of a means to a distinctly defined end, came as a welcome relief after all of this noise, vagueness and confusion. It was beautifully and sympathetically read by Mr. Paur, and delightfully played. The Beethoven overture, far from the best of the master's work in its order, also received a thoroughly fine interpretation.

The Raff concerto, despite some fine moments, is largely made up of bombast, and has a plentiful share of commonplace, not to say vulgarity. Its treatment in the orchestra is always interesting, and the solo part offers every opportunity for the performer to manifest his skill. Mr. Faelten played it with virility and unflagging energy, and his technique was clear and flexible and able. Something less of steadily maintained vigor would have given greater variety of light and shade to his performance, but he was heartily applauded and twice recalled.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Oberon," Weber; monologue from "Die Gotterdammerung," Wagner; "Scotch" symphony, Mendelssohn; songs; tragic overture, Brahms. The soloist will be Miss Marie Bremer.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY.

Excerpts From the "Guntram" of Strauss.

The program of the fourth Symphony concert given last evening was as follows:

Preludes to Acts I. and II. of "Guntram"
Richard Strauss
(First time.)
Concerto for piano, C minor, op. 185...Raff
Symphony No. 39, D major, "Parisian"
Mozart
Overture, "Consecration of the House"
Beethoven

The program book stated that "Guntram, opera in three acts, the text and music by Richard Strauss, was first brought out at the Musicians' Festival at Weimar, in 1894." The statement is incorrect. The opera was first brought out at the Weimar Opera House, May 10, 1894. The Musicians' Festival at Weimar in 1894 was May 31-June 6.

***

Inasmuch as "Guntram" is unknown to us, we are obliged to listen to these preludes as though they were absolute music, without a definite purpose; as the inducing of a mood, a preparation for the dramatic action that follows, or, in the case of the second prelude, a contrast, or an explanation, or an announcement like the "20 years are supposed to elapse, etc.," so dear to writers of melodrama. The music, no doubt, suffers in consequence.

Yet is the first of these preludes—it was played in Chicago by Thomas's Orchestra Nov. 2—full of suggestion. Given the word Guntram and this prelude; here is a problem to be worked out by each hearer, and without doubt there are many wildly differing answers.

To you, madam, it may have suggested a cathedral. To you, a philosopher, it may have suggested infinity. To a third, something rumbling and vaguely agreeable. To me it was all white, mystic, wonderful. However you may regard its purpose or its meaning, you must admit the beauty, the spirituality, the freedom from earthly dross. It is easy to look wise, to say now "Lohengrin," and again "Tristan," and yet again "Parsifal," but there is much in the prelude that is Richard Strauss. Do you object to the synchronism in one passage of two decided tonalities? Is there not thereby a genuine effect? This is not simply a striving after the bizarre. Strauss wanted that particular effect; he got it; and I would not exchange for it the whole of the symphony by Mozart, with the overture by Beethoven thrown in. This young man, for Strauss is only 31, has written music that commands respect as well as music that is perplexing or disheartening in its pessimism, as the Don Juan fantasie, in which our old friend from Spain is sophisticated and deeply versed in Schopenhauer. But I do not remember anything by him that gives such assurance of his serene mastery of a subject as the prelude played last night, all white, mystic, wonderful.

The prelude to act two is "The Festival of Victory at the Duke's Court." Here we have Strauss, the student of Berlioz. But Berlioz in tumultuous joy, in orchestral jamborees, is a hard man to imitate, for he is always distinct in the height of his frenzy. Twist the rhythm as Strauss will, shock by sudden contrasts, set off blue lights and rockets and pin-wheels and cannon crackers -when the whole show is over, and there remains stunned ears, aching eyes, lame legs, the smell of powder and burnt paper, there is the one final opinion: "After all, Berlioz gave us a better show." Yet, in its proper place, this orchestral hurrah may serve its purpose.

***

Bülow never showed more clearly his devotion to Raff than when he insisted on playing his piano-concerto. The Raff of the greater symphonies is one man, a romantic creature, with a mastery of counterpoint and moments of genuine inspiration and gorgeous expression. The Raff of the piano-pieces is for the most part a contriver of pot-boilers, with a mastery of counterpoint and an eye to cheap applause. This concerto, we are told by some learned German, is a masterpiece because—because, forsooth, "in each movement all the subjects are in double counterpoint with one another." This may be so: it does not prevent the work from being intrinsically vulgar. I know of hardly anything more pathetic in the history of music than the necessity of Raff. Here was a man of fine thought, of acknowledged skill, of pure, romantic spirit, obliged to write for publishers and public that he might eat and clothe himself and have a place to sleep in. The pity of it, that such a man should write such a concerto, with its boarding-school prettiness, and its circus finale.

Mr. Faelten's performance of it was no doubt as good as it deserved. He was conscientious and careful and always respectable. There was never any exhibition of the overwhelming artistry that sometimes glorifies that which is commonplace and redeems that which is inherently vulgar.

***

Mozart's symphony in D pleased the Parisians of 1778. But that was over a century ago. In this work there are few traces of the smile of Mozart, the smile that suggests the tear. I doubt if Mr. Paur would play it today, or if anybody would listen to it respectfully and patiently, if it did not bear Mozart's name.

Nor is the Beethoven overture a mighty joy. Who cares for Beethoven when he wrote "in the style of Handel?" It is when we listen to his music written in the style of Beethoven that we bow the knee.

***

The people of Chicago last evening had an opportunity of hearing Thomas's Orchestra in this program:

Overture, "Genoveva".....Schumann
Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic"..Tschaikowsky
Symphonic Poem, "Les Eolides" (first time).....Cesar Franck
Scherzo, "Queen Mab," "Romeo and Juliet".....Berlioz
Ball Scene, "Romeo and Juliet".....Berlioz

How long will it be before we hear in Boston the orchestral works of César Franck, one of the greatest composers of the last 50 years?

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 10, 1895.

Changing his programme considerably from what was announced last week, Mr. Paur began his fourth concert with its only novelty, which was composed of the preludes to the first and second acts of Richard Strauss's recent opera, "The Fighters for Love," first staged at the Royal Opera House in Munich in April last. The work takes its name from that of a company of religionists who banded themselves in the thirteenth century in the hope that the spread of the gospel of Brotherly Love might be hastened and strengthened by the influence of music upon the people. The first prelude seems to aim at expressing the gradual assembly of the votaries of the new faith, their sturdy and active concentration in energetic purpose and their calmer, sweeter assertion of principle and purpose in order to conquer by persuasion. For the movement opens with a pleasant phrase which, drifting in from various voices in slighly modified forms, becomes at last the nucleus of a great harmonic concentration, which is followed in its turn by a stressful episode that is gradually resolved into new quietude of fullness. The second prelude is entitled "The Festival of Victory at the Duke's Court," and quite lives up to its denotement. Of all the followers of Wagner, this Strauss is in many respects the best; for he has ideas of his own, his heart beats high and hard and he has a spirit far beyond mere imitation. The first bars of the leading prelude suggested at once the mood of "Parsifal;" but in another instant one met the pure, clear, individual melody descending toward him and the master was thenceforth only traceable as an influence. In both preludes an almost extreme orchestration is used—two pairs of kettle drums, bass-clarinet, double bassoon, bass drum, snare-drum, cymbals and tamborine; but somehow, even at the height of heights, this instrumentation sounds softer, gentler and less elephantine than the more formally developed climaxes of Wagner, who often overbears us by sheer weight of metal rather than by growth of harmonious tonality. The two pieces were found interesting and evidently much enjoyed, pleasure being heightened by their reasonable brevity, their eminent contrasts and their appropriate performance.

Mr. Carl Faelten then played from Raff the G-minor concerto for pianoforte, opus 185. After the exceeding richness and depth of the Strauss extracts,—the former of which, by the way, was especially full and noble in its wind combinations,—Raff actually seemed thin and pallid; but after a little the excited ear began to accustom itself to the cooler, more simple style and followed Mr. Faelten with great pleasure, the greatest part of which was due to the smooth, song-like andante and the bright, stirring speed of the finale. Mr. Faelten is one of our best pianists in technical equipment, and he is the most nervously energetic and enthusiastic of all, his eager disposition sometimes tempting him to go too far in force and haste. He was in fine vein and displayed to particular advantage the rapidity and distinctness of his finger work and his breadth of emphatic phrasing. The orchestra supported him well, although in the coda it seemed now and then as if he wanted to hurry them into some fitful despatch of single passages.

Mr. Paur next placed Mozart's symphony in D-major, number 39, often known as the "Parisian," because he wrote and first gave it in that city about the middle of 1772. Its three movements (for it has no scherzo) brought the young composer high praise, because their thoughts had novelty as well as beauty of form, but Mozart saw how he could better his work, and so rewrote the andante into the shape it bears today. It is not long, but it is all compacted of beauties and daintiness—not a great work, but one instinct with joy, hope and gayety, even in its calmer moments, which is better far than scolasticism or philosophy for the listener's spirit. It was charmingly played.

A good, broad, dignified rendering of Beethoven's "Dedicating of the House" overture, which always seems more respectable than loveable, ended the concert.

The eccentric programme-book continued its dreary, dull drawl about the history of the "modal system," with pages of pedantic talk anent "authentic," "plagal," "hypomixo" and other modes, gave five pages of personal chatter about opera librettos, bestowed three pages upon the familiar Beethoven overture and said not one word about the piano-forte concerto or its player!

The next concert—a fortnight hence—will be thus ordered: Weber, Overture, "Oberon;" Wagner, Monologue from "Die Goetterdaemmerung;" Mendelssohn, Scotch Symphony;" Songs; Brahms, Tragic Overture. Soloist, Miss Marie Brema.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

[36]

EAGLE-SUNDAY
NOVEMBER 3, 18

NINE YEARS OF CONCERT.

BROOKLYN RECORD OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

This Great Musical Aggregation Will Come Again Before Long With Emil Paur at Its Head—Some of the Selections to Be Played.

The announcement of the sale of seats for the first concert in Brooklyn this season by the Boston Symphony orchestra affords an opportunity to recall the first appearance of this now famous organization in this city nine years ago.

In 1881 a music loving citizen of Boston, actuated solely by a desire to present good music in the best way, and fortunately possessed of means ample to carry out his most commendable impulse, conceived the idea of a large permanent orchestra, which should give each year an extended series of concerts in Music hall, Boston, with an occasional visit to the adjacent New England cities. This idea was at once acted upon, and the Boston Symphony orchestra began its existence, and to-day what was then a Boston organization has grown to be a national pride—an orchestra second to none in the world, whose name and fame are known in every cultured city on the globe, dependent upon no subsidy from the public exchequer, as is the case in all of the European cities, but rather upon the generous liberality of a music loving Bostonian.

The Boston Symphony orchestra was already in its seventh season at the date of its first concert in Brooklyn, on the evening of December 12, 1887, and Wilhelm Gericke was in the fourth year of his reign as conductor. The soloist was Miss Gertrude Edmands, a Boston contralto, and the programme was as follows:

Overture—"Der Freyschutz" .....Weber
Aria—"The Dawn Still Lingers".....Bruch
Prelude—Adagio and gavotte for strings.
Bach-Baohrich
Funeral march.....Schubert-Liszt
Song—"The Old Song".....Grieg
Song—"The Young Nun".....Schubert
Symphony No. 2, in D.....Beethoven

With the exception of the two seasons of 1889-90 and 1890-91, the Boston Symphony orchestra has given concerts in Brooklyn every year since its first appearance. In the seven years that this organization has visited Brooklyn it has given a total of forty concerts, or to be more exact, nineteen public rehearsals and twenty-one concerts. Of these, two were under the direction of Wilhelm Gericke, twenty under Arthur Nikisch and eighteen under the present conductor, Emil Paur. Since 1892 the concerts have been given under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic society. A list of the soloists who have appeared at these concerts is appended: Mme. Eames, Mme. Nordica, Miss Juch, Mrs. Georg Henschel, Mme Materna, Miss Edmands, Mrs. Nikisch, Miss Desvignes, Miss Aus der Ohe, Mrs. Bloomfield Zeisler, Miss Wetzler, Georg Henschel Max Heinrich, M. Paderewski, M. D'Albert, Mr. Stavenhagen, M. Scharwenka, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Adamowski, Mr. Schroeder, Mr. Schulz.

Before mentioning a few interesting facts as to the careers of the various conductors, it seems only just to recall the excellent opportunities Brooklyn has enjoyed to hear the best orchestras in this country under the direction of the ablest conductors. Theodore Thomas, who more than any other one man in this country created a love of and desire for the best in music; Anton Seidl, who has for the past six years given his best energies to a most excellent series of concerts; Walter Damrosch, the talented son of a distinguished father, must not be forgotten in a resume of the past.

Georg Henschel was the first conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and retained this position for three years, and on his retirement in 1885, located in London, where he met with his usual success as a composer and teacher, and in a few years assumed the leadership of a large orchestra in London, giving twelve concerts each year in St. James' hall.

Mr. Henschel's successor was Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who came from Vienna, and to this second leader can be attributed much of the wonderful precision and finish of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Five years of untiring zeal and persistent striving for absolute perfection of ensemble, during which time he spared neither the orchestra nor himself, Mr. Gericke returned to Vienna, leaving behind him the stamp of a skill so marvelous that it cannot be effaced. It was indeed a gracious compliment to Mr. Gericke that on his arrival in Vienna he at once assumed the leadership of the Geselschaft Musikfreund, a society not unlike the Handel and Haydn society, in Boston, the orchestra, however, playing a much more important part. The above society having offered the leadership to Mr. Gericke just as he was leaving Vienna for America, they said they would keep the offer open to him until he should return, and they kept their word. Mr. Gericke retained this position until last season, a period of six years, and is at present resting on his well deserved laurels.

The third and youngest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra was Arthur Nikisch, a Hungarian, leader of the orchestra at the Stadt theater at Leipsic, the first opera house in that city. His reign was for four years, a year longer than that of Mr. Henschel and a year less than Mr. Gericke's. One thing the Boston Symphony orchestra has always done for its conductors, it has given to them a greater renown than was theirs when they assumed control. Henschel, Gericke and Nikisch must all own a greater fame attended their return to Europe because of their association with America's first orchestra. Nikisch, on leaving Boston, was appointed director of the Royal opera, and also conductor of the orchestra at Buda Pesth, but has just accepted a more congenial position as the conductor of the Gewandhaus concerts in Leipsic.

When Arthur Nikisch left the Stadt theater in Leipsic to come to Boston he was succeeded by the same man who followed him as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the present leader, Emil Paur. It is also worthy of comment that Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur played at the same desk as first violinists under Mr. Gericke at the very same Stadt theater several years before.

Mr. Paur enters upon his third year with the orchestra this season and below will be found a summary of works he has promised to the patrons of the Brooklyn concerts, a list of the soloists and a programme of the first concert:

Overture—"Rienzi" .....Wagner
Prelude—"Tannhauser" act III.....Wagner
Prelude—"Lohengrin," act III.....Wagner
"Menuet des Follets" and "Valse des Sylphes," from "La Damnation de Faust" .....Berlioz
Overture—"Carlo Broschi".....Auber

The above programme will be interspersed with solo numbers by Mme. Melba, Mme. Scalchi, M. D'Aubigne and Signor Campanari, to be announced later. The following soloists will also appear during the series: Mme. De Vere-Saplo, Mme. Blauvelt, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Joseffy, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Adamowski, Mr. Schroeder and others. The following works will be performed:

Symphony No. 3, "Eroica".....Beethoven
Symphony No. 2, in D major.....Brahms
Symphony in C major.....Schubert
Symphony.....Haydn
Overture—"Corsair" (first time).....Berlioz
Overture—"Donna Diana" (first time).....Reznicek
Overture.....Handel
Overture.....Mozart
Prelude—"Guntram" (first time)
Richard Strauss
Overture.....Wagner
Symphony (new).....Goldmark
Overture.....Berlioz
Symphony.....Haydn
Symphony.....Tschaikowsky
Overture.....Weber

Miss [illegible], who is the star attraction at the opening concert, has met with success with her concert company. Miss [illegible] has been playing [illegible] Miss Melba has [illegible] Miss Davies [illegible] and Mme. Campanari and D'Au[illegible]

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVIII., NO. 133.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Two Interesting Novelties Presented Last Night.

Selections from Richard Strauss Heard Here for First Time—Both in Most Extreme Modern German Vein—Wild Vagaries of the Modern School—Brilliant Orchestral Playing.

The programme for the concert last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was:

Preludes to acts 1 and 2 of "Guntram"..
R. Strauss
Concerto, C minor, for pianoforte.....Raff
Symphony No. 39, "Parisian".....Mozart
Overture, "Consecration of the House"...
Beethoven

The soloist was Mr. Carl Faelten. The selections from Richard Strauss were heard here for the first time. Both are in the extremest modern German vein; in other words, there is a lavish affluence of orchestration and a barren poverty of ideas. The composer has avoided, studiously or otherwise, anything resembling what is generally understood as melody. There are brief themes, having no discoverable connection with each other and presented under a multitude of aspects in regard to tone color. Beyond this there is little that impresses itself on the mind except chaotic emptiness and bewildering noise. Strauss is generally claimed as a follower of the Wagner school, but he carries the Wogner method into the wildly grotesque, especially in orchestration. He seems to revel in causing ugly harmonies to break unexpectedly on the ear. He is unquestionably a master of instrumentation, but that is now a common crime, the indulgence in which enables even mediocrities to give a certain lurid pomp to their commonplaces in the sunburst of glowing tone color in which they envelop them. These preludes mean nothing and tell nothing distinctly. The prelude to act 1 meanders on its way with a vaguely voluptuous pretentiousness, but it is little else than musical sawdust served up with a rich and highly seasoned dressing. It might be considered as an effort to prove the truth of the French saying that it is the sauce which makes the fish, only that it is all sauce and no fish; unsubstantial froth, provocative of mental biliousness and indigestion generally.

The scoring is wonderfully ingenious and effective, even masterly in its originality and the knowledge it displays of all the resources of the modern orchestra, but otherwise it suggests the heathen raging and imagining a vain thing. This movement, however, is even tamely mild in its extravagances compared with the prelude to act 2. This opens with a lively theme that is abundant in promise of something better. It even takes on the aspect of a tune, but after a few bars its playfulness assumes a leviathan ponderousness; the lightness of an elephant in silk stockings disporting itself on a tight rope. Now and then the music becomes a miracle of cacophony; the bass drum rages, the tuba bellows, the trombones roar and the cymbals scream, the whole in grotesque savagery and suggesting the crack of doom. This is not music, but the raving of a mad degenerate. The gloomy essay in the programme book on "The Model System" became almost cheering and blithesome by comparison. The score makes the most exacting demands on the virtuosity of the players, but they were brilliantly met, and the performance was interesting, if the music was not. It was well, nevertheless, that an opportunity was given to hear these compositions, for they are much talked of in Germany, and their production here was useful in keeping the musical public in touch with contemporary art as illustrated by the more famous composers of the day.

The Mozart symphony, with its clearness, its tunefulness, its artistic use of a means to a distinctly defined end, came as a welcome relief after all of this noise, vagueness and confusion. It was beautifully and sympathetically read by Mr. Paur, and delightfully played. The Beethoven overture, far from the best of the master's work in its order, also received a thoroughly fine interpretation.

The Raff concerto, despite some fine moments, is largely made up of bombast, and has a plentiful share of commonplace, not to say vulgarity. Its treatment in the orchestra is always interesting, and the solo part offers every opportunity for the performer to manifest his skill. Mr. Faelten played it with virility and unflagging energy, and his technique was clear and flexible and able. Something less of steadily maintained vigor would have given greater variety of light and shade to his performance, but he was heartily applauded and twice recalled.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Oberon," Weber; monologue from "Die Gotterdammerung," Wagner; "Scotch" symphony, Mendelssohn; songs; tragic overture Brahms. The soloist will be Miss Marie Bremer.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY.

Excerpts From the "Guntram" of Strauss.

The program of the fourth Symphony concert given last evening was as follows:

Preludes to Acts I. and II. of "Guntram"
Richard Strauss
(First time.)
Concerto for piano, C minor, op. 185....Raff
Symphony No. 39, D major, "Parisian"
Mozart
Overture, "Consecration of the House"
Beethoven

The program book stated that "Guntram, opera in three acts, the text and music by Richard Strauss, was first brought out at the Musicians' Festival at Weimar, in 1894." The statement is incorrect. The opera was first brought out at the Weimar Opera House, May 10, 1894. The Musicians' Festival at Weimar in 1894 was May 31-June 6.

***

Inasmuch as "Guntram" is unknown to us, we are obliged to listen to these preludes as though they were absolute music, without a definite purpose; as the inducing of a mood, a preparation for the dramatic action that follows, or, in the case of the second prelude, a contrast, or an explanation, or an announcement like the "20 years are supposed to elapse, etc.," so dear to writers of melodrama. The music, no doubt, suffers in consequence.

Yet is the first of these preludes—it was played in Chicago by Thomas's Orchestra Nov. 2—full of suggestion. Given the word Guntram and this prelude: here is a problem to be worked out by each hearer, and without doubt there are many wildly differing answers.

To you, madam, it may have suggested a cathedral. To you, a philosopher, it may have suggested infinity. To a third, something rumbling and vaguely agreeable. To me it was all white, mystic, wonderful. However you may regard its purpose or its meaning, you must admit the beauty, the spirituality, the freedom from earthly dross. It is easy to look wise, to say now "Lohengrin," and again "Tristan," and yet again "Parsifal," but there is much in the prelude that is Richard Strauss. Do you object to the synchronism in one passage of two decided tonalities? Is there not thereby a genuine effect? This is not simply a striving after the bizarre. Strauss wanted that particular effect; he got it; and I would not exchange for it the whole of the symphony by Mozart, with the overture by Beethoven thrown in. This young man, for Strauss is only 31, has written music that commands respect as well as music that is perplexing or disheartening in its pessimism, as the Don Juan fantasie, in which our old friend from Spain is sophisticated and deeply versed in Schopenhauer. But I do not remember anything by him that gives such assurance of his serene mastery of a subject as the prelude played last night, all white, mystic, wonderful.

The prelude to act two is "The Festival of Victory at the Duke's Court." Here we have Strauss, the student of Berlioz. But Berlioz in tumultuous joy, in orchestral jamborees, is a hard man to imitate, for he is always distinct in the height of his frenzy. Twist the rhythm as Strauss will, shock by sudden contrasts, set off blue lights and rockets and pin-wheels and cannon crackers -when the whole show is over, and there remains stunned ears, aching eyes, lame legs, the smell of powder and burnt paper, there is the one final opinion: "After all, Berlioz gave us a better show." Yet, in its proper place, this orchestral hurrah may serve its purpose.

***

Bülow never showed more clearly his devotion to Raff than when he insisted on playing his piano-concerto. The Raff of the greater symphonies is one man, a romantic creature, with a mastery of counterpoint and moments of genuine inspiration and gorgeous expression. The Raff of the piano-pieces is for the most part a contriver of pot-boilers, with a mastery of counterpoint and an eye to cheap applause. This concerto we are told by some learned German, is a masterpiece because—because, forsooth, "in each movement all the subjects are in double counterpoint with one another." This may be so: it does not prevent the work from being intrinsically vulgar. I know of hardly anything more pathetic in the history of music than the necessity of Raff. Here was a man of fine thought, of acknowledged skill, of pure, romantic spirit, obliged to write for publishers and public that he might eat and clothe himself and have a place to sleep in. The pity of it, that such a man should write such a concerto, with its boarding-school prettiness, and its circus finale.

Mr. Faelten's performance of it was no doubt as good as it deserved. He was conscientious and careful and always respectable. There was never any exhibition of the overwhelming artistry that sometimes glorifies that which is commonplace and redeems that which is inherently vulgar.

***

Mozart's symphony in D pleased the Parisians of 1778. But that was over a century ago. In this work there are few traces of the smile of Mozart, the smile that suggests the tear. I doubt if Mr. Paur would play it today, or if anybody would listen to it respectfully and patiently, if it did not bear Mozart's name.

Nor is the Beethoven overture a mighty joy. Who cares for Beethoven when he wrote "in the style of Handel?" It is when we listen to his music written in the style of Beethoven that we bow the knee.

***

The people of Chicago last evening had an opportunity of hearing Thomas's Orchestra in this program:

Overture, "Genoveva".....Schumann
Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic"..Tschaikowsky
Symphonic Poem, "Les Eolides" (first time) .....Cesar Franck
Scherzo, "Queen Mab," "Romeo and Juliet" .....Berlioz
Ball Scene, "Romeo and Juliet".....Berlioz

How long will it be before we hear in Boston the orchestral works of César Franck, one of the greatest composers of the last 50 years?

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 10, 1895.

Changing his programme considerably from what was announced last week, Mr. Paur began his fourth concert with its only novelty, which was composed of the preludes to the first and second acts of Richard Strauss's recent opera, "The Fighters for Love," first staged at the Royal Opera House in Munich in April last. The work takes its name from that of a company of religionists who banded themselves in the thirteenth century in the hope that the spread of the gospel of Brotherly Love might be hastened and strengthened by the influence of music upon the people. The first prelude seems to aim at expressing the gradual assembly of the votaries of the new faith, their sturdy and active concentration in energetic purpose and their calmer, sweeter assertion of principle and purpose in order to conquer by persuasion. For the movement opens with a pleasant phrase which, drifting in from various voices in slighly modified forms, becomes at last the nucleus of a great harmonic concentration, which is followed in its turn by a stressful episode that is gradually resolved into new quietude of fullness. The second prelude is entitled "The Festival of Victory at the Duke's Court," and quite lives up to its denotement. Of all the followers of Wagner, this Strauss is in many respects the best; for he has ideas of his own, his heart beats high and hard and he has a spirit far beyond mere imitation. The first bars of the leading prelude suggested at once the mood of "Parsifal;" but in another instant one met the pure, clear, individual melody descending toward him and the master was thenceforth only traceable as an influence. In both preludes an almost extreme orchestration is used—two pairs of kettle drums, bass-clarinet, double bassoon, bass drum, snare-drum, cymbals and tamborine; but somehow, even at the height of heights, this instrumentation sounds softer, gentler and less elephantine than the more formally developed climaxes of Wagner, who often overbears us by sheer weight of metal rather than by growth of harmonious tonality. The two pieces were found interesting and evidently much enjoyed, pleasure being heightened by their reasonable brevity, their eminent contrasts and their appropriate performance.

Mr. Carl Faelten then played from Raff the G-minor concerto for pianoforte, opus 185. After the exceeding richness and depth of the Strauss extracts,—the former of which, by the way, was especially full and noble in its wind combinations,—Raff actually seemed thin and pallid; but after a little the excited ear began to accustom itself to the cooler, more simple style and followed Mr. Faelten with great pleasure, the greatest part of which was due to the smooth, song-like andante and the bright, stirring speed of the finale. Mr. Faelten is one of our best pianists in technical equipment, and he is the most nervously energetic and enthusiastic of all, his eager disposition sometimes tempting him to go too far in force and haste. He was in fine vein and displayed to particular advantage the rapidity and distinctness of his finger work and his breadth of emphatic phrasing. The orchestra supported him well, although in the coda it seemed now and then as if he wanted to hurry them into some fitful despatch of single passages.

Mr. Paur next placed Mozart's symphony in D-major, number 39, often known as the "Parisian," because he wrote and first gave it in that city about the middle of 1772. Its three movements (for it has no scherzo) brought the young composer high praise, because their thoughts had novelty as well as beauty of form, but Mozart saw how he could better his work, and so rewrote the andante into the shape it bears today. It is not long, but it is all compacted of beauties and daintiness—not a great work, but one instinct with joy, hope and gayety, even in its calmer moments, which is better far than scolasticism or philosophy for the listener's spirit. It was charmingly played.

A good, broad, dignified rendering of Beethoven's "Dedicating of the House" overture, which always seems more respectable than loveable, ended the concert.

The eccentric programme-book continued its dreary, dull drawl about the history of the "modal system," with pages of pedantic talk anent "authentic," "plagai," "hypomixo" and other modes, gave five pages of personal chatter about opera librettos, bestowed three pages upon the familiar Beethoven overture and said not one word about the piano-forte concerto or its player!

The next concert—a fortnight hence—will be thus ordered: Weber, Overture, "Oberon;" Wagner, Monologue from "Die Goetterdaemmerung;" Mendelssohn, Scotch Symphony;" Songs; Brahms, Tragic Overture. Soloist, Miss Marie Brema.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

[36]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 10.

The Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert of the season was given by the Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall last evening. The programme was:

Prelude to acts 1 and 11 of "Guntram"..R. Strauss
Concerto, C-minor op. 185.....Raff
Symphony No. 9, D-major.....Mozart
Overture, "Dedication of the House"....Beethoven
Soloist, Mr. Carl Faelten

It is questionable if a correct judgment of a work can be formed from a single specimen, and in judging the specimen one may consciously overpraise or underestimate the worse. We may then admit that Richard Strauss is a greater genius than his preludes show. It is all good music, but so much like other good music in the modern manner that it arouses only the ghost of enthusiasm. Modern Germany has already spoken through the lips of Wagner and young Germany has advanced no further than feebly whispering what the giant howled in his world-resounding voice. And "young" Germany has become middle-aged Germany, while the promises of youth have not been performed. Spontaneity is lacking in young Germany, it has lost the faculty of inventing; it makes music without inspiration and one admires the manufacturer in place of the composer. Of course the Grecian Brahms and the Goth Wagner must impress the era with their individuality; genius cannot do otherwise; but why dilute old wine and attempt to conceal the sophistication by giving it a new label? And then it requires a giant to fitly wear a giant's armor; modern mediocrity is crushed by its ambition and when it attempts to speak in the name of the prophet it has nothing more important to say than—figs! There is a monotony all the way up or down, from Richard Strauss to Humperdinck, and in art monotony is the most destructive of epidemics. The preludes are strongly suggestive of Wagner, but they are attenuated in ideas, and suggest deep babbling to deep of a noisy, but unspeakable mystery. The brilliancy is empty and the Kabbala is a bad subject for music. If one is concerned only with the instrumentation, and is able to forget Wagner, admiration will reach a high point.

It is a pleasure to turn from Strauss to the last of the old giants, Raff, to the Titan shorn somewhat of his pristine glory and brightness; whose ideas poured forth in a burning and unconquerable torrent, who was melodious learned, graceful and genial, and who, at his best, spoke the language of inspiration. The concerto is delightfully fresh, containing enough learning to set up a score or so of modern composers; that Mr. Carl Faelton is an adequate interpreter of this work it would be overbold to assert. As a pianist he has greatly improved since he was last heard; he played with great smoothness, and in technical matters generally he is deserving of praise; he is earnest and dignified, but his playing is dry and colorless. Raff demands something more than superlative technique, and this something more was absent. There were dryness, absence of color and of geniality. What was given was of excellent quality, but it does not answer the demands of the highest art. How colorless was Mr. Faelten's work, was easily seen when the orchestral work came in contrast with his own. Mr. Paur interprets Raff better than Mr. Faelten interprets him.

The Mozart Symphony received a fine, brilliant, delicate and sympathetic reading.

The programme for the next concert, November 22, is Weber's Overture, "Oberon;" Wagner monologue from "Die Gotterdammerung;" Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony; Brahms's Tragic Overture. The soloist is Miss Marie Brema.

Troy Northern Budget

BY C. L. MAC ARTHUR & SON.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 3, 1895.
Budget Building 16 Third Street, Troy, N. Y.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its tenth annual visit to New York during the coming winter. Its first concert given there was given February 14 1887. Since then forty-two concerts have been given—eleven under Gericke, twenty-one under Nikish, and ten under Paur. A curious coincidence is noted as to these three conductors. Nikish and Paur played at the same desk as first violinists at the Leipsic Stadt Theatre, where Gericke was its conductor. The orchestra will give its concerts at the Metropolitan Opera House on the evenings of November 15, December 19, January 23, February 27 and March 26. The soloists include Mme. Melba and Miss C Ladamowski, Ben Davies and E A Mac Dowell. Symphonies by Beethoven, Schumann and Tschaikowsky will be performed, also novelties by Humperdinck, Razmieck, Richard Strauss and Heinrigh Zoellner.

THE CAPITAL,

WASHINGTON · OCTOBER 26 · 1895

The announcements of the Boston Symphony concerts, which are to be given as usual at Metzerott's, are about again, and an unusually attractive season is promised. Campanari, Joseffy and Ben Davies have been engaged for soloists and others will be announced later. Emil Paur, deemed by many the very best of the wonderful conductors of this best of all American bands, will conduct the concerts here. The orchestra itself is said to be stronger than ever. The sale of tickets for the series will open on Tuesday morning, November 5, at nine o'clock, at Metzerott's. There will be the usual line standing (or sitting) in front of the doors, all night possibly. * * *

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 11, 1895.

The Symphony Concert--A Programme Worthy of Tribute

Again one must begin by paying tribute to the make-up of the symphonic programme; the ultra-modern and the classical, the simplest and the richest scoring were represented in its numbers. This is by no means stating that the reviewer took delight in Richard Strauss' "Guntram" preludes; with which the concert opened. It is not, however, wholly a question of enjoyment, but of interest and information as well; when all Germany is speaking of Strauss' "Guntram' it is eminently proper that one should be able to judge it on something more tangible than mere hearsay evidence.

Richard Strauss is a representative of the new German school of orchestral writing, and is himself so new to fame that his name is seldom seen in musical encyclopaedias outside of Germany; yet he has done important work, has been assistant director at Weimar (and has devoutly followed the Liszt vagueness of musical treatment), has written a number of symphonic fantasies and poems, and in "Guntram" has brought forth the most important German opera of the immediate present. He is not in any way related to the waltz-composing family of Vienna. Of all three of his works that have been heard in Boston (his "Italian" symphony, and his symphony in F minor were the other two) the symphony in F minor, one of his earliest works, is much the best. At the time that he wrote this he was, in some degree, following the lead of Brahms, a safe guide, and was full of promise as a composer in a great school. Even in this early work, however, there are evidences of a radical spirit tending towards iconoclasm.

In his later works we find that the Liszt road has led to the Wagner terminus. It is a pity; there can be no Wagner school; the Jovian thunderbolts belong to Jupiter alone, and he who endeavors to follow succeeds about as well as the poet who determines to imitate Shakespeare. In the prelude to "Guntram" one finds merely a chromo of a Wagner Vorspiel. He has dedicated the work to his father, but this must seem almost a bit of sarcasm, for the father was a conservative of conservatives, a sturdy musician of the old school. There is more than a resemblance to "Lohengrin" in the first prelude; all the effects of violins in high positions and in harmonics, against long-drawn-out sighs of the wood-wind are present, but the first figure of four notes, and the second of three notes, are treated with Wagnerian reiteration without Wagnerian genius. One may doubt whether the Leit-motif will ever again occupy the prominent position that it did with Wagner, for with the master it was repeated with such fertility of resources that it never produced monotony, while with the imitators it almost invariably becomes tiresome repetition.

The second prelude (to the second act of the same opera) was a fairly picturesque tone-picture of the hurly-burly of a triumphant festival. Of course the last act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg" remains the greatest achievement in this genre, but here, perhaps, the comparison is an unfair one, for themes and methods are somewhat different, and Strauss does not aim at much complexity of rhythm, but rather at sudden interruptions and pompous instrumentation. The latter was, if anything, too noisy; Strauss shows which way the wind blows, and in this case it blew a hurricane, brass and wood-wind uniting in a cyclone that threatened the auditor with concussion of the brain and the performers with burst bloodvessels. The audience liked this better than the reviewer did, and there was much applause.

Raff's piano concerto in C minor followed, with Mr. Carl Faelten at the solo instrument. It was a fitting thing that Mr. Faelton, the friend and colleague of Raff, should play this work, and its interpretation was in some degree excathedra. The work itself has a somewhat martial character (it might almost be called the "Military Concerto"), and its style fitted the artist like a glove. Resolute power, broad and massive execution were splendidly present in many parts of this performance.

There is a charm, too, in absolute certainty in piano work, and this was exerted to the utmost; not a vague passage, not an unclear note was in the work; one could rely upon the pianist as upon a rock and follow the thread of the symmetrical form with undisturbed serenity. The composition does not achieve the task of welding solo instrument and orchestra into homogeneity, as is done in Beethoven's two last concertos, but rather follows Rubinstein in giving such prominence to the piano, at times it becomes an alternation of solos and tutti effects. The ensemble, excepting a little hurrying of the orchestra at the beginning, was excellent. Mr. Faelton's clear, crisp style was admirably adapted to display the brilliancy of the chief theme in the first movement, and subsequently, when the themes appeared in the orchestra and the piano gave floriture the balance was commendable. The cadenza work and the bravura ending of this movement was something long to be remembered, and much applause followed.

The slow movement opened with an oboe theme, so nobly played that the instrument sounded as broad as an English horn. In this movement there was a trifle of over-accenting in the piano part, but the lofty climax was worked up in a superb manner.

The finale was again resolute and fiery, and began with the utmost bravura. Full justice was done to its dash and Brio, and the great enthusiasm which followed its final cadence was fully deserved by the pianist, who was recalled in the heartiest manner possible.

The concerto was a necessary mediator between Strauss and Mozart; had the "Parisian" symphony followed the "Guntram" preludes it would have been a phial of rose-water after an Atlantic in an uproar. Every true music-lover must have felt grateful to Mr. Paur for the manly way in which the symphony was read. It was not one of the great ones, but it is just as well to understand that Mozart is not milk-and-watery, and the conductor brought out this fact clearly in the interpretation.

The power of the first movement was brought out better than ever before, and in its strong accents one found for the first time a kinship with the great accented phrases of the first movement of the Beethoven violin concerto, or the last of the Schubert C major symphony.

The Andante was not a very soulful movement, but leaned rather towards grace and daintiness, as if to make amends for the absence of a minuet. The finale is one of those jovial endings which were in vogue in the last century, and which show the kinship of the symphony to the Suite, which in those days generally ended with a rollicking Gigue. There was no very great necessity for the performance of this symphony at all, for it is one of Mozart's lesser works, and has been heard here within two or three years.

With a very majestic performance of Beethoven's overture, "Die Weihe des Hauses," the concert ended. The orchestra have often given this work—it was the first composition they ever played in public—but they never have given it more clearly than at this concert. Especially to be noted were the trumpet fanfares, which recalled to mind the fact that in the old days we used to hear them on cornets and never knew the glory of the trumpet tone-color. Against the trumpet passages there was some bassoon work that was commendable in its inflexibility and steadiness. Altogether such a performance shows to those who have good memories what progress our orchestra has made. Even improvement-suggesting New Yorkers admit this, while not always giving the credit for the building up and the maintaining of such a standard where it is due.

One cannot help wishing that like Alexander, our band of musicians should seek for new worlds to conquer and make a European trip. What an opening of eyes there would be! How the sleepy Leipzigers would open their eyes to find a better orchestra than their own in a country which they consider musically barbaric! It is not too much to say that there is no such body of first violins in any orchestra of Europe today (although there are larger forces in some of them), and in almost every other department our orchestra is the peer of the great orchestras of Paris or Leipzig or Vienna.

Louis C. Elson.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1895.

REPERTORY OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA FOR THEIR METROPOLITAN CONCERTS.

This season the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give five concerts in New York, in the Metropolitan Opera House, under Pauer's sympathetic baton. They will be on the evenings of Nov. 15, Dec. 19, Jan. 23, Feb. 27, and March 26. The soloists already engaged are Mme. Melba, Ben Davies, E. A. MacDowell, and T. Adamowski. The works to be performed during the season comprise the following:

Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, "Eroica;" Beethoven, Symphony, No 4; Schumann, Symphony, No. 1, in B flat major; Schubert, Unfinished Symphony; Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 6; Beethoven, Overture, "Dedication of the House;" Humperdinck, Overture, "Hansel und Gretel;" Cornelius, Overture, "Barber of Bagdad;" Berlioz, Overture, "Corsair;" Berlioz, "Menuet des Follets" and "Valse des Sylphes" from "Le Damnation de Faust;" Rezniceck, Overture, "Donna Diana;" Tchaikowsky, Variations; Richard Strauss, Prelude and entr'acte, "Guntram;" Zöllner, "Midnight of Sedan;" Wagner, Kaisermarsch.

Paur's reading of Brahms' first symphony, receives this note in the Boston "Gazette:"

"Of the interpretation of the music of the first concert, little else than the highest praise can be given. The noble Brahms symphony was read superbly, and played with a dignity and finish beyond praise. On listening to the delightful work written before Brahms had frozen into statuesqueness, one almost regrets that the symphony is nearly twenty years old, and its many beauties long since described. Mr. Paur has a special fondness for this master, whose first and third manner will doubtless be abundantly illustrated in the near future. The Mozart andante also received full justice in Mr. Paur's hands."

MONDAY, NOV. 11, 1895.

BOSTON STANDARD.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Carl Faelten, the Pianist, Is Soloist.

Notes and Comments on Musical and Dramatic Events.

As the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, the week previous, was the most brilliant yet arranged this season by Conductor Paur, so was last Saturday night's programme the most stupid. The enthusiasts, however, applauded to their heart's content, and the audience presented the inevitable hall-filling appearance that characterizes each successive concert.

This was the programme:

Preludes to Acts I. and II. of "Guntram" Richard Strauss. (First time.)
Concerto for piano, C. minor, op. 185....Raff
Symphony No. 39, D major, "Parisian" Mozart.
Overture, "Consecration of the House" Beethoven.

The preludes to acts I. and II. of Richard Strauss' "Guntram" being given for the first time here, demanded respectful and searching attention. The search resulted in either one or two things; you found nothing, or, something was before you without searching. There is little satisfaction, in such cases, in either event. As if anticipating, in fear such a conclusion, the programme book says that at concert performances of the preludes, the composer desired the following to be printed: "Prelude to Act I.—The evangel that was sealed with the act of redemption on Golgotha, the evangel of divine love and exalted passion, inspired a company of pious singers in the 13th century to found an order of 'Fighters for Love.' The ideal aim of this order was to work for true realization of the divine doctrines of salvation through the power of song." A pretty thought, but the composer seems not to have been soulful or devout enough to give it tangible form. Not wishing to, perhaps, the result is a dreamy nothing, which will not bear translation, even to the semblance of a white cathedral, or to the suggestion of infinity, as some one has presumed it might.

Why not let it suggest a block of flat houses on Joy street or a high school algebraic problem? The prelude to act two concerns "The Festival of Victory at the Duke's Court." But here again, the composer, to most minds at least, has not made his idea clear. The music is festive, to be sure, but not of the evangelical sort. It is, rather, suggestive of the "scream eagle" celebration where red, blue and green lights are burned, where set fireworks pieces of the President and the signers of the Declaration of Independence are touched off, and where bombs burst in air, to the flash of scattering vari-colored stars; or like the Paeans of triumph over a Tammany celebration. The Mozart symphony, with its thoughtful passages, and its dominant vivacity, written to please the Parisians in 1778, had a capital rendering under Mr. Paur, and contrasted refreshingly with the vagueness of the preceding number. Carl Faelten may have been the victim of circumstances in selecting the Raff concerto for his piano solo work. If not then an explanation would be in good taste. Certain it is, however, that he played the concerto as well as it deserved, displaying admirable technique where the solo part offered opportunity to manifest his skill. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Oberon," Weber; monologue from "Die Gotterdammerung," Wagner; "Scotch" symphony, Mendelssohn; songs, tragic overture, Brahms. The soloist will be Miss Marie Bremer.

---

[37]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 10.

The Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert of the season was given by the Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall last evening. The programme was:

Prelude to acts 1 and 11 of "Guntram"..R. Strauss
Concerto, C-minor op. 185..... Raff
Symphony No. 9, D-major.....Mozart
Overture, "Dedication of the House"....Beethoven
Soloist, Mr. Carl Faelten

It is questionable if a correct judgment of a work can be formed from a single specimen, and in judging the specimen one may consciously overpraise or underestimate the worse. We may then admit that Richard Strauss is a greater genius than his preludes show. It is all good music, but so much like other good music in the modern manner that it arouses only the ghost of enthusiasm. Modern Germany has already spoken through the lips of Wagner and young Germany has advanced no further than feebly whispering what the giant howled in his world-resounding voice. And "young" Germany has become middle-aged Germany, while the promises of youth have not been performed. Spontaneity is lacking in young Germany, it has lost the faculty of inventing; it makes music without inspiration and one admires the manufacturer in place of the composer. Of course the Grecian Brahms and the Goth Wagner must impress the era with their individuality; genius cannot do otherwise; but why dilute old wine and attempt to conceal the sophistication by giving it a new label? And then it requires a giant to fitly wear a giant's armor; modern mediocrity is crushed by its ambition and when it attempts to speak in the name of the prophet it has nothing more important to say than—figs! There is a monotony all the way up or down, from Richard Strauss to Humperdinck, and in art monotony is the most destructive of epidemics. The preludes are strongly suggestive of Wagner, but they are attenuated in ideas, and suggest deep babbling to deep of a noisy, but unspeakable mystery. The brilliancy is empty and the Kabbala is a bad subject for music. If one is concerned only with the instrumentation, and is able to forget Wagner, admiration will reach a high point.

It is a pleasure to turn from Strauss to the last of the old giants, Raff, to the Titan shorn somewhat of his pristine glory and brightness; whose ideas poured forth in a burning and unconquerable torrent, who was melodious learned, graceful and genial, and who, at his best, spoke the language of inspiration. The concerto is delightfully fresh, containing enough learning to set up a score or so of modern composers; that Mr. Carl Faelton is an adequate interpreter of this work it would be overbold to assert. As a pianist he has greatly improved since he was last heard; he played with great smoothness, and in technical matters generally he is deserving of praise; he is earnest and dignified, but his playing is dry and colorless. Raff demands something more than superlative technique, and this something more was absent. There were dryness, absence of color and of geniality. What was given was of excellent quality, but it does not answer the demands of the highest art. How colorless was Mr. Faelten's work, was easily seen when the orchestral work came in contrast with his own. Mr. Paur interprets Raff better than Mr. Faelten interprets him.

The Mozart Symphony received a fine, brilliant, delicate and sympathetic reading.

The programme for the next concert, November 22, is Weber's Overture, "Oberon;" Wagner monologue from "Die Gotterdammerung;" Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony; Brahms's Tragic Overture. The soloist is Miss Marie Brema.

Troy Northern Budget

BY C. L. MAC ARTHUR & SON.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 3, 1895.
Budget Building 16 Third Street, Troy, N. Y.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its tenth annual visit to New York during the coming winter. Its first concert given there was given February 14 1887. Since then forty-two concerts have been given—eleven under Gericke, twenty-one under Nikish, and ten under Paur. A curious coincidence is noted as to these three conductors. Nikish and Paur played at the same desk as first violinists at the Leipsic Stadt Theatre, where Gericke was its conductor. The orchestra will give its concerts at the Metropolitan Opera House on the evenings of November 15, December 19, January 23, February 27 and March 26. The soloists include Mme. Melba and Miss C Ladamowski, Ben Davies and E A Mac Dowell. Symphonies by Beethoven, Schumann and Tschaikowsky will be performed, also novelties by Humperdinck, Razmieck, Richard Strauss and Heinrich Zoellner.

THE CAPITAL,

WASHINGTON · OCTOBER 26 · 1895

The announcements of the Boston Symphony concerts, which are to be given as usual at Metzerott's, are about again, and an unusually attractive season is promised. Campanari, Joseffy and Ben Davies have been engaged for soloists and others will be announced later. Emil Paur, deemed by many the very best of the wonderful conductors of this best of all American bands, will conduct the concerts here. The orchestra itself is said to be stronger than ever. The sale of tickets for the series will open on Tuesday morning, November 5, at nine o'clock, at Metzerott's. There will be the usual line standing (or sitting) in front of the doors, all night possibly.

* * *

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 11, 1895.

The Symphony Concert--A Programme Worthy of Tribute.

Again one must begin by paying tribute to the make-up of the symphonic programme; the ultra-modern and the classical, the simplest and the richest scoring were represented in its numbers. This is by no means stating that the reviewer took delight in Richard Strauss' "Guntram" preludes; with which the concert opened. It is not, however, wholly a question of enjoyment, but of interest and information as well; when all Germany is speaking of Strauss' "Guntram' it is eminently proper that one should be able to judge it on something more tangible than mere hearsay evidence.

Richard Strauss is a representative of the new German school of orchestral writing, and is himself so new to fame that his name is seldom seen in musical encyclopaedias outside of Germany; yet he has done important work, has been assistant director at Weimar (and has devoutly followed the Liszt vagueness of musical treatment), has written a number of symphonic fantasies and poems, and in "Guntram" has brought forth the most important German opera of the immediate present. He is not in any way related to the waltz-composing family of Vienna. Of all three of his works that have been heard in Boston (his "Italian" symphony, and his symphony in F minor were the other two) the symphony in F minor, one of his earliest works, is much the best. At the time that he wrote this he was, in some degree, following the lead of Brahms, a safe guide, and was full of promise as a composer in a great school. Even in this early work, however, there are evidences of a radical spirit tending towards iconoclasm.

In his later works we find that the Liszt road has led to the Wagner terminus. It is a pity; there can be no Wagner school; the Jovian thunderbolts belong to Jupiter alone, and he who endeavors to follow succeeds about as well as the poet who determines to imitate Shakespeare. In the prelude to "Guntram" one finds merely a chromo of a Wagner Vorspiel. He has dedicated the work to his father, but this must seem almost a bit of sarcasm, for the father was a conservative of conservatives, a sturdy musician of the old school. There is more than a resemblance to "Lohengrin" in the first prelude; all the effects of violins in high positions and in harmonics, against long-drawn-out sighs of the wood-wind are present, but the first figure of four notes, and the second of three notes, are treated with Wagnerian reiteration without Wagnerian genius. One may doubt whether the Leit-motif will ever again occupy the prominent position that it did with Wagner, for with the master it was repeated with such fertility of resources that it never produced monotony, while with the imitators it almost invariably becomes tiresome repetition.

The second prelude (to the second act of the same opera) was a fairly picturesque tone-picture of the hurly-burly of a triumphant festival. Of course the last act of "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg" remains the greatest achievement in this genre, but here, perhaps, the comparison is an unfair one, for themes and methods are somewhat different, and Strauss does not aim at much complexity of rhythm, but rather at sudden interruptions and pompous instrumentation. The latter was, if anything, too noisy; Strauss shows which way the wind blows, and in this case it blew a hurricane, brass and wood-wind uniting in a cyclone that threatened the auditor with concussion of the brain and the performers with burst bloodvessels. The audience liked this better than the reviewer did, and there was much applause.

Raff's piano concerto in C minor followed, with Mr. Carl Faelten at the solo instrument. It was a fitting thing that Mr. Faelton, the friend and colleague of Raff, should play this work, and its interpretation was in some degree excathedra. The work itself has a somewhat martial character (it might almost be called the "Military Concerto") and its style fitted the artist like a glove. Resolute power, broad and massive execution were splendidly present in many parts of this performance.

There is a charm, too, in absolute certainty in piano work, and this was exerted to the utmost; not a vague passage, not an unclear note was in the work; one could rely upon the pianist as upon a rock and follow the thread of the symmetrical form with undisturbed serenity. The composition does not achieve the task of welding solo instrument and orchestra into homogeneity, as is done in Beethoven's two last concertos, but rather follows Rubinstein in giving such prominence to the piano, at times it becomes an alternation of solos and tutti effects. The ensemble, excepting a little hurrying of the orchestra at the beginning, was excellent. Mr. Faelton's clear, crisp style was admirably adapted to display the brilliancy of the chief theme in the first movement, and subsequently, when the themes appeared in the orchestra and the piano gave fioriture the balance was commendable. The cadenza work and the bravura ending of this movement was something long to be remembered, and much applause followed.

The slow movement opened with an oboe theme, so nobly played that the instrument sounded as broad as an English horn. In this movement there was a trifle of over-accenting in the piano part, but the lofty climax was worked up in a superb manner.

The finale was again resolute and fiery, and began with the utmost bravura. Full justice was done to its dash and Brio, and the great enthusiasm which followed its final cadence was fully deserved by the pianist, who was recalled in the heartiest manner possible.

The concerto was a necessary mediator between Strauss and Mozart; had the "Parisian" symphony followed the "Guntram" preludes it would have been a phial of rose-water after an Atlantic in an uproar. Every true music-lover must have felt grateful to Mr. Paur for the manly way in which the symphony was read. It was not one of the great ones, but it is just as well to understand that Mozart is not milk-and-watery, and the conductor brought out this fact clearly in the interpretation.

The power of the first movement was brought out better than ever before, and in its strong accents one found for the first time a kinship with the great accented phrases of the first movement of the Beethoven violin concerto, or the last of the Schubert C major symphony.

The Andante was not a very soulful movement, but leaned rather towards grace and daintiness, as if to make amends for the absence of a minuet. The finale is one of those jovial endings which were in vogue in the last century, and which show the kinship of the symphony to the Suite, which in those days generally ended with a rollicking Gigue. There was no very great necessity for the performance of this symphony at all, for it is one of Mozart's lesser works, and has been heard here within two or three years.

With a very majestic performance of Beethoven's overture, "Die Weihe des Hauses," the concert ended. The orchestra have often given this work—it was the first composition they ever played in public—but they never have given it more clearly than at this concert. Especially to be noted were the trumpet fanfares, which recalled to mind the fact that in the old days we used to hear them on cornets and never knew the glory of the trumpet tone-color. Against the trumpet passages there was some bassoon work that was commendable in its inflexibility and steadiness. Altogether such a performance shows to those who have good memories what progress our orchestra has made. Even improvement-suggesting New Yorkers admit this, while not always giving the credit for the building up and the maintaining of such a standard where it is due.

One cannot help wishing that like Alexander, our band of musicians should seek for new worlds to conquer and make a European trip. What an opening of eyes there would be! How the sleepy Leipzigers would open their eyes to find a better orchestra than their own in a country which they consider musically barbaric! It is not too much to say that there is no such body of first violins in any orchestra of Europe today (although there are larger forces in some of them), and in almost every other department our orchestra is the peer of the great orchestras of Paris or Leipzig or Vienna.

Louis C. Elson.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1895.

REPERTORY OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA FOR THEIR METROPOLITAN CONCERTS.

This season the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give five concerts in New York, in the Metropolitan Opera House, under Pauer's sympathetic baton. They will be on the evenings of Nov. 15, Dec. 19, Jan. 23, Feb. 27, and March 26. The soloists already engaged are Mme. Melba, Ben Davies, E. A. MacDowell, and T. Adamowski. The works to be performed during the season comprise the following:

Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, "Eroica;" Beethoven, Symphony, No 4; Schumann, Symphony, No. 1, in B flat major; Schubert, Unfinished Symphony; Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 6; Beethoven, Overture, "Dedication of the House;" Humperdinck, Overture, "Hansel und Gretel;" Cornelius, Overture, "Barber of Bagdad;" Berlioz, Overture, "Corsair;" Berlioz, "Menuet des Follets" and "Valse des Sylphes" from "Le Damnation de Faust;" Rezniceck, Overture, "Donna Diana;" Tchaikowsky, Variations; Richard Strauss, Prelude and entr'acte, "Guntram;" Zöllner, "Midnight of Sedan;" Wagner, Kaisermarsch.

Paur's reading of Brahms' first symphony, receives this note in the Boston "Gazette:"

"Of the interpretation of the music of the first concert, little else than the highest praise can be given. The noble Brahms symphony was read superbly, and played with a dignity and finish beyond praise. On listening to the delightful work written before Brahms had frozen into statuesqueness, one almost regrets that the symphony is nearly twenty years old, and its many beauties long since described. Mr. Paur has a special fondness for this master, whose first and third manner will doubtless be abundantly illustrated in the near future. The Mozart andante also received full justice in Mr. Paur's hands."

MONDAY, NOV. 11, 1895.

BOSTON STANDARD.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Carl Faelten, the Pianist, Is Soloist.

Notes and Comments on Musical and Dramatic Events.

As the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, the week previous, was the most brilliant yet arranged this season by Conductor Paur, so was last Saturday night's programme the most stupid. The enthusiasts, however, applauded to their heart's content, and the audience presented the inevitable hall-filling appearance that characterizes each successive concert.

This was the programme:

Preludes to Acts I. and II. of "Guntram" Richard Strauss. (First time.)
Concerto for piano, C. minor, op. 185....Raff
Symphony No. 39, D major, "Parisian" Mozart.
Overture, "Consecration of the House" Beethoven.

The preludes to acts I. and II. of Richard Strauss' "Guntram" being given for the first time here, demanded respectful and searching attention. The search resulted in either one or two things; you found nothing, or, something was before you without searching. There is little satisfaction, in such cases, in either event. As if anticipating, in fear such a conclusion, the programme book says that at concert performances of the preludes, the composer desired the following to be printed: "Prelude to Act I.—The evangel that was sealed with the act of redemption on Golgotha, the evangel of divine love and exalted passion, inspired a company of pious singers in the 13th century to found an order of 'Fighters for Love.' The ideal aim of this order was to work for true realization of the divine doctrines of salvation through the power of song." A pretty thought, but the composer seems not to have been soulful or devout enough to give it tangible form. Not wishing to, perhaps, the result is a dreamy nothing, which will not bear translation, even to the semblance of a white cathedral, or to the suggestion of infinity, as some one has presumed it might.

Why not let it suggest a block of flat houses on Joy street or a high school algebraic problem? The prelude to act two concerns "The Festival of Victory at the Duke's Court." But here again, the composer, to most minds at least, has not made his idea clear. The music is festive, to be sure, but not of the evangelical sort. It is, rather, suggestive of the "scream eagle" celebration where red, blue and green lights are burned, where set fireworks pieces of the President and the signers of the Declaration of Independence are touched off, and where bombs burst in air, to the flash of scattering vari-colored stars; or like the Paeans of triumph over a Tammany celebration. The Mozart symphony, with its thoughtful passages, and its dominant vivacity, written to please the Parisians in 1778, had a capital rendering under Mr. Paur, and contrasted refreshingly with the vagueness of the preceding number. Carl Faelten may have been the victim of circumstances in selecting the Raff concerto for his piano solo work. If not then an explanation would be in good taste. Certain it is, however, that he played the concerto as well as it deserved, displaying admirable technique where the solo part offered opportunity to manifest his skill. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Oberon," Weber; monologue from "Die Gotterdammerung," Wagner; "Scotch" symphony, Mendelssohn; songs, tragic overture, Brahms. The soloist will be Miss Marie Bremer.

[37]

PHILADELPHIA PRESS
NOVEMBER 10, 1895.

Those who prefer absolute music and do not care for the opera will have their opportunity on Monday evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra will render Beethoven's "Heroica" and a well-chosen programme, and Madame Melba will delight us all by singing a Handel aria and Ophelia's mad scene in Thomas' "Hamlet." As this is the eleventh season of the Boston Symphony in Philadelphia it is interesting to recall, especially as one remembers how it has progressed from a miserable beginning to its present state of crowded houses, a little of its history since 1888. Forty-six concerts have been given in this city, fourteen under Wilhelm Gericke, twenty-two under Arthur Nikisch and ten under the present conductor, Emil Paur. It is a noteworthy fact that on the weekly trips made by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Philadelphia and Brooklyn are the only two cities in which the concerts have been given in the same place from the start. In the same length of time the audience room in Baltimore has changed six times, in Washington five and in New York four.

To conductor Gericke must be attributed much of the wonderful precision and finish of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Five years of untiring zeal and persistent striving for absolute perfection of ensemble, during which time he spared neither the orchestra nor himself, and Mr. Gericke returned to Vienna, leaving behind him the stamp of a skill so marvelous that it cannot be effaced. The youngest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was Arthur Nikisch, a Hungarian, leader of the orchestra at the Stadt Theatre at Leipsic, the first opera house in that city. His reign was for four years, a year longer than that of Mr. Henschel, who was the first conductor in Boston, but did not appear in Philadelphia, and a year less than Mr. Gericke. One thing the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always done for its conductors—it has given to them a greater renown than was theirs when they assumed control. Henschel, Gericke and Nikisch must all own a greater fame attended their return to Europe because of their association with America's first orchestra. When Arthur Nikisch left the Stadt Theatre in Leipsic to come to Boston he was succeeded by the same man who followed him as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the present leader, Mr. Emil Paur. It is also worthy of comment that Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur played at the same desk as first violinists under Mr. Gericke at the very same Stadt Theatre several years before.

Stirred by the new spirit in Philadelphia the Boston Symphony will also enter upon the field of popular music this year and has selected this city for its initial concert. This will take place on Saturday afternoon, and the programme vocally and instrumentally is one of the best that has been presented for some time. In the first place, Melba will sing and Campanari and Scalchi, and then the orchestra will give us some of Auber, Bizet and Wagner. Madame Melba renders the mad scene from "Lucia" and sings and sings an Arditi waltz song. This means that six days of this week will be given up to music, and the first thing we know we shall be having sacred concerts

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.
BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.
FIRST CONCERT
MONDAY EVENING, November 11, at 8.15.
Solo Artist, MME. MELBA.
PROGRAMME—Beethoven Symphony, No. 3, "Eroica;" Haendel, Aria, "Sweet Bird" (Flute Obligato, Mr. MOLE); Berlioz, a, Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps; b, Waltz of Sylphs, from the Damnation of Faust; Thomas, Ophelie's Mad Scene, from "Hamlet;" Wagner, "The Emperor's March."
Tickets, with reserved seats, $1.50, $1.00 and 75c., now on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.
FIRST POPULAR MATINEE
BY THE
Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor
ASSISTED BY
Mme. MELBA
Mme. SCALCHI, Contralto
Sig. D'AUBIGNE, Tenor
Sig. CAMPANARI, Baritone
Saturdry, November 16, at 2.30
PROGRAMME
No. 1. OVERTURE, "Carlo Broschi," Auber; Orchestra. No. 2. ARIA, "Lituani," Ponchielli; (first time), Mr. Campanari. No. 3. ARIA, "Che faro" (Orpheus), Gluck; Mme. Scalchi. No. 4. LUCIA, Mad scene from "Lucia," Donizetti; Mme. Melba; Flute Obligato, Mons. Ch Mole. No. 5. SUITE, "L'Arlesienne," Bizet; Orchestra. No. 6. ARIA, "Salve Dimora" (Faust), Gounod; Mr. D'Aubigne. No. 7. WALTZ SONG, "Se saran Rose," Arditi (by request), Mm. Melba. No. 8. MONOLOGUE (Falstaff), Verdi; Mr. Campanari. No. 9. (a) PRELUDE, "Lohengrin," Act III, Wagner. (b) PRELUDE, "Tannhaeuser," Act III, Wagner; Orchestra. No. 10. QUARTET from "Rigoletto," Verdi; Mesdames Melba, Scalchi, Messrs. D'Aubigne and Campanari. No. 11. OVERTURE, "Rienzi, Wagner; Orchestra. TICKETS on sale at Fischer's 1221 Chestnut Street, on and after TUESDAY, NOV. 12, at 9 A. M.

Times. 2 pages
SUNDAY MORNING,
NOVEMBER 10, 1895.

Melba and Campanari.

The first popular matinee by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, assisted by Mme. Melba, Mme. Scalchi, contralto; Sig. D'Aubigne, tenor, and Sig. Campanari, baritone, will take place next Saturday afternoon at the Academy of Music. The programme will contain of orchestral features Auber's "Carlo Broschi" overture, the "L'Arlesienne" suite, Bizet; prelude to act 3 "Lohengrin," ditto to "Tannhaeuser," and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture. Sig. Campanari sings for the first time Ponchielli's aria "Lituani" and the monologue of Verdi's "Falstaff." Mme. Melba's numbers are the mad scene from "Lucia," with flute obligato, and a waltz song, "Se Sarau Rose," by Arditi. Mme. Scalchi will do the area, "Che Faro," from Gluck's "Orpheus," and "Salve Dimora." "Faust" is allotted to Sig. D'Aubigne. A leading vocal feature is the quartette from "Rigoletto" by Mesdames Melba and Scalchi and Signore D'Aubigne and Campanari.

The Boston Symphony.

To-morrow evening, at the Academy of Music, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of the series of five concerts in this city the present season, the dates of the others being December 16, January 20, February 24 and March 23. An eminent soloist will take part in each concert, Mme. Melba appearing to-morrow night. The splendid programme announced includes Beethoven's "Eroica' symphony No. 3, the fairy dance music from Berlioz's "Faust" and Wagner's "Kaisermarch." Mme. Melba will sing Handel's air, "Sweet Bird," with flute accompaniment, and also the mad scene from Thomas' opera of "Hamlet."

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.
FIRST POPULAR MATINEE
BY THE
Boston Symphony Orchestra
Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor,
Assisted by
Mme. MELBA
Mme. SCALCHI, Contralto. Sig. D'AUBIGNE, Tenor.
Sig. CAMPANARI, Baritone.
Saturday, November 16, at 2.30
PROGRAMME

1. Overture, "Carlo Broschi".....Auber
ORCHESTRA.
2. Aria, "Lituani".....Ponchielli
(First time.)
Mr. CAMPANARI.
3. Aria, "Che faro" (Orpheus).....Gluck
Mme. SCALCHI.
4. Lucia, Mad Scene from "Lucia"....Donizetti
Mme. MELBA.
Flute Obligato, Mons. Ch. Mole.
5. Suite, "L'Arlesienne".....Bizet
ORCHESTRA.
6. Aria, "Salve Dimora" (Faust).....Gounod
Mr. D'AUBIGNE.
7. Waltz Song, "Se saran Rose".....Arditi
(By request.)
Mme. MELBA.
8. Monologue (Falstaff).....Verdi
Mr. CAMPANARI.
9. (a) Prelude, "Lohengrin," Act III.....Wagner
(b) Prelude, "Tannhaeuser," Act III..Wagner
ORCHESTRA.
10. Quartette from "Rigoletto".....Verdi
Mesdames MELBA and SCALCHI and
Messrs. D'AUBIGNE and CAMPANARI.
11. Overture, "Rienzi".....Wagner
ORCHESTRA.

Tickets on sale at FISCHER'S, 1221 Chestnut St., on and after TUESDAY, November 12, 9 A.M

THE PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER—SUNDAY
NOVEMBER 10, 1895.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Emil Paur, will give the first of five concerts in which it is to be heard here during the season at the Academy of Music on Monday evening next, November 11, beginning at 8 o'clock, upon which occasion the program will include Beethoven's symphony No. 3, the socalled "Eroica," the fairy dance music from Berlioz's "Faust" and Wagner's pompous "Kaisermarch." Mme. Melba will be the soloist, and she will be heard in Handel's air "Sweet Bird," with flute accompaniment, and in the mad scene from Ambroise Thomas' opera of "Hamlet." This will be recognized by amateurs as an especially attractive scene. The dates of the other four concerts are December 16, January 20, February 24 and March 23, and the sale of seats is now proceeding at the usual place.

Boston Symphony Matinee and Melba

The enthusiastic reception of Mme. Melba at her first concert here has induced the management to give a popular matinee next Saturday afternoon for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at which Melba, Scalchi, Campanari and D'Aubigne will be the soloists. The program is as follows:

1. Overture, "Carlo Broschi".....Auber
Orchestra.
2. Aria, "Lituani".....Ponchilli
(First time.)
Mr. Campanari.
3. Lucia, "Che faro" (Orpheus)....Gluck
Mme. Scalchi.
4. Mad Scene from "Lucia"....Donizetti
Mme. Melba.
Flute Obligato, Mons. Ch Mole.
5. Suite, "L'Arlesienne".....Bizet
Orchestra.
6. Aria, "Salve Dimora" (Faust).Gounod
Mr. D'Aubigne.
7. Waltz Song, "Se saran Rose"..Arditi
(By request.)
Mme. Melba.
8. Monologue, (Falstaff) .....Verdi
Mr. Campanari.
9. (a(Prlude, "Lohengrin."
Act III.....Wagner
(b) Prelude, "Tannhaeuser."
Act III.....Wagner
Orchestra.
10. Quartet from "Rigoletto,".....Verdi
Mesdames Melba, Scalchi, Messrs. D'-Aubigne and Campanari.
11. Overture, "Rienzi".....Wagner
Orchestra.

Tickets for sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut street, Tuesday, November 12, at 9 A. M.

The North American
PHILADELPHIA, PA.,
MONDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1895.

First Concert for the Season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This evening at the Academy of Music the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first of the series of five concerts in this city the present season, the dates of the others being December 16, January 20, February 24 and March 23. An eminent soloist will take part in each concert, Mme. Melba appearing to-morrow night. The splendid programme announced includes Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, No. 3; the fairy dance music from Berlioz's "Faust" and Wagner's "Kaisermarch." Mme. Melba will sing Haendel's air "Sweet Bird," with flute accompaniment, and also the mad scene from Thomas' opera of "Hamlet."

A BOSTON SMYPHONY MATINEE.

The first popular matinee by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, assisted by Mme. Melba, Mme. Scalchi, contralto; Sig. D'Aubigne, tenor, and Sig. Campanari, baritone, will take place next Saturday afternoon at the Academy of Music. The programme will contain of orchestral features Auber's "Carlo Broschi" overture, the "L'Arlesienne suite, Bizet; prelude to act three "Lohengrin," ditto to "Tannheuser" and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture. Sig. Campanari sings for the first time Ponchielli's aria "Lituani" and Iago's monologue from Verdi's "Falstaff." Mme. Melba's numbers are the mad scene from "Lucia," with flute obligato, and a waltz song, "Se Sarau Rose," by Arditi. Mme. Scalchi will do the aria "Che Faro," from Gluck's "Orpheus," and "Salve Dimora" is allotted to Sig. D'Aubigne. A leading vocal feature is the quartette from "Rigoletto," by Mesdames Melba and Scalchi and Sig. D'Aubigne and Campanari.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.
BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.
FIRST CONCERT
MONDAY EVENING, November 11, at 8.15.
Solo Artist, MME. MELBA.
PROGRAMME—Beethoven Symphony, No. 3, "Eroica;" Haendel, Aria, "Sweet Bird" (Flute Obligato, Mr. MOLE); Berlioz, a, Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps; b, Waltz of Sylphs, from the Damnation of Faust; Thomas, Ophelie's Mad Scene, from "Hamlet;" Wagner, "The Emperor's March."
Tickets, with reserved seats, $1.50, $1.00 and 75c., now on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.
BOSTON SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA
Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.
FIRST CONCERT
THIS MONDAY EVENING, November 11, at 8.15.
Solo Artist, Mme. MELBA.
Programme: Beethoven Symphony, No. 3, "Eroica;" Haendel, Aria, "Sweet Pird" (Flute Obligato, Mr. MOLE); Berlioz, a, Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps; b, Waltz of Sylphs, from the Damnation of Faust; Thomas, Ophelie's Mad Scene, from "Hamlet;" Wagner, "The Emperor's March. Tickets, with reserved seats. $1.50, $1.00 and 75c., now on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut street.
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.
First Popular Matinee
BY THE
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor,
ASSISTED BY
MME. MELBA
Mme. SCALCHI, Contralto. Sig. D'AUBIGNE, Tenor.
Sig. CAMPANARI, Baritone.
SATURDAY, November 16, at 2.30.
Programme.

1. Overture, "Carlo Broschi".....Auber
ORCHESTRA.
2. Aria, "Lituani".....Podchielli
(First time.)
MR. CAMPANARI.
3. Aria, "Che faro" (Orpheus).....Gluck
MME. SCALCHI.
4. Lucia, Mad Scene from "Lucia".....Donizetti
MME. MELBA.
Flute Obligato, MONS. CH MOLE.
5. Suite, "L'Arlesienne".....Bizet
ORCHESTRA.
6. ARIA, "Salve Dimora"(Faust).....Gounod
MR. D'AUBIGNE.
6. Waltz Song, "Se saran Rose".....Arditi
(By Request)
MME. MELBA.
8. Monologue (Falstaff).....Verdi
MR. CAMPANARI.
9. (a) Prelude. "Lohengrin," Act III.....Wagner
(b) Prelude, "Tannhaeuser," Act III..Wagner
ORCHESTRA.
10. Quartet from "Rigoletto".....Verdi
Mesdames MELBA, SCALCHI,
Messrs. D'AUBIGNE and CAMPANARI.
11. Overture, "Rienzi".....Wagner
ORCHESTRA.

Tickets on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut street, on and after Tuesday, Nov. 12, at 9 A. M.

PHILADELPHIA RECORD, SUNDAY
NOVEMBER 10, 1

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Emil Paur, will give the first of five concerts in which it is to be heard here during the season at the Academy of Music to-morrow evening, beginning at 8 o'clock, upon which occasion the programme will include Beethoven's symphony No. 3, the so-called "Eroica," the fairy dance music from Berlioz's "Faust" and Wagner's pompous "Kaisermarch." Mme. Melba will be the soloist, and she will be heard in Haendel's air, "Sweet Bird," with flute accompaniment, and in the mad scene from Ambroise Thomas' opera of "Hamlet." The dates of the other four concerts are December 16, January 20, February 24 and March 23, and the sale of seats is now proceeding at the usual place.

The Boston Symphony Matinee.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Emil Paur, will give its first popular matinee" on Saturday afternoon, November 16. Mme. Melba will appear in the mad scene from "Lucia," and will also sing Arditi's "Se Saran Rose." Mme. Scalchi, Sig. D'Aubigne and Sig. Campanari will take part in the concert, and in addition to solo work, will appear with Mme. Melba in the famous quartet from "Ringoletto."

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.
First Popular Matinee
BY THE
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor,
Assisted by
Mme. MELBA
Mme. Scalchi, Contralto. Sig. D'Aubigne, Tenor,
Sig. Campanari, Baritone.
Saturday, November 16, at 2.30.
PROGRAMME.

1—Overture, "Carlo Broschi," ..... Auber
Orchestra.
2—Aria, "Lituani" ..... Ponchielli
(First Time.)
MR. CAMPANARI.
3—Aria, "Che faro," (Orpheus)..... Gluck
MME. SCALCHI.
4—Lucia, Mad Scene from "Lucia" .. Donizetti
MME. MELBA.
Flute Obligato, Mons. CH. MOLE.
5—Suite, "L'Arlesienne" ..... Bizet
Orchestra.
6—Aria, "Salve Dimora" (Faust) .... Gounod
MR. D'AUBIGNE.
7—Waltz Song, "Se saran Rose" ..... Arditi
(By request.)
MME. MELBA.
8—Monologue (Falstaff) ..... Verdi
MR. CAMPANARI.
9—(a) Prelude, "Lohengrin," Act III.. Wagner
(b) Prelude "Tannhaeuser," Act III. Wagner
Orchestra.
10—Quartet from "Rigoletto" ..... Verdi
Mesdames MELBA, SCALCHI,
Messrs. D'AUBIGNE, CAMPANARI.
11—Overture, "Rienzi" ..... Wagner
Orchestra.

Tickets on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut street, on and after Tuesday, Nov. 12, at 9 A.M.

THE PHILADELPHIA RECORD, TUESDAY
NOVEMBER 12, 1895

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy.

Leader Emil Paur had every reason to feel proud of the magnificent reception accorded him and his orchestra last evening at the Academy of Music. It was the inaugural concert of the eleventh season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia, and the huge auditorium was crowded in every part, hundreds being compelled to stand. The programme contained no new musical offering, but it certainly was attractive in selection and quite varied in character, ranging from the cobwebby lightness of Berlioz's "Waltz of Sylphs" to the thunderous turmoil of Wagner's "Emperor's March." The chief number of the evening was Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, in the treatment of which no innovation was attempted; Conductor Paur simply brought to its performance an exquisite finish that was most admirable in results. The Scherzo was given with especial effectiveness, and rarely has this wonderfully-trained orchestra responded to the demands of its leader with greater readiness and accuracy. The most charming endeavor of the evening, however, was undoubtedly the dainty delicacy that marked the "Minuet of the Will o' the Wisps" and the "Waltz of the Sylphs" from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." The trembling of a sunbeam, the flash of a jewel, the flare of lights were all suggested in the almost shadowy tenderness of touch that is required in the proper realization of several of the fairylike passages in these compositions. The soloist of the evening was the gifted Melba, and she created a perfect furore. That glorious voice of hers was as clear, fresh, sparkling and melodious as ever; she ran the most intricate trills with astonishing skill, and in Handel's florid aria, "Sweet Bird," her tones rivaled those of the flute. The obligato was performed by Flutist Mr. Mole, and his contribution to the success of this number was in a measure equal to that of Melba's. The prima donna was at her best in the mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet," into which she threw more genuine feeling than was ever observed in her operatic performances. The concert concluded with Wagner's "Emperor's March," which was magnificently played, even its noisiest outbursts having a tonal adjustment difficult to obtain in so crashing an arrangement of brass, wood, leather and strings. A matinee concert is announced for Saturday.

...Music—The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

...which brilliantly ushered in the ...symphony season last evening at the ...of Music displayed Emil Paur in ...terrible light as a programme builder. ...one who realizes how hopelessly at sea ...conductors sometimes are in that ca... and how dull they occasionally con... to make their arrangement of numbers, ...hardly be said that there was cause for ...fulness at this fresh exhibition of ...Paur's skill. Solidarity and depth may ...one thing, stupidity quite another, but a ...type of concert-goers (a type which, ...unately, makes a light impression) can ...ver see the difference. Fortified by a little ...owledge and a vast amount of enthusiasm, ...will not admit, except, perchance, to ...themselves, that here and there a stray com... ...tion of their favorite masters may be un... ...come, just as if the most sublime writers ...uld not, at times, produce a dreary ...ore. These are the people who, not con... ...t with recognizing the many real beauties ...Wagner, insist that every bar he ever ...olved is a heaven-sent blessing, and who ...ould hold up their hands with pretended ...orror if they knew that a great virtuoso ...who possibly understands more about music ...than all of them put together) observed, the ...other day, that, much as he believed in Wag... ...er, he always felt like leaving an opera ...house when he heard a certain duet in one of ...the master's works. The same enthusiasts ...smile patronizingly when the name of Bee... ...hoven is mentioned; they shrug their shoul... ...ders over "poor old Haendel," and show as ...much regard for Ambroise Thomas as for— ...Offenbach.

To such musical bigots last night's pro... ...gramme, which is appended, may have ...seemed unsuitable; to those of wider tastes it ...was delightful:

Ludwig von Beethoven: Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"
Haendel.....Aria, "Sweet Bird"
(Flute obligato, Mr. Mole.)
Hector Berlioz.....a. Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps
b. Waltz of Sylphs.
From the "Damnation of Faust."
Ambroise Thomas..Ophélie's Mad Scene, "Hamlet"
Richard Wagner.....'Emperor's March"

The soloist was Madame Melba. She has, ...no doubt, been using that marvellous voice ...of hers a great deal during the past few ...weeks, yet this did not prevent her from ...giving the Haendal aria with such exquisite ...effect that at its conclusion the crowded au... ...dience recalled the prima donna again and ...again. For an exhibition of the remarkable ...facility and faultless method which distin... ...guish all her work no selection could have ...been more appropriate. The only other ...number she gave, the mad scene from ..."Hamlet," was sung with unmistakable ...beauty, if hardly with the necessary feeling ...and romantic sentiment.

Of the instrumental portion of the concert it ...may be said, in a general way, that it showed ...the orchestra to be in as fine form as ever this ...season. There was the same finish and ...unanimity, as displayed in the performance ...of the "Eroica" Symphony, and the same ...possibilities for delicate expression, as in the ...Berlioz excerpts. The powers of the orches... ...tra in the way of virility were admirably ...brought out in the closing "Emperor's ...March," which, with its crashing chords, its ...spirit of fortissimo and stirring pictures of ...war, makes a magnificent piece of descrip... ...tive writing.

On next Saturday afternoon the Orchestra ...will have a popular matinée, at which Ma... ...dame Melba, Madame Scalchi, Signor D'Au... ...bigne and Signor Campanari will be the solo... ...ists. The programme, a characteristic one ...for such an entertainment, promises to be ...most attractive.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.
FIRST POPULAR MATINEE
BY THE
BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR,
Assisted by
MME. MELBA,
MME. SCALCHI, Contralto,
SIG. D'AUBIGNE, Tenor,
SIG. CAMPANARI, Baritone,
Saturday, Nov. 16, at 2.30.
TICKETS on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut ...street, on and after TUESDAY, NOV. 12, at 9

The Times
TEN PAGES
PHILADELPHIA, NOVEMBER 12, 1895.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened ...its tenth Philadelphia season with a very ...successful concert at the Academy of Music. ...Mr. Ellis has doubled up his attractions for ...this week, and it may as well be owned that ...the feature of last evening was not the or... ...chestra but Madame Melba, who sang the ...flute aria from "Il Penseroso" and the mad ...scene from "Hamlet," with a splendor of ...voice and a smoothness and ease and brilli... ...ancy of execution that left nothing to be de... ...sired. Her tone is so rich and her singing is ...so exquisitely clear and true and sparkling, ...and at the same time so firm and strong, ...that to listen to her in concert is a great ...delight. The Handel aria, to which Mr. ...Mole played the obligato, was exquisitely ...sung, with the most delicious runs and scales ...and ending with a marvelous cadenza. ...Ophelia's scene needs the illustration of ac... ...tion, but it does not need more facile exe... ...cution. In this combination of facility with ...volume and beauty of voice Madame Melba ...is now practically alone, and in a selected ...programme like this she is heard to the best ...advantage. Mr. Paur gave a rather pale and ...colorless rendering of the third symphony, ...which never before seemed too long, and a ...very delicate execution of the fairy dance ...music from the "Damnation of Faust," clos... ...ing the concert with the Kaiser March, in ...which at least there was noise enough. The ...orchestra with Melba and the concert troupe ...will be heard again on Saturday afternoon.

...PHIA
...PRESS, TUESDAY,
NOVEMBER 12, 1895

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Appearance of Boston Orchestra This Season—Melba as Soloist.

Of course it was Melba that packed the Academy of Music last evening. Not that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not a drawing card. It is. Its days of trial have long been over, and a crowded Academy is its portion, but Philadelphia is a Melba city, and as many as could get in squeezed themselves into the Academy last night to hear her in conjunction with the orchestral diversion offered by Mr. Paur's perfectly-trained followers. This outpouring bears out all that has been said before in these columns about the unusual character of the musical season. Philadelphia seems to be thinking music as it never has before.

The Melba part of the concert was of a contrasted character. Her first solo was Handel's old-time aria, "Sweet Bird That Shunst the Noise and Folly," from his Miltonic cantata. The aria is sung with flute accompaniment, and its runs and trills are played by the flute occasionally and then echoed by the voice. In this setting-off of her voice against the flute Melba's purity of tone and rounded quality of voice was beautifully evident. The flute distinctly suffered by comparison. The aria is one of much simplicity, and yet has several high reaches that gave Melba an opportunity and caught the gallery. The second solo was "Ophelia's" mad song from Ambroise Thomas' "Hamlet." To compare Melba with herself there is this to say, that she sings the mad scene from "Lucia" much better and that the latter is a more moving performance. The "Ophelia" music did not seem to be felt by Melba, and there was a certain coldness about her rendition, which, of course, was finely executed. The mad song is plaintive and sweet, but for a mad song it needs something which Melba did not put in it last night, and yet the rendering as a mere vocalization carried away the audience. No encores, although vociferously demanded, were allowed.

The orchestral programme was an interesting one, yet Mr. Paur was a bad European politician in his programme, since he opened with Beethoven's Third symphony, the Napoleon symphony with all its consecration to a great idea, a great national hero, and closed with Wagner's loud sounding racking Kaiser march in honor of German unity in 1870 and the triumph over the French. Beethoven and the Napoleon idea bore off the honors of the evening with the fantastic Will-o'-the-Wisp's minuet and waltz of the sylphs from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" as a most dainty and exquisite interlude played as only an orchestra with the training of the Boston Symphony can play it. In the symphony the serious movement or funeral march was particularly notable. The orchestra gives its first popular concert next Saturday afternoon with Melba, Scalchi and Campanari as the stars of the first magnitude, and an attractive orchestra programme.

NORTH AMERICAN.
PHILADELPHIA,
NOVEMBER 12, 1895.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Successfully Opens Its Eleventh Philadelphia Season.

There was a great crowd at the Academy of Music last evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, opened its eleventh Philadelphia season with the performance of a programme comprising Beethoven's third symphony, the "Eroica" the fairy dance music from Berlioz's "Damnation du Faust," and Wagner's pretentious but unsatisfying "Kaiser Marsch." The interpretation of the symphony, while perfect as regards technique, intellectually and emotionally left something to be desired. It was beautifully refined, admirably proportioned, and of pellucid clearness, but somehow or other it failed to communicate the feeling of the music. It left the listener cold. Even in the playing of the funeral march, one did not get away from the art of the rendition. And while art is much, it is not everything, especially where the composer is Beethoven. What was missed was the accent of sincerity, of intensity, of life. The deep sorrow which pervades the throbbing phrases of the slow movement, and inspires its haunting, reiterated cadences, was never felt and made contagiously communicative. The Berlioz music was much more satisfying, for its performance was marked by a perfection that left nothing wanting. Mme. Melba was the soloist. She sang Haendel's air, "Sweet Bird," with flute obligato, beautifully played by M. Mole, and the mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet." She was not in her best voice, but sang with incomparable brilliancy and delightful art, and was rapturously applauded.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1895.

The program of the Fourth Symphony Concert given last evening was as follows:

Preludes to Acts I. and II. of Guntram.....Richard Strauss
(First time.)
Concerto for piano, C minor, op. 185.....Raff
Symphony No. 39, D major, Parisian.....Mozart
Overture, Consecration of the House.....Beethoven

The program book stated that "Guntram, opera in three acts, the text and music by Richard Strauss, was first brought out at the Musicians' Festival at Weimar in 1894." The statement is incorrect. The opera was first brought out at the Weimar Opera House, May 10, 1894. The Musicians' Festival at Weimar in 1894 was May 31 to June 6.

* * *

Inasmuch as Guntram is unknown to us, we are obliged to listen to these preludes as though they were absolute music, without a definite purpose, as the inducing of a mood, a preparation for the dramatic action that follows, or, in the case of the second prelude, a contrast, or an explanation, or an announcement like the "twenty years are supposed to elapse," &c., so dear to writers of melodrama. The music no doubt suffers in consequence.

Yet is the first of these preludes—it was played in Chicago by Thomas' Orchestra November 2—full of suggestion. Given the word Guntram and this prelude; here is a problem to be worked out by each hearer, and without doubt there are many wildly differing answers.

To you, madam, it may have suggested a cathedral. To you, a philosopher, it may have suggested infinity. To a third, something rambling and vaguely agreeable. To me it was all white, mystic, wonderful. However you may regard its purpose or its meaning, you must admit the beauty, the spirituality, the freedom from earthly dross. It is easy to look wise, to say now Lohengrin, and again Tristan, and yet again Parsifal, but there is much in the prelude that is Richard Strauss. Do you object to the synchronism in one passage of two decided tonalities? Is there not thereby a genuine effect? This is not simply a striving after the bizarre. Strauss wanted that particular effect; he got it; and I would not exchange for it the whole of the symphony by Mozart, with the overture by Beethoven thrown in.

This young man, for Strauss is only thirty-one, has written music that commands respect, as well as music that is perplexing or disheartening in its pessimism, as the Don Juan symphonic poem, in which our old friend from Spain is sophisticated and deeply versed in Schopenhauer. But I do not remember anything by him that gives such assurance of his serene mastery of a subject as the prelude played last night, all white, mystic, wonderful.

The prelude to Act 2 is the Festival of Victory at the Duke's Court. Here we have Strauss, the student of Berlioz. But Berlioz in tumultuous joy, in orchestral jamborees, is a hard man to imitate, for he is always distinct in the height of his frenzy. Twist the rhythm as Strauss will, shock by sudden contrasts, set up blue lights and rockets and pinwheels and cannon crackers when the whole show is over, and there remain stunned ears, aching eyes, lame legs, the smell of powder and burnt paper, there is the one final opinion: "After all, Berlioz gave us a better show." Yet, in its proper place, this orchestral hurrah may serve its purpose.

Bülow never showed more clearly his devotion to Raff than when he insisted on playing his piano concerto. The Raff of the greater symphonies is one man, a romantic creature, with a mastery of counterpoint and moments of genuine inspiration and gorgeous expression. The Raff of the piano pieces is for the most part a contriver of pot boilers, with a mastery of counterpoint and an eye to cheap applause. This concerto, we are told by some learned German, is a masterpiece because—because, forsooth, "in each movement all the subjects are in double counterpoint with one another." This may be so; it does not prevent the work from being intrinsically vulgar.

I know of hardly anything more pathetic in the history of music than the necessity of Raff. Here was a man of fine thought, of acknowledged skill, of pure, romantic spirit, obliged to write for publishers and public that he might eat, clothe himself and have a place to sleep in.

There are philistines in all trades and callings, though, and ours are to have recognition to-morrow evening, when the Boston Symphony orchestra will play Arditi's and Donizetti's music. Whether this is done to oblige Melba or the audience remains to be seen. If the audience likes it, and we are all afraid it will, the Boston Symphony orchestra will probably give us Offenbach before the season is over, and we may have T'row him down, McCloskey at the last concert. The Brooklyn Institute, which backs the Boston orchestra this season, is devoted to the advancement of art and science. This week it gives talks on nearly everything. There are seven lectures under its auspices to-day and this evening; three to-morrow, three on Wednesday, ten on Thursday, four on Friday and three on Saturday. In addition to all this it keeps art and architecture classes going and gives a course of dramatic readings. In every one of these themes the lecturers and orators and teachers deal with high facts of science and art. We have talks and discussions about Shakespeare, Goethe, Æschylus, Raphael, the Renaissance, and the like of that. Yet its music admits Donizetti and Arditi! Well, perhaps we should not complain.

The Boston Symphony people have been giving us Wagner, Beethoven, Schubert and Schumann for several years and the houses have been half full. If the people do not want the classics let them have their musical taffy. Some of us are sorry. But it brings the dollars.

...AND ADVERTISER.

...ia, Tuesday, Nov. 12, 1895.

...cademy of Music—The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert which brilliantly ushered in the Boston Symphony season last evening at the Academy of Music displayed Emil Paur in an admirable light as a programme builder. To any one who realizes how hopelessly at sea the best conductors sometimes are in that capacity and how dull they occasionally contrive to make their arrangement of numbers, it need hardly be said that there was cause for thankfulness at this fresh exhibition of Mr. Paur's skill. Solidarity and depth may be one thing, stupidity quite another, but a certain type of concert-goers (a type which, fortunately, makes a light impression) can never see the difference. Fortified by a little knowledge and a vast amount of enthusiasm, they will not admit, except, perhaps, to themselves, that here and there a stray composition of their favorite masters may be unwelcome, just as if the most sublime writers could not, at times, produce a dreary score. These are the people who, not content with recognizing the many real beauties of Wagner, insist that every bar he ever evolved is a heaven-sent blessing, and who would hold up their hands with pretended horror if they knew that a great virtuoso (who possibly understands more about music than all of them put together) observed, the other day, that, much as he believed in Wagner, he always felt like leaving an opera house when he heard a certain duet in one of the master's works. The same enthusiasts smile patronizingly when the name of Beethoven is mentioned; they shrug their shoulders over "poor old Haendel," and show as much regard for Ambroise Thomas as for—Offenbach.

To such musical bigots last night's programme, which is appended, may have seemed unsuitable; to those of wider tastes it was delightful:

Ludwig von Beethoven: Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"
Haendel.....Aria, "Sweet Bird"
(Flute obligato, Mr. Mole.)
Hector Berlioz.....a. Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps
b. Waltz of Sylphs.
From the "Damnation of Faust."
Ambroise Thomas. Ophélie's Mad Scene, "Hamlet"
Richard Wagner.....'Emperor's March"

The soloist was Madame Melba. She has, no doubt, been using that marvellous voice of hers a great deal during the past few weeks, yet this did not prevent her from giving the Haendal aria with such exquisite effect that at its conclusion the crowded audience recalled the prima donna again and again. For an exhibition of the remarkable facility and faultless method which distinguish all her work no selection could have been more appropriate. The only other number she gave, the mad scene from "Hamlet," was sung with unmistakable beauty, if hardly with the necessary feeling and romantic sentiment.

Of the instrumental portion of the concert it may be said, in a general way, that it showed the orchestra to be in as fine form as ever this season. There was the same finish and unanimity, as displayed in the performance of the "Eroica" Symphony, and the same possibilities for delicate expression, as in the Berlioz excerpts. The powers of the orchestra in the way of virility were admirably brought out in the closing "Emperor's March," which, with its crashing chords, its spirit of fortissimo and stirring pictures of war, makes a magnificent piece of descriptive writing.

On next Saturday afternoon the Orchestra will have a popular matinée, at which Madame Melba, Madame Scalchi, Signor D'Aubigne and Signor Campanari will be the soloists. The programme, a characteristic one for such an entertainment, promises to be most attractive.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.
FIRST POPULAR MATINEE
BY THE
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR,
Assisted by
MME. MELBA,
MME. SCALCHI, Contralto,
SIG. D'AUBIGNE, Tenor,
SIG. CAMPANARI, Baritone,
Saturday, Nov. 16, at 2.30.
TICKETS on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut street, on and after TUESDAY, NOV. 12, at 9 A. M.

The Times

TEN PAGES

PHILADELPHIA, NOVEMBER 12, 1895.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its tenth Philadelphia season with a very successful concert at the Academy of Music. Mr. Ellis has doubled up his attractions for this week, and it may as well be owned that the feature of last evening was not the orchestra but Madame Melba, who sang the flute aria from "Il Penseroso" and the mad scene from "Hamlet," with a splendor of voice and a smoothness and ease and brilliancy of execution that left nothing to be desired. Her tone is so rich and her singing is so exquisitely clear and true and sparkling, and at the same time so firm and strong, that to listen to her in concert is a great delight. The Handel aria, to which Mr. Mole played the obligato, was exquisitely sung, with the most delicious runs and scales and ending with a marvelous cadenza. Ophelia's scene needs the illustration of action, but it does not need more facile execution. In this combination of facility with volume and beauty of voice Madame Melba is now practically alone, and in a selected programme like this she is heard to the best advantage. Mr. Paur gave a rather pale and tedious rendering of the third symphony, which never before seemed too long, and a very delicate execution of the fairy dance music from the "Damnation of Faust," closing the concert with the Kaiser March, in which at least there was noise enough. The orchestra with Melba and the concert troupe will be heard again on Saturday afternoon.

THE PHILADELPHIA PRESS.—TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1895

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Appearance of Boston Orchestra This Season—Melba as Soloist.

Of course it was Melba that packed the Academy of Music last evening. Not that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not a drawing card. It is. Its days of trial have long been over, and a crowded Academy is its portion, but Philadelphia is a Melba city, and as many as could get in squeezed themselves into the Academy last night to hear her in conjunction with the orchestral diversion offered by Mr. Paur's perfectly-trained followers. This outpouring bears out all that has been said before in these columns about the unusual character of the musical season. Philadelphia seems to be thinking music as it never has before.

The Melba part of the concert was of a contrasted character. Her first solo was Handel's old-time aria, "Sweet Bird That Shunst the Noise and Folly," from his Miltonic cantata. The aria is sung with flute accompaniment, and its runs and trills are played by the flute occasionally and then echoed by the voice. In this setting-off of her voice against the flute Melba's purity of tone and rounded quality of voice was beautifully evident. The flute distinctly suffered by comparison. The aria is one of much simplicity, and yet has several high reaches that gave Melba an opportunity and caught the gallery. The second solo was "Ophelia's" mad song from Ambroise Thomas' "Hamlet." To compare Melba with herself there is this to say, that she sings the mad scene from "Lucia" much better and that the latter is a more moving performance. The "Ophelia" music did not seem to be felt by Melba, and there was a certain coldness about her rendition, which, of course, was finely executed. The mad song is plaintive and sweet, but for a mad song it needs something which Melba did not put in it last night, and yet the rendering as a mere vocalization carried away the audience. No encores, although vociferously demanded, were allowed.

The orchestral programme was an interesting one, yet Mr Paur was a bad European politician in his programme, since he opened with Beethoven's Third symphony, the Napoleon symphony with all its consecration to a great idea, a great national hero, and closed with Wagner's loud sounding racking Kaiser march in honor of German unity in 1870 and the triumph over the French. Beethoven and the Napoleon idea bore off the honors of the evening with the fantastic Will-o'-the-Wisp's minuet and waltz of the sylphs from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" as a most dainty and exquisite interlude played as only an orchestra with the training of the Boston Symphony can play it. In the symphony the serious movement or funeral march was particularly notable. The orchestra gives its first popular concert next Saturday afternoon with Melba, Scalchi and Campanari as the stars of the first magnitude, and an attractive orchestra programme.

NORTH AMERICAN.
PHILADELPHIA,
NOVEMBER 12, 1895.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Successfully Opens Its Eleventh Philadelphia Season.

There was a great crowd at the Academy of Music last evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, opened its eleventh Philadelphia season with the performance of a programme comprising Beethoven's third symphony, the "Eroica" the fairy dance music from Berlioz's "Damnation du Faust," and Wagner's pretentious but unsatisfying "Kaiser Marsch." The interpretation of the symphony, while perfect as regards technique, intellectually and emotionally left something to be desired. It was beautifully refined, admirably proportioned, and of pellucid clearness, but somehow or other it failed to communicate the feeling of the music. It left the listener cold. Even in the playing of the funeral march, one did not get away from the art of the rendition. And while art is much, it is not everything, especially where the composer is Beethoven. What was missed was the accent of sincerity, of intensity, of life. The deep sorrow which pervades the throbbing phrases of the slow movement, and inspires its haunting, reiterated cadences, was never felt and made contagiously communicative. The Berlioz music was much more satisfying, for its performance was marked by a perfection that left nothing wanting. Mme. Melba was the soloist. She sang Haendel's air, "Sweet Bird," with flute obligato, beautifully played by M. Mole, and the mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet." She was not in her best voice, but sang with incomparable brilliancy and delightful art, and was rapturously applauded.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1895.

The program of the Fourth Symphony Concert given last evening was as follows:

Preludes to Acts I. and II. of Guntram.....Richard Strauss
(First time.)
Concerto for piano, C minor, op. 185.....Raff
Symphony No. 39, D major, Parisian.....Mozart
Overture, Consecration of the House.....Beethoven

The program book stated that "Guntram, opera in three acts, the text and music by Richard Strauss, was first brought out at the Musicians' Festival at Weimar in 1894." The statement is incorrect. The opera was first brought out at the Weimar Opera House, May 10, 1894. The Musicians' Festival at Weimar in 1894 was May 31 to June 6.

* * *

Inasmuch as Guntram is unknown to us, we are obliged to listen to these preludes as though they were absolute music, without a definite purpose, as the inducing of a mood, a preparation for the dramatic action that follows, or, in the case of the second prelude, a contrast, or an explanation, or an announcement like the "twenty years are supposed to elapse," &c., so dear to writers of melodrama. The music no doubt suffers in consequence.

Yet is the first of these preludes—it was played in Chicago by Thomas' Orchestra November 2—full of suggestion. Given the word Guntram and this prelude; here is a problem to be worked out by each hearer, and without doubt there are many wildly differing answers.

To you, madam, it may have suggested a cathedral. To you, a philosopher, it may have suggested infinity. To a third, something rambling and vaguely agreeable. To me it was all white, mystic, wonderful. However you may regard its purpose or its meaning, you must admit the beauty, the spirituality, the freedom from earthly dross. It is easy to look wise, to say now Lohengrin, and again Tristan, and yet again Parsifal, but there is much in the prelude that is Richard Strauss. Do you object to the synchronism in one passage of two decided tonalities? Is there not thereby a genuine effect? This is not simply a striving after the bizarre. Strauss wanted that particular effect; he got it; and I would not exchange for it the whole of the symphony by Mozart, with the overture by Beethoven thrown in.

This young man, for Strauss is only thirty-one, has written music that commands respect, as well as music that is perplexing or disheartening in its pessimism, as the Don Juan symphonic poem, in which our old friend from Spain is sophisticated and deeply versed in Schopenhauer. But I do not remember anything by him that gives such assurance of his serene mastery of a subject as the prelude played last night, all white, mystic, wonderful.

The prelude to Act 2 is the Festival of Victory at the Duke's Court. Here we have Strauss, the student of Berlioz. But Berlioz in tumultuous joy, in orchestral jamborees, is a hard man to imitate, for he is always distinct in the height of his frenzy. Twist the rhythm as Strauss will, shock by sudden contrasts, set up blue lights and rockets and pinwheels and cannon crackers when the whole show is over, and there remain stunned ears, aching eyes, lame legs, the smell of powder and burnt paper, there is the one final opinion: "After all, Berlioz gave us a better show." Yet, in its proper place, this orchestral hurrah may serve its purpose.

Bülow never showed more clearly his devotion to Raff than when he insisted on playing his piano concerto. The Raff of the greater symphonies is one man, a romantic creature, with a mastery of counterpoint and moments of genuine inspiration and gorgeous expression. The Raff of the piano pieces is for the most part a contriver of pot boilers, with a mastery of counterpoint and an eye to cheap applause. This concerto, we are told by some learned German, is a masterpiece because—because, forsooth, "in each movement all the subjects are in double counterpoint with one another." This may be so; it does not prevent the work from being intrinsically vulgar.

I know of hardly anything more pathetic in the history of music than the necessity of Raff. Here was a man of fine thought, of acknowledged skill, of pure, romantic spirit, obliged to write for publishers and public that he might eat, clothe himself and have a place to sleep in.

There are philistines in all trades and callings, though, and ours are to have recognition to-morrow evening, when the Boston Symphony orchestra will play Arditi's and Donizetti's music. Whether this is done to oblige Melba or the audience remains to be seen. If the audience likes it, and we are all afraid it will, the Boston Symphony orchestra will probably give us Offenbach before the season is over, and we may have T'row him down, McCloskey at the last concert. The Brooklyn Institute, which backs the Boston orchestra this season, is devoted to the advancement of art and science. This week it gives talks on nearly everything. There are seven lectures under its auspices to-day and this evening; three to-morrow, three on Wednesday, ten on Thursday, four on Friday and three on Saturday. In addition to all this it keeps art and architecture classes going and gives a course of dramatic readings. In every one of these themes the lecturers and orators and teachers deal with high facts of science and art. We have talks and discussions about Shakespeare, Goethe, Æschylus, Raphael, the Renaissance, and the like of that. Yet its music admits Donizetti and Arditi! Well, perhaps we should not complain.

The Boston Symphony people have been giving us Wagner, Beethoven, Schubert and Schumann for several years and the houses have been half full. If the people do not want the classics let them have their musical taffy. Some of us are sorry. But it brings the dollars.

...Music—The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

...which brilliantly ushered in the ...phony season last evening at the ...y of Music displayed Emil Paur in ...table light as a programme builder. ...one who realizes how hopelessly at sea ...ral conductors sometimes are in that ca... and how dull they occasionally con... to make their arrangement of numbers, ...rdially be said that there was cause for ...ulness at this fresh exhibition of ...Paur's skill. Solidarity and depth may ...one thing, stupidity quite another, but a ...rtain type of concert-goers (a type which, ...unately, makes a light impression) can ...ver see the difference. Fortified by a little ...owledge and a vast amount of enthusiasm, ...y will not admit, except, perchance, to ...emselves, that here and there a stray com...sition of their favorite masters may be un...welcome, just as if the most sublime writers ...ould not, at times, produce a dreary ...ture. These are the people who, not con...t with recognizing the many real beauties ...f Wagner, insist that every bar he ever ...rolled is a heaven-sent blessing, and who ...ould hold up their hands with pretended ...orror if they knew that a great virtuoso ...who possibly understands more about music ...than all of them put together) observed, the ...other day, that, much as he believed in Wag...er, he always felt like leaving an opera ...house when he heard a certain duet in one of ...the master's works. The same enthusiasts ...smile patronisingly when the name of Bee...thoven is mentioned; they shrug their shoul...ders over "poor old Haendel," and show as ...much regard for Ambroise Thomas as for—...Offenbach.

To such musical bigots last night's pro...gramme, which is appended, may have ...seemed unsuitable; to those of wider tastes it ...was delightful:

...dwig von Beethoven:
Symphony No. 3, "Eroica" ...Handel.....Aria, "Sweet Bird"
(Flute obligato, Mr. Molé.)
...ector Berlioz.....a. Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps
b. Waltz of Sylphs.
From the "Damnation of Faust."
...mbroise Thomas..Ophelie's Mad Scene, "Hamlet"
...chard Wagner.....'Emperor's March'

The soloist was Madame Melba. She has, ...no doubt, been using that marvellous voice ...of hers a great deal during the past few ...weeks, yet this did not prevent her from ...giving the Haendal aria with such exquisite ...effect that at its conclusion the crowded au...dience recalled the prima donna again and ...again. For an exhibition of the remarkable ...facility and faultless method which distin...guish all her work no selection could have ...been more appropriate. The only other ...number she gave, the mad scene from ..."Hamlet," was sung with unmistakable ...beauty, if hardly with the necessary feeling ...and romantic sentiment.

Of the instrumental portion of the concert it ...may be said, in a general way, that it showed ...the orchestra to be in as fine form as ever this ...season. There was the same finish and ...unanimity, as displayed in the performance ...of the "Eroica" Symphony, and the same ...possibilities for delicate expression, as in the ...Berlioz excerpts. The powers of the orches...tra in the way of virility were admirably ...brought out in the closing "Emperor's ...March," which, with its crashing chords, its ...spirit of fortissimo and stirring pictures of ...war, makes a magnificent piece of descrip...tive writing.

On next Saturday afternoon the Orchestra ...will have a popular matinée, at which Ma...dame Melba, Madame Scalchi, Signor D'Au...bigne and Signor Campanari will be the solo...ists. The programme, a characteristic one ...for such an entertainment, promises to be ...most attractive.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.
FIRST POPULAR MATINÉE
BY THE
BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR,
Assisted by
MME. MELBA,
MME. SCALCHI, Contralto,
SIG. D'AUBIGNE, Tenor,
SIG. CAMPANARI, Baritone,
Saturday, Nov. 16, at 2.30.
TICKETS on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut ...on and after TUESDAY, NOV. 12, at 9

The Times
TEN PAGES
PHILADELPHIA, NOVEMBER 13, 1895.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its tenth Philadelphia season with a very successful concert at the Academy of Music. Mr. Mills has doubled up his attractions for this week, and it may as well be owned that the feature of last evening was not the orchestra but Madame Melba, who sang the flute aria from "Il Penseroso" and the mad scene from "Hamlet," with a splendor of voice and a smoothness and ease and brilliancy of execution that left nothing to be desired. Her tone is so rich and her singing is exquisitely clear and true and sparkling, and at the same time so firm and strong, that to listen to her in concert is a great delight. The Handel aria, to which Mr. Mole played the obligato, was exquisitely sung, with the most delicious runs and scales and ending with a marvelous cadenza. Melba's scene needs the illustration of action, but it does not need more facile execution. In this combination of facility with volume and beauty of voice Madame Melba is now practically alone, and in a selected ...mme like this she is heard to the best ...vantage. Mr. Paur gave a rather pale and ...ious rendering of the third symphony, ...hich never before seemed too long, and a ...ery delicate execution of the fairy dance ...usic from the "Damnation of Faust," clos...g the concert with the Kaiser March, in ...hich at least there was noise enough. The ...rchestra with Melba and the concert troupe ...ill be heard again on Saturday afternoon.

...PHILADELPHIA
...PRESS, TUESDAY,
NOVEMBER 12, 1895

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Appearance of Boston Orchestra This Season—Melba as Soloist.

Of course it was Melba that packed the Academy of Music last evening. Not that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not a drawing card. It is. Its days of trial have long been over, and a crowded Academy is its portion, but Philadelphia is a Melba city, and as many as could get in squeezed themselves into the Academy last night to hear her in conjunction with the orchestral diversion offered by Mr. Paur's perfectly-trained followers. This outpouring bears out all that has been said before in these columns about the unusual character of the musical season. Philadelphia seems to be thinking music as it never has before.

The Melba part of the concert was of a contrasted character. Her first solo was Handel's old-time aria, "Sweet Bird That Shunst the Noise and Folly," from his Miltonic cantata. The aria is sung with flute accompaniment, and its runs and trills are played by the flute occasionally and then echoed by the voice. In this setting-off of her voice against the flute Melba's purity of tone and rounded quality of voice was beautifully evident. The flute distinctly suffered by comparison. The aria is one of much simplicity, and yet has several high reaches that gave Melba an opportunity and caught the gallery. The second solo was "Ophelia's" mad song from Ambroise Thomas' "Hamlet." To compare Melba with herself there is this to say, that she sings the mad scene from "Lucia" much better and that the latter is a more moving performance. The "Ophelia" music did not seem to be felt by Melba, and there was a certain coldness about her rendition, which, of course, was finely executed. The mad song is plaintive and sweet, but for a mad song it needs something which Melba did not put in it last night, and yet the rendering as a mere vocalization carried away the audience. No encores, although vociferously demanded, were allowed.

The orchestral programme was an interesting one, yet Mr. Paur was a bad European politician in his programme, since he opened with Beethoven's Third symphony, the Napoleon symphony with all its consecration to a great idea, a great national hero, and closed with Wagner's loud sounding racking Kaiser march in honor of German unity in 1870 and the triumph over the French. Beethoven and the Napoleon idea bore off the honors of the evening with the fantastic Will-o'-the-Wisp's minuet and waltz of the sylphs from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" as a most dainty and exquisite interlude played as only an orchestra with the training of the Boston Symphony can play it. In the symphony the serious movement or funeral march was particularly notable. The orchestra gives its first popular concert next Saturday afternoon with Melba, Scalchi and Campanari as the stars of the first magnitude, and an attractive orchestra programme.

NORTH AMERICAN.
PHILADELPHIA,
NOVEMBER 12, 1895.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Successfully Opens Its Eleventh Philadelphia Season.

There was a great crowd at the Academy of Music last evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, opened its eleventh Philadelphia season with the performance of a programme comprising Beethoven's third symphony, the "Eroica" the fairy dance music from Berlioz's "Damnation du Faust," and Wagner's pretentious but unsatisfying "Kaiser Marsch." The interpretation of the symphony, while perfect as regards technique, intellectually and emotionally left something to be desired. It was beautifully refined, admirably proportioned, and of pellucid clearness, but somehow or other it failed to communicate the feeling of the music. It left the listener cold. Even in the playing of the funeral march, one did not get away from the art of the rendition. And while art is much, it is not everything, especially where the composer is Beethoven. What was missed was the accent of sincerity, of intensity, of life. The deep sorrow which pervades the throbbing phrases of the slow movement, and inspires its haunting, reiterated cadences, was never felt and made contagiously communicative. The Berlioz music was much more satisfying, for its performance was marked by a perfection that left nothing wanting. Mme. Melba was the soloist. She sang Haendel's air, "Sweet Bird," with flute obligato, beautifully played by M. Mole, and the mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet." She was not in her best voice, but sang with incomparable brilliancy and delightful art, and was rapturously applauded.

Paderewski.

WELL, our glorious Paderewski is back again, and, if possible, more glorious than ever! There does not seem much else to say about him, since everything ...to hear it; it makes me think of George!" Since that time it is in my mind as Paderewski's George Melody.

...said in speaking of Schumann, 1. Arleschino; 2. Notturno (In Boccacio's Villa); 3. Lucciolo (Firefly); 3. Misericordia (On the Lung Urno at Midnight); 5. Rusigmolo (In My Neighbor's Garden), also La Suitone (Petite Scene for piano).

Mr. John H. Manning, assisted by Miss Gertrude Edmands, Mr. Jacques Hoffmann and Mr. Edouard Rose, gave a piano recital in Association Hall Thursday evening. His program was: Trio for piano and strings, op, 23, Christian Sinding; Spirit Song, Haydn; sarabane, Bach; gavot, Bach; Etudes Symphoniques, Schumann;

The pity of it that such a man should write such a concerto, with its boarding school prettiness and its circus finale.

Mr. Faelten's performance of it was no doubt as good as it deserved. He was conscientious and careful and always respectable. There was never any exhibition of the overwhelming artistry that sometimes glorifies that which is commonplace and redeems that which is inherently vulgar.

* * *

Mozart's symphony in D pleased the Parisians of 1778. But that was over a century ago. In this work there are few traces of the smile of Mozart, the smile that suggests the tear. I doubt if Mr. Paur would play it to-day, or if anybody would listen to it respectfully and patiently, if it did not bear Mozart's name.

Nor is the Beethoven overture a mighty joy. Who cares for Beethoven when he wrote "in the style of Händel"? It is when we listen to his music written in the style of Beethoven that we bow the knee. PHILIP HALE.

Boston Music Notes.

BOSTON, November 9, 1895.

Mme. Melba's apartments at the Hotel Brunswick were a perfect garden of flowers, some of them the trophies of the opening night at Music Hall, other gifts from friends who know her love for roses. Next Friday evening she will sing in New York with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for the first time this season. The past month she has sung at eighteen concerts.

Mme. Scalchi will leave for New York immediately after the Saturday afternoon concert, to meet her husband, Signor Lolli, who is to arrive from Italy in a day or two.

Mlle. Bauermeister, owing to engagements with the opera, leaves the Melba Company on Saturday, as she has to be in New York in time to sing at the opening night at the Metropolitan Opera House. Mlle. Bauermeister received so warm a welcome upon her appearance at Music Hall that, as she expressed it, "a big lump came in her throat and was very hard to get rid of." The greatest pleasure of her life is in doing something that gives happiness to others. She takes very few holidays, going from one engagement to another, with but short intervals between. In London her home is near the Crystal Palace, but she is always glad to get back to her "dear America."

Mr. Lloyd d'Aubigne, who by the way is a pupil of Wm. Courtney, of New York, has had such a succession of complimentary notices ever since he has been a member of the Melba Operatic Concert Company that to read them is but to read the changes upon the words "tremendous success," "artistic singing," "strong personality," "fine tenor voice," &c. On Thursday evening at Music Hall he sang under great difficulties, as he had been seriously ill for several days, and it was only by the greatest effort of the will that he was able to make his appearance. In January Mr. d'Aubigne will be heard in New York in opera.

Mr. and Mrs. Warren D. Hobbs announce the marriage of their daughter Henrietta and Homer A. Norris, which took place on Tuesday, November 5. The Rev. Edward Everett Hale was the officiating clergyman.

Miss Edith F. Castle sang two groups of songs in the recital given at the New England Conservatory of Music on Thursday evening. Miss Castle has already booked several engagements for concerts, and will probably be heard ...of Boston before the season is over.

...z Worthington Loomis, a young composer

L 91

Kneisel, of Boston, as well by other virtuosi. Music lives in the sensible perception of sound. Reading a score is useless; the work, if it belongs to the past, must be made to live again in the sense of hearing, for it must not be forgotten that the further we go back in the past the more uncertain are the traditions and conditions of culture under which a given work was composed; nay, even the very sense of hearing has undergone changes. Such being the case, the philological method is insufficient, and our teachers have in consequence illustrated their lectures by piano performance and instituted the so-called historical concerts.

After lamenting the fact that the history of music does not form part of the general education of the cultured classes, Dr. Pruefer exclaims, "Music as it exists in the works of the great masters of all ages is a revelation of one of the most peculiar branches of human culture, comparable to Christianity alone in its power to conquer and redeem the world," and he quotes Wagner's words, "As Christianity stepped out from the Roman universal civilization, so from the chaos of modern civilization music comes forth."

Music, Pruefer says, has a mission, and if the science of musical history ...further this mission

BEN IS BITTER.

THE Boston Herald printed the following editorial November 10:

Certain of the New York music critics continue to express profound sympathy with Boston in the absence of Mr. Arthur Nikisch from his former place as conductor of the Boston Symphony concerts, and seem to pretend to believe that in parting with him Boston has lost a treasure of inestimable value. This is all well enough in its way as an example of the keen interest that these writers take in the musical welfare of this city; but, unfortunately, they do not appear to be able to glorify the conductor who has gone without manifesting a more than ugly spirit toward the infinitely more able conductor who has replaced him. In other words, Mr. Nikisch is taken as a text for depreciating Mr. Paur.

New York critics have always been eccentric in regard to conductors, and do not seem to know exactly what they really want in that regard. After having showered praise of the most fervid quality on Theodore Thomas for years, they suddenly turn upon him and hound him unmercifully. On the advent of Anton Seidl they prostrated themselves adoringly before him and sang the loudest of hosannas whenever he took his baton in hand to impart a lurid Wagnerian color to every other composer; in fact they established a Seidl cult and wildly worshipped their idol for some years. Then, without warning, they began to pull down the altars they had erected to his power and glory, and to throw mud at him, to ridicule him, to scoff at his pretentiousness and to decry him as a false god, a misleader in art and a musical imbecile generally. This state of affairs lasted for some little time, when the current of feeling underwent a change, and Mr. Seidl was lugged from the mound of abuse under which he had been submerged, shaken into shape, brushed off, made fairly presentable and set up again, but on a smaller pedestal and without any of the attributes of his earlier divinity. The reason for these mutations of admiration has never been explained.

Then came Mr. Damrosch, whom the critics would not accept at any price. Season after season they berated him, laughed at him, snarled at him, belittled him, insulted him and displayed a bitter and an implacable resolve to "down him," come what might. He could not thus be "downed," however, but held on his way unmoved of the thunderbolts that the gentlemen of the press hurled at him, and, lo and behold! by-and-by they began to smear him with commendation, to rejoice in him, to pick from his coat lappels such little bits of fluff as may have wafted thither, and to smooth him down generally, until at last they find themselves almost impoverished in terms wherewith to sound his praises. The reason for this curious change of heart remains also unexplained. And so it was of Mr. Van der Stucken, and so it has been of every conductor whose misfortune or honor it may have been to come under the pens of these same critics. So it was at the outset even with Mr. Nikisch, in a lesser degree, because, probably, he was only an occasional visitor.

Having rung all the changes possible on their own conductors they now turn their attention to Boston, and reproach her severely for having let Mr. Nikisch go; and they throw in her teeth the fact that Leipsic has secured him for the Gewandhaus concerts. That great light of American musical art, Mr. Reginald de Koven, seizing a few moments from his industrious composition of music by other composers, finds opportunity to say: "After the many detrimental things said in regard to his work the surpassing success which Mr. Nikisch has been meeting with both in Leipsic and Berlin must be gall and wormwood to some critics." Nothing has yet been heard here of this surpassing success; but even if Mr. Nikisch has achieved it in Berlin and Leipsic it proves no more than that there are as great fools in those cities as there are in New York. Mr. De Koven himself has achieved astonishing success, but that is only an indication that some people like the sort of music that he provides. It does not make him a great musician, even in his genre; nor does Mr. Nikisch's success in Berlin and Leipsic make him a great conductor. If these cities like Mr. Nikisch, and he remains no better a conductor than he was when he failed to satisfy Boston and delighted New York, so much the worse. There must be some German critics to whom the triumph of mediocrity is as much gall and wormwood as it can possibly be to Boston critics.

But why this almost paternal solicitude regarding the absence of Mr. Nikisch from Boston? If he is so successful abroad, why not rejoice that he is where he is appreciated, instead of wishing him back again where he is not? It is said that he is very eager to return to this country, which, by the way, is somewhat ungrateful toward those cities that have crowned him with laurel, and that the boom which those New York critics are attempting to make for him is directed toward assisting him in that desire. It is a pity that they do not use their great influence to obtain a foothold for him in New York, where they will be enabled to encourage and to support them to their heart's content. He was weighed in the balance here and found wanting, but he would no doubt do very well in New York, where they are far less particular. However, they do not appear to be so much bent on having him there as they are in having him in Boston, which is, after all, something closely resembling a backhanded compliment, and a rather dubious form of admiration to come from those who are so inconsolable at his absence, and who yearn so movingly for him. Pave the way, gentlemen, for him to take up his abode in New York, and should you succeed, Boston would hear of it with pleasure and an equanimity that would be impossible in any contemplation of his return hither. In the meanwhile you will of course continue to hammer away at Mr. Paur whenever he visits you with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, just to show how loyal you are to Mr. Nikisch, and how consistent you are in your treatment of conductors generally. Then, too, there is something in emulating the ruffian in Punch, who advised hurling half a brick at the new minister, simply because he was not the old one.

Of course little Benny Woolf wrote the above interesting nonsense. Benny has never forgiven Mr. Nikisch because that great conductor failed to appreciate Benny's music, and of course Benny heaves his verbal brickbat at Mr. De Koven because that composer's Robin Hood is successful and the Woolf operettas are not. But let all this pass. THE MUSICAL COURIER is referred to, naturally enough, for THE MUSICAL COURIER said that Mr. Paur is not a great conductor and not a worthy successor to Mr. Nikisch, that Walter Damrosch was sadly in need of experience, and that Mr. Thomas and Mr. Seidl had both deteriorated.

All these criticisms were just and called for. Mr. Damrosch has by sheer force of ability and backbone won a foremost and an enviable position in the musical life of America. He benefited by our criticisms. So did Mr. Thomas, who has been doing superb work in Chicago, and who will revisit New York next spring with a success he never experienced since his palmy days of a decade ago. Mr. Seidl has been criticised in these columns, but he was never pulled off his pedestal, as Woolf says. Mr. Seidl is a strong individuality, a conductor of modern music drama. That is his pedestal and stronghold. Mr. Paur alone has not benefited by THE MUSICAL COURIER criticisms, for the simple reason that he could not. He is Mr. Paur, and will make no progress, being hidebound in his prejudices, and hopelessly dull and philistine.

Naturally such a provincial writer as Woolf—"Has-Been Woolf" they nickname him in Boston town—knows nothing of the contemporaneous currents of the great musical world. How can he? He writes for a distinguished constituency, chiefly composed of shoemakers, in Lynn, Mass.! How could he have heard of Nikisch's success in Leipsic and Berlin? What is Nikisch to Lynn and Ben Woolf? Why, the man never reads the newspapers—no, not even the Boston Herald! In the old Baconian days this admirable newspaper was amiable to a fault in its musical department.

We congratulate the Herald on its Woolf. He of all men will tell the stern truth to his Lynn auditory. He will say that New York is unmusical because it upheld Mr. Nikisch—Nikisch, the man who neglected the genius of Woolf. He will say that a musical journal of New York has the temerity to criticise Emil Paur—Paur, who dotes on Woolf's music. That this musical journal dared to criticise Seidl, Thomas and Damrosch—criticisms that have all born fruit. That this journal dares to even criticise Woolf—Woolf, of Lynn and thereabouts. We congratulate Lynn; we felicitate the Boston Herald.

Yet for all this Nikisch has had big success in Germany, Austria and England. He is a great conductor and Paur is not. Woolf knows this, but he also knows that public sentiment runs very high in Lynn, that Emil Paur is an idol—a leathern conductor indeed to Lynnites. So Woolf pounds away. It hurts no one and gives him pleasure. Yet must we reiterate that phrase which maddens Woolf—lashes Woolf into vertiginous fury. Paur must go, Paur is going.

For the benefit of our Lynn subscribers we beg to say that THE MUSICAL COURIER is referred to by little Benny Woolf in the editorial quoted above, which is clipped from the Herald of Boston.

CARNEGIE LIBRARY AND MUSIC HALL,

Pittsburgh, Pa.

HISTORY OF THE GIFT.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRUSTEES.

One of the Towers.

ON November 25th, 1881, Mr. Andrew Carnegie, in a communication to Hon. Robert W. Lyon, then Mayor of the City of Pittsburgh, offered to donate $250,000 for a free library, provided the City would agree to appropriate the sum of $15,000 annually for its maintenance. No action looking to the acceptance of the offer was taken at that time owing to the fact that the City under the then existing law had no power to raise by taxation money for the maintenance of such an institution.

In 1886, however, after it had been ascertained that the proper legislative action could be procured, an ordinance was passed incorporating Mr. Carnegie's letter of 1881, accepting his proposition, and empowering the Mayor of the City and the Presidents of Select and Common Councils to serve ex-officio on a Board of Trustees to be named by the donor. It was not until 1887, however, that the enabling act was passed by the Legislature, and Mr. Carnegie was notified that the City was able to perform its part of the contract. This notification brought another letter from Mr. Carnegie, under date of February 6th, 1890, in which he stated that, as the City had greatly increased in size and importance during the past few years, he was convinced that more extensive buildings were needed, combining reference and circulating libraries, accommodations for the exhibition of works of art, and assembly rooms for the various learned societies; and suggesting the erection of branch library buildings. To provide these structures he offered to expend not less than $1,000,000, and proposed placing their erection and control in the hands of a Board of Trustees of eighteen members, nine to be named by himself and the other nine to comprise the Mayor of the City, the Presidents of Select and Common Council, the President of the Central Board of Education, and a Library Committee of five members of City Councils. The conditions attached to the offer were that the City would bind itself to place in the hands of the Board of Trustees $40,000 annually for the maintenance of the Library system, and that the non-office-holding members of the Board should have power to fill all vacancies occurring in their own number.

On May 31st, 1890, the ordinance accepting this second proposition was passed. At the first meeting of the Board of Trustees James B. Scott was made President, H. C. Frick Treasurer, and W. N. Frew Secretary. The principal committee appointed was the Building Committee, of which James B. Scott was made Chairman. The serious work of the enterprise was begun at once and a public invitation was extended to all architects to enter a competition to be held in this City, general instructions being given as to size and requirements of the building. In the competition which followed ninety-seven architects from all parts of the United States were represented by one hundred and two sets of plans, which were placed on exhibition in a room in the Ferguson building. A special committee of the Board was appointed to examine the plans, and, after several weeks' study, a recommendation was made that the plan of Longfellow, Alden & Harlow be adopted. It is needless to say that many beautiful elevations were presented, but the Committee decided at the outset of its labors that a useful interior was more to be desired than a graceful exterior, and recognized the architectural difficulty of combining under one roof four separate buildings, each naturally calling for its own special treatment.

The Board adopted the recommendation of the Committee, and the following months were spent in elaborating and maturing the plans. When it was decided to use stone instead of Florentine brick, as originally contemplated, and as $300,000 had been set apart for the Branch Libraries, Mr. Carnegie generously added $100,000 to the $700,000 already appropriated by the Board for the main structure. In 1891 the City showed its appreciation of the philanthropic act of Mr. Carnegie by passing an ordinance authorizing the Board of Trustees to erect the main structure on part of the nineteen acres of park land then recently acquired from Mrs. Schenley. The foundation of this building was laid in the fall of 1892, and in May, 1893, the contract for the superstructure was awarded to Henry Shenk. Work was started in July, 1893, and continued without interruption until the present date.

In February, 1894, James B. Scott died, and his place as President of the Board and Chairman of the Building Committee was filled by W. N. Frew. Mr. Scott contributed unsparingly of his time and skill to making this building what it is, and, almost unaided, succeeded in removing many serious obstacles to the success of the enterprise.

In 1894 a Committee of the Board of Trustees on Branch Libraries was appointed, having Mr. H. P. Ford as Chairman, with instructions to recommend the number and location of sites for the Branch Library buildings. After much conscientious labor seven locations were selected, three on the South Side, one in Hazlewood, one in Lawrenceville, one in the East End, and one in the old City. Most of these sites have already been purchased.

The several departments of the main Library building are under the management of a corps of gentlemen, each selected because of his peculiar fitness for his position. Mr. Edwin H. Anderson is at the head of the Library proper. Mr. Frederic Archer will control the development of the musical department. Mr. George H. Wilson is manager of the Music Hall and has charge of the press work connected with it. Prof. Gustave Guttenberg collected and arranged the Museum exhibit, and Mr. John W. Beatty gathered the Art collection. Mr. Charles R. Cunningham is Superintendent of the building. Each of the above is held responsible to the Board of Trustees for the proper management of his own department, and has the sole right to employ and discharge his assistants.

Arrangements have been made with the Academy of Science and Art to occupy and control the meeting and lecture rooms in the Science wing, with the understanding that numerous lecture courses shall be free to the public. Similar contracts have been made with the Art Society and the Mozart Club. The School of Design for Women has been given commodious quarters in the basement, and the Art Students' League has found a home on the third floor on the conditions that skilled instructors be secured from the best schools, and that male and female classes be formed which shall be open to any desiring to study art.

WILLIAM N. FREW.

The Architectural Plan.

BY THE ARCHITECTS.

The Carnegie Library, Pittsburgh, is the general name given to the great building containing under one roof four distinct departments of Learning and Art.

In order to clearly understand a description of this building, the history and construction of which are so well known to Pittsburgh, it is absolutely necessary to begin with the general arrangement and grouping of the plan, as this was the first problem presented to the Architects for solution.

A problem which, in its comprehensive scope, presented architectural difficulties of a most unusual nature and without precedent was the grouping together into a harmonious whole of a Library, a Music Hall, an Art Gallery, and Science Museum, each distinct and complete in itself. Convenience and saving of space and economy of money and maintenance entered largely into the necessity of this grouping of what ordinarily would have been four distinct buildings.

With a fixed appropriation the generous donor had gathered together in one great comprehensive scheme all the kindred interests of Letters, Music, Art and Science, to be housed in convenient relation one to the other, in order that a busy and growing people might easily avail themselves of the opportunities offered for relaxation and cultivation.

The plan of the building finally adopted, its orientation was determined by the somewhat contracted though picturesque site selected in Schenley Park, near the main entrance on Forbes Street and bordered on the north by Bellefield Avenue. The extreme dimensions of this building are 392 feet by 148 feet. The main axis of the building was first called for and was designed to be parallel to Forbes Street, but on account of the deep and picturesque ravine which encroaches upon the site, the building was finally turned parallel to Bellefield Avenue, and facing the ravine and proposed bridge. This placing demands a careful architectural treatment of terraces, balustrades, and steps necessary to give dignity to the placing and surroundings of so important a public monument

The Library, which forms the heart of the building, has its greatest length (119 feet) along this axis, and is flanked on either hand by the projecting wings which contain the Science and Art Museums; the unpierced wall of the latter having been utilized as the main wall from which springs the semicircular walls of the Music Hall. The deep projecting wings with the Library front form an open court of great interest for planting and decorative treatment with architectural garden motives.

The style of the building is an adaptation of the early Italian Renaissance, where simplicity of outline and careful study of wall spaces and openings give a dignified and monumental quality to the design without the use of costly architectural motives or a wealth of carved ornamentation.

The general effect and composition of the exterior, while expressing the interior in broad strong masses of light and shade, is held together and quieted by long sweeping horizontal lines of continuous cornices and bands which connect the composition, and serve to harmonize the various distinct parts and their different uses. The vigorous vertical lines of towers and angles enliven the calm effect of the strong preponderating horizontal lines, which are still further emphasized by the simple outline and mass of the tiled roof. This, in color contrast with the unity of the lighter stone work, gives simplicity and elegance to the building. The stone used is the light gray Ohio sandstone, which, in contrast with the soft red tiled surfaces of the roof, has great artistic value against the changing sky and the foliage of the Park.

In general composition the towers have been employed to arrest the flow of the horizontal lines and reconcile the joining of the semicircular and stilted walls of the massive Music Hall with the symmetrical mass of the rest of the building. Their high, graceful shafts like Italian campanili, rising 162 feet in the air, also serve, with open arched top, decorated frieze and high roof, artistically to arrest the attention and to reconcile the transition at the point where the lighter and more pleasing treatment and lines of the Music Hall and the expanse of the roof join the severer masses of the Library portion. These towers, by adding vigor and light and shade to the design, obviate the threatened overpowering of the whole mass by the width and form of the Music Hall: a form necessitated by the great seating capacity demanded. Moreover, while adding greatly to the effectiveness of the building at a distance these towers furnish much needed space for staircases and ventilation.

The placing of the Music Hall on Forbes street brings the great sweep of its semicircular walls, porte cochere, towers, entrance, vestibule, and domed staircases, all interesting and important motifs, into prominence at the most effective point of the composition. Easy access from the three streets, a matter of utilitarian value, also insures a view of the building from a distance as well as from the vicinity.

The general quiet treatment of the façade is enlivened by the carefully studied grouping of the window openings, the balconies, panels, inscriptions and discs of marble, and by a judicious and reserved use of carving appropriate to the character of the building and the local atmosphere. The arched windows of the principal story are treated in the early Florentine style with shaft and arched tracery in contrast with the smaller square windows of the rusticated walls below. This rusticated story, carried completely around the building, serves to bind the various projections and masses together and to give a sense of unity and breadth.

The library proper, practically and ideally the most interesting and important part of the problem, occupies two stories in that portion of the main building recessed between the Art and Science wings, and is in direct communication with them, as well as with the isolated "stack" or book storage rooms. This central position of the Library insures greater quiet and easy access from the various entrances and all other parts of the building, while the reading rooms have the advantage of eastern light and purer outside air.

The "stack," situated directly at the rear, is so placed as to obstruct the least possible light, while its central position is the most convenient for the selection and distribution of books. Its present capacity of 200,000 volumes in six stories, with iron floors, shelves and lifts, can be readily increased without the loss of light or air. Fire doors and its slight connection with the building give protection against fire.

On the frieze above the Main Library entrance is the simple inscription, "Carnegie Library." Along the walls and under the windows tablets bearing the names of the principal writers of the world serve as a useful and instructive form of decoration, placed where all may read. In the same spirit the names of the Masters of Art and Science are carried as a noble decoration around the frieze of the building. Tablets on the attic story also mark the Art and Science wings.

The Library entrance is marked by a broad flight of stone steps, flanked by buttresses, destined to receive statues or groups, and by a triple arched porch with balustrade, carved pilasters and a frieze bearing the inscription "Free to the People." On either side of the Library steps and buttresses and arched doorways, protected by elaborately carved balconies, mark the separate entrances to the Art and Science wings. The Library porch, with three flat ceiling domes and finished in soft gray Knoxville marble and mosaic floor, leads to the grand vaulted vestibule finished in marble panels, pilasters and with a mosaic floor. The broad, graceful, vaulted ceiling is decorated with flowing arabesques, and at either end richly decorated tympani bear tablets with the names of great writers.

This vestibule, fifty-six feet wide, merges into the centre or axial corridor, thus giving two easy entrances into the Delivery room of the Circulating Library, which, with periodical and newspaper reading rooms opening through Palladian arches on either hand, occupies the entire length of the Library portion. In addition to the Palladian arches, the long delivery desk built around the piers, the projecting coat room, the architectural treatment of wainscot, pilasters, beams and cornice in ivory white, the monumental red Verona chimney-pieces marking the ends of the vista, and the quiet terazzo floor, give a dignified and pleasing sense of scale, freedom and usefulness.

The simple color treatment is kept luminous throughout, while interest is added by the introduction of the book marks of American publishers and early Venetian printers as appropriate emblems to emphasize the disks employed.

On either side of the main entrance hall are situated the Trustees' room and the Librarian's office, while in connection with them light iron staircases for students and employés lead to the floors above and the working rooms below. Conveniently placed in the Art wing next the Library and opposite the Librarian's room is the long cataloguing room. The other working rooms are in the basement.

Between the entrances to the Circulating Library under the continuation of the vaulted and decorated ceiling, and between marble piers and balustrades, steps lead to the marble platform which forms the first landing of the main staircase leading up to the grand Reading Room and Reference Library, which occupies nearly the whole length of the Library building. This staircase, in marble, with niches on either side, opens to view the lofty proportion and dignified treatment of the great Reading Room and ends conveniently near the delivery desk, an arrangement enabling those wishing books to reach the delivery desk without disturbing the readers who occupy the large quiet spaces on either side of the staircase.

The classical arrangement of the arched windows with pilasters between and an arched wall treatment with cornice carrying the great sweep of the graceful, low lying, coffered ceiling, makes the room the most important and effective, with the possible exception of the Music Hall. The coffered ceiling is pierced to admit light from the large skylight above and from the elaborate system of electric lighting; thus every part of the great Reading room is flooded with light. The broad panels and the divisions of the tympanum under the sweep of the vault at either end suggest special mural painting. This grand hall, with dimensions 91 feet by 44 feet and 30 feet high, gives a sense of lightness, airiness and repose which has been preserved and enhanced by the beautifully refined and artistic color scheme used in connection with the ivory white treatment of the architecture.

The large Reading room opens by three doorways into the Library corridor (119 feet long) which, owing to its length and the proportions of arch, vault and pilasters, with its light and graceful scheme of decoration, is one of the most interesting portions of the building. Busts and statuary will eventually increase the interest of this beautiful vista. This corridor connects the Art Gallery with the Science wing and separates the Reference Library from the special libraries and from the secondary staircases which connect with the floors below.

THE PROSCENIUM, CARNEGIE MUSIC HALL, PITTSBURGH, PA.

Two comfortable rooms, one of which opens into the main Picture gallery, the other into the Science wing, lead from this corridor, and are designed for offices for the custodians of these two portions of the building.

Entering the Science wing on the ground floor a capacious double staircase leads to the floors above, while a long corridor with plain arched motives

The Art Galleries, superbly lighted by huge skylights of light iron construction, with handsomely decorated coving and cornice, have been carefully studied as to the hanging and changing of pictures and artificial lighting, the smaller galleries having side light as well as top light for the exhibition of small works and general objets d'art. The total wall space for exhibition is 8,300 feet. The Art Galleries are reached by a broad, branching staircase, starting at right angles to the long arched corridor which runs the entire length of the wing. This corridor is 148 feet in length and has entrances at either end. The treatment of the corridor suggests a decorative scheme with bas-reliefs of the frieze of the Parthenon, and busts and statues between the which only careful study and the bold use of the tower motifs could successfully solve. This form also, on account of the mean distance from the stage, assures a nearly equal value to all the seats.

The principal entrance to the Music Hall is marked by a high arched porte cochere and a porch in two stories surmounted by domes, all marked by a lighter and more festal feeling of form and detail than the rest of the building. This effect is increased by the tall bronze lamps rising above the balustrade of the porte cochere and by the general arrangement of the lighting.

A large vaulted vestibule leads to the foyer, which merges itself in the semicircular and vaulted corridor which completely encircles the Music Hall. With leads to all the lecture rooms and to the amateur photographers' and coat rooms. Three large lecture rooms, the central one with a semicircular bay, opening singly or by means of sliding doors as one great hall, are destined for the lectures of the scientific societies and other meetings. On the floor above are the three rooms of the Museum. This wing of the building is finished and decorated plainly in keeping with its uses and is thoroughly lighted.

THE AUDITORIUM, CARNEGIE MUSIC HALL, PITTSBURGH, PA.

Above these halls on the third floor the same space is occupied by three picture galleries, thoroughly lighted from above and furnishing meeting rooms and wall space for special exhibitions of pictures and prints as well as for the exhibition of local Art Societies. These supplementary galleries are destined to be exceedingly useful in the future. In the basement of this wing large and well-lighted rooms will be devoted to the various departments of the Art Schools of Pittsburgh, and the fact that they are within easy reach of of the Art Gallery, Museum and Library will make them still more useful, as all forms of Art study are thus gathered together under one roof.

pilasters. Important groups placed on either side of the staircase are designed to give interest to these spaces and increase the Museum capacity.

The great boilers and all the machinery, dynamos, pumps, fans, and the system of air ducts occupy a large portion of the basement beneath the Library. By means of this system the vitiated air of the entire building is removed and fresh warm air brought in to replace it in a way to completely obviate a great difficulty often found in so large a building. In the basement are the commodious lavatories, which are easily reached by the various staircases, as well as other useful rooms.

The Music Hall, semicircular in plan, and with a deep widening stage, has been designed to bring the 2,000 and more seats within easy seeing and hearing distance of the performers. The semicircular form was selected as the only one giving the required seating capacity in the area allowed and an expression of the individual character of the building, and yet one that could be brought into union with the rest of the composition without overpowering it. This welding of dissimilar buildings was a difficult problem its marbled walls and decorated and vaulted ceiling it forms a convenient and attractive promenade for the audience, and its form makes it easily accessible from all parts of the floor, as well as connecting the foyer proper with the tower staircases and the side entrances. On either side of the main vestibule spiral staircases with handsomely wrought iron rails lead to the floors above and the dressing rooms. Other staircases lead to the dressing rooms and the basement below. The gay effect of the Sienna marbled walls and the bright decoration of the vaulting have been carefully studied to give this entrance and foyer the effect appropriate to a palace of music. The mosaic floor and durable materials used are designed to withstand the great wear to which they are to be subjected, while they add greatly to the general decoration.

Six entrances lead to the auditorium, which extends from wall to wall above the balcony. A second balcony above completes the seating capacity of the auditorium and their flowing lines harmonize most agreeably with the surfaces and walls of the interior composition. Rising above the walls and penetrations springs the low, domed ceiling, sufficiently divided into panels by the ribs and sweeping concentric mouldings, ornamented and decorated so as to preserve lightness and detail and yet be sufficiently broken up for acoustic properties. The interior is designed to give a sense of comfort and space, and the decoration has been most carefully carried out in the same spirit. An elaborate and handsomely decorated proscenium arch springs from the stage, with double proscenium boxes worked into the splay of the arch, while the decoration of the paneled soffit above the arch, everywhere accented with gold, is heightened by the use of the electric light. This rich arch, the most elaborate piece of decoration in the building, forms a worthy setting for the towering organ which has been specially designed for its position in the niche and in harmony with the general decoration.

The stage has been planned to accommodate large choruses and an orchestra, for whose use suitable rooms have been provided at the rear, as well as dressing rooms for special performers. All the details of seats and furnishing have been carried out with special attention to harmony with the decoration of the auditorium. This ornamentation, though the richest in point of color and design, has everywhere been made to augment the purely architectural effects, at the same time that it has added great life to the whole scheme. The same thing is true of the decoration throughout the Library portion and of the use of the electric lights which have been studied where possible to enhance the general artistic effect.

The steel construction used throughout in connection with the masonry, and the wire lathing, have made a practically fireproof building and greatly facilitated the placing and arrangement of rooms in some important cases.

The building has been worthily constructed within the appropriation, and every endeavor has been made to erect an institution worthy of its donor and its destination.

LONGFELLOW, ALDEN & HARLOW.

The Music Hall and Organ

And the Methods of their Utilization for the Musical Education of the People.

BY THE DIRECTOR OF MUSIC.

Although music is the youngest of the Arts and unique in its individuality it is the purest of them all, and appeals more directly to the emotions than any other. Therefore its extended cultivation cannot fail to exercise a potent influence in developing the intellectual and moral attributes of humanity. The recognition of this fact is fitly exemplified by the erection of the magnificent Music Hall, perfect in its acoustic qualities, as an adjunct to the noble Library building which Mr. Carnegie has with princely munificence donated to the city of Pittsburgh.

It is a source of special gratification to me, in commencing my duties as Music Director and Organist, to find such abundant opportunities afforded me for working out a system of musical education adapted to the needs of the people at large.

I have learned from experience that in order to create a real love for music in any community it is first necessary to popularize it. This can only be effected by the liberal use of works in which melody is a prominent feature, of course in combination with a few compositions of progressively higher type. By such means the gradual evolution of the Art is attractively demonstrated and general interest is awakened.

Even in cases where the audience is chiefly made up of æsthetic musicians, a concert programme devoted exclusively to classical music of intricate construction and profound thought is undesirable. Richard Wagner, the most advanced of musical philosophers, shared this opinion, and stated unreservedly that he considered the interspersion of music of lighter character to be indispensable, as it served to sharpen the appetite for the more solid items of the musical feast.

Conservatism in Art is also to be deprecated as being antagonistic to all real progress. Meritorious productions of all schools of composition, and of varied nationality, are worthy of attention and calculated to foster the growth of real musical taste. I shall endeavor to practically demonstrate the efficacy of an educational process based on these general principles.

Mr. Carnegie has exercised keen foresight and sound judgment in providing the Hall with a large modern concert organ in every way worthy of its mission. This aptly named "King of Instruments" rightly claims precedence of all others. Its noble dignity of tone, allied to enormous power, is no less conspicuous than its capacity for the production of the most refined and delicate effects in every shade of color. It lends itself with equal readiness to the interpretation of the marvelous creations of the immortal Bach, and the reproduction of many orchestral works in a manner impossible on any other instrument. Modern writers, realizing its marvelous comprehensiveness, have freely availed themselves of the increased facilities afforded by the completely equipped organ of our day (which bears but slight resemblance to the imperfect and clumsy instrument of a bygone age), and invested their compositions with entirely new characteristics.

Some purists consider this departure from a so-called legitimate organ style as a species of musical outrage, failing to realize the fact that the emotional element has now superseded to a great extent the dry and labored prolixity of the contrapuntal pedant. They quote Bach in support of their protest, forgetting that he involuntarily used the fugal form. It was his natural means of expression, but his marvelous genius and inspired creative power shone so conspicuously through the mazes of his intricate writing that its marvelous technical skill, by reason of its spontaneity, was never obtrusive. In his case art and science were so deftly interwoven that both were strengthened by the contact. Unfortunately Bach has had no real successor as a composer of organ music.

PROSCENIUM ARCH.

The term "legitimate," as applied to art, has become almost obsolete, modern thought having now outgrown the narrow limits assigned to the orthodoxy of a former day.

To revert to modern organ composers. Although many of them, particularly of the French and Italian school, lack profundity, their productions are replete with piquant charm and graceful melody, enhanced by picturesque treatment.

The programmes of my two weekly recitals will contain works specially composed for the organ, by writers of varied nationality, both ancient and modern, in addition to transcriptions of suitable and attractive orchestral works of varied type. Organ recitals designed on a similar plan have proved of the utmost value in arousing widespread interest in Liverpool, Manchester and elsewhere in England, but in no country in the world has such a series of organ concerts been given by any municipality entirely free to the people. This privilege is now accorded to the people of Pittsburgh.

The formation of a Select Choir of twenty-four mixed voices, to be utilized chiefly for the performance of madrigals, glees and church music of different epochs, will also be a valuable factor in promoting the object I have at heart. It will likewise afford an opportunity of familiarizing the public with choral music of a class hitherto neglected in this country.

A series of Musical Lectures is also included in my scheme. These will be of a popular character, free from all technicalities, and illustrated either by the Select Choir, organ or piano.

The most valuable auxiliary, however, will be the new Symphony Orchestra of carefully selected players, which owes its existence to the energetic efforts of the Art Society, an institution domiciled in the Library building, which has already done so much in promoting general æsthetic culture.

The advent of this newly formed organization will mark a new era in the musical history of the city. Twenty Concerts and Public Rehearsals will be given, five or six weeks being devoted to daily preliminary rehearsals and the preparation of the necessary répertoire. Special thanks are due to those gentlemen who have so generously placed their names on the subscription list, which renders it possible at once to establish the permanent Symphony Orchestra on a firm and substantial basis. I propose to present programmes that will be of a popular character. The symphonic element will by no means be neglected, but used in conjunction with music of light and more or less familiar characters. The classical numbers will be chosen for their adaptability to the purpose in view, the standard being gradually raised as circumstances may warrant.

By means of the Organ, Select Choir, Lectures, the Symphony Orchestra and annotated programmes, I shall be enabled to carry out my plans concurrently in various branches of the art, and I confidently anticipate successful results.

The forthcoming musical campaign at Carnegie Music Hall, planned on those broad lines, cannot fail, I think, to exercise a healthy influence on the people at large. It will, moreover, stimulate the energies of those who have already labored faithfully and disinterestedly in the noble cause of the divine art.

It may be well to emphasize the fact that the whole conduct of the musical department at Schenley Park will be anti-monopolistic. The desire is to aid in the propagation of music and render more effective the work already being done, by enlarging the field of operation. Such an incentive cannot be otherwise than beneficial, whether regarded from a business or artistic point of view.

I enter on my new career in a spirit of unalloyed hopefulness, gratefully conscious of the hearty sympathy and kindly interest of all those gentlemen who have so generously devoted their time and attention to the perfecting of the plans which will develop to the best advantage the manifold resources of one of the grandest temples of Art education in the world.

FREDERIC ARCHER.

Mr. Sam Hamilton.

MR. SAM HAMILTON, a native of Pittsburgh, was in his young days an amateur baritone singer and a musician of some note. At the age of twenty he was made choirmaster and organist of Wesley Chapel. Thirty years ago he started to sell pianos for some of the houses of Pittsburgh, and in 1870 started in business for himself, which now brings the business to the quarter of the century mark. The business has assumed great dimensions, and there is no better known nor more respected man in the trade than Mr. Hamilton. Years ago he befriended several of the now leading musicians of Pittsburgh, and promoted several musical organizations.

In 1885 Mr. Hamilton built the first nine story building in Pittsburgh, at Nos. 91 and 93 Fifth avenue. In 1887 the building was partly consumed by fire. Nothing daunted, Mr. Hamilton, that very night, while the building was burning, hurriedly secured other quarters, arranged his "ads." for the morning papers, secured extra stock, which he then had stored in a warehouse, and at 9 o'clock in the morning was ready for business. He immediately proceeded to rebuild, making the entire structure thoroughly fireproof.

The building is 24½ feet long, 30 feet wide. The basement and first two floors are occupied by Mr. Hamilton for his business. The rest of the building is rented for offices, every room being at present occupied. Mr. Hamilton is said to carry the largest stock of any concern in the city. For twenty-two years he has handled the Decker Brothers pianos and Estey organs. He also handles the Fischer pianos and Sterling organs, which he has sold for the last twenty years.

Mr. Hamilton thinks there will be a good trade for the Christmas holidays, yet does not expect any general revival of business until a change of administration in the election of 1896.

Mannheim.—The Academy concerts there began October 15. The orchestral part of the first program was Beethoven's D major symphony, Svendsen's Carneval in Paris, and the Vorspiel to Libussa by Smetana.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

WEDNESDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 13, 1895.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

In the old fashioned jumble concerts of a past generation it was never thought beneath the dignity of an artist to sing Handel or play Beethoven after the band had played "Annie Laurie" with variations and a vocalist had sung "Oft in the Stilly Night" and "Willie, We Have Missed You." In those days there was little professed or affected taste in the arts, and people knew what they liked. They did not like what they called classical music much. It seemed from last night's concert at the Academy of Music as if we had not outlived our ancestral latitude entirely. There were fine things in the programme, and middling things, and things that filled the hearts of supporters of the Philharmonic concerts with sorrow. The orchestra from Boston is the best in the world, and there was one of the best singers in the world with it as soloist; but there was a sad disparity between her voice and the stuff that she sang with it. Imagine Melba, after a Wagner number, singing that mad scene from "Lucia"—at least, the close of it, with all of those fool scales and trills and curlicews. She was singing at the gallery, and she reached it. Of all ridiculous work in music that mad scene is the worst, unless it may be "The Forge in the Forest," where they light paper in a joint of stove pipe in order to convince the public that the music is about a blacksmith. Here is a woman who has lost her lover and is wandering about the stately halls of her fathers with her heart full of murder, and she goes to the footlights and does a singing lesson, practicing her scales with diligence while the orchestra, that begins by lending a color of woe, drops its instruments, and a single flute follows her scales. When this kind of thing is art it will be art for Macbeth to stop in the middle of the murder scene and make up gingerbread babies to distribute to the audience, and for Hamlet to interrupt the duel with Laertes to step aside and do a double shuffle with his mother. Melba has a voice of such purity that there is only one other like it, and that is Patti's. She sings with a good method. She seems to have a fair share of understanding. Yet she makes an exhibition like this. The pity of it. There was other singing, and because the songs were more honest and the music was not perverted for display's sake, it was more agreeable. Scalchi sang the "Che faro senza Eurydice" somewhat less securely than of yore, yet with broad intonation and dramatic expression. Campanari, who gets himself liked because of his perfect and almost awkward simplicity, sang the prologue to "I Pagliacci" and the monologue from "Falstaff" in a plain and manly style that was good to hear. A young man of ambition named D'Aubigne sang in a tenor voice that is still in its formative stage, but that has promise if he will only stop shaking it. His air from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba" was sung carefully and with intended exactness, albeit he seemed in peril of getting off from the key in his high notes. The singers were heard together in the quartet from "Rigoletto," which was as well given as one often hears it. Now, if any of these lighter matters failed to please it must be laid to the matters themselves and not to the way in which they were sung. They had the best of interpretation. Even Mr. Paur tried to put himself in sympathy with them, and he was as good natured as anyone when Melba sang Arditi's "Saran Rose," a waltz song by no means so bad as the "Lucia" number, since it affects to be only a modest form of art, and is not without daintiness and prettiness no less than a catchy quality. It is a good example of its class, whereas the "Lucia" trills are a bad example of a better class. The orchestra, big, sonorous, prompt, occasionally a little coarse from over driving by the robust conductor, was heard in the "Rienzi" overture, which caught the ear and the understanding by its martial ring, its opulent color, its richness and variety, and two later and more characteristic examples of Wagner were supplied in the preludes to the third act of "Tannhauser," which is mournful, and the prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin," which is full of stir and vitality. Especially charming were the minuet of will o' wisps and dance of the sylphs from the "Damnation of Faust." In these the wonderful string work of the orchestra was heard, and, strange as it may seem, the applause that flared so readily for the empty scales of Donizetti was as prompt and hearty for these exquisite bits of Berlioz. One of Auber's little heard numbers, the overture to "Carlo Broschi," was the concluding number. It is not up to the mark of the "Massaniello" or "Fra Diavolo" preludes, but it has warmth, gayety and spontaneity, and it pleased the public. Although there were twelve numbers the actual length of the concert was hardly two hours. Mr. Paur was prompt and there was no idling. It is said that a thousand persons were unable to get in, and an effort will be made to have the singers here again in the institute course. It is pleasant to find that the custom is revived of dressing the stage with palms and flowers, though there has been no attempt to improve the lighting. At the next concert, on December 20, the orchestra will support Mrs. De Vere Sapio, singer. A number of people prominent in the institute and the Philharmonic society were in the audience last evening.

At the conclusion of the concert the department of music of the institute invited the Melba quartet, with its own orchestra, to give an evening in which acts from several operas should be included in their programme. An affirmative answer is expected and the concert will probably fall about December 21 or 26.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

NOVEMBER 12, 189[illegible]

* * * * * *

Carl Wolfsohn, the veteran musician of this country and Germany, says in a current magazine that America is at the present day at least abreast of Germany in musical art. Three orchestras, the Boston Symphony, the Cincinnati and Theodore Thomas' New York organization, "play much better than those which play symphonies over there....The men here have their time and are kept in pay during the entire months they are expected to play symphonies....The best men come to America or play in the opera orchestra." For the execution of chamber music, Mr. Wolfsohn thinks our Kneisel Quartette of this city the finest in the world, something indeed Bostonians well believe now.

* * * * *

BALTIMORE AMERICAN.

NOVEMBER 3, 1895.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Its Coming Concert.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first appearance in Baltimore, on the evening of April 12, 1886, The American, in speaking of the performance the morning after, said that the symphony was "artistically rendered and unspeakably beautiful." Brief as was this compliment, it sounded the keynote of the welcome extended to the orchestra, and it is safe to say that in ten seasons during which the orchestra has continued its visits to Baltimore, this welcome has never been withdrawn. The orchestra will give its thirty-fourth concert in Baltimore on Wednesday, November 13. Of the previous concerts six have been under Wilhelm Gericke, seventeen under Arthur Nikisch and ten under the present conductor, Emil Paur. When Arthur Nikisch left the Stadt Theater in Leipsic, to come to Boston, he was succeeded by the same man who followed him as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the present leader, Mr. Emil Paur. It is also worthy of comment that Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur played at the same desk as first violinists under Mr. Gericke at the very same Stadt Theater several years before. Mr. Paur enters upon his third year with the orchestra this season.

In 1881 a music-loving citizen of Boston, actuated solely by a desire to present good music in the best way, and fortunately possessing means ample to carry out his most commendable impulse, formed the idea of a large permanent orchestra, which should give each year an extended series of concerts in Music Hall, Boston, with an occasional visit to the adjacent New England cities. This idea was at once acted upon, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra began its existence, and today what was then a Boston organization has grown to be a national pride—an orchestra second to none in the world, whose name and fame are known in every cultured city on the globe, dependent upon no subsidy from the public exchequer, as is the case in all the European cities, but rather upon the generous liberality of a music-loving Bostonian.

During the visits of the orchestra to Baltimore the public has heard among the soloists, Mme. Melba, Mme. Nordica, Mme. Materna, Miss Emma Juch, Mme. Steinbach-Johns, Mr. Pol Plancon, Mr. Max Heinrich, Mr. Eugene d'Albert, Mr. Adamowski, Mr. Giese and many others as famous. The concert on Wednesday, November 13, will present a program from Weber, Verdi, Mendelssohn, Leoncavallo, Tschaikowsky and Wagner.

THE SUN, BALTIMORE.

NOVEMBER 9, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Tenth Season in Baltimore of the Noted Orchestra to Begin Wednesday.

Next Wednesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin the tenth season of its concerts in Baltimore with a concert at Music Hall, in which several new works will be presented. The orchestra is to give five concerts in Baltimore in the course of the winter, the other four dates being December 18, January 22, February 26 and March 25, all of them Wednesday evenings.

Thus far the Boston Symphony Orchestra has given thirty-three concerts in Baltimore since its first visit on April 12, 1886. Six were under the direction of Wilhelm Gericke, seventeen under Arthur Nikisch and ten under the present conductor, Emil Paur. Last year five of them were given at Music Hall, one being the concert with which the building was dedicated.

The orchestra was founded in 1881 by a music-loving citizen of Boston, who conceived the idea of a large permanent orchestra, which should give each year an extended series of concerts in Music Hall, Boston, with an occasional visit to the adjacent New England towns. In the course of these fifteen years he has supported the orchestra with generous liberality, and the high standard which he insisted upon from the men who were engaged to direct it has made the fame of the organization national and even international.

The progamme which will be given next Wednesday includes:

Weber—Overture......"Oberon."
Verdi—Monologue.....from "Falstaff."
Mendelssohn—Symphony No. 3.....("Scotch.")
Leoncavallo—Prologue....."I Pagliacca."
Tschaikowsky—Elegie and Valse from Suite for String Orchestra.
Wagner—Overture.....Rienzi."
Soloist.....Mr. G. Campanari.

Some of the most important works which it is intended to give in Baltimore later in the season are:

Beethoven.....Symphony No 3, "Eroica."
Schumann.....Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major.
Haydn.....Symphony.
Tschaikowsky.....(First time,) Symphony No 6.
Wagner....."Ride of the Valkyries."
Auber.....Overture, "Carlo Broschi."
Schubert.....Overture, "Rosamunde."
Rezniceck..(First time.) Overture, "Donna Diana."
Berlioz—"Menuet des Follets" and "Valse des Sylphes," from "La Damnation de Faust."
Berlioz....."Carneval" overture.
Delibes.....Suite, "Sylvia."
Beethoven—"Claerchen's Death" and "Turkish March," from "Ruins of Athens."
Godard.....(First time,) Suite.
Haendel.....Largo.
Mozart.....Turkish March.
Dvorak.....Capriccio.
Tschaikowsky.....Variations.
Liszt.....Rhapsody.

THE BALTIMORE [illegible]

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 9,

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The First to Be Given Next Wednesday Evening at Music Hall.

The sale of seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series of concerts at Music Hall is now in progress. The first concert will be given next Wednesday evening. The following dates will be December 18, January 22, February 26 and March 25. Among the solo artists for the series will be Rafael Joseffy, Ben Davies and Campanari. It will be the orchestra's 15th season and the 12th season it has come to Baltimore.

The concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore this season will include the following compositions:

Beethoven.....Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"
Schumann.....
....Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major Mendelssohn.....
Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch"
Haydn.....Symphony
Tschaikowsky.....Symphony No. 6
(First Time.)
Wagner.....Overture, "Rienzi"
Wagner....."Ride of the Valkyries"
Auber.....Overture, "Carlo Broschi"
Schubert.....Overture, "Rosamunde"
Rezniceck.....Overture, "Donna Diana"
(First Time.)
Berlioz.....
"Menuet des Follets" and "Valse des Sylphes," from "La Damnation de Faust"
Berlioz....."Carneval," Overture
Weber.....Overture, "Oberon"
Delibes.....Suite, "Sylvia"
Beethoven.....
"Claerchen's Death" and "Turkish March," from "Ruins of Athens"
Godard.....Suite
(First Time.)
Haendel.....Largo
Mozart.....Turkish March
Dvorak.....Capriccio
Tschaikowsky.....Variations
Tschaikowsky.....Elegie and Valse
Liszt.....Rhapsody

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is the only musical organization of high class which has made success encugh of its Baltimore engagements to renew them for a series of concerts continually for a dozen years. The orchestra is the best of its kind, and the Baltimore music-loving public appreciates its excellence as shown by the large audiences that greet it on each concert date.

The orchestra is unique in having been founded by a man who had money, but was more interested in music than money. He made provision for composing the orchestra of the best possible artists, and said if it was conducted at a loss he was willing to stand the loss in order to have such a high-class organization. That was 15 years ago. There was a loss in maintaining the orchestra for several years, but its founder cheerfully paid it. Now it is going the other way and the organization is a success financially as well as musically.

Mr. Emil Paur will conduct next Wednesday night, and Campanari will be the soloist. The organization is under the management of Mr. C. A. Ellis, but Mr. Frederick R. Comee, assistant manager, always travels with the company, and may be expected in Baltimore with it the coming week.

The Symphony concert will be the first entertainment at Music Hall since the new manager, Mr. Edward Strakosch, has taken charge. Mr. Strakosch succeeded Mr. J. J. Nolan November 1. He has been 18 years in the business of managing various attractions and will keep the standard of Music Hall high.

Mr. Strakosch has been connected for the last nine years with Abbey, Schoeffel and Grau, and represented for them such attractions as Sara Bernhardt, Lillian Russell, Coquelin and Hading, and the Metropolitan Grand Opera Company. In the concert line he has managed Wilhelmj, Remenyi, Emma Thursby and Ole Bull. He was the discoverer of Cyril Tyler, the phenomenal child soprano. He also managed Etelka Gerster and the W. T. Carleton Opera Company.

SUNDAY HERALD. BALTIMORE.

[illegible]osed to [illegible]OUR

NOVEMBER 10, 189[illegible]

Boston Symphony Concerts.

There is hardly any doubt that the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be hailed with delight by the lovers of good music of this city. The visits of this splendid organization afford about the only opportunity for Baltimore people to hear the standard works properly interpreted and produced, although not a little fault was found last season with some of the programmes presented. This season, however, it is expected that Director Paur will remedy this matter and give a series of concerts in keeping with the superb aggregation of musicians over whom he waves the baton.

The first concert of the season will be given at Music Hall next Wednesday evening, when Campanari, the great baritone, will be the soloist. The programme to be given is as follows:

Karl Maria von Weber,
Overture to "Oberon," in D major.
Verdi.....Monologue from "Falstaff."
Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy Symphony No. 3, in A minor (Scotch), Op. 56.
1. Introduction: Andante con moto (A minor), 3-4.
Allegro un poco agitato (A minor)..6-8.
2. Vivace non troppo (F major).....2-4.
3. Adagio (A major).....2-4.
4. Allegro vivacissimo (A minor).....2-2.
Allegro maestoso assai (A major)....6-8
Leoncavallo....Prologue, "I Pagliacci."
Peter Ilyitch Tschaikowsky. Second and Third Movements from "Serenade" for Strings in C major, Op. 48.
2. Valse: Moderato, Tempo di Valse (G major).
3. Elegia: Larghetto elegiaco (D major), Richard Wagner, Overture, "Rienzi."

[43]

BALTIMORE AMERICAN
NOVEMBER 10, 1895.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Opening Concert.

The first Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert for the season will be given at the Music Hall on Wednesday evening of this week, under Mr. Emil Paur, conductor. The soloist will be Mr. G. Campanari. The program begins with the overture to Weber's Oberon in D major, which is followed by these numbers:

Verdi.....Monologue from "Falstaff."
Felix Mendelssohn—Bartholdy, Symphony No. 3, in A minor (Scotch), op. 56.
I. Introduction: Andante con moto (A minor) 3-4
Allegro un poco agitato (A minor) 6-8
II. Vivace non troppo (F major).....2-4
III. Adagio (A major).....2-4
IV. Allegro vivacissimo (A minor)...2-2
Allegro maestoso assai (A major) 6-8
Leoncavallo.....Prologue, "I Pagliacci."
Peter Ilyitch Tschaikowsky, Second and Third Movements from Serenade for Strings, in C major, op. 48.
II. Valse: Moderato, Tempo di Valse (G major.)
III. Elegia: Larghetto elegiaco (D major.)
Richard Wagner.....Overture, "Rienzi."

"Oberon" is a romantic opera in three acts, the text being by James R. Plauche and the music by Weber. It was first given at Covent Garden, London, on April 12, 1826. The overture begins with a slow introduction, which is suggestive of the fairy character of the opera. The first four measures of the allegro, the main body of the overture, are the most brilliant and dashing orchestral onslaught in all music, and Weber has fairly outdone himself in brilliancy. Mendelssohn-Bartholdy's Symphony No. 3, in A minor (Scotch), was sketched in Scotland in 1829, and completed in Germany in 1842. The score was dedicated to Queen Victoria, and the symphony was performed under Mendelssohn's direction by the London Philharmonic Society on June 13, 1842. The main body of the movement begins at once with the first theme, a cantabile melody played in four-part harmony by the strings, with the upper voice doubled in the lower octave by the first clarinet. The upper two voices, moving almost constantly in thirds, together with the song-like nature of the melody itself, gave this theme a rather nocturne character. The fourth movement is a rondo in four themes, all of them of a recognizably Scotch character, and is worked out with greater elaboration than any other part of the symphony.

THE BALTIMORE NEWS,
, NOVEMBER 13, 1895.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Orchestra to Give It at Music Hall Tonight.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in Baltimore this afternoon direct from New York in charge of Mr. Frederick Comee, the assistant manager. The orchestra is at the Carrollton Hotel and will appear at Music Hall tonight in the opening concert of its winter series in Baltimore.

When Mr. Comee arrived in town this afternoon and found what a large advance sale there had been, not only for single seats, but for the season, he was much gratified, but said it was no more than could be expected of the musical people of Baltimore. He said the orchestra played last night to a large audience in Brooklyn, and at its recent concert in Philadelphia all the reserved seats were gone and 1400 admission tickets had been sold on the afternoon of the performance.

Campanari, of the Abbey and Grau Opera Company, will be the soloist tonight. He arrived with the company this afternoon and took a little airing to give his baritone voice a toning-up for the concert. The orchestra will remain here tomorrow and will give a concert in Washington tomorrow night. The programme for this evening follows:

Karl Maria von Weber.....
....Overture to "Oberon," in D major
Verdi.....Monologue from "Falstaff"
Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy Symphony No. 3, in A minor (Scotch), Op. 56.
I. Introduction: Andante con moto (A minor) 3-4; Allegro un poco agitato (A minor) 6-8.
II. Vivace non troppo (F major) 2-4.
III. Adagio (A major) 2-4.
IV. Allegro vivacissimo (A minor) 2-2; Allegro maestoso assai (A major) 6-8.
Leoncavallo.....Prologue, "I Pagliacci"
Peter Ilyitch Tschaikowsky; Second and Third Movements from Serenade for Strings, in C major, Op. 48.
II. Valse: Moderato, Tempo di Valse (G major).
III. Elegia: Larghetto elegiaco (D major).
Richard Wagner.....Overture, "Rienzi"

THE BALTIMORE NEWS.
THURSDAY EVENING, NOV. 14, 1895.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mendelssohn and His Snappy Scotch Bagpipe Tune.

Conductor Emil Paur and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall last night showed how Mendelssohn could introduce a Scotch bagpipe into a symphony. It was in the second movement of the third number of the programme.

It began with a soft rustling in the strings, against which the wind instruments sounded some loud calls; then, against the persistent rustling accompaniment in the strings, the clarinet struck up the jolliest, snappy Scotch bagpipe tune; this was next taken up by the flute and oboe, and then fortissimo by the full orchestra. A dance-like second theme soon set in in the strings, and the rest of the movement was taken up with the working-out of these two themes.

The audience enjoyed it as all the numbers of the programme were enjoyed. Campanari was given an ovation after his masterful prologue to "Pagliacci." The audience wanted to hear the peals and reverberations of his baritone again, but the rule of the Boston Symphony of no encores was not broken.

The orchestra will give a concert in Washington tonight. It will give the second concert of its winter series in Baltimore [illegible]ember 18.

NEW [illegible] HERALD
NEW YORK [illegible] SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mme. Melba and Mme. Scalchi Appear Before a Fine Audience in Brooklyn.

Mme. Melba, for the first time this season, sang in Brooklyn in concert last evening. The Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared at the Academy of Music under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn. It was a large and very appreciative audience, indeed so appreciative as to become tiresome. The soloists, especially Mme. Melba, were repeatedly called to the front, in the expectation that they would give an encore. Encores are never given at these concerts, and it is Mme. Melba's inflexible rule not to respond. She was called out five times in succession before the audience discovered that she had filled the programme according to contract.

The feature of the evening was the rendering of the celebrated soprano of the mad scene from "Lucia," with a flute obligato by M. Mole. Nothing could be more refined, more delicate or more true than the execution of voice and instrument, and when they blended in a cadenza the audience listened in rapt attention. Mme. Melba never sang better and her ease and grace in difficult passages were marvellous. Arditi's waltz song, "Se Saran Rose," was another artistic triumph for the diva.

Mme. Scalchi, in the aria "Che faro" ("Orpheus") did not seem to be in her usual good form. She made one slight error in one note, but quickly recovered herself and finished with brilliancy. She was recalled several times.

Mr. Campanari, in the difficult monologue from "Falstaff," acquitted himself with credit, his phrasing being delightfully true. Leoncavallo's "I Pagliacci" was put under tribute by him.

Mr. D'Aubigne's rendition of the aria from "La Reine de Saba" was enthusiastically applauded.

The soloists gave a very fine exhibition of the beauties of the quartet from Verdi's "Rigoletto."

The playing of the orchestra, under Mr. Emil Paur, was unexceptionable. Its best effort was a selection from Bernoz's "The Damnation of Faust." The minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisp and the waltz of Sylphs, both so full of delicate passages, fine shadings and exquisite fancies, were played in a masterly manner that roused the audience to enthusiasm. Then, on the other hand, the more masculine quality of the orchestra was shown in the stirring overture from "Rienzi." The grandeur and dignity of "Tannhauser," "Lohengrin" and Auber's "Carlo Broschi" were brought out by Mr. Paur's musicians in a way that showed their careful training and admirable appreciation of the spirit of Wagner and Auber.

HERALD, BALTIMORE
NOVEMBER 14, 1895.

Boston Symphony Concert.

At the Music Hall last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season in this city. The attendance was large, as usual, and the numbers on the programme were well interpreted by Director Pauer and the splendid organization in his charge.

BALTIMORE LIFE.

* * *

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—This famous musical organization will give its first of a series of five concerts at the New Music Hall on next Wednesday evening. The solo artists will be Signor G. Campanari, the distinguished tenor; Mr. Rafail Joseffy, the great pianist, and Mr. Ben Davies, the renowned baritone. The progaamme of the evening will be of the highest musical merit and will include compositions of the greatest musical masters. It is almost needless to refer to the high qualities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is confessedly one of the greatest musical organizations in the world and in all of the principal cities of the United States for several years past, its success has been attested by the presence of crowded and refined audiences. In Baltimore the orchestra has always had the warmest appreciation, and the coming series of concerts will again indicate the pleasure of our people at the opportunities afforded to hear the best classical music rendered with matchless skill and completeness.

BALTIMORE AMERICAN
NOVEMBER 14, 1895.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The First Concert of Its Eleventh Season.

That the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are by far the most popular and highly appreciated musical entertainments given in Baltimore, was again attested by the audience assembled at Music Hall last night. Although there have been a few good concerts already, the season is never really considered properly begun until inaugurated by the first Boston Symphony.

The musical and social world were brilliantly represented, and Music Hall was crowded with a distinguished audience. As the fashionably dressed assemblage thronged into the auditorium, it was pleasant to observe the "rapport" which seemed to exist between it and the members of the orchestra. There was everywhere noticeable an air of friendliness and welcome, and everyone concerned appeared, and, doubtless, was, glad to be there.

This will be the eleventh season in which these concerts have figured as a most prominent feature in Baltimore's musical life, and there is doubtless an attachment existing between the orchestra and the music-lovers who attend these delightful affairs.

It is a subject for mutual congratulation to both Baltimore and the orchestra that this splendid organization annually increases its subscription list.

The program was well selected and attractive, and besides presenting many novelties, contained a number of old, well-tried favorites, which were all the more enjoyable on account of their absence from recent concert programs. The soloist, Mr. Campanari, is one of Baltimore's prime favorites, and added greatly to the interest and enjoyment of the evening.

The concert opened with a fine performance of Weber's overture to "Oberon."

The other orchestral numbers were the "Scotch Symphony" of Mendelssohn, the second and third movements of Tchaikowsky's "Serenade in C Major," for strings, and the overture to "Rienzi," of Wagner.

The familiar and popular Mendelssohn symphony was welcomed as an old friend, and the orchestra was in fine form in this, as in all the other numbers. Rarely, indeed, has the orchestra played a program throughout with such uniform excellence, That it is in such splendid condition so early in the season speaks well for the fine results of Mr. Paur's earnest and painstaking work.

The Tchaikowsky composition, a charming novelty, is eminently adapted to display the strongest feature of this splendidly balanced orchestra—its string choir. Few orchestras can boast such a tremendous and capable body of strings as Mr. Paur conducts, and this number received a delightfully smooth, graceful performance, and found much favor with the audience. Since the recent death of Peter Illitch Tchaikowsky his name figures frequently on concert programs, and with each new opportunity to become acquainted with his work one realizes what a loss the world of music has sustained.

Mr. Campanari introduced the other novelty, the monologue from "Falstaff," Verdi's latest and greatest opera. It makes a magnificent concert number, and Mr. Campanari gave it a fitting interpretation. It is small wonder that this singer takes all the honors wherever and whenever he appears, for he is a consummate artist, possessed of a noble voice, fine musical and dramatic temperament, unimpeachable taste, and, indeed, every attribute which a singer par excellence should have. It is a pity that Mr. Paur did not keep his forces down in the accompaniment to this number, for the singer was frequently overpowered—not from any lack of sonority on the part of Mr. Campanari, however. His singing of the "Pagliacci" prologue was the same splendid performance Baltimoreans are accustomed to from him in this number. Mr. Campanari received an ovation, and the audience clearly expressed its desire for an encore. It seems a great pity that the cast iron rule, "no encore," cannot once in a while be broken. The concert was brought to a close by a magnificent performance of the "Rienzi" overture. Mr. Paur quite surpassed himself in this number, giving a much more forceful and brilliant interpretation than even that of last season.

The Press
DAILY EDITION.
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1895.

STILL A NIGHTINGALE.

Mme. Melba Sings at the Boston Symphony Concert.

Mme. Melba was received last night at the first Boston Symphony concert with the warmest possible demonstrations of welcome by an audience which nearly filled the Metropolitan Opera House.

It was her first appearance here this year, and after she had sung Handel's florid "Sweet Bird" she retired almost buried in flowers.

It is the same glorious voice which has enthralled us in the past. May she reign many years!

She also sang the Mad Scene from "Hamlet."

The orchestral numbers were Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, the "Minuet of Will o' the Wisps" and the "Waltz of Sylphs" from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" and Wagner's rather bizarre but thrilling "Kaiser March."

The work of the band under Emil Paur was worthy of unstinted praise.

THE SUN, BALTIMORE
NOVEMBER 14, 1895.

PAUR AND HIS ORCHESTRA.

Success of the First Boston Symphony Concert of the Season.

The musical season in Baltimore may be said to commence with the first of the series of five concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

If the concert of this orchestra last night at Music Hall may be taken as a specimen of what is in store, in a musical way, for Baltimoreans, this season will assuredly be a brilliant one. It is the fifteenth season in which the orchestra has visited Baltimore and the concert was the thirty-fourth in this city.

Up to last year the lack of a suitable building for concert purposes, here was severely felt, but the effect of the opening of the Music Hall has made itself apparent in the size and character of the audiences attending these concerts. The hall last night was filled with an audience which was representative of all that is best in the musical life of Baltimore.

The concert opened with the overture to Von Weber's "Oberon," which was rendered with great delicacy and brilliancy. The climax of this overture, based upon the well-known air occurring later in the opera, "Ocean, thou mighty monster," took the audience by storm. The intensely dramatic effects contained in the work were clearly brought out in the decidedly broad treatment which it received at the hand of Director Paur.

The symphony presented was the Mendelssohn Scotch Symphony, and although Mendelssohn was not a believer in "programmusik" as it has since been developed, this work is certainly descriptive, and the result of his journey through Scotland and the Hebrides is apparent throughout the entire work. Storm effects are obtained by a curious treatment of the strings, which suggest at times Wagner's "Flying Dutchman." While this symphony is thoroughly dignified and in certain parts beautiful, one is forced to conclude that Mendelssohn will be remembered as a writer of oratorio and organ music rather than as a composer of strictly orchestral music. There is a certain suavity and repose about his style which seems incompatible with the demands of the orchestra.

It seems remarkable that a composer who is so thoroughly Russian in his traditions as Tschaikowsky should have caught and reproduced the Spanish spirit so charmingly in the "Serenade," two movements of which were produced at the concert. This Spanish character is found more particularly in the second movement, which consists of an intoxicating waltz, the melody of which is played alternately by the violins and the cellos.

The concluding number was the noisy spectacular and decidedly un-Wagnerian "Rienzi" overture.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Campanari, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and although he has sung repeatedly in Baltimore this was his first appearance with the orchestra with which he was associated for several years as 'cellist. Mr. Campanari's first number, the Monologue from "Falstaff," was, as a concert piece, uninteresting, but in the prologue to "Pagliacci" he found an opportunity to display his superb voice and magnificent style. He was heartily recalled several times, but failed to respond to the enthusiastic demands for an encore.

Comparisons of Paur as a conductor with Nikisch, who, by the way, is now winning golden opinions in Leipzig as the conductor of the Gewandhaus concerts, are still made, but this year shows the newcomer much more firmly established in the hearts of the American public. His sincerity and enthusiasm, the absence of posing in his manner, and, indeed, his very ruggedness have won for him the respect of all concert-goers.

He was successful last night in his conducting of the Mendelssohn Symphony. The picturesqueness and magnificence of this work seemed to appeal to him especially. It is also quite natural that he should have been completely at home with a Mendelssohn composition, inasmuch as a large part of his life was spent in Leipzig, which is, above all places, the cradle of Mendelssohnian traditions.

NEW YORK, SUN.
, NOVEMBER 16, 1895.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Society took place last evening in the Metropolitan. A gay audience was present to listen to a most cheerful and charming performance. Beethoven's Eroica symphony received the neatest kind of a rendering at Mr. Paur's hands. His interpretations are matter-of-fact and best suited to the older classic writers. Berlioz's beautiful excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust" could have absorbed a much more fanciful and imaginative rendering. The "Will o' the Wisps" and the "Sylphs" were by no means either so weird or so elfish as they should have appeared. The accompaniments to Mme. Melba's songs, the "Mad Scene from Hamlet" and Handel's delicious aria, "Sweet Bird that Shun'st the Noise of Folly," were exquisitely played, however. Mr. Mole's flute obligato was very skilfully done. Mme. Melba showed that she is in splendid health and voice, entrancing her hearers as usual with beauty of tone, the smoothest execution, and wonderful trills of notes of dizzy altitude.

It is really time that Wagner's poorest composition, the "Kaiser Marsch," was relegated to silence and oblivion. It is only a rehash of phrases to be found in other works of his, set forth here in a diluted state and distorted form.

It is both homely and stupid, and sounds as if it were written to order, which it was. Let us not listen to the "Kaiser Marsch" just because Wagner's name appears opposite the title. It is unworthy of his fame and his genius.

The New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1895.

YESTERDAY'S CONCERTS.

Yesterday was one of the days, of which it is to be feared there will be overmany in New-York season, that are full of music. But it was all good music, and the only fault that could be found in the premises was that it involved a weariness of the flesh to those who tried to hear it all. As a matter of fact, it was impossible for one to hear it all, "because," as Dr. Hanslick in his "Memoirs" quotes a Vienna banker as being in the habit of saying, "not being a bird, it is impossible for a man to be in two places at the same time," and two of the concerts took place at the same time in different places. But reviewers for the newspapers have means of learning what goes on, and how it goes, without extending their ears (which, let it be hurriedly said in anticipation of what the evil-minded and envious might say, are possibly long enough for the purpose) from the Metropolitan Opera House to Steinway Hall. And because of this facility it is possible in this place to say something about the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra without neglect of the pianoforte recital in Steinway Hall.

At Carnegie Hall in the afternoon, the Philharmonic Society, under the direction of Mr. Seidl, gave its first public rehearsal for the season. It was pleasant, on opening the leaflet containing Mr. Mees's always judicious analytical notes on the programme, to find a printed memorial of the action of the society on the death of William Scharfenberg, one of the original members of the organization, and for many years active in its ranks. The Tribune has spoken its eulogium on this admirable man and musician, who died last August, and this mention of the society's graceful performance of a pious duty may suffice. The music of the rehearsal, which will be repeated at the concert to-night, consisted of Esser's transcription of Bach's stupendous organ toccata in F, Dvorak's violin concerto, and Ernst's "Hungarian Airs" (played by Ondricek), Wagner's "A Faust Overture," and Schumann's symphony in B-flat. There was scarcely enough finish in the performance of the joyous symphony, with its ebullient proclamation of vernal moods, to entitle it to high praise and one felt tempted to believe that possibly it has been neglected at rehearsal in favor of the overture, which was given with an eloquence that admitted of no questioning concerning either the splendid powers of the band, or the sympathetic insight into its contents, and masterly skill of Mr. Seidl. It stood out brightly, strongly, self-reliantly in the scheme, and afforded a noteworthy illustration of the moving power of music conceived, composed and given out in a dramatic spirit. Mr. Ondricek effected his entrance on the American concert platform with the two compositions for violin, which are plainly written in a manner native to his feelings and temperament. The impression which he made was that of a player full of fire and in possession of a technical equipment upon which he draws extravagant drafts with a daring that borders on recklessness. A listener might desire to hear a firmer, fuller and warmer tone than he gets out of his G string, but this deficiency is forgotten when he climbs into the high position on the A and E strings, where all is vital, brilliant and inspiringly energetic. He has the dash which commands admiration, where more academic, or, let us say, even more correct, players win only respect, but with all his vehement eagerness he never forgets justness of intonation, and for that he must be heartily welcomed to our concert rooms. His success was immediate and emphatic, and after many recalls he supplemented his set pieces with a transcription of Schubert's "Er-King," without accompaniment. It is a show piece merely and bristles with difficulties which are all but insurmountable for human hands, but after all it serves but to amaze and suggest the question, What good? It is a miracle that Schubert's galloping accompaniment and the contrasted voices of father, child and the Erl-King should all be produced from a solo violin with but little sacrifice of their harmonic integument, but if their melodies must be gasped out so spasmodically it will have to be said that from a musical point of view the most that such a composition can do is to provoke the sigh—difficult, indeed—would that it were impossible!

The temptation is strong to say that the concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave in the evening at the Metropolitan Opera House was one of the most brilliant that that superb organization has ever placed to its credit. This at least may be asserted: None of the concerts given by the orchestra here since Mr. Paur assumed the administration of its artistic affairs was comparable with it, either in technical perfection or poetic beauty. In the not long ago, when the Boston newspapers, which, with a singular distressful pitiful and pathetic disregard of truth (it is to be supposed that back of them are also souls threatened with damnation) keep on asserting that New-York has misjudged and abused Mr. Paur (assertions that are utterly without foundation) wanted to extenuate their abuse of Mr. Nikisch, who was frankly criticised, as well as generously praised here, it used to be said that the orchestra played better in New-York than in Boston. It is more than probable that when the Boston reviewers urged this they came very near the truth. At least as often as The Tribune has listened to the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its native heath, so to speak, it never heard either such admirable playing or intelligent reading in a symphony as marked Beethoven's "Eroica" last night. It was an inspiration and a joy to listen to it. The local subscriptions to the orchestra's concerts have fallen off sadly of late, so it is only fair to assume that the fine audience of last night was largely due to the desire to hear Mme. Melba. It was a flattering tribute, and it met with a most gracious reward, for Mme. Melba sang with surpassing brilliancy. One thing a trifle discordant may be said, if it can be done with freedom from cavil. Milton's poetry is good poetry; it has a music of its own well worthy of the added melody of Handel in the familiar extract from "L'Allegro," which our fair cantatrice sang last night. Why then should she change. "Thee, chauntress, oft the woods among," to "Thee, chauntress, oft among the woods?" There is a merit in rhyme in music such as Handel has superimposed on Milton whatever Wagner may have said in condemnation of rhyme in the abstract, and "evensong" makes music with "among," but makes none with "woods." When Mme. Melba first sang the air here she sang it in French as if she were ignorant of its origin. Now that she has learned the English, why should we not have it in its correctness? Her other number was the mad scene from "Hamlet," and with both pieces she excited the liveliest enthusiasm.

The pianoforte recital in Steinway Hall was given by the Misses Miller and Schafer, of St. Louis, who during and since their studies in Europe have cultivated ensemble playing. A feature in this concert, which is new here, is the division of pieces written for solo performance between two pianofortes, without change of the text. A high value need not be placed upon such a device, but it serves excellently to display the harmony of feeling which exists between the players, their sense of rhythm and their technical accuracy, and it can also be said that to the hearer it measurably increases the effectiveness of such sonorous compositions as Schumann's toccata, which is one of the programme numbers of the young women. Both have good musical intuitions and digital skill, and their concerts are in a high degree worthy of respect. But it might be wished that they should attach a higher value than they seem to to beauty of tone.

The World.

Published by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 Park ROW, New York.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1895.

TWO FINE CONCERTS.

Philharmonic Society and Boston Symphony Orchestra with Ondricek and Melba.

Following the example of the Symphony Society, the Philharmonic Society had a freshly imported violinist as the feature of the first concert of its fifty-fourth season at Music Hall yesterday afternoon. As an artist Ondricek is far removed from mediocrity, and is certainly a violinist of the very first rank. To me, however, his playing lacks—and in this it resembled that of the Philharmonic Orchestra—that inner subtle something, call it soul if you will, which causes it to just fall short of being absolutely great. And yet there is a virility, a force, an authority and intensity about Ondricek, which, combined with an impeccable and brilliant technique, makes his art and playing both convincing and attractive. It is both manly and sincere. His tone is penetrating, vivid, and dominating, rather than suave and velvety; it commands rather than caresses. But the style and finish are at all times that of a master of the instrument.

Ondricek was heard in Dvorak's A minor concerto, and Ernst's "Airs Hongrois." His reading of the concerto, while forceful, contained and dignified, lacked, to me, both romantic feeling and poetic fervor. He was evidently more at home in Ernst's brilliant show piece, which he executed with commanding virtuosity, and caught his audience completely with his verve and magnetic energy. As an encore he played Schubert's "Erlkonig," arranged for violin solo, a hideously difficult piece of virtuoso clap-trap which seemed to accord but ill with the dignity of a Philharmonic concert. In spite of certain patent artistic limitations, I am inclined to rank Ondricek high among modern violinists.

The playing of the orchestra throughout exhibited its usual characteristics. There was the same splendid force and energy, the same sonority of tone, and the same roughness and lack of refinement and sentiment as ever noticeable in its work. A lack of precision in the strings and blatant roughness in the brasses—a constantly offending member of the orchestra—tended to mar the broad and vigorous rendering of Bach's Toccata, F major, arranged, and reverently and well arranged, for orchestra and organ by G. Esser.

The Wagner-Faust overture went so much better that it seemed like a different orchestra playing. Mr. Seidl is certainly a Wagner conductor hors ligne. Schumann's First Symphony, fresh with all the beauty and color of spring, was also well played, especially the Larghetto, though Mr. Seidl's at times somewhat boisterous reading made Schumann's too thick orchestration sound more than usually heavy. There is noble material in the Philharmonic Orchestra; to whom the fault that it does not always seem to be utilized to the best advantages? The same programme will be repeated at Music Hall this evening.

Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Paur, gave the first concert of their tenth New York season at the Metropolitan Opera-House last night. The orchestra has not for some time, and Mr. Paur, to my thinking, never been heard to better advantage here.

Credit where credit is due. I have never been able to enthuse much over Mr. Paur as a conductor; and I still think that his lack of temperament and poetic fervor imposes limitations on the endless artistic possibilities of the superb orchestra he now directs; but it would be idle and unjust prejudice to deny him the praise which is his due for his capable and artistic work last night. His reading of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony was at once classic in its repose, contained force, and finished and well considered conception, and modern in its warmth of color, contrasted effect, force and vigor.

The first movement might in places have been more smoothly played, while the slower tempo at which the trio of the Scherzo was taken in respect to the Scherzo itself has no warranty in the score, and was, notwithstanding, too fast at any rate. Apart from this to find serious fault with Mr. Paur's reading would be carping criticism. I thought, too, that Mr. Paur's rather deliberate tempo made Wagner's "Kaisermarsch" sound somewhat halting and heavy-footed. Still his reading of it had climax, force and brilliancy.

The "Menuet" and "Valse des Sylphes," from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," were played with rare delicacy and finish, and marked romantic feeling and pictorial effect. The latter movement especially was much appreciated by the audience, and justly. What a superlatively excellent orchestra this Boston Orchestra is! The first violins are simply incomparable. I thought the seconds at times a little weak or unduly kept down last night, while the body of tone of the full band whether in forte or piano passages is marvellous in its rich sonority, consistency and absolute precision. I think after last night that the orchestra has at last waked Mr. Paur up. He has been called stolid; there were no signs of it last night.

Mme. Melba sang the Handel aria "Sweet Bird," with flute obligato exquisitely played by Mr. Mole, and the "Mad Scene," from Thomas's "Hamlet," and was received with tumultuous applause; but what a blessed relief that in spite of endless recalls no encores were permitted. To say that Mme. Melba sang these now familiar numbers as well as ever is to say that they were as well sung as they could be; as no other singer now before the public could sing them. There is truly only one Melba, just as there is but one Paderewski. Her beautiful quality and evenness of tone and marvellous vocalization are surely unsurpassed and unapproachable. A most enjoyable concert throughout.

Between the Philharmonic and the Boston Symphony Orchestras there is rather a long artistic step.

REGINALD DE KOVEN.

The New-York Times

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, NOV. 16, 1895.

THE MUSIC OF YESTERDAY

The Philharmonic in the Afternoon and Boston Symphony at Night.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of its season in New-York at the Metropolitan Opera House last night. There was a large audience, which was well repaid for its attendance by a concert of high excellence. It is a cheering fact that whatever discouragements may come from wearisome readings by Emil Paur, the Boston conductor, at times, in the course of the season, he has periods of luminous energy, and these refresh the drooping spirit. Mr. Paur was at his best last night, and his best is a pretty good article. His worst need not be discussed at this time, but it is difficult to avoid recording a fervent wish that he would not exhibit it again in New-York.

The orchestral numbers last night were Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, "The Will-o'-the Wisps" minuet and "Waltz of the Sylphs," from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," and "The Kaiser March" of Richard Wagner. The soloist was Mme. Melba, who sang Handel's "Sweet Bird," and the scene of fiorituri insanity from M. Ambroise Thomas's milk-and-water version of "Hamlet."

For his reading of the Beethoven symphony, Mr. Paur deserves only the warmest praise. It was broad, dignified, scholarly, and sympathetic, and showed in every measure the results of a conscientious, analytical study. In balancing the various instrumental voices the finest possible skill was shown, and in the distribution of light and shade the conductor displayed a deep sympathy with the emotional content of the work, and a firm grasp of its musical embodiment. Not a phrase in the entire composition had been neglected in rehearsal, and every significant fragment in the middle voices was brought conspicuously to the surface, and made to take an influential place as a component part of the whole. If Mr. Paur always gave his New-York audiences such admirable reading we should not hesitate to accord him that position which his Boston advocates claim for him as a notable conductor. The orchestra played the work like a small army of virtuosi, and, taking it all in all, the performance was one of the most admirable ever heard in New-York. The two Berlioz numbers were played with delightful delicacy and smoothness, and the waltz quite captivated the audience.

Mme. Melba has not profited by her itinerant career as a concert singer. Her delivery of the Handel air was not up to the standard which she has set for herself here, and several measures were throaty in tone, and decidedly inartistic in the treatment of the vowel sounds. The Ophelia music was sung with apparent effort; but that was probably as much the fault of the music as of the singer. The air is not advantageously placed for the voice, and is exacting in its difficulty. Mme. Melba's delivery of it would have been a triumph for a vocalist of ordinary ability, but she is something more than that, and her hearers expect from her only perfection.

The first public rehearsal of the Philharmonic Society took place at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. There were the usual evidences of public pleasure at the resumption of the most artistic musical entertainments known to the metropolis. The house was packed even to the standing room, and the attention given to the music was all that the most exacting performer could ask. The applause was warm and plentiful, and on the whole there was an atmosphere of refined enjoyment.

A new solo violinist, Mr. Franz Ondricek, made his first appearance in America. He selected as his media of introduction Dvorak's concerto in A minor and Ernst's "Hungarian Airs." It is not necessary to give a detailed consideration to Mr. Ondricek's playing till after to-night's concert. It may be said now, however, that his style is distinguished by impetuosity and nervous vigor rather than by breadth, repose, or dignity. He has a good technic and a pleasing tone, and no doubt will win his way with the public; but the impression which he made yesterday, while favorable, was by no means profound.

The orchestra played Bach's toccata in F major, Wagner's "Eine Faust" overture, and Schumann's First Symphony. Anton Seidl, who was graciously received when he appeared at the conductor's desk, begins the season with his forces well in hand. His reading of the Wagner music was a superb achievement, and those who are to hear it at the concert to-night have a rare orchestral treat in store for them.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

It was an attractive programme selected by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its first concert of the season, which it gave last evening at the Metropolitan Opera House.

With Mme. Melba as soloist, and great compositions of Beethoven, Berlioz and Wagner to be interpreted by an orchestra of such repute, it was to be expected that the beautiful opera house would be well filled and the audience enthusiastic in its demonstrations.

The band (numbering eighty-eight players) did his best work in the scherzo of the "Eroica Symphony" and in the "Waltz of the Sylphs," from the "Damnation of Faust." Perhaps the scenic arrangements interfered last evening with the volume of sound. Although every number was delightfully given, still there were no such effects produced in the "Kaiser March" last night as were heard when the band gave it under Mr. Nikisch's baton at Chickering Hall.

Mme. Melba sang two numbers, Handel's Aria "Sweet Bird" (to which Mr. Mole played the flute obligato) and the mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet." After each of her numbers she was recalled six times to bow her acknowledgments. At the conclusion of her first solo she received many handsome floral testimonials.

She sang superbly, and richly deserved the tributes of approval.

Mr. Emil Paur conducted with care and precision.

The Washington Post.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 1895.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Its Season Opens with a Magnificent Rendition of a Fine Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was welcomed to Washington last night, at the first of its series of five concerts, by an audience which filled Metzerott Hall, and which represented in its personnel the highest circles of social, official, and musical life. The return of the orchestra is an event much appreciated, a fact very evident in the warmth of the reception which greeted Conductor Paur, and in the generous applause given to every number on the programme. As for the orchestra itself, it is sufficient to say that it improves with age. Very few changes were noticeable in its ranks, and the artists who in the past have responded so intelligently and skillfully to the baton of Mr. Paur, and even of Nikisch and Gericke, still remain, their ensemble playing improved by long companionship with each other.

Very catholic in its range was the programme. It began with Beethoven's third symphony, popularly known as the Heroic, familiar enough to music-lovers, although never previously performed here under Mr. Paur's direction. Its interpretation was unmarked by any radical departures from conservative ideas, and was thoroughly satisfactory. The will-o'-the-wisp minuet and the waltz of the sylphs, from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," were given with exquisite daintiness, while Wagner's Kaisermarsch illustrated the very extreme of that composer's tempestuous style. In all these numbers the orchestra acquitted itself most admirably. In precision of attack, in the solidity of the chords in the symphony and the march, in the force and vigor of the tutti playing, in the accentuated contrasts of crescendo and dimuendo, in prompt and absolute responsiveness to intelligent leadership—in fact, in all the details which combine to present perfect work, the orchestra illustrated its unquestioned superiority.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Campanari, whose selections were the monologue of Verdi's "Falstaff" and the prologue from Leoncavallo's "Pagliacci." Mr. Campanari's musical, resonant, and accurate tones are a constant delight, and his work last night naturally evoked the greatest enthusiasm. He sings with expression, fervor, and confidence, and his dramatic delivery intensifies the pleasure of listening to his voice.

The New York Recorder.

BY GEORGE W. TURNER.

SATURDAY, NOV. 16, 1895.

MELBA'S GREAT HIT.

She Carries Off the Honors at the First Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Emil Paur, conductor, gave its first concert of the season at the Metropolitan Opera House last evening. The largest audience to welcome the band in many seasons was present. The cause was not far to seek. Melba was the soloist.

Beethoven's colossal symphony Eroica, the minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps and Waltz of Sylphs from Berlioz's Damnation of Faust, and Wagner's Kaiser March formed the orchestral programme.

The Waltz of Sylphs made the hit of the evening with the audience, who wanted it repeated, but there were no encores.

Melba received an ovation. She sang, with flute obligato by Mr. Mole, the Handel aria "Sweet Bird," the solo in which she first captured the New York public two seasons ago at a Sunday night concert in the Metropolitan. The singer is in good form. An improvement in the way of a greater power to show feeling is agreeably manifest, the voice is fresh and spontaneous, though mono-tinted as before, her execution as dazzling and daring—there were a few small slips in staccati only—as ever, and there is a slightly more vigorous assertion of dramatic authority.

Her second number, the mad scene from "Hamlet" was delivered brilliantly, and also with a satisfactory show of feeling. There was something like real pathos in the "Je suis Ophelie" new with Melba, and really grateful to the ear. But her cantabile was the most pleasing part of her work. There was little of it, but what there was she gave with flowing breadth and a purity of bell-like tone which could hardly be surpassed.

She was recalled half a dozen times, laden with gigantic bouquets, clapped and cheered to the echo, and finally had to simulate exhaustion and send a double kiss from her finger tips in order to be allowed to steal away.

Melba was the popular magnet of the evening.

THE BALTIMOREAN.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A very large and appreciative audience attended the first concert season 1895-96 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall on Wednesday evening last. The program rendered was a most excellent one, comprising compositions by Von Weber, Mendelssohn, Wagner etc. The soloist of the evening was Mr. Campanari, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, his numbers were the Monologue from "Falstaff" and the prologue to "Pagliacci," his work was appreciated and he was recalled several times but failed to respond to the demands for an encore. Mr. Paur and also the orchestra received their share of honors during the evening. The next concert will be given Wednesday evening, December 18th.

[45]

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVIII., NO. 140.
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1895.

WARMLY LAUDED BY CRITICS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its first concert of the season in New York on Friday evening, and the orchestra and its conductor were warmly lauded by the critics in yesterday's papers. Even the World at last finds a good word for Mr. Paur, and says: "Credit where credit is due. I have never been able to enthuse much over Mr. Paur as a conductor; and I still think that his lack of temperament and poetic fervor imposes limitations on the endless artistic possibilities of the superb orchestra he now directs; but it would be idle and unjust prejudice to deny him the praise which is his due for his capable and artistic work last night. His reading of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony was at once classic in its repose, contained force and finished and well considered conception, and modern in its warmth of color, contrasted effect, force and vigor."

The New York Tribune says: "The temptation is strong to say that the concert which the Boston Symphony orchestra gave in the evening at the Metropolitan Opera House was one of the most brilliant that that superb organization has ever placed to its credit. This at least may be asserted: None of the concerts given by the orchestra here since Mr. Paur assumed the administration of its artistic affairs was comparable with it, either in technical perfection or poetic beauty." And of the playing of the "Eroica" symphony it states, "As often as the Tribune has listened to the Boston Symphony orchestra on its native heath, so to speak, it never heard either such admirable playing or intelligent reading in a symphony as marked Beethoven's 'Eroica' last night. It was an inspiration and a joy to listen to it."

The Times says: "Mr. Paur was at his best last night, and his best is a pretty good article"; and later observes: "For his reading of the Beethoven symphony, Mr. Paur deserves only the warmest praise. It was broad, dignified, scholarly and sympathetic, and showed in every measure the results of a conscientious, analytical study. In balancing the various instrumental voices the finest possible skill was shown, and in the distribution of light and shade the conductor displayed a deep sympathy with the emotional content of the work, and a firm grasp of its musical embodiment. Not a phrase in the entire composition has been neglected in rehearsal, and every significant fragment in the middle voices was brought conspicuously to the surface, and made to take an influential place as a component part of the whole. If Mr. Paur always gave his New York audiences such admirable reading we should not hesitate to accord him that position which his Boston advocates claim for him as a notable conductor."

The Sun contents itself by saying: "Beethoven's 'Eroica' symphony received the neatest kind of a rendering at M. Paur's hands. His interpretations are matter-of-fact and best suited to the older classic writers." It is more energetic in stating: "It is really time that Wagner's poorest composition, the 'Kaiser Marsch,' was relegated to silence and oblivion. It is only a rehash of phrases to be found in other works of his, set forth here in a diluted state and distorted form. It is both homely and stupid, and sounds as if it were written to order, which it was. Let us not listen to the 'Kaiser Marsch' just because Wagner's name appears opposite the title. It is unworthy of his fame and his genius." A judgement which is as just as it is frank and timely.

It is gratifying to notice this change of heart toward M. Paur, and it is a pleasing manifestation of a desire to treat him with the fairness to which he is entitled.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch's overwhelming success in Berlin does not seem to be so overwhelming after all if what the eminent music critic, Otto Lessmann, says in the Allgemeine Musik-Zeitung of Nov. 1, is true. The programme was the "Sakuntala" 'overture, a suite for strings arranged from Bach by Bachrich, and the D major symphony by Brahms. Herr Lessmann says: "Even more than in the first concert did the conductor show an inclination to take the tempi too slow, and through clever but laboriously thought-out nuances, pauses for breath, ritardandos and exaggerated fermatas to tangle himself in details and thereby to lose sight of the thematic structure. The result was, that however interesting much of the detail may have been, the effect as a whole disappointed expectation. This was especially true of the Bach adagio, and of the first two movements of the symphony. Then, too, the third movement of this work, which won comparatively the greatest applause, did not exercise its customary fascination. Buloro was always obliged to repeat this movement, and if I am not mistaken, so was Weingarttner, last year, in the Opera House concerts. No one of the movements this time met with such favor." From which, it would seem, that Mr. Nikisch has not yet learned how to deal with musical classics. Herr Lessmann finds the same faults with him that were found in Boston, and makes the same objection that Boston did to his ill-informed and inartistic method of imparting a ludicrously inappropriate operatic color to the severer orchestral works of the great masters.

In his recently published work on orchestra conducting, Weingartner says very wisely: "In opposition to the 'elegant' conductors who get over passages not clear at first sight by quickening the tempo, the tempo rubato directors made the [illegible] passages unclean by attempting [illegible] an unimportant middle voice which is raised to an importance which does not suit it; at times it is an accent, which, perhaps, ought to be lightly indicated, that now appears as a sforzato; then comes a so-called Luft pause, or pause for breath, which is introduced at the crescendo and following piano. And all these with perpetual chopping and changing of the time? Whence comes this attempt of some directors to make out of compositions something else than they really are? Whence this horror of a uniform tempo? Personal vanity is the answer, which is not content to execute a work as the author intended, but wishes to demonstrate to the public what they could make of it if they had been in the position to do so. The conductor's desire for applause is placed higher than the genius of the composer. Let the conductor before all things be true to the work which he is to execute, true to himself, true to the public. Let him not think when he takes a score in hand, 'What can I make out of this!' but 'What did the composer wish to say?' Let him study it so thoroughly that during a performance the score is rather a support for his memory than a fetter for his thoughts. If by study he has formed an image thereof, let him give this image as a unity, not in fragments. Let him always consider that he is the most important, most responsible personality in musical life. By good performances he can form the public and produce a general improvement of artistic sentiment; by bad performances he makes unsure the ground for true art. Let his greatest triumph be to execute a beautiful work beautifully; the success of the composer is his own."

The Symphony concert, which is on its first tournee, is having an enormous success as usual. In Baltimore, Philadelphia, Washington and Brooklyn it has been the same old story, crowded houses and genuine enthusiasm. Melba sung with them, and was royally received, especially in New York, Friday, at the Metropolitan Opera House, where her voice was as brilliant as the sunburst which she wore at her corsage.

In Philadelphia, which was a specially gala night, Melba was in gold and yellow satin, and wore a lot of her fine jewels.

The Boston Symphony orchestra played before enormous audiences during its tour last week. In Philadelphia on Monday night there was one of the largest houses even known to be present at a concert in that city. Every seat was sold, beside 1400 admissions. In Brooklyn on Tuesday night there was another splendid audience, and the same results attended the concert in Washington.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVIII., NO. 139.
SATURDAY, NOV. 16, 1895.

WELCOMED BOSTON'S ARTISTS.

Symphony Orchestra, with Mme. Melba, Proved a Great Attraction in New York.

(Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.)

NEW YORK, Nov. 15, 1895. It was an attractive programme that the Boston Symphony orchestra selected for its first concert of the season, which it gave this evening at the Metropolitan Opera House. With Mme. Melba as soloist, and the great compositions of Beethoven, Berlioz and Wagner interpreted by an orchestra of such repute, it was to be expected that the beautiful Onera House would be well filled, and the audience enthusiastic in its demonstrations.

The orchestra, numbering 88 players, did its best work in the scherzo of the "Eroica Symphony" and in the "Waltz of the Sylphs," from the "Damnation of Faust." Perhaps the scenic arrangements interfered with the volume of sound. Although every number was delightfully given, still there was no such effects produced in the "Kaiser March" tonight as was heard when the orchestra gave it under Mr. Nikisch's baton at Chickering Hall.

Mme. Melba sang two numbers, Handel's aria, "Sweet Bird" (to which Mr. Mole played the flute obligato), and the "Mad Scene" from Thomas' "Hamlet." After each of her numbers she was recalled six times to bow her acknowledgments. At the conclusion of her first solo she received many handsome floral testimonials. She sang superbly, and richly deserved the tributes of approval. Mr. Emil Paur conducted with care and precision.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, NOV. 17, 1895.

The Symphony orchestra scored a most brilliant success in Philadelphia Monday night, every seat in the academy of Music being sold and 1400 admission tickets besides, making an audience of about 4500 people. Mme Melba was the soloist, and this, in part, was the reason of the large sale. Tuesday and Wednesday nights' concerts in Brooklyn and Baltimore were but repititions of Monday night, and the concerts in Washington and New York Thursday and Friday nights, and the matinee in Philadelphia yesterday afternoon, were larger in numbers of people present than ever before

---

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1895.

Mr. Finck Takes Up a Cudgel for Mr. Nikisch.

Henry T. Finck writes as follows concerning Nikisch in the November number of The Looker On (page 182): "Possibly some of the Boston critics will feel a tinge of remorse when they read of the great triumphs which Mr. Arthur Nikisch is winning in Leipsic and Berlin as concert conductor. It was they who drove him from Boston, and now he has captured the two most desirable positions in all Germany, and is stirring up great enthusiasm."

In the first place, "the Boston critics" did not drive Mr. Nikisch away. He received an offer from Buda-Pesth. He accepted it, and just before his exit in the spring of '93 he behaved in a silly, shabby, wholly contemptible manner toward Mr. Higginson and the manager of the orchestra. It is true that "the Boston critics" spoke out frankly and vigorously when he introduced impertinent readings and sacrificed composers on the altar of his great god Vanity. This was the business and the duty of the critics. If they had not thus spoken, they would have been false to their employers, the public, and themselves.

In the second place, the position at Leipsic, which Mr. Nikisch, it seems, "captured," went for some time a-begging. It was offered in May or June of this year to Dr. Carl Muck, one of the conductors of the Berlin opera. It was offered to several, as I am informed by a Leipsic correspondent, before Mr. Nikisch "captured" it.

And how about this "stirring up great enthusiasm"? In this conection let us see what Mr. Otto Lessmann, the eminent critic and the editor of the Allgemeine Musik-Zeitung, wrote about the second Philharmonic concert in Berlin. The review was published in the said journal, dated Nov. 1 (pp. 563-564).

"Even more than in the first concert did the conductor show an inclination to take the pace too slow, and by means of clever, laboriously thought-out nuances, breaths, ritardandos and never-ending fermatas to lose himself in details and thereby to lose sight of the thematic structure. The result was that while much of the detail may have been interesting in itself, the total effect disappointed expectation. This was especially true of the adagio by Bach and the first two movements of the symphony. Then, too, the third movement of the symphony, which won, comparatively, the most applause, did not exercise its customary fascination. Billow was always obliged to repeat this movement, and, if I am not mistaken, so was Weingartner last year in the Opera House concerts. No one of the movements this time met with such favor."

Now Mr. Lessmann is not a hidebound conservative; he is a radical, thoroughly in sympathy with the ultra-modern school, believing in the "modern conductor."

But probably Mr. Finck is so engrossed with his passionate press work for Paderewski, that, having evolved from his inner consciousness the camel Nikisch, he cares not for opinions criticising the build or the habits of the thus created camel.

Mr. Lessmann agrees in his strictures with the London critics who reviewed performances led by Mr. Nikisch in that city in June of this year. Thus the Academy, June 22, after speaking kindly of his ability, said: "Yet there is at present something unsatisfactory about him. The Tannhäuser overture, for instance, was in many ways admirable, especially in any matter requiring finish or delicacy; but the total impression was not convincing. Then again in the Beethoven symphony in C minor,"—his crack piece—" neither the titanic greatness of the opening movement, nor the ecstasy of the finale was fully revealed." The Athenaeum, June 22, spoke of his "free indulgences in the tempo rubato." The Times, June 17, in the review of the performance of the C minor symphony, said: "The work as a whole was not allowed to make the deep impression that is produced when its beauties are presented with less obvious intention to make them prominent." The Pall Mall Gazette, June 17, referring to the Tannhäuser overture, said: "But by degrees, as the work wore on, a certain creeping slowness came over the spirit of our dream."

Mr. J. F. Runciman in the Saturday Review, June 22, wrote as follows: "If Mr. Nikisch fails at once to capture the affections of a London afternoon audience, it will be because there is about him something that mars the completely harmonious effect of his artistically disordered hair, his elegantly nervous figure, clad (I am given to understand) in the newest fashion, and that melancholy eye which gazes mournfully into futurity. To be frank, when he conducts, his appearance does somehow strike a discordant note just now. His pose and his air of authority are just a little obvious and offensive. He seems enamored of some high-flying notion of magnetizing his men, of subduing them to his will, compelling them to carry out his every thought almost as he thinks it. Now when you are conducting a hungry German orchestra, where the best men get 20 shillings a week, and go in daily fear of losing that, it is easy enough to work the magnetic business, for so soon as the men discover that to be your little weakness, they are ready to be hypnotized by the hour, or for that matter, to be cast into tra of 100 independent Englishmen, or Anglicized foreigners, who never will be slaves except for something handsome in cash, who would laugh if you offered them for a day's work what the German bandsmen are glad to get for a week's work, who have not an empty stomach amongst them; this kind of orchestra cannot easily be hypnotized, and the conductor who tries it is apt to make rather a ludicrous spectacle. It is to be hoped that Mr. Nikisch will drop the thing at once."

All these writers, as well as Mr. Lessmann and the Boston critics, recognized fully certain admirable characteristics of Mr. Nikisch's leadership. This recognition, however, did not degenerate into fetichism.

The great trouble with Mr. Nikisch is his inordinate vanity. With him, all is vanity. His nostrils must ever smell thick, pungent incense. Hence his woe in Boston; hence his woe in Buda-Pesth.

"Of praise a mere glutton, he swallow'd what came,
And the puff of a dunce, he mistook it for fame;
'Till his relish grown callous, almost to disease,
Who pepper'd the highest, was surest to please."

The Press
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1895.

A MELBA CRUSH.

Great Crowds at the Academy Welcome the First of the Boston Symphony's Popular Concerts.

When the first Melba concert was held "The Press" remarked that Philadelphia was in a fair way to develop a Melba fad, as it had in years past developed a Patti fad. Well, it has developed it and the fad has reached the proportions of a great craze already. When Mr. Paur lifted up his baton to begin the first of the Boston Symphony's series of popular matinee concerts he had for his auditors such a crowd as the Academy has seen but few times in its history. Every seat was sold. Galleries were jammed to the doors, and in the parquet the aisles were crowded to the doors and beyond them. The house certainly held over 3500 people at a low estimate. How many more it would be difficult to guess. How many who were refused admission is also a problem.

There is no need of talking about the programme; it spoke for itself. The audience simply went wild over Melba, and for that matter, over Scalchi. The orchestra, as perfect as it is and as beautifully as it rendered Auber, Bizet and Wagner, was tolerated. What all wanted to hear was the great diva. Of course the mad scene from "Lucia," which is Melba's best piece of florid singing, set the house by the ears and it had to be resung. And, in fact, encores were the rule. Everybody shared in the excitement. Even M. d'Aubigne outshone all his previous efforts. Campanari sang among other things his famous prologue from "I Pagliacci" instead of the monologue from "Falstaff," and was applauded vociferously. Well, the fact of it is the whole concert went off like wildfire. One woman said in her excitement that she preferred Scalchi to Melba, as the former went to her heart. She really ought to have said to her liver, but then it is all a matter of taste. The so-called "experiment" of Boston Symphony's popular concert is, however, an experiment no longer. It is a huge success.

THE RECORD

Philadelphia, November 17, 1895.

Boston Symphony Matinee.

The greatest audience of the season signalized the first popular matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon. The fame of this magnificent organization has grown apace under Herr Emil Paur's conductorship, especially since he has begun to introduce a more elastic variety of his hitherto too classical programmes. An elaborate musical feast had also been prepared for the occasion and the orchestra was supplemented by the entire Melba concert aggregation, including Signor Campanari, M. D'Aubigne and Mme. Scalchi, as well as the peerless Australian diva. The instrumental feature of the afternoon was Georges Bizet's first orchestral suite of "L'Arlesienne" music, embracing half of the incidental melodies composed by the young Bizet for Alphonse Daudet's drama. It includes the prelude, minuetto, adagietto and carillon, and gave its hearers a delightful conception of the dainty blossoming of that picturesque genius previous to his full flowering in the immortal "Carmen." As an offset for this purely tuneful treat, Herr Paur treated his vast clientele to a goodly dose of Wagner. The prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin," the prelude to the third act of "Tannhaeuser" and the overture of "Rienzi" followed upon one another in quick succession toward the close of the programme. The superb bowing force of the orchestra was splendidly revealed in this trio. It was in the "Rienzi" overture that Wagner introduced the first of those famous violin effects of his, and their spiritual and overwhelming climax is visible in the "Tannhaeuser" prelude as well as overture. The beauty of the strings is the great glory of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

As for the lyricists, Mme. Melba captivated her listeners. She was in delightful spirits and her soprano rose more than ever like a skylark through the music of Donizetti's mad Lucia, until flute and voice interblended in perfect and almost indistinguishable unison. She sang for the first time in this city in a "Rigoletto" aria. Signor Campanari gave a new aria from Ponchielli's "Litunni" and sang the jealous monologue of Ford from Verdi's "Falstaff" with forcible baritone effect.

---

[46]

The Philadelphia Inquirer
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1895

THE MELBA CONCERT

Close of a Week That Has Been Remarkable in a Musical Way.

The Melba concert yesterday closed the most remarkable week in the musical history of this city. It opened with a Boston Symphony concert, with Melba as soloist; there were three grand opera nights, a Paderewski matinee of Wednesday, and Melba in concert yesterday afternoon. On each occasion there was a full house; on three occasions every seat was sold and the aisles were jammed. It is estimated that the total receipts were almost $25,000. This shows that there is musical appreciation in this city.

At the concert yesterday, this was the program:

1. Overture, "Carlo Broschi".....Auber
2. Aria, "Lituani".....Ponchielli
   Mr. Campanari.
3. Lucia, "Che faro" (Orpheus)...Gluck
   Mme. Scalchi.
4. Mad Scene from "Lucia"....Donizetti
   Mme. Melba.
   Flute Obligato, Mons. Ch Mole.
5. Suite, "L'Arlesienne".....Bizet
6. Aria, "Salve Dimora" (Faust).Gounod
   Mr. D'Aubigne.
7. Waltz Song, "Se saran Rose"..Arditi
   Mme. Melba.
8. Monologue (Falstaff).....Verdi
   Mr. Campanari.
9. (a) Prelude, "Lohengrin."
   Act III.....Wagner
   (b) Prelude, "Tannhaeuser."
10. Quartette from "Rigoletto"....Verdi
    Mesdames Melba, Scalchi, Messrs. D'-Aubigne and Campanari.
11. Overture, "Rienzi".....Wagner

It is needless to add anything to what has been said so often in these columns about Melba's voice. She is the reigning queen of song. Her golden tones, brilliancy of execution and rare presence have elevated her to the ranks of a popular idol. The Boston Symphony Orchestra accompanied her yesterday—a very expensive arrangement, which did not draw one extra dollar into the treasury of the management. There were other singers of renown, but the public did not come to hear them. It was Melba, elevated to the gods, whom the people wanted to hear, and she earned all the appreciation she received. The Patti farewell has gone into eclipse. It is the youthful nightingale of the Antipodes who now reigns triumphant. The homage paid her yesterday was all that she could have desired. Her numbers were familiar and there is no need to say how she sang them.

PUBLIC LEDGER
Philadelphia, Monday, Nov. 18, 1895.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Matinee.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's experiment of giving a popular matinée met with emphatic success at the Academy of Music on Saturday afternoon. The auditorium was crowded with an audience that found the programme thoroughly to its taste, and extended to the soloists, Madame Melba, Madame Scalchi, Signor Campanari and Mr. D'Aubigne, all manner of cordial greetings. The concert was, naturally enough, of a diversified character, entirely free from heaviness, and was evidently none the less enjoyed on this account. That it was admirably carried out is something that goes without the saying. Melba, who gave, among other numbers, the mad scene from "Lucia," sang with her accustomed charm, and the remaining soloists contributed of course to the attractiveness of the occasion. It may be added, indeed, that Madame Scalchi revived the familiar "Che Faro" aria from Gluck's "Orpheus" with not a little of her old-time effectiveness.

The purely orchestral portion of the entertainment included Bizet's "L'Arlésienne" suite, which had a really delightful interpretation, and several Wagnerian selections.

THE CALL
—PHILADELPHIA.
MONDAY, NOVEMBER 18.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The matinee given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in conjunction with the Melba Concert Company on Saturday at the Academy of Music, attracted an audience which not only completely filled every available seat and standing room, but which overflowed even the stairs and lobbies of that capacious edifice. The program was of a popular character, including, for the orchestra, the overtures to Auber's "Part du Diable" and Wagner's "Rienzi," Bizet's "Suite L'Arlisienne" and the preludes to the third act of "Tannhaeuser" and to the third act of "Lohengrin." All of these were played magnificently. Mr. Paur conducted con amore. Mme. Melba was in capital form, and sang superbly the mad scene from "Lucia" and the waltz, "Se Saran Rose." Mme. Schalchi contributed a fine rendition of the aria from Gluck's "Orpheus," Mr. Campanari created a sensation by his singing of the prologue from "Pagliacci" and an aria from Ponchielli's "Lituani," and Mr. D'Aubigne gave a fine rendering of "Salve Dimora." The four vocalists also sang the immortal quartet from Verdi's "Rigoletto." The entire program was enthusiastically received, and every vocal number was encored.

Der Deutsche Correspondent
Donnerstag den 14. November 1895

Aus dem Conzertsaal.

Erstes Conzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters in der Musik-Halle. — Liederkranz-Conzert.

Wenn ein Conzert einen hohen Genuß bereitet hat, so war es das gestrige erste Conzert dieser Saison, welches von dem „Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester" unter der Leitung seines Dirigenten Emil Paur den hiesigen Musikfreunden in der Musik-Halle geboten wurde. Das Programm war ein recht ansprechend gediegenes, und besonderen Dank darf man Hrn. Paur dafür wissen, daß er Mendelssohn's A-Moll-Symphonie, oder wie sie auch genannt wird, schottische Symphonie, den Zuhörern vermittelte. Die warme Melodik des ersten Satzes, die lebensvolle brillante Rhythmik des Viance, welchem sich das klar aufgebaute Adagio und das mit Meisterhand ausgearbeitete Allegro anschlossen, verfehlten bei der tadellosen Darlegung Seitens des Orchesters ihre Wirkung nicht, so daß, obschon die einzelnen Sätze ohne die sonst üblichen Pausen hintereinander folgen sollen, das Publikum es sich nicht nehmen ließ, nach jedem Satze seiner Anerkennung in enthusiastischer Weise Ausdruck zu geben.

Nicht geringeren Applaus weckte die Darbietung der Weber'schen Ouvertüre zu seiner letzten größeren Tonschöpfung, der Oper „Oberon," während die beiden Sätze aus einer Tschnikowsky'schen „Serenade" zu den poetischen Tondichtungen Mendelssohn's und Weber's etwas zu stark contrastirten, um trotz der sauberen Darlegung seitens des Orchesters denselben Beifall wie diese zu finden. Aber gerade für die Art und Weise der Darbietung, für die Interpretation der genannten Werke gebührt dem Orchester, sowie nicht minder dem Dirigenten Hrn. Paur alle Anerkennung. Das Orchester ist gewissermaßen in seiner trefflichen Zusammensetzung eine Persönlichkeit, die ihre Seele von dem Dirigenten erhält. Sein Leben, seine Blutwärme pulsirt sich in ihm und sein künstlerisches Glaubensbekenntniß ist es, welches von dem Orchester bekannt gegeben wird. In diesem Sinne muß man die instrumentalen Gaben, welche das Conzert bot, betrachten, und wird dabei, wie gesagt, nicht umhin können, die Zucht, wenn man so sagen darf, anzuerkennen, welche den an sich noch lockeren Klangkörper des Orchesters zu einem einheitlichen zusammenschmelzen läßt, um den Intentionen seines Leiters zu folgen, als auch wird man dem Dirigenten selbst volle Gerechtigkeit widerfahren lassen müssen für den Ernst und den feinen künstlerischen Sinn, mit welchem er es versteht, in der Componisten Gedanken einzudringen und sie durch den wunderbar arbeitenden Mechanismus seines trefflich geschulten Orchesters dem Publikum zu vermitteln. Außer den vorgenannten Orchester-Nummern bot das Programm noch als Schlußpiece die Ouvertüre zu „Rienzi" von Wagner mit ihrem lärmenden Schluß, der um so lärmender klang, als auf der Bühne des Saales noch ein weiteres Podium aufgebaut war, auf welchem das Orchester Platz genommen.

Der Solist des Abends war Hr. G. Campanaris. Er ist den hiesigen Musikfreunden kein Fremder mehr, und mit seinem sonoren Organ, welchem alle Töne voll Schmelz und mit Ausdruck entströmen, hat er sich bereits seit Langem in die Gunst des Publikums hinein gesungen. Als er daher den herrlichen Monolog aus Verdi's „Falstaff" sang, entzückte er durch die schöne musikalische Gewandung, die er dem Texte gab, und entschädigte dadurch dafür, daß man die Worte nicht verstand. Dreimal mußte er dem Beifallklatschen folgen und vor dem Publikum erscheinen und als er dann später den gewaltigen effektvollen Prolog aus Leoncavallo's "I Pagliacci" vortrug und auch dann vier, fünf Mal herausgerufen wurde, da bedauerte er, wie seine Geberde andeutete, es wohl ebenso sehr, wie das Publikum, daß er dem Wunsche nach einer Zugabe nicht entsprechen konnte. Das stellenweise das Orchester etwas zu stark war und die kräftige Stimme des Sängers verdeckte, beeinträchtigte den Genuß, den die Soli boten, ein wenig.

Das nächste Conzert findet am Mittwoch, den 18. Dezember, statt. Der Besuch gestern Abend war ein guter, obschon der Saal nicht vollständig gefüllt war und es noch manchen leeren Platz gab.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVIII., NO. 143.
WEDNESDAY, NOV. 20, 1895.

PADEREWSKI'S RETURN.

A Brilliant Audience and a Splendid Reception.

Paderewski's Influence on the Public as Strong as Ever—First Performance Here of His Polish Fantasie—The Work Something of a Disappointment—The Artist Obliging.

A large and brilliant company, a welcome to the artist that was immense in its fervor, enthusiasm without reserve, rapt, almost devout, attention—in fact, all the remarkable regard for the man and affluent admiration for the performer that were such characteristic elements at the Paderewski concerts in the past—were manifested in their full at the concert, in which he was the central figure, at Music Hall last evening. The audience was completely carried away by him again, and, despite the exacting task that he had set himself in playing three concertos, he was twice compelled to pay tribute to the potent demon of encore. There was also the same wonderful piano playing, in which perfection of technique seemed to have reached the limit of its possibilities. To dwell on the artist's finger work, his refinement of taste and his mastery over all the technical resouces of his art would be only to repeat a thrice-told and wholly familiar tale.

His performance of the Chopin concerto in F-minor was of rare beauty, and was notable for its virility and for its crystal clearness. He was especially felicitous in the first and the last movements, which were given by him with extraordinary brilliancy and clearness, and with an artistic swing that was fairly fascinating. The slow movement, though exquisitely played, was somewhat overladen with rubato, and was disjointed in effect; the melody did not flow, and the reading savored of affectation and more of sentimentality than of sentiment. The Liszt concerto in E-flat was nobly set forth from beginning to end; the playing of the finale being a magnificent display of virtuosity. The feature of the evening, however, was the Fantasie Polonaise, composed by Paderewski, a work in which much interest was felt, owing to the marked impression made by his concerto, in which he was heard when he first appeared here.

On a first hearing the fantasie does not appear to be as able and as admirable a work as was its predecessor. It is true that it has a strong national color, that it has a decided originality, that it is not a mere show piece, being as it is a composition in which the orchestra has at least an equal share with the solo instrument. It is in four movements, but they melt into each other, and there is no interruption of continuity. The orchestration is ingenious and effective, the harmonies are rich and unconventional, and the work has a decided individuality; but it has little of what is understood as inspiration. None of the movements except the finale is notably clear, and the composer appears to have started out at random in a path that should lead him somewhere, but which carried him to nowhere in particular. There is enough and to spare of musicianship in the fantasie, and the last movement has a fire and a vigorous rhythmical emphasis that are fairly thrilling, but what it is all about, as music pure and simple, is not easy to discover on a first hearing. This, however, is the saving portion of the work, and holds the interest with a firm grasp, even if it does not appeal lucidly to the understanding. Here the composer has sought to dazzle by the virtuosity of the solo part, and his success is unmistakable.

For the rest, there is much of padding, much of mere noise and bombast, and much of aiming at a mark that remains untouched. Then, too, there are moments when the orchestration is almost brutal in its aggressive storminess. That there are many charming and finely conceived effects may be frankly conceded, but on the whole it must be confessed that the fantasie is a disappointment, especially after the unreserved encomiums by which it was injudiciously heralded. Of Paderewski's playing of the work there is, of course, nothing but commendation to be expressed, and at its conclusion there was a tempest of applause, the artist being recalled over and over again, and, notwithstanding the fatigue he must have felt, he responded with an exacting Hungarian rhapsody.

On Saturday afternoon M. Paderewski will give the first of his two recitals in Music Hall.

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
WEDNESDAY MORNING, NOV. 20, 1895.

THE PADEREWSKI CONCERT.

If one waxed enthusiastic over the marvellous playing of Paderewski at Music Hall last night, he or she could well be pardoned, for there was everything about the occasion to make it one long to be remembered.

The announcement that this was the great pianist's first appearance in this city after an absence of two years was in itself enough to draw a large audience; but the fact that he was to appear in conjunction with our own Symphony Orchestra was an added incentive which served to draw out an audience which crowded every corner of the big edifice. In fact, it would have been almost impossible to have squeezed in another soul, and for those who were fortunate enough to be present the occasion will long linger in the memory as musically considered one of the most notable events of the entire season.

Paderewski's art has long been recognized as nothing short of genius, and as he had on his previous visits established his reputation as a great, if not the greatest living pianist, one might almost have been led to believe that he had reached the zenith of his art. After last night, however, he must be accorded even a greater pianist than before. To indulge in superlatives is not out of place in writing of this wonderful artist, and while the hypercritical may find many minor points in his playing to which to take exception, yet, judged from the standpoint of popular favor or approval, he represents almost absolute perfection. Few in last night's audience were prepared for such a display of virtuosity and technique, such precision and lightning-like execution as they were treated to.

He was first heard in the Chopin concerto in F minor, a composition abounding in exquisite sentiment and which served admirably as a first course to the musical feast. The second movement, larghetto, as anyone will remember, is given over almost entirely to the solo instrument, the orchestral background being only discernible in places. It was played exquisitely, and he was rewarded with a triple recall.

The Liszt concerto in E flat followed and was played as probably never before. Into this piece he threw himself with all the fire and intensity at his command, and even Mr. Paur himself was filled with the enthusiasm of the occasion, and conducted the orchestral portion of the work in a most unusual manner. To satisfy the desire of his audience Paderewski played for an encore one of his own short pieces with a beautiful delicacy of feeling.

But the number for which his audience will remember him most was his own "Fantasie Polonaise," which he has composed since his last visit to this country, and which is reported to have greatly increased his reputation abroad. It was performed for the first time in England, a little over two years ago, and it serves the double purpose of showing off his ability as a composer and pianist. The composition, to quote the programme, is built "on original themes," and is full of delightful surprises. One moment it suggests the music of sunny Italy, again it is Spanish, and frequently strongly suggestive of his own nationality. It is positively unique, and the playful, buoyant passages were handled beautifully by the pianist. Brasses are frequently used to get the desired effect, and the whole ensemble is so well scored as to indicate that Paderewski could, if he wished, occupy a broader field as a composer. Both the composition and its marvellous manner of execution provoked the most unbounded enthusiasm, and the audience refused to leave their seats until he had been heard once more. Again he generously acceded to their desire and played one of Liszt's Hungarian rhapsodies. For an opening number the orchestra was heard in the overture to "Lenore," by Beethoven.

[47]

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, NOV 20, 1895.

PADEREWSKI HERE

Plaudits and Cheers Greet Polish Pianist.

Culture and Fashion Gather in His Honor.

His Return Proves a Great Popular Success.

Gives a Fantasia of His Own Composition.

Playing Divine as Ever and Hair Still Beautiful.

Pianist Paderewski's reappearance, with the Symphony orchestra, in Music hall last evening, was the occasion of intense delight to as many music-loving Bostonians as could possibly crowd into the building. He has lost none of his popularity during an absence of two years; on the contrary it would seem that interest in his playing and his personality is greater than ever.

Paderewski is unquestionably the ablest of living pianists. It is doubtful if he has been excelled by any pianist of the past, certainly no proofs of such excellence can be given at this time. Paderewski acomplishes all that any other pianist is reported to have done, and much more besides.

Many marvelous players have been heard here in recent years; some excelled in mastery of technique, some in purity of tone production, and others in poetic temperament and power of expression, but no one of them possessed all these gifts. Paderewski alone commands the possessions of a perfect pianist.

PADEREWSKI'S LATEST PORTRAIT.

To state that he excels in any particular style of music is simply to give expression to personal favor, which cannot be substantiated by general opinion.

There is no need for extended comment upon Mr Paderewski's extraordinary gifts at this time, however. Indeed there is nothing new to write, so completely has the subject been covered in the past. One can only repeat what has been said so many times, that Paderewski's playing is as near perfection as human talent can approach.

Paderewski has undoubtedly progressed in his art since he was last here, but this improvement will scarcely be evident to the average auditor. This improvement, however, is mainly in his greater power of giving expression to the sentiment of the composition interpreted. There was no opportunity for improvement in his technique.

The program last evening was very substantial. It would have been much too heavy had it been offered by a pianist of less ability, but as given by Paderewski it was wholly delightful. Following were the selections played: Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. 3, in C major, op. 72; Chopin, concerto in F minor, op. 21; Liszt, concerto in E flat, No. 1; Paderewski, fantasie polonaise, op. 19.

When Paderewski played here two years ago his Chopin interpretations did not meet with universal approval. His work was compared with that by De Pachmann, and there were those who did not hesitate to declare that De Pachmann was the most faithful exponent of the Polish composer's writings. But Paderewski won new friends last evening by his playing of Chopin's F minor concerto. It was a superb performance, broad in style, passionate in feeling and brilliant in execution. The exquisite larghetto, the gem of the three movements of the concerto, was played with indescribe delicacy and refinement.

His performance of the Liszt concerto was truly magnificent and stirred the audience to demonstrations of wild enthusiasm. Such an exhibition of artistic virtuosity was fairly bewildering. It seemed incredible that human fingers could be capable of such amazing dexterity. The final movement was taken at a furious tempo, but every note was clear and limpid.

felt in Paderewski's own fantasia, which had ... heard here. It is a brilliant ... oughly Polish in character, ... its author to be a master of composition as well as of interpretation. The orchestration is uncommonly elaborate, and is superb in its beauty and variety of coloring, and is notable for many novel effects, not the least of which is the introduction of a harp, which has never before been used in the orchestration of a piano concerto.

The fantasia is written in extreme modern style and consists of four movements, played without interruption. The numerous themes are charmingly fresh and melodious, and their development is ingenious and artistic. They are for the most part founded on the folk songs and peasant dances of the composer's native land. The concerto seems to possess all the elements of lasting popularity, for it possesses a wealth of tone color and grace of rhythm. The piano part is dazzlingly brilliant and bristles with an amazing variety of runs and octave passages calculated to display the virtuosity of a performer. It is quite unnecessary to state that the interpretation was worthy of the composition.

The audience applauded with the wildest enthusiasm, recalling the pianist half a dozen times and showing a determination not to leave the hall until he had played again. He finally submitted to the demands of his almost frantic audience and played the famous Liszt Hungarian rhapsody No. 3, the one with those amazing glissando scales which Paderewski plays so perfectly.

The first recital by Paderewski will be given next Saturday afternoon, when the following program will be played:

Variations (on a theme by Handel) .....Brahms
Sonata—Op 31, No 2 .....Beethoven
Sonata—F sharp minor, op 11 .....Shumann
Nocturne .....Chopin
Three etudes .....Chopin
Two chants polonaise .....Chopin-Liszt
Legende No 2 .....Paderewski
Etude (on false notes) .....Rubinstein
Valse caprice .....Rubinstein

"PADDY'S" BIG AUDIENCE.

Music Lovers and Society's Following Moved by the Artist's Power.

Paderewski, according to his manager, is bored by adoration of the explosive, hysterical kind, so he ought to have been immensely pleased with the way his Boston devotees greeted him. It would be sacrilege to call it a critical audience, since the pianist is way beyond criticism; it was rather sympathetic, and of course it was cultured.

The house was the best of the present symphony season. The 2500 people present were emphatically the "Lang following," and comprised all the local musical prophets who long ago put the Polish master on a pedestal and inscribed him an artistic hero.

It was a remarkably fashionable house too, for a Tuesday evening symphony, and evening dress and opera gowns were conspicuous on the floor. Dainty creations of silk and lace, the show of fetching opera bonnets, a generous sprinkling of jewels and an occasional flash of a white neck above a slightly low cut bodice all told the story that Paderewski is the favored genius in all the musical world with women, and that, en masse, they never miss an opportunity to honor him.

There was the stillness of suppressed anticipation during the first orchestral number, and then all necks craned forward to catch the first glimpse of the chrysanthemum locks, as Mr Paur led the master out. The house applauded, but not vociferously; it seemed to be too curious, especially the feminine part of it, which happened to be the overwhelming part, to give itself up to emotions at that moment.

At once everybody became aware that the Pole had retained his stiff, conventional bow, which always suggested to one that he may have at some time swallowed his walking stick. But then, that became an impossible theory as soon as the bow is over, for he instantly grows delightfully supple.

The abandon of genius was just as conspicuous in his makeup as ever—the Delsartean tie, the impossible goatee and the pudgy, square-toed shoes were immensely characteristic. In the two and a half years he has been away from Boston he has grown to look even a greater man than before, just as Hugo says the masters of the ideal are sure to do as they grow old.

His hair has a goldener hue, and delighted the women to find that it was still long enough to suggest a halo.

Paderewski's manager said to the reporter that the story that the pianist would wear short locks during this tour was all an unfounded bugaboo.

"Mr Paderewski always cuts his hair down in the summer," he explained, as though he were discussing a grass crop, "in fact, he always cuts it down twice in the hot weather, and then he doesn't cut it at all in winter. Really it isn't a bit shorter than when he began his American tour, two seasons ago. It has already grown nearly an inch since we landed, and it will grow three inches more before the season is over."

But the house was not less pleased with the artist's looks than it was with his performance. There wasn't a movement in all the crowd while those slender, velvet fingers were gliding and tripping the keys—and it's an excellent test of appreciation when a crowd sits still through three concertos. The applause was not of the painfully prolonged kind, but it was generous and sincere.

They say that over in New York the women devotees of Paderewski weep whole bucketsful at his playing; that they become so unstrung that they fall on each other's necks and tell family secrets to entire strangers who happen to occupy adjoining chairs. Then some reports have it that if their darling happens to scratch his finger on the keys the Gotham girls fight with each other for a chance to get a drop of blood on their handkerchiefs.

Thank heavens, the Boston women who go to the Paderewski concerts have stronger nerves and are really sensible. They didn't weep, and they didn't pull hair, but they said very learned things about the different movements in the "fantasie," and they became so intensely wrapped up in the stories of merriment and pathos and grandeur which the brain and soul and fingers of the Pole were making that piano tell, that their jaws dropped down, and in one or two cases their glasses fell off.

It was noticed also that there wasn't any of those dreadful enunciation seances which the New York papers say occur at every Paderewski matinee there. All the Boston girls knew that W is an F in Russian, and they put a little coughing sound in the middle of his name just as it ought to be.

The musicians were more demonstrative than anybody on the floor. After the Liszt concerto they crowded round the player with "bravos" and handshakes, and the young master was very gracious. He did not inflict them with any of his stiff bows, but he gripped them by the hand and smiled as forcibly as a Paderewski can smile, and replied to their compliments in execrable English.

...f the con... encore was over ...ly regained indoors to leave the hall. The crowd stood up in their places with eyes strained on the stage, as though in hopes that the player had dropped his handkerchief or lost a cuff button and would have to come out again. Some of the daring ones went to his dressing room and had the supreme happiness of shaking hands and congratulating him.

Paderewski was very cordial with his admirers, but he behaved as though he were not sufficiently sure of his English to care to engage in much conversation.

Mr Hugo Gorlitz, his secretary, said he was hungry, and Mr Gorlitz was consequently anxious to get him away.

Items concerning Paderewski's diet are ever interesting, and it might be said here that on those days when he gives concerts he only takes a cup of tea in the morning and an egg at lunch. He goes on the platform with an empty stomach, and between every number Gorlitz hastens to his dressing room and mixes a seltzer and lemon without sugar. As soon as the concert is over the pianist takes a glass of beer.

Eleven p m is his dinner hour. In the Paderewski suite is a remarkable valet known as Baron, who acts really as a chef rather than a valet, because the artist, like most geniuses, scorns fastidiousness in dress and doesn't like to be "fussed over." The "baron," who claims to be a German nobleman, makes divine French salads and on these the pianist invariably dines. After dinner he smokes a pile of Russian cigarettes. He never smokes anything else, and imports these for his own use, having just received a fresh consignment of 10,000.

Paderewski is growing wealthy out of his American concerts. He took $178,000 back with him from his last tour. A little of this has been lost in speculation, but he has been doing a great business in England and France the last two seasons. At one recital in London last May the box office receipts were £1270.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1895.

PADEREWSKI.

Reappearance of the Polish Hypnotist.

Still Does He Work His Spell and Fascinate Hearers.

His Polish Fantasia Proves a Sad Disappointment.

Mr. Paderewski made his first appearance here this season last evening in Music Hall. He was assisted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Paur conductor. The hall was crowded with a wildly enthusiastic audience. The program was as follows:

Overture to "Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven
Concerto in F minor, op. 21.....Chopin
(Orchestration by Richard Burmeister.)
Concerto in E flat, No. 1.....Liszt
Polish Fantasia, op. 19.....Paderewski
On original themes:
Allegro moderato.—Vivace non troppo, ma poi molto accelerando.—Andante molto sostenuto.—Allegro giocoso.
(First time in Boston.)

When Paderewski first played in Boston—it was at a Symphony concert, Dec. 5, 1891—the Journal welcomed him as a marvelous apparition. The hysteria that broke out soon after, and at times developed into acute mania, and, in some instances, into chronic "Paddymania," did not change the opinion then expressed. The fulsome praise of press agents, open and disguised, of high and low degree, did not lead to a reversal of judgment. Nor did even the extraordinary poem of Mr. R. W. Gilder shake the judgment one whit. The Journal did not, however, cry aloud and shout, "Lo, here is the greatest pianist that ever lived. To him Rubinstein is a blunderer, Von Bülow a pedant, de Pachmann a quack, Planté a poor Frenchman, Saint Saëns a nobody—Joseffy, Rosenthal, d'Albert nothing when weighed in the balance." And yet no sane person denies the strange fascination exerted by this skillful mixer of tone colors. You may call this power by whatever name you please: personality, individuality, temperament. He may be, as some claim, an adroit hypnotizer. Some demon may have given him a ring. It may be that Hunold Singuf, the piper that charmed the rats, the women and the children of Hamelin town, is again in the flesh, after many re-incarnations. Ascribe what reason you will, physical, psychological, superstitious, fantastical, there is no denying or escaping the spell this Pole lays upon you. After you have left the hall you may in cooler moments take exception to this reading or that mood; you may regret his performance of a piece by Beethoven and remember gratefully d'Albert; you may prefer de Pachmann, on the whole, as a player of mazurkas or nocturnes of Chopin; you may talk of "breadth" and "intellectuality" which you missed; but the spell is upon you, and you remember forever the charm of the tone colors.

IGNACE PADEREWSKI.

And what is again to be said about Paderewski's playing? You were at the concert last night; how did you convey your impressions to a friend who was not there? If you are a musician, you probably spoke of beauty of tone, evenness in scale passages and arpeggios, delicacy and spontaneity in arabesques, skill in the use of pedals, general splendor of technique? But did your friends gain any just idea of the power, the pathos, the brilliancy of the performance? Or if you are an amateur, a simple lover of music, what was there for you to do except to "babble in superlatives."

It seemed to me that Paderewski reached the summit last evening in the larghetto of the Chopin Concerto. He took the pace exceedingly slow; in fact for another dangerously slow; yet he worked wonders where another might have fallen ingloriously. For as he played it, the melos was sustained, vital, throbbing. Admirable as was his playing throughout the evening, here he seemed most truly inspired. In the Liszt Concerto and in his own Fantasia he displayed amazing artistry; but these latter compositions lend themselves chiefly to technical display and dazzling virtuosoship. And how about this Fantasia which was played here last night for the first time in Boston?

* * *

This is the history of Paderewski's Polish Fantasia. He first played it at the Norwich Festival, Eng., Oct. 4, 1893. He played it Nov. 22 of the same year at a London Symphony Concert. In Paris, March, 1894, he played it twice at the Lamourent Concerts. In May, 1894, he played it at the Netherrhenish Festival at Aix-la-Chapelle. June 1, 1894, he appeared with it at a London Philharmonic Concert. In 1895, Feb. 15, he exhibited it at Dresden.

This Fantasia was first played in the United States, without orchestra, by Miss Helen Robinson, New York, June 3, 1895. Its first performance with orchestra, in this country, was at New York, Nov. 4, 1895, by the composer.

* * *

Mr. H. T. Finck, in his advance press work for Paderewski, said confidently: "The greatest of Paderewski's works are his Polish Fantasia and his opera." He then added that up to the time of writing he had heard neither; but he quotes a gentleman named Alexander McArthur, who was once Rubenstein's private secretary, and it appears that Mr. McArthur is of Mr. Finck's opinion. Now, the opinions expressed in Europe about this same Fantasia are by no means unanimously favorable. Of course, with these we now have nothing to do. To those that heard the piece last evening, the opinions of Mr. McArthur, or Mr. Barbadette, or Mr. Boutarel, or the critic who wrote a review for the Signale, should be interesting not as guide posts, but as documents illustrating a singular episode in the history of the piano.

* * *

To me the Fantasia is interesting chiefly because Paderewski plays it. The composition in itself seems barren of ideas, often emptily bombastic, and at times a deliberate bid for cheap applause. Whatever may be the origin of the themes, they are of little beauty or nobility, and the development of them seems clumsy and ineffective. Fiorituri, fiorituri, fiorituri! And for a contrast, smash, bang, and again smash, bang! Not even Paderewski's art could elevate the intrinsic vulgarity of the allegro giocoso, or, as a clever Frenchman puts it, the allegro giocoso orchestrato piteuso maladroito nigaudinoso. The instrumentation is often thick, noisy, even brutal. The Liszt concerto is audacious enough, but there is seldom an actual entrance into the circus ring, even if there are occasional threats.

* * *

But why talk at length about Paderewski, the composer, when Paderewski, the pianist, is a more pleasing subject? Let it be said that this great pianist returns to us in the fulness of his power. The spell is as potent as when it was first felt, nearly four years ago.

PHILIP HALE.

[48]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, NOV. 20, 1895.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Paderewski Concert in Music Hall a Great Triumph.

A more triumphant entree could scarcely be imagined than that of Paderewski, at Music Hall, last night. Not only was the great auditorium crowded in every part, not only was the enthusiasm intense and continuous, but the character of the concert was more suited to its surroundings than any which Paderewski has yet given in Boston This character was due in large degree to the presence of an orchestra, and not a "scrub" orchestra, picked up at the dictation of chance, but our own great symphony orchestra, under the direction of its regular conductor, Mr. Emil Paur, who deserves to share in some degree the laurels of the soloist. Even the genius of a Paderewski cannot make Music Hall a perfect place for piano recitals; much of the delicacy, the close rapport which should exist between artist and audience is lost in so large a space, even though a Paderewski audience listens with a breathless attention which most pianists cannot command. But a programme of conctrtos, of works demanding orchestral color, and, therefore, also requiring the larger hall of orchestral usage, was something more legitimate than a magnified solo recital; for the first time the picture and the frame were suited to each other.

It is difficult to speak of Paderewski without in some degree being influenced by his attractive personality; were a burly Teuton, with titanic waist and suggestions of a hearty appetite to play a similar programme equally well, it may be doubted if he would carry the crowd, or even the cultured musicians, so absolutely with him as does this refined-looking Pole. It is, however, futile to demand that the artist should perform behind a screen and if the eye is pleased while the ear is delighted, so much the better.

Nor need one carry out all the comparisons which are thrust forward by the devotees in this almost permanent craze; Paderewski is not exactly a Rubinstein, nor need he be; it is quite sufficient that he is a very great technicist, who possesses a degree of poetry that would turn the best of technicists green with envy. It is not too much to call him today the pre-eminent poet of the piano. This claim to the poetic mind combined with the perfect technique is doubly proved by the advent of the pianist as composer. Again the reviewer may decline to make invidious comparisons; it is not necessary that Paderewski, being a Pole, and having composed a Polish Fantasie, should at once be measured against Chopin. Suffice it is to state that the Polish Fantasie for piano and orchestra, which Paderewski has brought forth, is as brilliant as even the Hungarian Fantasie by Liszt, and that in managing the orchestra our present composer is far in advance of Chopin, who when he wrote any passage for orchestra or voice only gave piano music in disguise.

Naturally the Polish Fantasie, played by the composer, was the central point of interest in a programme which was exciting from first to last. As was to be expected, the work has plenty of local color, Polish themes seem to be its groundwork, (although these are original with its composer) and when one bear in mind that the music of Poland sounds the emotional gamut from deepest dejection to wildest Bacchanalian merriment, it can be imagined that the work does not lack contrast. Perhaps the extreme contrasts cause the impression of homogeneity to be somewhat weakened, but one must pay high tribute to the manner in which the composer has treated the orchestra and to the manner in which he has united his orchestral forces with the solo instrument.

A fantasie for piano and orchestra must not become a piano solo with orchestral accompaniment, and this artistic law seems to have been fully recognized by the composer. When pianists compose they generally claim the lion's share of the proceedings for their own instrument; even Rubenstein in his piano concerts too often thrusts the orchestra into the background. Not so Paderewski; he has given some of his finest points to the orchestra, and he has made a sincere effort to interweave his parts so that the orchestral impression shall remain with the auditor. He has also understood the art of working up a climax, and the finale of the work becomes a fury of brilliant execution.

Almost every instrument of the modern grand orchestra is present in the work, and the spice of the piccolo is most showily placed against the brilliant piano passages. Even the tinkling glockenspiel (the chime of high-toned bells) appears in the work, yet without giving any suspicion of tawdriness. Altogether, this work, if not attaining the power of a standard classic, yet proves abundantly that Paderewski is more than a mere interpreter, and, if one may read between the lines of its measures, he has by no means said his last word in composition yet.

Liszt's piano concerto in E flat was a splendid foil to the Paderewski Fantasie. It was folk-music, but of another nationality; it presented Hungarian in contrast with Pole, and although called a concerto, it was practically as much of a fantasie as its companion piece. It may not take the rank with musicians that the composer's second concerto, in A, does, but its effects lie much nearer the surface than the touches of the latter work, and it is always certain to excite an audience. Paderewski plays the work in a manner to beggar description; it becomes a tornado of technique, and the abandon and elan of the pianist suits [illegible] composition in classical form. Liszt, when asked what its prominent figure of seven notes meant, responded—"Das versteh't ihr alle nicht"—("None of you can understand!"), and the reiteration of this figure may conduce to an incomprehensibility with those who seek for classical form, but the lack of symmetry should not blind the auditor to the splendor of the composition.

At times its brilliancy becomes even audacious, as, for example, when the triangle (an instrument which has no definite pitch) plays a few notes of solo.

Paderewski played the showy work with a dash that was little short of phenomenal, and its climax has never been heard in such a masterly fashion in Boston before. Of course, an encore followed, and a Mendelssohn "song without words" formed an effective contrast.

It is scarcely necessary to say that the Chopin concerto which preceded these works, was perfectly played. Only De Pachmann can rival Paderewski in the interpretation of Chopin, and even he does not achieve the same level in the broader and more earnest works. Paderewski, in this (F minor) concerto, makes Chopin feminine, without reducing him to effeminacy.

All through the concert the orchestra was admirable never too prominent, never too rigid. In such a concert one is apt to think only of the soloist, but it is not often that the soloist can have such efficient support as Paderewski had on this occasion.

Of course the final number (Paderewski's Polish Fantasie) won an encore, and a final rhapsodie sent everybody home in the best possible humor.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1895.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is meeting with unusual success during its tour. At the concerts given in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn last week, the houses were crowded to the doors, and there is promise for equally great enthusiasm when the other trips are made later in the season. Melba is the soloist during the present tour, and as usual her part of the programme arouses unlimited appreciation. The Tribune said of the Friday evening concert in New York: "The temptation is strong to say that the concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave in the evening at the Metropolitan Opera House was one of the most brilliant that that superb organization has ever placed to its credit."

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1895.

Music Hall: Paderewski.

Paderewski made his first appearance in this city since his return to the United States at the Music Hall last evening in conjunction with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme was as follows:

Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, opus 72.
Chopin: Concerto No. 2, in F minor, opus 21.
(Orchestration by Richard Burmeister.)
Liszt: Concerto No. 1, in E-flat major.
Paderewski: Fantaisie Polonaise, opus 19.

It was good to have the great pianist come back to us; doubly good to hear him with orchestra, in the only sort of compositions for pianoforte for which the Music Hall is adapted. There was, as usual, an enormous audience to greet him; we doubt if there was an empty seat in the house, and all the available standing-room was taken.

The concert opened with a brilliant performance of Beethoven's ever-welcome "Leonore" overture, No. 3; one of the few compositions that could make such an audience forget for a few minutes its impatience to hear Paderewski.

Chopin's F minor concerto was given with the orchestral part remodelled by Richard Burmeister of Baltimore; or rather, from Burmeister's score as retouched and slightly modified by Paderewski himself. This re-orchestration by Burmeister is worth something more than passing comment; it is done on quite a different plan from that of the remodelled version of the concerto by Karl Klindworth. Chopin's use of the orchestra in his concertos has long been unfavorably looked upon by pianists and critics; his long ritornellos are now entirely out of fashion, and it cannot be truly said that the part they play in preserving the balance of the form of the compositions is in any way conspicuous. The opening ritornellos in Mozart's concertos and in Beethoven's earlier ones are far more important; they may certainly be called old-fashioned in one sense; composers have long since seen the folly of keeping the solo performer waiting through several pages of score before playing his first note; Beethoven himself saw the undesirable side of this, for, in his fourth and fifth concertos, he preceded the orchestral ritornello with some free preluding on the pianoforte; Mendelssohn and Schumann went one step further and reduced the ritornello to the simplest proportions. Then, Chopin's ritornellos are not only long, but are scored with an artless awkwardness that only adds to their dreariness. Chopin's use of the orchestra in accompanying the solo instrument was far better; now and then he even had a felicitous inspiration in this particular. His scoring of the accompaniment was, in general, very well adapted to his peculiar treatment of the pianoforte, especially so when his concertos are played in not over-large halls. Still his orchestral accompaniment is for the most part purely and simply an accompaniment; it seldom serves to add definiteness to the plastic outlines of the music, but plays the part of a, so to speak, neutral background of orchestral color.

But to remodel Chopin's orchestral part in his concertos is no easy matter. His treatment of the pianoforte is wholly individual, and the pianoforte part in these concertos of his is singularly complete in itself. To give additional pungency and zest to the orchestration, to make the orchestra, as it were, underscore some of the plastic outlines of the music, too little emphasized by the solo instrument, without unduly covering up the pianoforte part, is no easy task. Tausig and Klindworth evidently felt this, in making their respective rearrangements of the E minor and F minor concertos; they went boldly to work to substitute essentially modern orchestral effects for Chopin's timid and unskilful scoring; but their modern orchestration would not agree with Chopin's pianoforte writing, and they accordingly found themselves forced to remodel the pianoforte part as well. But to meddle with Chopin's pianoforte writing is very like tampering with Lamartine's French; the man was the most thoroughly and unexceptionably idiomatic pianoforte writer that ever put pen to paper; decidedly more so than Liszt; and any plan of rescoring his concertos which involves changing his pianoforte part stultifies itself at the outset. Burmeister has done his work far more modestly than either Tausig or Klindworth. We believe he really has changed the pianoforte part in a few passages; but Paderewski does not follow him in this; he sticks to the original version throughout; and he can do this with perfect safety, for Burmeister's scoring does not in any way necessitate a change in the pianoforte part. Upon the whole, we do not see how Burmeister could have done his work much better; his new version of the orchestral part is a really important addition to the F minor concerto, and does not interfere with the pianoforte part in the least. His pruning down the ritornellos is also an important improvement.

Paderewski's playing of the concerto was a revelation. Especially wonderful to us was his playing of the first and last movements. It was throughout the purest Chopin playing, reflecting all the ideal, if at times rather morbid, grace and warmth of sentiment in Chopin's writing, wholly in sympathy with the great master's peculiar style; yet it was the most thoroughly masculine playing—we say "yet" because too many pianists seem to think Chopin must be treated as if he were a woman—and never let poignancy of expression interfere with musical coherence, nor rhythmic freedom mar the clearness and consistency of musical form. To hear him play the first and last movements of this concerto is an education in itself. Of his playing of the beautiful Adagio we can speak with equal respect, if not quite with the same enthusiasm. Everything Paderewski does with Chopin should doubtless be regarded as to a certain extent authoritative; he probably has the Chopin traditions as well as any artist living, and his being of the same race as the composer must almost necessarily give him a certain security of insight into his works. Yet all we can say of his conception of this Adagio is that, with all its unquestionable beauty, it neither satisfies us nor convinces us. The [illegible] but we cannot imagine anything in the whole range of music going as slow as he takes the better part of this movement.

Liszt's E-flat concerto is a horse of another color. The time is long past when one was inclined to look upon this concerto as a pure monstrosity; it all seems plain sailing enough nowadays; one can hardly even remember sympathizing with John S. Dwight's calling its first theme "the east wind set to music." Our modern New Lights—with Richard Strauss at their head—have accustomed us (if not reconciled us), to far other horrors than this comparatively innocuous (if, upon the whole, rather ugly) theme. Paderewski played the concerto simply wonderfully. Let us say nothing of the exhibition of technique and physical endurance; let all that sort of thing go without saying. But the way he held the somewhat loosely constructed concerto together, as with a grasp of iron, and made it seem really like a musical composition, was truly astounding.

In his Polish Fantasia—heard here for the first time last evening—Paderewski brings us something which very decidedly goes beyond what his predecessors have done in this line of composition. We had expected, and even feared, something like Liszt's Hungarian rhapsodies. Well, this fantasia is like them, in one sense; but with what a difference! The work has consistency and musical form; not that it is in any traditional form, but that it really has a recognizable form of its own. Everything hangs well together in it; in listening to it you feel that the man is really saying something, and knows what he himself means. And what rich fertility of invention he shows, both in his themes and the use he makes of them. You never feel that he has had to stop and look round for his second phrases; they seem to spring quite naturally from his first, of their own accord. Then his use of the orchestra is masterly; form and color belong to each other here. A man who writes such a work is a composer; and composers—in the sense we mean—are getting to be somewhat of a rarity nowadays. The work is original, admirable in every way. His playing of it beggars description. Pianoforte fireworks we have heard before; but this brilliancy cannot be compared to anything merely pyrotechnic; it is too artistic and full of musical reason of being.

Upon the whole, Paderewski comes back to us exactly as he ought to come; just as much older in musical experience and feeling as he is in years. One does not speak of such a man's "improving;" men like Paderewski do not improve, they grow. What he was two years ago was but the opening bud of what he is now. That is what it is to be a man of genius.

The huge audience expressed its delight as only a Boston audience can; by clapping until it had got all it could out of the great pianist—the "all" in this case being represented by a Mendelssohn Song Without Words and a Liszt Rhapsody (one of the least displeasing we have yet heard).

The Boston Traveller

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1895.

PADEREWSKI IS KING.

The Great Polish Pianist Triumphs Once More.

BIG MUSIC HALL IS THRONGED.

The Player's Own Polish Fantasie Makes an Admirable Impression. Liszt and Chopin the Other Composers.

The magic of the name of Paderewski was potent to draw to Music Hall last evening a vast audience of a quality almost unparalleled in the musical history of Boston. Fashion was there in bravest attire, and as regards the musicianship present, that old joke to the effect that if an earthquake had swallowed up the hall there would be no instructors or players left in town might almost be pardoned. Not to be seen as an enthusiastic component of that great throng was a social sin and a musical transgression. And these were the offerings that greeted the eyes of the chosen 3,000:

Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, in C major, op. 72 (Boston Symphony Orchestra).... Beethoven.
Concerto in F minor, op. 21 (orchestration by Richard Burmeister.....Chopin.
Concerto in E flat, No. 1.....Liszt.
Fantasie Polonaise, op. 19, on original themes: Allegro moderato—Vivace non troppo, ma poi molto accelerando—Andante molto sostenuto—Allegro giocoso.. Paderewski.

Now and again, but not too often, there arises a towering genius who makes adjectives meaningless and praise a simple matter of course. Such a man is this aureole-topped Paderewski. Say that his wonderful personality wins half the battle; say that sentimental girls are his most persistent applauders; you still have to meet the fact that the soberest sense is led captive by the witchery of his phrasing, the solid attainments of his superb technique and the absolute perfection of his sense of proportions.

Fresh from his European triumphs and wholly restored to health, he plays with a fuller inspiration and a more virile authority than ever before. That he is the greatest pianist of the world is as safe a thing to say as that two and two make four. De Pachmann may play Chopin with a more honeyed beauty, and D'Albert interpret Beethoven with more impressive grandeur, but each stops there. Paderewski successfully ranges the whole field of pianoforte music, and invests all he touches with his poetic inspiration.

The Chopin concerto is not very impressive, truth to tell. The first two movements drag somewhat, but the last, in dainty dance rhythm, arouses the lagging interest and finishes the work in a flash of glory. Chopin's orchestration was always thin and clumsy, and Mr. Burmeister has had the good sense not to depart very radically from the composer's style. Chopin's concertos are, in the main, songs for the piano, with orchestral accompaniment, and Mr. Burmeister knew this well enough; he therefore made an orchestration wholly devoid of what we now call "modern color." Indeed, in the larghetto, it was only a sort of crooning accompaniment to the melody of the solo instrument. Mr. Paderewski played the first two movements a trifle listlessly for so great an artist, but the allegro vivace went with entrancing verve, daintiness and beauty of tone.

As if to show us a wholly opposite mood, the pianist gave the fiery and tremendous Liszt concerto next. So far as prodigies of massive technique and perfect victory over enormous difficulties goes, this was the event of the evening. Old Liszt's work thrilled as never before. He may be called noisy, bombastic, insincere—anything, but when he wrote for piano and orchestra he knew what he wanted the piano to say, and the piano always says it. There is no blurring, no uncertainty. This concerto is in his most heroic vein, and it was played as it deserved to be, with a titanic power, but never forced beyond the limits of the pianoforte—it seems to have no limits to Paderewski—and a magnetism that made it irresistible. At its close a whirlwind of applause brought the pianist back many times, until at last he sat at the instrument again and gave one of his own simple pieces with great refinement.

Now came the most anticipated event of the evening, the work, whose announcement had above all called out the imposing array of really musical people in the vast audience—Paderewski's own "Polish Fantasie." This was composed in the pianist's home at the close of his American tour of 1893. It received its first public hearing at the Norwich festival in England Oct. 4 of the same year. Its success, both with the public and the not over-enthusiastic critics of that country was overwhelming, and Paderewski was hailed as the legitimate successor of Liszt in the realms of pianoforte works. The fantasie is in four well-defined, though not separated, movements. A bold prelude in G sharp minor introduces the melodic theme, and then follows a new chief theme in C major, mazurka rhythm, of comparative simplicity, but quite effective. A sombre and pathetic andante, developed from a cadence in the first movement, and beautifully announced by the English horn and the violas, follows, and, having been elaborated at some length, breaks into a brilliant finale a la Kracovienne, fairly bristling with glissandos and strongly syncopated.

This fantasie is Polish enough, there is no doubt, but that it is inspired is a matter of serious doubt, or rather of no doubt at all. It does not compare in beauty or real worth with the composer's concerto played here two years ago at a Symphony concert. Paderewski has made tremendous difficulties for himself, but that is not making music. The orchestration is very florid, sometimes obstreperously noisy. The work was played in a masterly fashion, but even genius at the piano could not make up for a surprising nodding at the composer's desk.

W. D. QUINT.

TWELVE PAGES

PHILADELPHIA, NOVEMBER 22, 1895.

Do We Want Opera?

The Philadelphia public, and particularly those who profess an interest in music, will have an opportunity to-night to indicate whether they really want opera here or not.

It is fruitless to find fault with people for not taking to "Sigurd." Reyer's lyric drama has not been generally popular. Those who dislike the modern manner find it heavy, while the Germanizers object that it has not the weight of the "Goetterdammerung," and the opposing parties agree to turn it down. But there can be no question about the beauty and splendor, the strength and brilliancy of "Les Huguenots," and there cannot be any doubt of the adequacy of the company and the special fitness of the leading artists for the presentation of this great opera. People who want to hear Meyerbeer's music, therefore, and whose interest is not confined to some famous names, cannot neglect the opera to-night.

That our public would be slow to realize the importance and value of the work done at the Academy was to be expected from all past experience. While the house was filled twice last week to hear the Boston Orchestra with a single noted singer, it is easily recalled when the Boston Orchestra played there to empty benches and this same singer appeared to an audience by no means crowded. It takes a long time for our people to find out a good thing. When they do find it out they are generally loyal but not always discriminating in their adherence to it.

It was in some ways at least a better concert that was given by Mr. Hinrichs on Tuesday to a comparatively empty house. The appeal in that case was to musical appreciation only, and naturally it was not heeded all at once. In the course of the winter our people will awaken to the presence of the strongest and best operatic organization—orchestra, chorus and leading singers—ever brought together in Philadelphia; but while the director is educating his public it is not fair that he should lack the support and encouragement of any of the comparatively limited number who are competent to recognize artistic work without respect to personal fame.

It is worth while to repeat here that the basis on which this Philadelphia season is undertaken expressly excludes that reliance on the individual "star" that is recognized by judicious observers in New York as an obstacle to any real operatic development there. The New York opera has come to be practically dependent on the star, and the result is that no real progress has been made there from the first; scarcely a new opera has been done; the organization is weaker than when it started, and the singers who really do the work are not of equal rank with those of the Philadelphia company. They give a fine spectacle at the Metropolitan, with sometimes an imposing star cast at extra prices; but the whole effect is speculative rather than artistic.

We could not maintain this kind of a show in Philadelphia, even if it were worth while, as it is not. But we can maintain good opera, conscientiously and artistically interpreted by good artists, some of them already famous and some sure to become so, and can build up, on the noble foundation already laid, an organization the like of which this country has not yet known. There can be no question of the artistic success of the undertaking, if the people of Philadelphia really want it. To be sure, the tree cannot produce perfect fruit within a few weeks of its planting, nor can we expect it to obtain popular recognition all at once. The public is apt to be exacting in proportion to its ignorance, and patience is essential to every perfect work. But the people who do possess an interest in music for its own sake and for the sake of the artistic life of the community are numerous enough in themselves to make the opera a success if they will come to its support now, while it is still in the formative stage, and give to the earnest director and his most admirable company of artists the recognition and encouragement to which they are so well entitled.

CONCERT HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVIII., NO. 147.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Miss Marie Brema Was the Soloist and Received a Cordial Reception.

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall last evening was attended by a very large audience. The selections were:

Tragic overture, op. 81.....Brahms
Air, "Dans son Obscurite".....Gounod
"Scotch" symphony.....Mendelssohn
Air "My Heart Ever Faithful".....Bach
Overture, "Oberon".....Weber

Miss Marie Brema was to have been the soloist, but the late arrival of the steamer on which that artist returned from abroad prevented her appearance, and Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke consented to sing at a few hours' notice. Under such circumstances criticism is uncalled for; but it may be said that she acquitted herself in a manner that won for her hearty applause and two recalls after each effort. The Brahms overture received a masterly interpretation at the hands of Mr. Paur. The reading was the clearest and the most interesting that the work has had here, and its performance by the orchestra was exceptionally brilliant and impressive.

The melodious and beautifully-made Mendelssohn symphony also obtained splendid treatment. Some important changes were made in the reading of the work in regard to tempi, but they did no violence to the essential character of the music, were in good taste and exceedingly effective. The scherzo especially was given with marked piquancy, and the martial theme with which the fianle closes was brought out with stirring nobility, the prominence into which the first horn part loomed being notably felicitous.

The performance of the work throughout was admirable and well merited the vigorous applause that rewarded it. The Weber overture, which, by the way, is beginning to be somewhat hackneyed, was read and played with a fire and a dramatic force that made it thoroughly interesting, the incomparable virtuosity of the strings being displayed at its very best.

The programme was a light one, but the plaudits that attended its performance throughout were sufficient indication that no fault was found with it on that account. The programme for the next concert will consist of selections from Volkmann, Viotti, Borodin and D'Albert, and Mr. Franz Kneisel is to be the soloist.

MUSIC CRITICS NOT IN TUNE.

Lack of Harmony in the Case of Conductor Nikisch.

Boston Writers Not Responsible for His Leaving the Symphony Orches-

Several of the New York writers about matters musical continue to cherish the belief that the music critics of Boston were instrumental in driving Mr. Nikisch from this city. Nothing could be further at variance with the real facts of the case. While it is true that criticism here was strongly adverse to the liberties taken with the master works of the great composers by Mr. Nikisch through ignorance or caprice, he held his situation at the head of the Symphony orchestra until he forfeited it by his own conduct. As it is generally understood, he received an offer as music director at the Buda-Pesth Opera House, and consulted Mr. Higginson on the subject. The latter is said to have advised Mr. Nikisch to accept it, and this piqued him so greatly that he became recalcitrant from that moment. He is said to have objected to travel with the orchestra unless he received extra remuneration for it, and the upshot was that Mr. Kneisel was called upon to lead some of the western concerts at which Mr. Nikisch was announced to appear. This complicated matters between the conductor and Mr. Higginson, and Mr. Nikisch received a suggestion that his resignation would be in order. But for his own unwarrantable conduct he would have been permitted to fill out his five years' contract instead of being obliged to depart at the end of his third year. The critics had nothing whatever to do with the matter, despite the severe animadversions they had made on his shortcomings. The gentlemen in New York who are so deeply moved over his departure do not seem to be aware that when Mr. Nikisch acquitted himself well he was as cordially praised by the Boston press as he was severely and justly censured when he gave an operatic turn to a Beethoven symphony. The real point of the case, however, is, that the critics of this city were in no wise responsible for Mr. Nikisch's discharge, or resignation, or whatever the severance of his connection with the orchestra may be properly called. As he appears to be where his methods of conducting are more warmly favored than they were in Boston, his New York friends should rejoice rather than lament that he is no longer here. In any case, they should refrain from further misrepresentation of the cause of his departure.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1895.

Fifth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall—A Program of Very Familiar Numbers—Miss Clarke Takes Miss Brema's Place—The First Paderewski Recital.

The program of the fifth Symphony Concert, given last evening in Music Hall, Mr. Paur conductor, was follows:

Tragic Overture.....Brahms
Aria "Queen of Sheba".....Gounod
Symphony No. 3, A minor.....Mendelssohn
"My Heart Ever Faithful".....Bach
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber

Perhaps it would be unfair to again refer to Mr. Paur's apparent inability to arrange a striking and well-contrasted program, and for this reason: as originally planned Brünnhilde's Dying Speech—and, like Charles II., she was a long time dying—might have supplied the proper balance. As Miss Brema did not appear, the scheme of the program fell to pieces.

And so the hearers last evening were like unto a family gathered together, ready to listen to the head of the household read aloud for entertainment and instruction. There are new books on the table: Meredith's "Amazing Marriage." Hardy's "Jude, the Obscure," the latest novel by the Rosny Brothers, or Judge Grant's treatise on "The Sin of Having Less Than $10,000 a Year." But the father has no curiosity; he pulls down a volume of Scott or Thackeray or Dickens, and reads for an hour or two to his own delight that which has long been familiar.

There is little to be said about the concert except that it apparently gave much pleasure to the audience. Even one of the three everlasting Weber overtures was listened to as though it were a novel, intensely interesting work. It is surely a good overture of the pot-pourri order, and it was well played; but is it really necessary to play at stated intervals this and its mates, or to administer conscientiously monthly doses of Mozart, Beethoven and Schumann? I sometimes think it would make for musical righteousness if not one of the Beethoven symphonies were heard at these concerts for a year. How fresh and overpowering in this case would one of the better of them appear, say in 1897! We are all too familiar, orchestra and audience, with the masterpieces of symphonic music. Now familiarity does not necessarily mean full appreciation.

The overture by Brahms was given effectively and so was much of the Scotch Symphony, although the first movement was diluted in a measure instead of being served hot. The introduction was taken at too slow a pace, a common error of conductors. It is an andante con moto, Mr. Paur; and then the character of the melos should indicate the pace without too precise verbal direction. As you took it, the introduction dragged. So, too, the following allegro lacked at times in spirit. But as a whole the symphony gave pleasure, although the pianissimos were not always respectfully treated, and the drummer's ears were not invariably keen.

* * *

Miss Caroline G. Clarke sang the air of Balkis in an intelligent manner and with considerable authority. She might have made more of the superb opening phrase, but as she delivered it with greater breadth in the reprise, perhaps her action was intentional. Yet surely, at the very start, this phrase should be given with all the pride and the dignity of a queen who chooses to entertain a passion for a workman. Balkis was not a shy, trembling maiden.

The air by Bach was sung with piano accompaniment and 'cello obligato, played by Messrs. Zach and Schroeder. In this selection Miss Clarke did not appear to marked advantage. It must be said, however, that the air itself is occasionally unvocal, and it is out of place in concerts of this nature.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 24, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Owing to the non-arrival on this side of Miss Marie Brema, who was to have been the soloist at last night's Symphony concert, a slight change was necessary in the programme, and in place of the Wagner aria and two songs by Schumann and Schubert, in which Miss Brema was to have been heard, the aria from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba," and Bach's aria "My Heart Ever Faithful" were sung by Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke, who had been hastily called upon to fill the gap.

Miss Clarke was heard at these concerts last season, and it must be conceded that her rendering of the Gounod aria last night gave far greater satisfaction than her selections on her previous appearance. The aria is particularly suited to a full, robust voice as is Miss Clarke's, and while she does not always sing with that degree of ease which one would like to see, her tones are true and her enunciation almost faultless. While particularly fortunate in this number, not so much can be said for the Bach selection, which, while not especially interesting under the most favorable conditions, is rather above Miss Clarke's compass, as her voice is a mezzo-soprano. Barring existing conditions, however, Miss Clarke acquitted herself creditably. Her piano accompaniment was delicately played by Mr. Zach, and the 'cello obligato by Mr. Schultz.

The programme opened with Brahms's tragic overture, played in a spirited manner. But it was Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony which gave infinite pleasure, as it was read in a most intelligent and careful manner. The tempo of the last movement was taken somewhat more rapidly than usual, but it rather added to than detracted from the general effect. The overture to Weber's "Oberon" was also well played, all the subtle beauties of this number being admirably brought out. In fact, the entire concert was uniformly well played, which is a tribute to Mr. Paur's able conductorship.

At the next concert the prelude to the opera "Rubin," by D'Albert, will be heard for the first time, and Mr. Kneisel will be the soloist.

[50]

...Sunday Globe.

...DAY, NOV. 24, 1895.

...h Symphony Concert.

...symphony program of last week ...made up of standard compositions, ...hich the orchestra, as well as the ...t-going public, are familiar. ...ms' "Tragic Overture," Mendels... "Scotch" symphony, and Weber's ...verture to "Oberon" were the orches... numbers. Miss Marie Brema was ...le to arrive here in time to fill her ...gement, and Miss Caroline Gard... Clarke sang in her place. Miss ...Clarke's numbers were an aria from ...ounod's "Queen of Sheba" and a Bach ..., "My Heart Ever Faithful." The ...al style of the popular artist, and ...rich tones of her lower register are ...ited to music of a dramatic na... than to the Bach aria, and her ...ater success was gained in the first ...ection. Miss Clarke sang at a few ...hours' notice.

The irregular, though classic, form of the Brahm overture, with its different subsidiary background and rhythmic modulations, offers innumerable pitfalls for an orchestra, and only an organization capable of perfect ensemble work can give a coherent and satisfactory interpretation of the composition. The different movements are so complex and commingled that each body of instruments must do its part well, or the musical effect becomes clouded. As a whole the rendition was excellent, the working out of the different principal and counter themes being regular and clear.

The great "Scotch" symphony by Mendelssohn was grandly played. The wind instruments and violas harmonized perfectly in the opening themes and the unison work of the violins, which immediately follows, was notably crisp and melodic. The climax for the full band was given with thrilling vehemence.

The clarionets in the third part were tunefully contrasted with the "singing" of the cellos and the descending octaves by the bassoons, flutes and clarionets were also skilfully played. Of course the curious little jig by the clarionet and staccato strings went merrily until the development of the dance tune by the full orchestra, the passages terminating in a finale brilliantly played. The stately portions of the third and fourth movements were given perfectly, the closing one, sometimes known as "The Gathering of the Clans," showing splendid ensemble work.

Weber's "Oberon" was daintily performed, the phrases by the horns and the fairy-like figures by strings and flutes, being specially suggestive of the poetic, idyllic nature of the overture. This week's symphony program will be as follows: Volkmann, "Festivall" overture; Viotti, concerto for violin; Goetz, symphony in F major, op 9; Borodin, "Eine Steppenskizze aus Mittel-Asien;" d'Albert, prelude to opera, "Rubin," (first time). Mr Franz Kneisel will be the solo violinist.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 24, 1895.

Mr. Paur swung back to classical and standard music in appointing his part of the fifth Symphony programme. His selections were the "Tragic" overture of Brahms, Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, and Weber's overture to "Oberon." They were beautifully and nobly played. Not only was the technique faultless in executive passages, but the tone-color requisite for the pure violin sweeps, the far-off horn calls and the dainty wood-wind bits of the "Oberon," the concentrated elegiac breadth of gravity in the brams, and the stormy climaxes, bounding measures and sweet song of the Symphony, was always readily present. But superior to this complete external satisfaction was the quick, faithful, adaptable spirit which imbued the many phases of the chosen works with a sensibility which admitted of no cavilling criticism. The orchestra is possessing itself ever more strongly of the heart of its music and portraying it in sound and shape.

Miss Marie Brema was to sing; but, according to the fashion of foreign artists, she had pared down the probable time of transit, had taken the latest possible steamer, and of course did not arrive in season. If she had reached Boston, she would probably have been in no fit condition for singing. Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke accepted the ever difficult duty of a substitute and presented the soprano air from Gounod's "Queen of Saba" and Bach's "My heart ever faithful." We have never heard her sing so well, whether in respect of tone-production or of expressiveness. She delivered her voice easily and lightly and although it once slipped away from its place in an awkward Bach measure, this should not count as anything against her much improved definiteness in attack, her gain in smoothness and equality of gradation and her quiet broadening of delivery. The climax which precedes the return of the chief theme in the Gounod was admirably worked up and the dreadfully trying skips in the Bach were taken as justly as gently. Miss Clarke may congratulate herself safely on such obvious improvement.

The next programme is this: Volkmann, "Festival" overture; Viotti, concerto for violin, Goetz, Symphony in F. major, op. 9; Borodin, "Eine Steppenskizze aus Mittel-Asien;" D'Albert, prelude to opera, "Rubin," first time. Soloist, Mr. Franz Kneisel.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOV. 23, 1895.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera House.

Emil Paur provided a delightful surprise for the public and brought consternation to the ranks of his enemies with the first concert of the famous Boston orchestra last Friday night.

It might well be said that those who came to scoff remained to pray, for the great public had been attracted by the name of Melba, to bring the favorite prima donna an ovation, and the Orchestra was to be merely an incident. It turned out quite otherwise, however, and, as a result, the wise critics are rubbing their eyes and wondering why they did not discover the genius of Herr Paur before.

It is doubtful if the Third Symphony of Beethoven ever was performed so well in the United States. First, the conception of the poetic and dramatic contents of the work was of the highest order, full of love and reverence, and Mr. Paur projected all the fire, tenderness, breadth of sorrow and heroism of his own soul into the rendition. In the first movement it at once became apparent that we were listening to a remarkable performance. The melodies were given with a variety of light and shade in tone color, rarely, if ever, heard here before, and the tempi were liberally and appropriately modified to give these beautiful effects an opportunity to impress the listeners. The contrasts of power and the most delicate pianissimo were so perfect that at times the audience were listening with bated breath. Every phrase showed thought and great care and pulsated with feeling and intelligence. Mr. Paur for once gave the Funeral March at a reasonable tempo so that the audience thoroughly enjoyed it. The Scherzo was taken at a rapid pace, but so delicately, gracefully, and withal so perfectly, as to sharpen the edge of wonder and keep the listeners continually on the qui vive. Such perfection of execution is, however, most essential to that tempo. But the piece suffered nothing by it; on the contrary, it gained in piquancy. The last movement was a revelation of fine shading, broad contrasts and delicacy. At the conclusion the audience gave an outburst of applause, expressing the admiration which had been growing and increasing as the performance progressed.

The "Will o' the Wisp" and "Waltz of Sylphs" of Berlioz, were given in a most translucently delicate and perfect manner. The soft, dreamy moonlight scene, the graceful, flitting motion, all so beautifully suggested with the united effect of the strings, was portrayed with a rare perfection of refinement which compelled enthusiastic applause, and brought the conductor an ovation. So, too, when accompanying the great singer in the "mad scene" from Hamlet: the perfection and artistic supremacy of the orchestra, under Mr. Paur's hands, became an equal rival with the favorite singer and lent a charm of completeness as enjoyable as it is rare. The only criticism we could possibly offer is as to the tempi of the "Kaiser March," of Wagner. This appeared a little too slow for some of the phrases. However, it was magnificently powerful and pompous.

The concert proved not only that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the finest organizations in the world, but that Mr. Paur is a master able to direct it to the most perfect artistic results.

Third Symphony Concert.

It was a rainy night, and there was no outside soloist; yet the seats were filled, and there were standees. It might have been called an Evening of Program Music, whereof one would fain have more; for Goldmark's Sakuntala Overture is very descriptive, though less so than Tschaikowsky's Fantasy on the legend of Francesca da Rimini, heard here for the first time, and portraying the storms of wind greeting Dante in the second hell circle, with the loves of the unhappy pair in fleeting relief. For the first time also we heard the Dream Pantomime Music from Humperdinck's Hansel and Gretel,—very suggestive of the Sandman. The symphony was the Harold in Italy, of Berlioz, another very descriptive work, with Mr. Kneisel playing the viola solo which runs through it in such ruminatic fashion.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

BOSTON, NOV. 24, 1895.

The Symphony Concert.

Last evening the fifth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall, with the following programme:

Tragic overture, op. 81.....Brahms
Aria, "La Reine de Saba".....Gounod
Symphony No. 3, A-minor.....Mendelssohn
Aria, "My heart ever faithful".....Bach
Overture, "Oberon".....Weber
Soloist, Miss Caroline G. Clark.

As will be seen, there was little given in the way of novelty; but when curiosity is unsatisfied, expectation is always on the alert, and the disappointment of today becomes the Utopia of tomorrow. Fortunately Mr. Paur has the gift of keeping one awake, even in the presence of old and tried friends. Unlike his predecessor, he has the art and taste to keep his own individuality in the background, and not thrust it in the way of the composer whose work he is interpreting. Something of popularity is lost through this method, but art is the gainer, and the conducter who depends for success on the size of his shirt cuffs, the poetic pallidness of his face and the romantic droop of his shoulders is a thing of the past.

Comparison is inevitable whenever one listens to the broad and masterly readings that Mr. Paur gives to the works of the classic composers, mistakes of judgment there occasionally are, but even these are in the direction of vigorous manliness, and not of puling sentimentality that may become a hysterical cult, but has no place in real art. The Weber overture was given with delightful freshness and spirit, and the Symphony with unfaling instinct for true values and true color, not a beauty was missed, and although now and then a conventional reading in the way of sentimental prettiness was discarded, the change was always of a higher artistic value in the way of broadness or of daintiness. The beautiful scherzo was interpreted with the rarest delicacy, although the hypercritical may have missed the "screaming of eagles" and the "perfume of the heather," the adagio with marked nobleness and dignity and the last movement with exhilerating brilliancy and spirit. Mr. Paur was in his happiest mood after his recent triumph over prejudice and malice in New York, and he won another triumph in the city where his merits are better known and appreciated.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Caroline Gardiner Clarke, who consented to sing at a few hours' notice in place of Miss Brema, who was advertised to appear. Miss Clarke's beautiful voice was at its clearest and best; the aria from the "Queen of Sheba," was sung with dramatic power and tender feeling, and the Bach aria with a fine simplicity that was an evidence of finer art. It is always a pleasure to hear Miss Clarke, for in addition to her beautiful voice her work shows evidence of rare intelligence, and the rarer feeling that instinctively reaches the very heart of the works she sings. Her reception was most enthusiastic, and after each aria she was called out again and again to bow her thanks.

The programme for the next concert is Volkmann's "Festival" overture; a concerto for violin by Viotti; Goetz's Symphony in F major; Borodin's "Eine Steppenskizzeans Mittel-Asien" and the prelude to D'Alberto opera, "Rubin." The soloist is Mr. Franz Kneisel.

The Boston Traveler

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1895.

SYMPHONY AND PIANO.

Double Feast of Music For Bostonians on Saturday.

Fifteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; fifth concert. The programme:
Tragic Overture .....Johannes Brahms
Aria, "La Reine de Saba".....Charles Gounod
"Scotch" Symphony,
Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy
Aria, "My Heart Ever Faithful,"
John Sebastian Bach
Overture to "Oberon,"..Karl Maria Von Weber.

Father Neptune and his various boisterous winds prevented the arrival of Miss Marie Brema, who was to have been the soloist with Wagner, Schumann and Schuman to be interpreted, and Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke served in her stead at very short notice. She sang the well-frayed Queen of Sheba aria with smoothness and purity of intonation, and received much kindly applause. In the Bach aria, with accompaniment on the 'cello and the piano by Messrs. Schroeder and Zach, she was less successful, and the ensemble was at times woefully discordant.

The "Tragic Overture" proved anew how admirably Brahms stands the test of time. In imposing dignity it is unexcelled amongst all the latter-day works of its kind, and its classicism is of the sort that does not frown upon pure enjoyment. It was read and played superbly.

The beautiful "Scotch" symphony, highest type of Mendelssohn's work, has, as a whole, been better given at these concerts. The splendid burst of enthusiasm found in the allegro maestoso was taken at too rapid a pace, thus robbing it of the stately grandeur that it should possess. On the other hand, the delightfully whimsical and dainty second movement, with its airy dance measures and charming dialogue, received the most sympathetic treatment from Mr. Paur and the musicians. To hear M. Pourtau play that fascinating little tune was a most convincing lesson as to the beauty and sentiment of the clarinet in the hands of a master.

There is always a regulation amount of jeering when the "Oberon" overture makes its appearance on these programmes, perhaps because it is so eminently melodious and sparkling. But if a thing of beauty is a joy forever, then surely this romantic child of Von Weber's deserves not to be chastised for putting itself in evidence once in a while. Intense brilliancy marked its playing, and it kept the people in their seats to the very end, something that the Fifth Symphony a few weeks ago notably failed to do. That is an excellent mission for any orchestral work.

[51]

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 24, 1895.

Fifth Symphony Concert.

The symphony program of last week was made up of standard compositions, with which the orchestra, as well as the concert-going public, are familiar. Brahms' "Tragic Overture," Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, and Weber's overture to "Oberon" were the orchestral numbers. Miss Marie Brema was unable to arrive here in time to fill her engagement, and Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke sang in her place. Miss Clarke's numbers were an aria from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba" and a Bach solo, "My Heart Ever Faithful." The vocal style of the popular artist, and the rich tones of her lower register are better suited to music of a dramatic nature than to the Bach aria, and her greater success was gained in the first selection. Miss Clarke sang at a few hours' notice.

The irregular, though classic, form of the Brahm overture, with its difficult subsidiary background and rhythmic modulations, offers innumerable pitfalls for an orchestra, and only an organization capable of perfect ensemble work can give a coherent and satisfactory interpretation of the composition. The different movements are so complex and commingled that each body of instruments must do its part well, or the musical effect becomes clouded. As a whole the rendition was excellent, the working out of the different principal and counter themes being regular and clear.

The great "Scotch" symphony by Mendelssohn was grandly played. The wind instruments and violas harmonized perfectly in the opening themes and the unison work of the violins, which immediately follows, was notably crisp and melodic. The climax for the full band was given with thrilling vehemence.

The clarionets in the third part were tunefully contrasted with the "singing" of the cellos and the descending octaves by the bassoons, flutes and clarionets were also skilfully played. Of course the curious little jig by the clarionet and staccato strings went merrily until the development of the dance tune by the full orchestra, the passages terminating in a finale brilliantly played. The stately portions of the third and fourth movements were given perfectly, the closing one, sometimes known as "The Gathering of the Clans," showing splendid ensemble work.

Weber's "Oberon" was daintily performed, the phrases by the horns and the fairy-like figures by strings and flutes, being specially suggestive of the poetic, idyllic nature of the overture. This week's symphony program will be as follows: Volkmann, "Festivall" overture; Viotti, concerto for violin; Goetz, symphony in F major, op 9; Borodin, "Eine Steppenskizze aus Mittel-Asien;" d'Albert, prelude to opera, "Rubin," (first time). Mr Franz Kneisel will be the solo violinist.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 24, 1895.

Mr. Paur swung back to classical and standard music in appointing his part of the fifth Symphony programme. His selections were the "Tragic" overture of Brahms, Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, and Weber's overture to "Oberon." They were beautifully and nobly played. Not only was the technique faultless in executive passages, but the tone-color requisite for the pure violin sweeps, the far-off horn calls and the dainty wood-wind bits of the "Oberon," the concentrated elegiac breadth of gravity in the brams, and the stormy climaxes, bounding measures and sweet song of the Symphony, was always readily present. But superior to this complete external satisfaction was the quick, faithful, adaptable spirit which imbued the many phases of the chosen works with a sensibility which admitted of no cavilling criticism. The orchestra is possessing itself ever more strongly of the heart of its music and portraying it in sound and shape.

Miss Marie Brema was to sing; but, according to the fashion of foreign artists, she had pared down the probable time of transit, had taken the latest possible steamer, and of course did not arrive in season. If she had reached Boston, she would probably have been in no fit condition for singing. Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke accepted the ever difficult duty of a substitute and presented the soprano air from Gounod's "Queen of Saba" and Bach's "My heart ever faithful." We have never heard her sing so well, whether in respect of tone-production or of expressiveness. She delivered her voice easily and lightly and although it once slipped away from its place in an awkward Bach measure, this should not count as anything against her much improved definiteness in attack, her gain in smoothness and equality of gradation and her quiet broadening of delivery. The climax which precedes the return of the chief theme in the Gounod was admirably worked up and the dreadfully trying skips in the Bach were taken as justly as gently. Miss Clarke may congratulate herself safely on such obvious improvement.

The next progrmme is this: Volkmann, "Festival" overture; Viotti, concerto for violin, Goetz, Symphony in F. major, op. 9; Borodin, "Eine Steppenskizze aus Mittel-Asien;" D'Albert, prelude to opera, "Rubin," first time. Soloist, Mr. Franz Kneisel.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOV. 23, 1895.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera House.

Emil Paur provided a delightful surprise for the public and brought consternation to the ranks of his enemies with the first concert of the famous Boston orchestra last Friday night.

It might well be said that those who came to scoff remained to pray, for the great public had been attracted by the name of Melba, to bring the favorite prima donna an ovation, and the Orchestra was to be merely an incident. It turned out quite otherwise, however, and, as a result, the wise critics are rubbing their eyes and wondering why they did not discover the genius of Herr Paur before.

It is doubtful if the Third Symphony of Beethoven ever was performed so well in the United States. First, the conception of the poetic and dramatic contents of the work was of the highest order, full of love and reverence, and Mr. Paur projected all the fire, tenderness, breadth of sorrow and heroism of his own soul into the rendition. In the first movement it at once became apparent that we were listening to a remarkable performance. The melodies were given with a variety of light and shade in tone color, rarely, if ever, heard here before, and the tempi were liberally and appropriately modified to give these beautiful effects an opportunity to impress the listeners. The contrasts of power and the most delicate pianissimo were so perfect that at times the audience were listening with bated breath. Every phrase showed thought and great care and pulsated with feeling and intelligence. Mr. Paur for once gave the Funeral March at a reasonable tempo so that the audience thoroughly enjoyed it. The Scherzo was taken at a rapid pace, but so delicately, gracefully, and withal so perfectly, as to sharpen the edge of wonder and keep the listeners continually on the qui vive. Such perfection of execution is, however, most essential to that tempo. But the piece suffered nothing by it; on the contrary, it gained in piquancy. The last movement was a revelation of fine shading, broad contrasts and delicacy. At the conclusion the audience gave an outburst of applause, expressing the admiration which had been growing and increasing as the performance progressed.

The "Will o' the Wisp" and "Waltz of Sylphs" of Berlioz, were given in a most translucently delicate and perfect manner. The soft, dreamy moonlight scene, the graceful, flitting motion, all so beautifully suggested with the united effect of the strings, was portrayed with a rare perfection of refinement which compelled enthusiastic applause, and brought the conductor an ovation. So, too, when accompanying the great singer in the "mad scene" from Hamlet: the perfection and artistic supremacy of the orchestra, under Mr. Paur's hands, became an equal rival with the favorite singer and lent a charm of completeness as enjoyable as it is rare. The only criticism we could possibly offer is as to the tempi of the "Kaiser March," of Wagner. This appeared a little too slow for some of the phrases. However, it was magnificently powerful and pompous.

The concert proved not only that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the finest organizations in the world, but that Mr. Paur is a master able to direct it to the most perfect artistic results.

Third Symphony Concert.

It was a rainy night, and there was no outside soloist; yet the seats were filled, and there were standees. It might have been called an Evening of Program Music, whereof one would fain have more; for Goldmark's Sakuntala Overture is very descriptive, though less so than Tschaikowsky's Fantasy on the legend of Francesca da Rimini, heard here for the first time, and portraying the storms of wind greeting Dante in the second hell circle, with the loves of the unhappy pair in fleeting relief. For the first time also we heard the Dream Pantomime Music from Humperdinck's Hansel and Gretel,—very suggestive of the Sandman. The symphony was the Harold in Italy, of Berlioz, another very descriptive work, with Mr. Kneisel playing the viola solo which runs through it in such ruminatic fashion.

Gazette

SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

BOSTON, NOV. 24, 1895.

The Symphony Concert.

Last evening the fifth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall, with the following programme:

Tragic overture, op. 81.....Brahms
Aria, "La Reine de Saba".....Gounod
Symphony No. 3, A minor.....Mendelssohn
Aria, "My heart ever faithful".....Bach
Overture, "Oberon".....Weber
Soloist, Miss Caroline G. Clark.

As will be seen, there was little given in the way of novelty; but when curiosity is unsatisfied, expectation is always on the alert, and the disappointment of today becomes the Utopia of tomorrow. Fortunately Mr. Paur has the gift of keeping one awake, even in the presence of old and tried friends. Unlike his predecessor, he has the art and taste to keep his own individuality in the background, and not thrust it in the way of the composer whose work he is interpreting. Something of popularity is lost through this method, but art is the gainer, and the conductor who depends for success on the size of his shirt cuffs, the poetic pallidness of his face and the romantic droop of his shoulders is a thing of the past.

Comparison is inevitable whenever one listens to the broad and masterly readings that Mr. Paur gives to the works of the classic composers, mistakes of judgment there occasionally are, but even these are in the direction of vigorous manliness, and not of puling sentimentality that may become a hysterical cult, but has no place in real art. The Weber overture was given with delightful freshness and spirit, and the Symphony with unfaling instinct for true values and true color, not a beauty was missed, and although now and then a conventional reading in the way of sentimental prettiness was discarded, the change was always of a higher artistic value in the way of broadness or of daintiness. The beautiful scherzo was interpreted with the rarest delicacy, although the hypercritical may have missed the "screaming of eagles" and the "perfume of the heather," the adagio with marked nobleness and dignity and the last movement with exhilerating brilliancy and spirit. Mr. Paur was in his happiest mood after his recent triumph over prejudice and malice in New York, and he won another triumph in the city where his merits are better known and appreciated.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Caroline Gardiner Clarke, who consented to sing at a few hours' notice in place of Miss Brema, who was advertised to appear. Miss Clarke's beautiful voice was at its clearest and best; the aria from the "Queen of Sheba," was sung with dramatic power and tender feeling, and the Bach aria with a fine simplicity that was an evidence of finer art. It is always a pleasure to hear Miss Clarke, for in addition to her beautiful voice her work shows evidence of rare intelligence, and the rarer feeling that instinctively reaches the very heart of the works she sings. Her reception was most enthusiastic, and after each aria she was called out again and again to bow her thanks.

The programme for the next concert is Volkmann's "Festival" overture; a concerto for violin by Viotti; Goetz's Symphony in F major; Borodin's "Eine Steppenskizzeans Mittel-Asien" and the prelude to D'Alberto opera, "Rubin." The soloist is Mr. Franz Kneisel.

The Boston Traveler

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1895.

SYMPHONY AND PIANO.

Double Feast of Music For Bostonians on Saturday.

Fifteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; fifth concert. The programme:
Tragic Overture .....Johannes Brahms
Aria, "La Reine de Saba".....Charles Gounod
"Scotch" Symphony,
Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy
Aria, "My Heart Ever Faithful,"
John Sebastian Bach
Overture to "Oberon,"..Karl Maria Von Weber

Father Neptune and his various boisterous winds prevented the arrival of Miss Marie Brema, who was to have been the soloist with Wagner, Schumann and Schuman to be interpreted, and Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke served in her stead at very short notice. She sang the well-frayed Queen of Sheba aria with smoothness and purity of intonation, and received much kindly applause. In the Bach aria, with accompaniment on the 'cello and the piano by Messrs. Schroeder and Zach, she was less successful, and the ensemble was at times woefully discordant.

The "Tragic Overture" proved anew how admirably Brahms stands the test of time. In imposing dignity it is unexcelled amongst all the latter-day works of its kind, and its classicism is of the sort that does not frown upon pure enjoyment. It was read and played superbly.

The beautiful "Scotch" symphony, highest type of Mendelssohn's work, has, as a whole, been better given at these concerts. The splendid burst of enthusiasm found in the allegro maestoso was taken at too rapid a pace, thus robbing it of the stately grandeur that it should possess. On the other hand, the delightfully whimsical and dainty second movement, with its airy dance measures and charming dialogue, received the most sympathetic treatment from Mr. Paur and the musicians. To hear M. Pourtau play that fascinating little tune was a most convincing lesson as to the beauty and sentiment of the clarinet in the hands of a master.

There is always a regulation amount of jeering when the "Oberon" overture makes its appearance on these programmes, perhaps because it is so eminently melodious and sparkling. But if a thing of beauty is a joy forever, then surely this romantic child of Von Weber's deserves not to be chastised for putting itself in evidence once in a while. Intense brilliancy marked its playing, and it kept the people in their seats to the very end, something that the Fifth Symphony a few weeks ago notably failed to do. That is an excellent mission for any orchestral work.

[51]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 25, 1895.

The Symphony Concert---Readings Brilliant and Powerful.

Spite of the fact that the vocalist of the concert was detained upon the stormy deep and that the programme was (with one exception) not of any great profundity, the concert of Saturday was one to awaken enthusiasm, for the readings were brilliant and powerful and the execution beyond criticism. The most abstruse number of the programme came first,—Brahms' "Tragic Overture." This was read with a breadth and majesty that fitted its earnest character. The work can never be a popular one; as Bulwar-Lytton would say, "It was not written for the common herd;" it falls short of the first movement of Brahms' first symphony in its development, but compared with Mendelssohn, whose Scotch Symphony came later, it is a miracle of thematic treatment. For all its title, (it is not intended to represent any especial tragedy) the overture is not very discordant or vehement but presents the loftier, less emotional, style of a Sophocles or Aeschylus; in fact one might readily imagine Brahms inspired by the tragic muse of the old Greeks in this grave composition, and its steady and unchanging rhythm, (it has scarcely any change of rhythm or tempo throughout) suggests that resistless fate which is so often pictured in the Hellenic plays. But the ordinary auditor craves a more direct picture, and seeks in vain for the martial clangor or the feminine pathos that would garnish a modern tragedy.

As Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke took the place of the still floating Miss Marie Brema at very short notice, she is in some degree hors concours, although she needed no excusing on this account, and the expected Wagner gold was changed into Gounod silver, the aria "Plus grand dans son Obscurite" taking the place of the great finale to "Goetterdaemmerung." The number was well sung, a certain slowness of enunciation, a dwelling on the consonants, and an exaggerated Gallic nasality being the chief faults. The tender passage, "Reigne-toi, non coeur, Oubliez," was most commendably given. As a second number Miss Clarke gave Bach's "My Heart ever Faithful," to which Mr. Schroeder gave a fine violoncello obligato, and Mr. Zach furnished the piano accompaniment. It is one of the odd resemblances in music, that Jensen's romantic "Murmuring Breeze" should begin with the same phrase as this ever-faithful heart. This song of the bright Whitsuntide has some of the repetitions which mar the old school, but it nevertheless shows the radical side of Bach quite thoroughly. What a bold stroke it was to send the leading tone down a major seventh instead of up a minor second in the final cadence! Bach was at times as bold as Wagner in his progressions, and the consecutive-fifth-hunter can find even these in Bach if he searches well. Miss Clarke received abundant applause after both of her numbers.

Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony is certainly the finest of his orchestral works, although the A major ("Italian") symphony may at times display greater contrapuntal device. It was most cordially welcomed by the audience on this occasion, and it received a performance that deserves a whole host of gilt-edged adjectives.

The exposition of themes in the first movement was magnificently clear, although the subsidiary passage of the chief theme was put in somewhat too brusque contrast. The repeat of the themes before the development was not cut, as is too often the fashion nowadays; the violoncello work in the development was splendid in its effect, not only because of its broad execution, but because of the careful balance of the other parts which might have obscured it. In this careful balancing of parts we have never had a more faithful conductor than Mr. Paur.

The Scherzo was a great delight. Mendelsshon was the king of all scherzo composers; Beethoven was grotesque and hearty in his scherzi, Schumann was quietly happy, but Mendelsshon alone caught up the true humor, the dainty playfulness without vulgarity that should characterize this movement; and he never wrote a finer one than this of the Scotch symphony. Best of it all, the theme is Scotch; almost all of the German composers have aimed at Scotch effects at one time or another, Beethoven, Schumann, Bruch, etc., but only Mendelssohn succeeded in catching the true lilt of Gaelic music without dropping either into the pentatonic scale or the hackneyed "Scotch snap" figure (a dotted eighth followed by the sixteenth.) The clarinette did excellent work in this theme, and it reminded one that Mendelssohn and Weber were the first two composers who perceived the full power of the clarinette, and especially in the spectral-colored lower register. Mozart and Beethoven while using the instrument freely never suspected the ghosts that walked in the lowest tones ("chalumeau register" they are called) of the instrument.

That Mendelssohn fully appreciated the dark color is abundantly shown by his using an A clarinette (the largest and deepest of the regular clarinettes) in passages where the C clarinette (a smaller and shriller-toned instrument) is generally used, writing its passages in a flat, (since it sounds a minor third deeper than it is written,) on this occasion. The unusual form of this scherzo is in its favor; instead of using the conventional song-form with contrasted trio and return, the composer brings a concise but quite free rondo style into play and it suits the bright melody of the chief theme excellently. It did one good to hear such direct melody as is [illegible] much as one pleases, but it is refreshing to hear such a tune in these dissonant, diminished seventh, days. Again the cellos covered themselves with glory.

The finale never had a better performance in Boston than on this occasion. Its martial character seemed to arouse all that was brilliant and dauntless in the conductor's nature, and the Ossianic prowess of it all was remarkable. The contrast of that lonely and pensive subtheme with the spirit of the chief theme is one of the finest touches in all Mendelssohn, and when it came in against a drone bass, just before the coda, clarinette and bassoon played it as if they loved it, as indeed everyone must who is musical. The loneliness of the Trossachs on an autumn evening rises to mind with its every praise. The broad hymn of thanksgiving which forms the coda to the work, beginning in the depths and rising with two repetitions to the full power of the orchestra, was taken a trifle fast for its best effect, but it went finely enough for all that. Oddly enough, just after this strong climax, Mendelssohn introduces a few phrases that are as cheap as a negro minstrel song, an instance of Homer nodding after a rhapsody. The appreciation of the symphony by the audience was evident and the spontaneity of the applause was unmistakeable.

The "Oberon" overture with which the concert ended was most brilliantly played but scarcely made as great an effect. Just as Mendelssohn made the clarinette his favorite, Weber chooses the horn as the instrument of his affection, and he never wrote an orchestral work without giving this instrument some prominent work. It would be an interesting subject to study the predilections of the great masters in the matter of instruments; Mozart loved the basset-horn and enjoyed the clarinette, but disesteemed the flute; Beethoven was never in better mood than when writing for the bassoon, but never used the English horn (the little trio, Op. 87, for various reasons does not count) and cared little for the trumpet and not at all for the harp; a study of the scoring of the masters brings out simiar points with each; there is always a favored child in the orchestral family.

All of Weber's orchestral works present more horns than a dilemma; but our horn-blowers must guard against over-blowing; the delicate effects of Weber suffer greatly if the tone begins to rasp as it sometimes does when forced beyond a certain limit. This defect was present, however, only in the first phrase, after which the quality was all that could have been desired. The working up of the climaxes, and Weber is a little theatrical in these, was as emphatic as could have been demanded, and the concert ended with a trifle of the glare of the footlights, which was not the fault of conductor or orchestra, but lay in the composition itself.

Louis C. Elson.

[illegible]Y, NOVEMBER 25, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fifth Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, was as follows:

Brahms: Tragic Overture, opus 81.
Gounod: Aria from "La Reine de Saba."
Mendelssohn: Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch", opus 56.
Bach: Aria, "Mein glaubiges Herze."
Weber: Overture to "Oberon."
Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke was the singer.

Miss Marie Brema was announced on the programmes to sing Brünnhilde's great monologue from the third act of "Götterdämmerung," and two songs by Schumann and Schubert; but the late arrival of the Germanic in New York prevented her appearance. Miss Clarke took her place at only a few hours' notice.

Brahms's "Tragic Overture" was admirably played, in a way to bring its true beauty and greatness well home to the audience. What an ideally beautiful work it is! Brahms has here taken the term "tragic" in its exactest sense: not as implying a collection of horrors nor the ravings of frantic melodrama, but as fraught with all the ennobling and dignified associations of true tragedy.

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, too, went exceedingly well; the management of the varying shades of tempo in the first movement was capital: we have not always been able to agree with Mr. Paur in his modifications of tempo in works by the classic masters, and it is a pleasure to agree with him thoroughly in this instance. That neither he nor anyone else can instil much life and effectiveness into that all too weak coda to the finale, need hardly be said. The wonderful Scherzo—the movement in which Mendelssohn shows himself on a par with any great composer you please—made its usual brilliant impression.

Weber's "Oberon" overture, on the other hand, seemed to us to hang fire a little; it were hard to say just where the shoe pinched, but we have heard more brilliant performances of it.

Miss Clarke soon silenced all regrets at Miss Brema's non-appearance. It was a trying situation for a not very experienced singer to be placed in; but Miss Clarke fully rose to the emergency. She sang the Gounod aria admirably, in a grand, broad style, with great truth of expression, and a corresponding effect upon her hearers. No doubt the beauty of her voice was for much in this; but she has more to trust to than a sensuously beautiful organ; she has brains, schooling, and musical sense. Her singing of the Bach aria was also excellent; her tempo especially good—most sopranl take this air decidedly too slow. Bach marked it "Presto;" by which he, of course, did not mean what we understand by "Presto" nowadays; but he certainly could not have meant "slow" by it. It was unfortunate that, while the Franz score and parts to this air were reposing under their layer of dust in the library of the Harvard Musical Association, Miss Clarke had to sing it with pianoforte accompaniment, Mr. Schroeder, to be sure, playing the 'cello obbligato. But lack of time has to excuse much; and you cannot get anything out of the Harvard Musical before 2 P. M. As it was, one felt that more rehearsing (for which there was no time) would have brought the three performers—singer, 'cellist, and accompanist—to a somewhat better mutual understanding. Miss Clarke was very enthusiastically received by the audience, and recalled twice or thrice after each of her numbers. She richly deserved it.

The next programme is: Volkmann, Festival overture; Viotti, concerto for violin, No. 22, in A minor; Goetz, symphony in F major, opus 9; Bordin, "A Steppe-sketch from Central Asia;" d'Albert, prelude to "Der Rubin." Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the violinist.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1895.

The fifth Symphony concert, Mr. Paur conductor, was given last evening in Music Hall. The program, which was changed in consequence of the non-appearance of Miss Brema, was as follows:

Tragic Overture	Brahms
Aria, Queen of Sheba	Gounod
Scotch Symphony	Mendelssohn
My Heart Ever Faithful	Bach
Overture, Oberon	Weber

There is little to be said about this concert. The overture by Brahms was well played. The symphony was read in an honest, conventional, not highly poetic manner. The opening andante con moto was dragged out wearily, and the allegro that followed yawned at times. The overture to Oberon! A good overture, but is it necessary to hear this and its mates regularly each year, and at stated intervals, just as some people take sulphur and molasses in the spring, and put on heavy underclothes November 1?

I wish somebody would send Mr. Paur a list of modern orchestral compositions by Germans, Russians, Scandinavians and wicked Frenchmen. I've no doubt pieces by Americans are offered him weekly. But he prefers works without which no gentleman's library is complete.

Miss Caroline G. Clarke, who took Miss Brema's place at short notice, sang the aria from The Queen of Sheba with a display of considerable intelligence. She was less successful in the air by Bach, which is out of place in concerts of this nature.

* * *

The program of the Symphony concert Saturday will be Volkmann's Festival Overture; concerto for violin Viotti; Symphony, F major, Goetz; Dans les Steppes de l'Asie Centrale, Borodin; Prelude, Der Rubin, d'Albert (first time). Mr. Kneisel will be the soloist.

Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke was called upon at a few hours' notice to take Marie Brema's place at the Symphony concert in Cambridge on Thursday evening, and she also sang at the Friday afternoon rehearsal in Boston. After the aria from Gounod's Queen of Sheba Miss Clarke was recalled several times, the audience showing in every way their pleasure at her singing. This was particularly complimentary, as there was naturally a feeling of disappointment at Miss Brema's non-appearance, but Miss Clarke had a great success. It was not possible in either case to have any rehearsal. Miss Clarke will also sing at the Saturday evening concert.

Nikisch and the Tannhauser Overture.

Editors The Musical Courier:

I WAS very much interested in the account of your able Berlin correspondent, dated October 15, of the wonderful performance of the Tannhäuser overture at the hands of Mr. Nikisch at the first Berlin Philharmonic concert. If the article had been written by anyone else but Mr. Floersheim I would have taken no further notice of it, but coming from such an eminent critic, and referring to such a prominent work, I am convinced that a more concise explanation would be highly interesting to every thinking musician. Mr. Floersheim states: "In the finale of the overture, in the great massive fortissimo repetition of the Pilgrims' Chorus, there is a horn part which forms a perfect second voice to the trombones that carry the melody. T his horn part hitherto was always covered by the trombones, and you could not hear it except in so far as it pertains to the general harmony of the structure. By doubling the horns, Mr. Nikisch succeeded in bringing out this underlying tenor voice, and the effect was so novel, beautiful and telling that the critics caught on to it, and it quickly became the subject of a most animated discussion."

Now all this reads very nicely, and I have little doubt that by doubling the horns, using eight, the harmony in the brass is greatly strengthened, and more in keeping with the immense power of the melody played by three trombones and three trumpets, but as to developing any important underlying tenor voice, forming a perfect second voice to the melody, that is quite another question. A careful perusal of the score fails to establish any second voice which could possibly receive prominence by such a treatment. The part in question consists of four voices, and strictly speaking one voice is as important as the other. Even if such a voice could be found, it is extremely doubtful in my mind whether the doubling of any one voice by a French horn could effect the united fortissimo efforts of three trombones and three trumpets.

I am confident that Mr. Floersheim would receive the thanks of a large number of orchestral conductors if he could further enlighten them as to just what Mr. Nikisch did in order to render the Tannhäuser overture more electrifying than it already is as scored by the composer.

Yours very truly, Ross JUNGNICKEL.

"Has attracted so much attention of late in the musical world"
—Musical Times.

[52]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 25, 1895.

The Symphony Concert---Readings Brilliant and Powerful.

Spite of the fact that the vocalist of the concert was detained upon the stormy deep and that the programme was (with one exception) not of any great profundity, the concert of Saturday was one to awaken enthusiasm, for the readings were brilliant and powerful and the execution beyond criticism. The most abstruse number of the programme came first,—Brahms' "Tragic Overture." This was read with a breadth and majesty that fitted its earnest character. The work can never be a popular one; as Bulwar-Lytton would say, "It was not written for the common herd;" it falls short of the first movement of Brahms' first symphony in its development, but compared with Mendelssohn, whost Scotch Symphony came later, it is a miracle of thematic treatment. For all its title, (it is not intended to represent any especial tragedy) the overture is not very discordant or vehement but presents the loftier, less emotional, style of a Sophocles or Aeschylus; in fact one might readily imagine Brahms inspired by the tragic muse of the old Greeks in this grave composition, and its steady and unchanging rhythm, (it has scarcely any change of rhythm or tempo throughout) suggests that resistless fate which is so often pictured in the Hellenic plays. But the ordinary auditor craves a more direct picture, and seeks in vain for the martial clangor or the feminine pathos that would garnish a modern tragedy.

As Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke took the place of the still floating Miss Marie Brema at very short notice, she is in some degree hors concours, although she needed no excusing on this account, and the expected Wagner gold was changed into Gounod silver, the aria "Plus grand dans son Obscurite" taking the place of the great finale to "Goetterdaemmerung." The number was well sung, a certain slowness of enunciation, a dwelling on the consonants, and an exaggerated Gallic nasality being the chief faults.The tender passage, "Resigne-toi, non coeur, Oubliez," was most commendably given. As a second number Miss Clarke gave Bach's "My Heart ever Faithful," to which Mr. Schroeder gave a fine violoncello obligato, and Mr. Zach furnished the piano accompaniment. It is one of the odd resemblances in music, that Jensen's romantic "Murmuring Breeze" should begin with the same phrase as this ever-faithful heart. This song of the bright Whitsuntide has some of the repetitions which mar the old school, but it nevertheless shows the radical side of Bach quite thoroughly. What a bold stroke it was to send the leading tone down a major seventh instead of up a minor second in the final cadence! Bach was at times as bold as Wagner in his progressions, and the consecutive-fifth-hunter can find even these in Bach if he searches well. Miss Clarke received abundant applause after both of her numbers.

Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony is certainly the finest of his orchestral works, although the A major ("Italian") symphony may at times display greater contrapuntal device. It was most cordially welcomed by the audience on this occasion, and it received a performance that deserves a whole host of gilt-edged adjectives.

The exposition of themes in the first movement was magnificently clear, although the subsidiary passage of the chief theme was put in somewhat too brusque contrast. The repeat of the themes before the development was not cut, as is too often the fashion nowadays; the violoncello work in the development was splendid in its effect, not only because of its broad execution, but because of the careful balance of the other parts which might have obscured it. In this careful balancing of parts we have never had a more faithful conductor than Mr. Paur.

The Scherzo was a great delight. Mendelsshon was the king of all scherzo composers; Beethoven was grotesque and hearty in his scherzi, Schumann was quietly happy, but Mendelsshon alone caught up the true humor, the dainty playfulness without vulgarity that should characterize this movement; and he never wrote a finer one than this of the Scotch symphony. Best of it all, the theme is Scotch; almost all of the German composers have aimed at Scotch effects at one time or another, Beethoven, Schumann, Bruch, etc., but only Mendelssohn succeeded in catching the true lilt of Gaelic music without dropping either into the pentatonic scale or the hackneyed "Scotch snap" figure (a dotted eighth followed by the sixteenth.) The clarinette did excellent work in this theme, and it reminded one that Mendelssohn and Weber were the first two composers who perceived the full power of the clarinette, and especially in the spectral-colored lower register. Mozart and Beethoven while using the instrument freely never suspected the ghosts that walked in the lowest tones ("chalumeau register" they are called) of the instrument.

That Mendelssohn fully appreciated the dark color is abundantly shown by his using an A clarinette (the largest and deepest of the regular clarinettes) in passages where the C clarinette (a smaller and shriller-toned instrument) is generally used, writing its passages in E flat, (since it sounds a minor third deeper than it is written,) on this occasion. The unusual form of this scherzo is in its favor; instead of using the conventional song-form with contrasted Trio and return, the composer brings a concise but quite free rondo style into play and it suits the bright melody of the chief theme excellently. It did one good to hear such direct melody as is given in the adagio; one may shrug the shoulders and say "Bad Sunday Song without Words," "Sentimentality," as much as one pleases, but it is refreshing to hear such a tune in these dissonant, diminished seventh, days. Again the cellos covered themselves with glory.

The finale never had a better performance in Boston than on this occasion. Its martial character seemed to arouse all that was brilliant and dauntless in the conductor's nature, and the Ossianic prowess of it all was remarkable. The contrast of that lonely and pensive subtheme with the spirit of the chief theme is one of the finest touches in all Mendelssohn, and when it came in against a drone bass, just before the coda, clarinette and bassoon played it as if they loved it, as indeed everyone must who is musical. The loneliness of the Trossachs on an autumn evening rises to mind with its every praise. The broad hymn of thanksgiving which forms the coda to the work, beginning in the depths and rising with two repetitions to the full power of the orchestra, was taken a trifle fast for its best effect, but it went finely enough for all that. Oddly enough, just after this strong climax, Mendelssohn introduces a few phrases that are as cheap as a negro minstrel song, an instance of Homer nodding after a rhapsody. The appreciation of the symphony by the audience was evident and the spantaneity of the applause was unmistakeable.

The "Oberon" overture with which the concert ended was most brilliantly played but scarcely made as great an effect. Just as Mendelssohn made the clarinette his favorite, Weber chooses the horn as the instrument of his affection, and he never wrote an orchestral work without giving this instrument some prominent work. It would be an interesting subject to study the predilections of the great masters in the matter of instruments; Mozart loved the basset-horn and enjoyed the clarinette, but disesteemed the flute; Beethoven was never in better mood than when writing for the bassoon, but never used the English horn (the little trio, Op. 87, for various reasons does not count) and cared little for the trumpet and not at all for the harp; a study of the scoring of the masters brings out simiar points with each; there is always a favored child in the orchestral family.

All of Weber's orchestral works present more horns than a dilemma; but our horn-blowers must guard against over-blowing; the delicate effects of Weber suffer greatly if the tone begins to rasp as it sometimes does when forced beyond a certain limit. This defect was present, however, only in the first phrase, after which the quality was all that could have been desired. The working up of the climaxes, and Weber is a little theatrical in these, was as emphatic as could have been demanded, and the concert ended with a trifle of the glare of the footlights, which was not the fault of conductor or orchestra, but lay in the composition itself.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fifth Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, was as follows:

Brahms: Tragic Overture, opus 81.
Gounod: Aria from "La Reine de Saba."
Mendelssohn: Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch", opus 56.
Bach: Aria, "Mein gläubiges Herze."
Weber: Overture to "Oberon."
Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke was the singer.

Miss Marie Brema was announced on the programmes to sing Brünnhilde's great monologue from the third act of "Götterdämmerung," and two songs by Schumann and Schubert; but the late arrival of the Germanic in New York prevented her appearance. Miss Clarke took her place at only a few hours' notice.

Brahms's "Tragic Overture" was admirably played, in a way to bring its true beauty and greatness well home to the audience. What an ideally beautiful work it is! Brahms has here taken the term "tragic" in its exactest sense: not as implying a collection of horrors nor the ravings of frantic melodrama, but as fraught with all the ennobling and dignified associations of true tragedy.

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, too, went exceedingly well; the management of the varying shades of tempo in the first movement was capital; we have not always been able to agree with Mr. Paur in his modifications of tempo in works by the classic masters, and it is a pleasure to agree with him thoroughly in this instance. That neither he nor anyone else can instil much life and effectiveness into that all too weak coda to the finale, need hardly be said. The wonderful Scherzo—the movement in which Mendelssohn shows himself on a par with any great composer you please—made its usual brilliant impression.

Weber's "Oberon" overture, on the other hand, seemed to us to hang fire a little; it were hard to say just where the shoe pinched, but we have heard more brilliant performances of it.

Miss Clarke soon silenced all regrets at Miss Brema's non-appearance. It was a trying situation for a not very experienced singer to be placed in; but Miss Clarke fully rose to the emergency. She sang the Gounod aria admirably, in a grand, broad style, with great truth of expression, and a corresponding effect upon her hearers. No doubt the beauty of her voice was for much in this; but she has more to trust to than a sensuously beautiful organ; she has brains, schooling, and musical sense. Her singing of the Bach aria was also excellent; her tempo especially good—most sopranі take this air decidedly too slow. Bach marked it "Presto;" by which he, of course, did not mean what we understand by "Presto" nowadays; but he certainly could not have meant "slow" by it. It was unfortunate that, while the Franz score and parts to this air were reposing under their layer of dust in the library of the Harvard Musical Association, Miss Clarke had to sing it with pianoforte accompaniment, Mr. Schroeder, to be sure, playing the 'cello obbligato. But lack of time has to excuse much; and you cannot get anything out of the Harvard Musical before 2 P. M. As it was, one felt that more rehearsing (for which there was no time) would have brought the three performers—singer, 'cellist, and accompanist—to a somewhat better mutual understanding. Miss Clarke was very enthusiastically received by the audience, and recalled twice or thrice after each of her numbers. She richly deserved it.

The next programme is: Volkmann, Festival overture; Viotti, concerto for violin, No. 22, in A minor; Goetz, symphony in F major, opus 9; Bordin, "A Steppe-sketch from Central Asia;" d'Albert, prelude to "Der Rubin." Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the violinist.

The Musical Courier
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1895.

The fifth Symphony concert, Mr. Paur conductor, was given last evening in Music Hall. The program, which was changed in consequence of the non-appearance of Miss Brema, was as follows:

Tragic Overture.....Brahms
Aria, Queen of Sheba.....Gounod
Scotch Symphony.....Mendelssohn
My Heart Ever Faithful.....Bach
Overture, Oberon.....Weber

There is little to be said about this concert. The overture by Brahms was well played. The symphony was read in an honest, conventional, not highly poetic manner. The opening andante con moto was dragged out wearily, and the allegro that followed yawned at times. The overture to Oberon! A good overture, but is it necessary to hear this and its mates regularly each year, and at stated intervals, just as some people take sulphur and molasses in the spring, and put on heavy underclothes November 1?

I wish somebody would send Mr. Paur a list of modern orchestral compositions by Germans, Russians, Scandinavians and wicked Frenchmen. I've no doubt pieces by Americans are offered him weekly. But he prefers works without which no gentleman's library is complete.

Miss Caroline G. Clarke, who took Miss Brema's place at short notice, sang the aria from The Queen of Sheba with a display of considerable intelligence. She was less successful in the air by Bach, which is out of place in concerts of this nature.

* * *

The program of the Symphony concert Saturday will be Volkmann's Festival Overture; concerto for violin Viotti; Symphony, F major, Goetz; Dans les Steppes de l'Asie Centrale, Borodin; Prelude, Der Rubin, d'Albert (first time). Mr. Kneisel will be the soloist.

Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke was called upon at a few hours' notice to take Marie Brema's place at the Symphony concert in Cambridge on Thursday evening, and she also sang at the Friday afternoon rehearsal in Boston. After the aria from Gounod's Queen of Sheba Miss Clarke was recalled several times, the audience showing in every way their pleasure at her singing. This was particularly complimentary, as there was naturally a feeling of disappointment at Miss Brema's non-appearance, but Miss Clarke had a great success. It was not possible in either case to have any rehearsal. Miss Clarke will also sing at the Saturday evening concert.

Nikisch and the Tannhauser Overture.

Editors The Musical Courier:

I WAS very much interested in the account of your able Berlin correspondent, dated October 15, of the wonderful performance of the Tannhäuser overture at the hands of Mr. Nikisch at the first Berlin Philharmonic concert. If the article had been written by anyone else but Mr. Floersheim I would have taken no further notice of it, but coming from such an eminent critic, and referring to such a prominent work, I am convinced that a more concise explanation would be highly interesting to every thinking musician. Mr. Floersheim states: "In the finale of the overture, in the great massive fortissimo repetition of the Pilgrims' Chorus, there is a horn part which forms a perfect second voice to the trombones that carry the melody. This horn part hitherto was always covered by the trombones, and you could not hear it except in so far as it pertains to the general harmony of the structure. By doubling the horns, Mr. Nikisch succeeded in bringing out this underlying tenor voice, and the effect was so novel, beautiful and telling that the critics caught on to it, and it quickly became the subject of a most animated discussion."

Now all this reads very nicely, and I have little doubt that by doubling the horns, using eight, the harmony in the brass is greatly strengthened, and more in keeping with the immense power of the melody played by three trombones and three trumpets, but as to developing any important underlying tenor voice, forming a perfect second voice to the melody, that is quite another question. A careful perusal of the score fails to establish any second voice which could possibly receive prominence by such a treatment. The part in question consists of four voices, and strictly speaking one voice is as important as the other. Even if such a voice could be found, it is extremely doubtful in my mind whether the doubling of any one voice by a French horn could effect the united fortissimo efforts of three trombones and three trumpets.

I am confident that Mr. Floersheim would receive the thanks of a large number of orchestral conductors if he could further enlighten them as to just what Mr. Nikisch did in order to render the Tannhäuser overture more electrifying than it already is as scored by the composer.

Yours very truly, Ross JUNGNICKEL.

"Has attracted so much attention of late in the musical world"
—Musical Times.

...TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1895.

...STON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

...cond Concert of the Season, with an Interesting Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's second concert was given at Infantry Hall last evening. As at the first concert, the audience seemed somewhat larger than the symphony audiences of past seasons. The programme was a highly interesting and well nigh faultlessly played one; its order was as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major ("Eroica"),.....Ludwig van Beethoven.
I. Allegro con brio (E-flat major).
II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai (C minor).
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace (E-flat major).
Trio (E-flat major).
IV. Finale: Allegro molto (E-flat major).
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in F minor.....Frederic Chopin.
I. Maestoso (F minor).
II. Larghetto (A-flat major).
III. Allegro vivace (F minor).
a. Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps.....
b. Waltz of Sylphs.....Hector Berlioz.
(from "Damnation of Faust.")
Preludes to Acts I. and II. of "Guntram."...
.....Richard Strauss.
(First time.)

The soloist for the evening was Miss Antoinette Szumowska, a young Polish pianist, reported to be a pupil—or at least a protegee—of the famed Paderewski. The advent of a new soloist is always a matter to excite interest, and—when bringing such credentials—arouses a degree of expectation. It may be said at once that Miss Szumowska proved herself an artist in all that the term implies, and a welcome addition to the by no means overcrowded list of the world's foremost piano virtuosos. She has technic, temperament and musical feeling. It is of little value as a compliment to say nowadays of any instrumental performer that he or she possesses a finished technic, for any one aiming at a public career is presupposed to be equipped in that direction to the very limit of human endeavor. And yet there are different kinds of technic. Miss Szumowska's is of the sort that pleases by its perfection rather than of that which dazzles by pyrotechnic display or astounds by the successful storming of some apparently impregnable musical fortress. Her touch is tone-compelling; it resembles that of her famous countryman and reputed teacher, though it is safe to say she never learned it of him or any one else. For it is the one thing about piano playing that must be inborn and cannot be taught. Her scale and passage work was admirable in its accuracy, evenness and limpid effect. A keenly developed sense of rhythm was very apparent in her playing; she made her points without ever resorting to the so often abused rubato, and yet her interpretation of the concerto was a most refined and elegant one. It is impossible to say what reserve of power she may have, for her number was not one to call for the exhibition of force. But her performance was a thoroughly artistic and pleasing one. There was much applause, and Mr. Paur shook her warmly by the hand as she left the stage.

The instrumental novelty of the programme was the preludes to the first and second acts of Richard Strauss's new opera "Guntram." Music more difficult to describe than this has never been written. Mr. Apthorp, in his programme notes, frankly confesses himself unable to deal with the problem. Parts of it seemed to bear a family likeness to Berlioz's music of sylphs and gnomes which preceded it on the programme. At other times one was reminded of Wagner in those ecstatic moments when he congratulated himself upon his deliverance from all bonds of musical form or tradition. There were also hints of a circus band and of a Salvation Army parade. And when it is said that the result of this incongruous musical brew was calculated to please the carnal ear and stir the jaded sense, the whole story is told. It was played con amore by the orchestra, and Mr. Paur nearly had spasms.

The weird and charming music from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" was delightfully played. In these numbers the marvellous ability of the orchestra for delicate shading and finesse was given full opportunity for display. To bring out the full effect of such music a band of virtuosi is needed. Equally good was the performance of Beethoven's "heroic" symphony, with which the concert began, a careless slip by the kettle drummer near the close of the funeral march only serving to accentuate the otherwise magnificent playing. This third symphony is a work that resembles least of all its brethren the style which Beethoven inaugurated and usually followed. It contains more than a hint of the "music of the future," and one is led to wonder if Wagner did not learn somewhat from its perusal. To be sure the brass is used with the same moderation that characterizes all Beethoven's symphonies have the ninth, but in many ways the music is strongly suggestive of the modern school. It has never been better played here, though we have heard it several times at the Symphony concerts.

The audience was not only large, but fully awake to the splendid playing of the orchestra and pianist, and greeted every number with warm and prolonged applause. There will be no Symphony concert next month, the third concert taking place on the evening of Wednesday, Jan. 8.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1895.

SIXTH SYMPHONY.

Mr. Kneisel Plays Finely a Viotti Concerto.

The program of the Symphony concert last evening in Music Hall, Emil Paur, conductor, was as follows:

Prelude to "The Ruby".....d'Albert
(First time.)
Concerto for Violin No. 22, A minor..Viotti
Cadenza by Mr. Kneisel.
Symphony, F major, Op. 9.....Goetz
A Steppe-Sketch from Central Asia..Borodin
Festival Overture, F major, Op. 50.....
Volkmann

D'Albert's first opera, "The Ruby," was produced Oct. 12, 1893, at Carlsruhe. The story is a sort of fairy romance, and the scene is Bagdad. But as we know the prelude only by concert music, we have now nothing to do with that enchanted town, or with Soliman, the jeweler, or the fair Bedura, or Asaf, or Hakam, or Irad, or the Cadi. The impression made last evening was this: The prelude might well serve for preparation for the telling an Eastern tale. The first movement, which is developed largely, is full of color, which is more striking than the themes so richly embroidered. This movement seems to me the best part of the prelude; for there is no denying the extreme beauty of the harmonic progressions, or the gorgeousness of certain orchestral effects. Occasionally there is a wave of sound that seems to come straight from that sonorous sea, the prelude to "Parsifal." Yet there is much more that is indisputably the invention of d'Albert. The lively movement that follows is ingeniously scored, but it is not so distinguished as the first.

* * *

Mr. Kneisel, who was received with loud applause, played the 22d concerto of Viotti, one of the nine written for the Salomon concerts in London, at which Viotti appeared, sometimes with Haydn and Dussek. It is a fine old work, without caprice or affectation, abounding in the serenity of the old masters, far removed from the restlessness and pessimism of today. Some say that the instrumentation of this concerto, a favorite with Joachim, was composed by Cherubini; but I can find no substantial ground for believing this. Viotti and Cherubini lodged together in Paris for six years, and Sundays the concertos of the former were played to a small audience of friends, but this concerto was written undoubtedly in London. Mr. Kneisel played with exquisite smoothness and delicacy, with purity of tone and unfaltering technique. In a word his performance was eminently gentlemanly. His cadenza was in excellent taste and not too long. The warm and long continued applause was deserved.

And yet there is no reason to believe that Viotti played this concerto in such a manner. His contemporaries assure us that his performance was "grand, imposing, full-toned, amazing for its verve and its variety." He was a revolutionary. He drove out of fashion the sentimentalists and the fiddlers of the Jarnowich pattern. Nor does the music itself warrant invariable delicacy and sweetness which last night characterized continually the performance of Mr. Kneisel.

* * *

There were several errors in the sketch of Viotti given in the Program Book. Thus Viotti died March 3, 1824, not "March 10." It was in 1798, not "1793," that he was suspected most unjustly of being "an emissary of the Revolution." He lived near Hamburg till 1801, not "1795."

* * *

The "Steppe-Sketch" of Alexander Porphyriewitch Borodin was written in 1880 for a representation of tableaux vivants at the Theatre of St. Petersburg on the 25th anniversary of Alexander II. These tableaux were a succession of episodes in the history of Russia. When it was first played Solovieff sniffed at it, and said that a Russian theme and an Oriental theme walked arm-in-arm in a landscape painted by Félicien David. But the sketch was soon heard all over Europe, from Christiania to Monaco. And now the first measures of it are in the memorial mosaic in the convent of Alexander Newski, with themes of other works of this talented musician, who was known widely in the scientific world as a chemist, skilled in benzol, the transformation of azotic bodies, and the solidification of aldehydes; the inventor of the nitrometer; the founder with two others of the Woman's School of Medicine in St. Petersburg.

'Tis a fascinating bit of tone color, deliberately and pleasingly monotonous, suggesting thin, high air, weariness of man, and desolation of Nature. It was first performed at a Symphony concert Feb. 27, 1892.

* * *

The Symphony of Goetz has been heard here frequently. It was first played, if I am not mistaken, at a Harvard Musical Association concert, Jan. 15, 1880. It has been played at Symphony concerts March 19, 1887, Nov. 16, 1889, and Oct. 28, 1893. It is familiar, then, but familiarity does not lessen the freshness and the beauty of much of the intermezzo and the adagio. This symphony gave greater promise of a future for the composer than did his opera, "The Taming of the Shrew," which, for the most part, is a singularly unsympathetic treatment of the comedy as known to English-speaking people, for it is seldom frank and spontaneous; it is almost entirely without humor, and planned on too heroic scale. The orchestra was heard to great advantage in this symphony, as also in the pieces by d'Albert and Borodin. The solo work was admirable throughout, especially in horn, trumpet, clarinet and flute passages.

* * *

If the overture of Volkmann were rigorously cut down it might serve as a pinch for a theatre overture. It was first played at these concerts Jan. 4, 1890. There does not seem to be any reason why it should have been played again.

PHILIP HALE.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 1.

The Symphony Concert.

The Symphony Orchestra gave its sixth concert of the season last evening in Music Hall. The programme was:

Prelude to "The Ruby".....D'Albert
Concerto for violin, A minor, No. 22.....Viotti
Symphony in F major, op. 9.....Goetz
A Steppe-Sketch.....Borodin
Festival Overture, F major, op. 50.....Volkmann
Soloist, Mr. F. Kneisel.

The Goetz symphony has a double interest. It is good music in itself, and it is the work of a man who died at the age of thirty-six, many years before the fruits of promising talent had time to ripen. Of course there is the example of Mozart in the opposite direction; but one must not study the laws of planetary motion from the dazzling and imperious comet that is a law unto itself. The symphony gains and does not lose by repetition, and of how many modern works of the second forder of merit can this be said? The ideas are dignified, and they do not fade away into meaningless ornamentation. There is an absence of serenity, for the modern world has been robbed of the gift of appreciating beauty in repose, and takes its small griefs and passions as the measure of a large universe. Goetz's pessimism, however, is not of the rabid kind that requires bass tubas, kettledrums and cymbals to give it expression. His gloom is the shadow cast by sunlight, and not the blackness of unlighted chaos. The fine first movement is filled with large ideas and real emotion. It is brilliant in the art meaning of this word, that is brilliant from internal glow, and not from external meretricious ornament. The second movement is charming and original, and was faultlessly and lovingly interpreted by Mr. Paur and his orchestra. Here were the grace, cheerfulness and placidity of a poet artist. A modern symphony that maintains its charms after thirty years have passed over it is something tnat is worthy of note, and, perhaps in the midst of so many claimants Goetz was really the "coming" man; at least his early death was a misfortune to musical art which is in sad need of vitalizing ideas in the last years of our dying century.

Mr. Kneisel gave a delightful reading of the Viotti concerto; he was in full sympathy with his composer, and the virtuoso was never displayed at the expense of the musician. The great Viotti has not been spared by cruel time we cannot force ourselves into the enthusiastic worshipping attitude of his contemporaries, but he was a true musician on the old large model, and sometimes the light of inspiration is in his face. The concerto is fresh and beautiful as of the time when when the earth was younger, and composers could sit in the mellow sunlight gazing with conviction towards the land of pure ideal beauty. In this concerto is the serenity that modern composers have lost; it is old fashioned only as all the good things of earth are old fashioned, and one listens to it with a peaceful sigh and a contented heart. It is a most fascinating work, beautiful in its simplicity, and it was beautifully played by Mr. Kneisel who was in full sympathy with the composer, and did not produced a tone that was not in keeping with the subject. Sympathy with pure beauty and simplicity, exquisite legato playing, purity of tone, perfect taste, and a masterful technique are a few of the items of Mr. Kneisel's playing, and all there, were equally prominent in Mr. Kneisel's fine cadenza. No more artistic and gracious playing has been heard at theSymphony concerts,and the soloist was greeted with the heartest applause and recalled three times.

D'Albert's prelude is pretty and fanciful, brilliant and strong in promises that were not always realized. It is modern in the higher and lower meaning of the word, and won admiration without going deeper than the drum of the ear. The Borodin Sketch is another pretty work, the themes are spun out to an unnecessary length, but it is a work of sunlight and peace, and appeals most pleasantly to the imagination. The orchestra was in its happiest mood, and the catholic taste and rare experience of Mr. Paur were never shown to greater advantage. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Nature," Dvorak; Concerto for Pianoforte G-minor, No. 2, Saint-Saens; Overture,"Donna Diana," Reznicek; Symphony No. 1, B-flat major, Schumann. The soloist is Mr. Martinus Sieveking.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVIII., NO. 154.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Orchestra Has Never Before Reached as High a State of Efficiency.

Last night's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, the sixth in this season's series, presented the following interesting programme:

Prelude to "Der Rubin".....D'Albert
Concerto for violin, in A minor, No. 22..Viotti
Symphony, F major.....Goetz
Steepe Sketch from Central Asia.....Borodin
Fest overture, in F, op. 50.....Volkmann

The D'Albert prelude was heard for the first time. The slow movement with which it opens is graceful in effect, though not very clear in meaning. The second movement is a bright and spirited allegro, with a dazzling theme that is full of promise of something ear-pleasing and brilliant, but it is scarcely fairly under way when it ends abruptly and ineffectively. There is not much invention shown in the work, which is a cleverly pieced bit of patchwork of ideas suggested by other composers, but it is warmly and richly instrumented and with striking piquancy in the finale. It shows excellent musicianship in rgeard to the technique of the orchestra and in its harmonies, though in one or two places there are some hideously ugly suspensions which jar so roughly on the ear that even their resolutions scarcely relieve the uncomfortable impression the extreme discords have made. The work, which is abundant in difficulties, was smoothly and beautifully played, but it received no very great applause. The buoyant, fresh and melodious symphony, with its masterly instrumentation, its wealth of lovely themes exquisitely treated and its steadily sustained interest, wears well. It was finely read by Mr. Paur, especially in the opening allegro and in the fascinating intermezzo, and with a grace of color throughout that was charming. Its performance by the orchestra may be praised without qualification. The wood wind was heard to exceptional advantage in the intermezzo, and in the finale the brilliancy and vigor of the strings were never more convincingly impressive. It is made clearer and clearer at each succeeding concert that the orchestra has never reached as high a state of efficiency in regard to freedom of style, precision and large warmth of sentiment as it now manifests. The quaint, beautifully colored and strikingly original sketch by Borodin was read and played delightfully.

It was a genuine pleasure to hear a Viotti concerto again. The master's works have almost passed out of the concert room. Of the 29 concertos he wrote for the violin, and which made a new epoch in the music written for that instrument, the one given last evening is the only one that is still given in public. It is an excellent example of the composer at his best. Its themes are broad, chaste and tuneful, and a noble simplicity and dignified refinement mark the work as a whole. The adagio is of exquisite beauty. The instrumentation of the concerto is more solid and effective than is usual with the composer, and it was charged that Cherubini scored the work, but evidence in support of this was never brought forward. The more brilliant moments of the concerto offer no very trying difficulties to a master of modern violin technique, and yet they are not to be scorned. In their day the performance of these concertos was less valued for the cleverness of the finger work displayed by the player than it was for the breadth of style, the fulness of tone and the classical dignity of sentiment with which they were given. Mr. Kneisel, who was the soloist of the occasion, and who was received with hearty and prolonged applause, interpreted the work with a purity of taste and of feeling, and a grace of technique that left nothing to be desired in those essentials. Nothing could have been more tender and more impressive in regard to cantabile playing than was his performance of the adagio. Something more in largeness of tone and breadth and vigor of style would perhaps have been more in harmony with the traditions that survive of the manner of Viotti in playing his own music, but the performance was an eminently pleasing one, and obtained for the artist three enthusiastic recalls.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Nature," Dvorak; concerto for pianoforte in G minor, Saint-Saens; overture, "Donna Diana," Reznicek; symphony No. 1, Schumann. The soloist is to be Mr. Martinus Sieveking.

NEW-YORK TIMES, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 8, without revulsion. He is a relic of an age which delighted in male sopranos. Let him disappear at once and forever.

W. J. H.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Patrons of the concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera House will no doubt read with great surprise in the programme of the next concert, on Thursday evening, Dec. 19, the announcement that it is the thirteen hundred and thirty-seventh performance given by this how famous organization since its inception, fourteen years ago. No other similar organization in the world can duplicate this record. Of course there are European orchestras which have been in existence many more years, and the New-York Philharmonic Society, the parent orchestral organization of this country, has over fifty years to its credit, but the lesser number of concerts given annually so reduces the total number that the Boston Symphony Orchestra undoubtedly heads the list.

Seven hundred and nineteen performances have been given in Boston and 615 in 37 cities throughout the United States, from Maine to Minnesota. Cambridge, Mass., with a series of 97 concerts, which began the first year of the orchestra's existence, and which are given under the auspices of Harvard College, in its Memorial Hall, heads the list of cities visited. The programme for Dec. 19 is as follows:

Haydn.....Symphony No. 13
Bruch.....Scotch fantasy for violin
Tschaikowsky..Fantasia for orchestra, "Francesca da Rimini," op. 32.
(First time at these concerts.)
Strauss..Preludes to Acts I. and II., "Guntram"
Soloist: Mr. T. Adamowski.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Second Concert of the Season, with an Interesting Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's second concert was given at Infantry Hall last evening. As at the first concert, the audience seemed somewhat larger than the symphony audiences of past seasons. The programme was a highly interesting and well nigh faultlessly played one; its order was as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major ("Eroica"),... .....Ludwig van Beethoven.
I. Allegro con brio (E-flat major).
II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai (C minor).
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace (E-flat major). Trio (E-flat major).
IV. Finale: Allegro molto (E-flat major).
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in F minor.... ..... Frederic Chopin.
I. Maestoso (F minor).
II. Larghetto (A-flat major).
III. Allegro vivace (F minor).
a. Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps.....
b. Waltz of Sylphs.....Hector Berlioz. (from "Damnation of Faust.")
Preludes to Acts I. and II. of "Guntram."... .....Richard Strauss. (First time.)

The soloist for the evening was Miss Antoinette Szumowska, a young Polish pianist, reported to be a pupil—or at least a protegee—of the famed Paderewski. The advent of a new soloist is always a matter to excite interest, and—when bringing such credentials—arouses a degree of expectation. It may be said at once that Miss Szumowska proved herself an artist in all that the term implies, and a welcome addition to the by no means overcrowded list of the world's foremost piano virtuosos. She has technic, temperament and musical feeling. It is of little value as a compliment to say nowadays of any instrumental performer that he or she possesses a finished technic, for any one aiming at a public career is presupposed to be equipped in that direction to the very limit of human endeavor. And yet there are different kinds of technic. Miss Szumowska's is of the sort that pleases by its perfection rather than of that which dazzles by pyrotechnic display or astounds by the successful storming of some apparently impregnable musical fortress. Her touch is tone-compelling; it resembles that of her famous countryman and reputed teacher, though it is safe to say she never learned it of him or any one else. For it is the one thing about piano playing that must be inborn and cannot be taught. Her scale and passage work was admirable in its accuracy, evenness and limpid effect. A keenly developed sense of rhythm was very apparent in her playing; she made her points without ever resorting to the so often abused rubato, and yet her interpretation of the concerto was a most refined and elegant one. It is impossible to say what reserve of power she may have, for her number was not one to call for the exhibition of force. But her performance was a thoroughly artistic and pleasing one. There was much applause, and Mr. Paur shook her warmly by the hand as she left the stage.

The instrumental novelty of the programme was the preludes to the first and second acts of Richard Strauss's new opera, "Guntram." Music more difficult to describe than this has never been written. Mr. Apthorp, in his programme notes, frankly confesses himself unable to deal with the problem. Parts of it seemed to bear a family likeness to Berlioz's music of sylphs and gnomes which preceded it on the programme. At other times one was reminded of Wagner in those ecstatic moments when he congratulated himself upon his deliverance from all bonds of musical form or tradition. There were also hints of a circus band and of a Salvation Army parade. And when it is said that the result of this incongruous musical brew was calculated to please the carnal ear and stir the jaded sense, the whole story is told. It was played con amore by the orchestra, and Mr. Paur nearly had spasms.

The weird and charming music from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" was delightfully played. In these numbers the marvellous ability of the orchestra for delicate shading and finesse was given full opportunity for display. To bring out the full effect of such music a band of virtuosi is needed. Equally good was the performance of Beethoven's "heroic" symphony, with which the concert began, a careless slip by the kettle drummer near the close of the funeral march only serving to accentuate the otherwise magnificent playing. This third symphony is a work that resembles least of all its brethren the style which Beethoven inaugurated and usually followed. It contains more than a hint of the "music of the future," and one is led to wonder if Wagner did not learn somewhat from its perusal. To be sure, the brass is used with the same moderation that characterizes all Beethoven's symphonies have the ninth, but in many ways the music is strongly suggestive of the modern school. It has never been better played here, though we have heard it several times at the Symphony concerts.

The audience was not only large, but fully awake to the splendid playing of both orchestra and pianist, and greeted every number with warm and prolonged applause. There will be no Symphony concert next month, the third concert taking place on the evening of Wednesday, Jan. 8.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1895.

SIXTH SYMPHONY.

Mr. Kneisel Plays Finely a Viotti Concerto.

The program of the Symphony concert last evening in Music Hall, Emil Paur, conductor, was as follows:
Prelude to "The Ruby".....d'Albert
(First time.)
Concerto for Violin No. 22, A minor...Viotti
Cadenza by Mr. Kneisel.
Symphony, F major, Op. 9.....Goetz
A Steppe-Sketch from Central Asia..Borodin
Festival Overture, F major, Op. 50..... Volkmann

D'Albert's first opera, "The Ruby," was produced Oct. 12, 1893, at Carlsruhe. The story is a sort of fairy romance, and the scene is Bagdad. But as we know the prelude only by concert music, we have now nothing to do with that enchanted town, or with Soliman, the jeweler, or the fair Bedura, or Asaf, or Hakam, or Irad, or the Cadi. The impression made last evening was this: The prelude might well serve for preparation for the telling an Eastern tale. The first movement, which is developed largely, is full of color, which is more striking than the themes so richly embroidered. This movement seems to me the best part of the prelude; for there is no denying the extreme beauty of the harmonic progressions, or the gorgeousness of certain orchestral effects. Occasionally there is a wave of sound that seems to come straight from that sonorous sea, the prelude to "Parsifal." Yet there is much more that is indisputably the invention of d'Albert. The lively movement that follows is ingeniously scored, but it is not so distinguished as the first.

* * *

Mr. Kneisel, who was received with loud applause, played the 22d concerto of Viotti, one of the nine written for the Salomon concerts in London, at which Viotti appeared, sometimes with Haydn and Dussek. It is a fine old work, without caprice or affectation, abounding in the serenity of the old masters, far removed from the restlessness and pessimism of today. Some say that the instrumentation of this concerto, a favorite with Joachim, was composed by Cherubini; but I can find no substantial ground for believing this. Viotti and Cherubini lodged together in Paris for six years, and Sundays the concertos of the former were played to a small audience of friends, but this concerto was written undoubtedly in London. Mr. Kneisel played with exquisite smoothness and delicacy, with purity of tone and unfaltering technique. In a word his performance was eminently gentlemanly. His cadenza was in excellent taste and not too long. The warm and long continued applause was deserved.

And yet there is no reason to believe that Viotti played this concerto in such a manner. His contemporaries assure us that his performance was "grand, imposing, full-toned, amazing for its verve and its variety." He was a revolutionary. He drove out of fashion the sentimentalists and the fiddlers of the Jarnowich pattern. Nor does the music itself warrant invariable delicacy and sweetness which last night characterized continually the performance of Mr. Kneisel.

* * *

There were several errors in the sketch of Viotti given in the Program Book. Thus Viotti died March 3, 1824, not "March 10." It was in 1798, not "1793," that he was suspected most unjustly of being "an emissary of the Revolution." He lived near Hamburg till 1801, not "1795."

* * *

The "Steppe-Sketch" of Alexander Porphyriewitch Borodin was written in 1880 for a representation of tableaux vivants at the Theatre of St. Petersburg on the 25th anniversary of Alexander II. These tableaux were a succession of episodes in the history of Russia. When it was first played Solovieff sniffed at it, and said that a Russian theme and an Oriental theme walked arm-in-arm in a landscape painted by Félicien David. But the sketch was soon heard all over Europe, from Christiania to Monaco. And now the first measures of it are in the memorial mosaic in the convent of Alexander Newski, with themes of other works of this talented musician, who was known widely in the scientific world as a chemist, skilled in benzol, the transformation of azotic bodies, and the solidification of aldehydes; the inventor of the nitrometer; the founder with two others of the Woman's School of Medicine in St. Petersburg.

'Tis a fascinating bit of tone color, deliberately and pleasingly monotonous, suggesting thin, high air, weariness of man, and desolation of Nature. It was first performed at a Symphony concert Feb. 27, 1892.

* * *

The symphony of Goetz has been heard here frequently. It was first played, if I am not mistaken, at a Harvard Musical Association concert, Jan. 15, 1880. It has been played at Symphony concerts March 19, 1887, Nov. 16, 1889, and Oct. 28, 1893. It is familiar, then, but familiarity does not lessen the freshness and the beauty of much of the intermezzo and the adagio. This symphony gave greater promise of a future for the composer than did his opera, "The Taming of the Shrew," which, for the most part, is a singularly unsympathetic treatment of the comedy as known to English-speaking people, for it is seldom frank and spontaneous; it is almost entirely without humor, and planned on too heroic scale. The orchestra was heard to great advantage in this symphony, as also in the pieces by d'Albert and Borodin. The solo work was admirable throughout, especially in horn, trumpet, clarinet and flute passages.

* * *

If the overture of Volkmann were rigorously cut down it might serve as a pinch for a theatre overture. It was first played at these concerts Jan. 4, 1890. There does not seem to be any reason why it should have been played again.

PHILIP HALE.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 1.

The Symphony Concert.

The Symphony Orchestra gave its sixth concert of the season last evening in Music Hall. The programme was:

Prelude to "The Ruby".....D'Albert
Concerto for violin, A minor, No. 22.....Viotti
Symphony in F major, op. 9.....Goetz
A Steppe Sketch.....Borodin
Festival Overture, F-major, op. 50.....Volkmann
Soloist, Mr. F. Kneisel.

The Goetz symphony has a double interest. It is good music in itself, and it is the work of a man who died at the age of thirty-six, many years before the fruits of promising talent had time to ripen. Of course there is the example of Mozart in the opposite direction; but one must not study the laws of planetary motion from the dazzling and imperious comet that is a law unto itself. The symphony gains and does not lose by repetition, and of how many modern works of the second forder of merit can this be said? The ideas are dignified, and they do not fade away into meaningless ornamentation. There is an absence of serenity, for the modern world has been robbed of the gift of appreciating beauty in repose, and takes its small griefs and passions as the measure of a large universe. Goetz's pessimism, however, is not of the rabid kind that requires bass tubas, kettledrums and cymbals to give it expression. His gloom is the shadow cast by sunlight, and not the blackness of unlighted chaos. The fine first movement is filled with large ideas and real emotion. It is brilliant in the art meaning of this word, that is brilliant from internal glow, and not from external meretricious ornament. The second movement is charming and original, and was faultlessly and lovingly interpreted by Mr. Paur and his orchestra. Here were the grace, cheerfulness and placidity of a poet artist. A modern symphony that maintains its charms after thirty years have passed over it is something that is worthy of note, and, perhaps in the midst of so many claimants Goetz was really the "coming" man; at least his early death was a misfortune to musical art which is in sad need of vitalizing ideas in the last years of our dying century.

Mr. Kneisel gave a delightful reading of the Viotti concerto; he was in full sympathy with his composer, and the virtuoso was never displayed at the expense of the musician. The great Viotti has not been spared by cruel time we cannot force ourselves into the enthusiastic worshipping attitude of his contemporaries, but he was a true musician on the old large model, and sometimes the light of inspiration is in his face. The concerto is fresh and beautiful as of the time when when the earth was younger, and composers could sit in the mellow sunlight gazing with conviction towards the land of pure ideal beauty. In this concerto is the serenity that modern composers have lost; it is old fashioned only as all the good things of earth are old fashioned, and one listens to it with a peaceful sigh and a contented heart. It is a most fascinating work, beautiful in its simplicity, and it was beautifully played by Mr. Kneisel who was in full sympathy with the composer, and did not produced a tone that was not in keeping with the subject. Sympathy with pure beauty and simplicity, exquisite legato playing, purity of tone, perfect taste, and a masterful technique are a few of the items of Mr. Kneisel's playing, and all there, were equally prominent in Mr. Kneisel's fine cadenza. No more artistic and gracious playing has been heard at theSymphony concerts,and the soloist was greeted with the heartest applause and recalled three times.

D'Albert's prelude is pretty and fanciful, brilliant and strong in promises that were not always realized. It is modern in the higher and lower meaning of the word, and won admiration without going deeper than the drum of the ear. The Borodin Sketch is another pretty work, the themes are spun out to an unnecessary length, but it is a work of sunlight and peace, and appeals most pleasantly to the imagination. The orchestra was in its happiest mood, and the catholic taste and rare experience of Mr. Paur were never shown to greater advantage. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Nature," Dvorak; Concerto for Pianoforte G-minor, No. 2, Saint-Saens; Overture,"Donna Diana," Reznicek; Symphony No. 1, B-flat major, Schumann. The soloist is Mr. Martinus Sieveking.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVIII., NO. 154.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Orchestra Has Never Before Reached as High a State of Efficiency.

Last night's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, the sixth in this season's series, presented the following interesting programme:

Prelude to "Der Rubin".....D'Albert
Concerto for violin, in A minor, No. 22..Viotti
Symphony, F major.....Goetz
Steepe Sketch from Central Asia.....Borodin
Fest overture, in F, op. 50.....Volkmann

The D'Albert prelude was heard for the first time. The slow movement with which it opens is graceful in effect, though not very clear in meaning. The second movement is a bright and spirited allegro, with a dazzling theme that is full of promise of something ear-pleasing and brilliant, but it is scarcely fairly under way when it ends abruptly and ineffectively. There is not much invention shown in the work, which is a cleverly pieced bit of patchwork of ideas suggested by other composers, but it is warmly and richly instrumented and with striking piquancy in the finale. It shows excellent musicianship in rgeard to the technique of the orchestra and in its harmonies, though in one or two places there are some hideously ugly suspensions which jar so roughly on the ear that even their resolutions scarcely relieve the uncomfortable impression the extreme discords have made. The work, which is abundant in difficulties, was smoothly and beautifully played, but it received no very great applause. The buoyant, fresh and melodious symphony, with its masterly instrumentation, its wealth of lovely themes exquisitely treated and its steadily sustained interest, wears well. It was finely read by Mr. Paur, especially in the opening allegro and in the fascinating intermezzo, and with a grace of color throughout that was charming. Its performance by the orchestra may be praised without qualification. The wood wind was heard to exceptional advantage in the intermezzo, and in the finale the brilliancy and vigor of the strings were never more convincingly impressive. It is made clearer and clearer at each succeeding concert that the orchestra has never reached as high a state of efficiency in regard to freedom of style, precision and large warmth of sentiment as it now manifests. The quaint, beautifully colored and strikingly original sketch by Borodin was read and played delightfully.

It was a genuine pleasure to hear a Viotti concerto again. The master's works have almost passed out of the concert room. Of the 29 concertos he wrote for the violin, and which made a new epoch in the music written for that instrument, the one given last evening is the only one that is still given in public. It is an excellent example of the composer at his best. Its themes are broad, chaste and tuneful, and a noble simplicity and dignified refinement mark the work as a whole. The adagio is of exquisite beauty. The instrumentation of the concerto is more solid and effective than is usual with the composer, and it was charged that Cherubini scored the work, but evidence in support of this was never brought forward. The more brilliant moments of the concerto offer no very trying difficulties to a master of modern violin technique, and yet they are not to be scorned. In their day the performance of these concertos was less valued for the cleverness of the finger work displayed by the player than it was for the breadth of style, the fulness of tone and the classical dignity of sentiment with which they were given. Mr. Kneisel, who was the soloist of the occasion, and who was received with hearty and prolonged applause, interpreted the work with a purity of taste and of feeling, and a grace of technique that left nothing to be desired in those essentials. Nothing could have been more tender and more impressive in regard to cantabile playing than was his performance of the adagio. Something more in largeness of tone and breadth and vigor of style would perhaps have been more in harmony with the traditions that survive of the manner of Viotti in playing his own music, but the performance was an eminently pleasing one, and obtained for the artist three enthusiastic recalls.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Nature," Dvorak; concerto for pianoforte in G minor, Saint-Saens; overture, "Donna Diana," Reznicek; symphony No. 1, Schumann. The soloist is to be Mr. Martinus Sieveking.

NEW-YORK TIMES, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 8, without revulsion. He is a relic of an age which delighted in male sopranos. Let him disappear at once and forever.

W. J. H.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Patrons of the concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera House will no doubt read with great surprise in the programme of the next concert, on Thursday evening, Dec. 19, the announcement that it is the thirteen hundred and thirty-seventh performance given by this now famous organization since its inception, fourteen years ago. No other similar organization in the world can duplicate this record. Of course there are European orchestras which have been in existence many more years, and the New-York Philharmonic Society, the parent orchestral organization of this country, has over fifty years to its credit, but the lesser number of concerts given annually so reduces the total number that the Boston Symphony Orchestra undoubtedly heads the list.

Seven hundred and nineteen performances have been given in Boston and 615 in 37 cities throughout the United States, from Maine to Minnesota. Cambridge, Mass., with a series of 97 concerts, which began the first year of the orchestra's existence, and which are given under the auspices of Harvard College, in its Memorial Hall, heads the list of cities visited. The programme for Dec. 19 is as follows:

Haydn.....Symphony No. 13
Bruch.....Scotch fantasy for violin
Tschaikowsky..Fantasia for orchestra, "Francesca da Rimini," op. 32.
(First time at these concerts.)
Strauss..Preludes to Acts I. and II., "Guntram"
Soloist: Mr. T. Adamowski.

---

[53]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 1, 1895.

There was a good deal of variety in the sixth Symphony programme, and yet the general effect was decidedly monochromatic—probably because of the insistent domination of the tonalities of A, F and C. A divergence into some remoter key would have been welcome, even if it had come with less good cheer than pervaded most of the selections. The absolute novelty of the concert came first. This was the prelude to Eugen d'Albert's fairy-tale opera, "The Ruby," which was produced at Carlsruhe a couple of years ago. It apparently becomes its position well, because it is for the most part soft, dreamy and lingering in theme and rather ecstatic than exciting in its highest developments. The primary themes are sweet and smooth, presented at first with great simplicity, but afterwards embedded in rich, warm, harmonious instrumentation, throughout which the harp is prominent and many bits of phrase are delivered in pure obbligato. There is a brief episode of gayer mood, but this soon melts back into the slower and more tranquil mood of the opening. Other orchestral numbers were Goetz's interesting and encouraging symphony in F, with its irregular but fascinating intermezzo, its romantic adagio, and its inspiriting allegros; Borodin's quaint Central Asian sketch, wherein, as in the "Desert" of David, the vast plain's palpitating uniformity is hinted in the steady vibrant tones of the violins, while the songs of one and another people are heard in the distance, approach, blend and pass away; and finally Volkmann's "Festival" overture, energetic, jubilant and effective.

For most of the audience surely the gem of the programme was the twenty-second violin concerto of Giovanni Battista Viotti, which was chosen by Mr. Kneisel for his solo number. Although a hundred years old or more, the high-born spirit, flowing melody and elegant finish of this concerto make it seem younger and fresher than many a work of these present days. The love of music as an art and not as an argument pervades it, and its three movements are in turn gently gay, delicately melancholy and naturally brilliant. The whole glides on with perfect apparent ease; but the observant will constantly recognize passages which only a master of the violin could have written and only a virtuoso could play.

Mr. Kneisel read it all exquisitely, with growing freedom and animation for the quick movements, and for the slow one more depth of tender feeling than he is wont to show. Of course his performance was perfect in such technical details as pure intonation, limpid harmonics and absolutely clear execution. His own cadenza was appropriate, intricate and masterly.

The seventh programme names Dvorak's "Nature" overture, Reznicek's overture "Donna Diana" and Schumann's first symphony. The soloist is not yet announced.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 1, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme served up to the Symphony patrons last night was of a thoroughly cosmopolitan character, somewhat longer than usual, but withal very interesting. For the opening number the audience listened to the prelude to D'Albert's "The Ruby." The composition is of a rather quiet order in the early measures, the united horns and trumpets being given considerable prominence. In the middle of the number a rapid change takes place. The tempo becomes more rapid, and, in fact, the whole character of the composition is changed. This portion shows rich and full orchestration, and with the quick dance movement which shows itself now and again, renders it extremely interesting. Mr. Paur and his band gave it a most adequate rendering, and all its beauties were brought out with beautiful effect.

After this came the works of three composers who are not often heard at these concerts, Viotti, Goetz and Borodin. On this occasion the concerto in A minor of the first named composer was given with Mr. Kneisel as the soloist. The concerto is in three movements and is one of the best ever written by this prince of composers for the violin. Mr. Kneisel seemed to be particularly at home in this number and did it and himself great credit. All his tones were true and well defined and his use of the bow is always to be admired. In fact, this favorite violinist has seldom played any better than on this occasion, and he was rewarded with several recalls.

Goetz's symphony in F major was next on the programme. Of the four movements the second (intermezzo) is by far the most popular, and last night it was given with much spirit, the dainty, tripping passages being played exquisitely by the orchestra. "A Steppe: Sketch for Central Asia," by Borodin, and the festival overture by Volkmann completed the programme, and neither is particularly interesting, although well played.

For next week's concert the soloist will be Mr. Martinus Sieveking.

SUNDAY, DEC. 1, 1895.

Franz Kneisel Soloist at Yesterday's Symphony.

The program of the sixth Symphony concert was sufficiently weighty and lengthy to please the most ardent admirer of substantial music. That a portion of the patrons of these concerts, however, disapprove of having the program extended beyond the usual length was shown by the promptness with which a large number of people left the hall after the lapse of the hour and a half, the limit of time to which they have trained themselves to be absorbed in classic melody.

An exodus such as that which preceded the performance of the last number Friday afternoon must have been as amazing to conductor Paur as it was to the majority of the audience, who wished to hear the full program. It is noticeable that those who leave the hall before the end of the concert are often the same people who make a practice of entering after the concert has begun, and squeezing into their seats regardless of the comfort of their neighbors.

Mr Franz Kneisel was the soloist last evening. He was greeted with great heartiness, and his playing was rewarded by enthusiastic applause. Mr Kneisel is probably the ablest of resident violinists; he is unquestionably the most popular among the more intelligent of local music patrons. He is a thorough artist, conscientious and intelligent in his interpretations and unaffected in manner. His annual appearance as a soloist with the Symphony orchestra is a welcome event, as is proven by the increased size and enthusiasm of the audience.

His selection yesterday was Viotti's concerto for violin in A minor, No. 22, a work that is rarely played in these days. It is a scholarly composition and rightly deserves the esteem in which it has long been held as a classic for the violin. It is, however, an excessively elaborated work, and contains very little melody that appeals to popular taste. But it affords excellent opportunities for display of the performer's virtuosity, and for this reason, if no other, it was very acceptable to the audience.

Mr Kneisel's performance was of even excellence. He played the most intricate passages with splendid skill and accuracy of execution. The less elaborately-developed portions of the work were given with much expression, and the performance, as a whole, was remarkable for purity and breadth of tone, beauty of phrasing and refinement of finish.

The audience was especially delighted with the cadenza and its performance. It is of Mr Kneisel's own composition, and is fascinatingly brilliant in its wealth of complicated scales, bewildering runs and trills and captivating harmonic effects.

Hermann Goetz' symphony in F major was admirable played by the orchestra under Mr Paur's intelligent direction. The first movement is very long, and at times almost wearisome in its excessive repetition and over elaboration. The second movement, intermezzo, on the contrary, sparkles with melodious and brilliant orchestral effects, and is thoroughly original in its themes and their development. The horns and wood wind instruments, which are given prominence in this movement, were finely played. The third and fourth movements are interesting, and the former is notable for some odd effects in the figural variations of the first theme.

The prelude to the fairy opera "The Ruby," by Eugene d'Albert was heard here for the first time, and made a rather favorable impression. The themes are dainty and fanciful, occasionally brilliant and always interesting. The orchestration is exceedingly rich and almost all the instruments of the modern orchestra are used.

"A Steppe Sketch from Central Asia," by Alexander Borodin, is an odd bit of descriptive music, thoroughly oriental in character, and it received capital interpretation from the orchestra. Robert Volkmann's festival overture was the final number on the program, and was played with splendid spirit.

The program for the next rehearsal and concert will include: Overture, "Nature," Dvorak; overture, "Donna Diana," Reznicek and symphony No. 1, in B flat major, Schumann. There will also be other selections, and a soloist, to be announced later.

MONDAY, DEC. 2, 1895.

BOSTON STANDARD.

It is a pleasant contrast to look from such a brainless audience to the solid music-loving gathering that crowds the same hall on Saturday evening for the Symphony orchestra concert. One is forcibly reminded to be thankful that there is a rehearsal of the same performance given Friday afternoons, when that same matinee element may abound and not disturb the Saturday night houses.

The Symphony programme Saturday evening was:

Prelude to "The Ruby".....D'Albert
Concerto for violin, in A Minor, No. 22...Viotti
Symphony, F major.....Goetz
Steppe sketch from Central Asia.....Borodin
Fest overture, in F, op. 50.....Volkmann

In the rendering of this programme the orchestra showed, as it never has before, how steeped it is in the genius of the various works it is called to perform, each player seeming, as well, perfectly in sympathy with Conductor's Paul's careful readings, and the leader in turn seeming to have the full breadth of the composer's conception well in mind. Mr. Kneisel was the soloist of the evening, and gave genuine pleasure to the most sensitive musical ear in his interpretation of the Viotti concerto. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Nature," Dvorak; concerto for pianoforte in G minor, Saint-Saens; overture, "Donna Diana," Reznicek; symphony No. 1, Schumann. The soloist is to be Mr. Martinus Sieveking.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the sixth Symphony Concert was as follows:

Eugen d'Albert: Prelude to "Der Rubin." (First time.)
Viotti: Concerto for violin, No. 22, in A minor. (Cadenza by Mr. Kneisel.)
Goetz: Symphony in F major, opus 9.
Borodin: "Eine Steppen-Skizze aus Mittel-Asien."
Volkmann: Festival Overture in F major, opus 50.
Mr. Franz Kneisel was the violinist.

Save for Mr. Kneisel's playing, it might have been called an "off night." It may be posited as almost axiomatic that no symphony programme should be without at least one work by a really first-class man; by Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Brahms, or Wagner. It may also be posited that the better part of every programme, or at least half of it, should be tolerably familiar to the audience. This curiously drawn-up programme complied with neither of these conditions. There was not one great number on it, and it was all unfamiliar. Time was once when Goetz's symphony was familiar to Boston audiences; but that was twenty or twenty-five years ago; it has been virtually forgotten since then.

D'Albert's prelude to "Der Rubin" is a euphonious work, pleasant to listen to, and full of gorgeous orchestral effects and impressive modulations. The quick middle movement seems rather confusedly scored—recalling Berlioz in its general tone-color, but quite lacking his clearness—but the orchestration of the rest is masterly. It is, upon the whole, an agreeable rather than an inspiring work; for one thing, if d'Albert writes this sort of prelude to a "fairy opera," what in heaven's name has he left for a tragic opera in the grand style? It was admirably played, only Mr. Paur's tempo struck us as unimaginably slow. The thing is marked "Langsam," but not "Sehr langsam."

Goetz's symphony well shows the difference between half-developed genius and mere routine cleverness, between real musical creation and "Kapellmeistermusik." True genius is apparent in the work, but also considerable immaturity. It seems to us that the Intermezzo alone is worth preserving. It was excellently well played.

In his "Steppe-Sketch from Central Asia" Borodin seems to have fallen into a not very uncommon artistic error. He has forgotten how very differently quite similar conditions may affect the eye, on the one hand, and the ear on the other. A "naturalistic" canvass picture of a desert may be very sublime; an equally "naturalistic" tone-picture of the same is a terrible bore. We can hardly find this symphonic poem of his very tedious indeed.

Volkmann's overture is Kapellmeistermusik in its fullest bloom. Why rake up a composition of this sort? It does no one any good; least of all, the composer's memory.

Mr. Kneisel made a happy choice in the Viotti concerto. The great difficulty with the other concerts of great violinists (and not entirely great composers) has generally been the finales. These finales are generally cast in the mould of the Haydn rondo; but they, as a rule, lack Haydn's vitality and perennial strength, and sound simply antiquated and dull nowadays. But the final rondo of this concerto of Viotti's is a perfect little gem; full of life, invention, grace, and vigor, and most deliciously scored for the orchestra. Indeed, the whole concerto is a work to be spoken of with more than respect. Mr. Kneisel played it positively superbly; one does not care to ransack the dictionary for adjectives to apply to anything so thoroughly right as his playing of this charming work. It showed the composition just as it is, exhausting all its possibilities. His cadenza to the first movement was a masterpiece in its way; it is extremely seldom that one finds so harmonious an intermarriage between modern violin technique and bravura and the classical musical spirit. His playing of it was the perfection of brilliancy.

The next programme is: Dvorak, overture, "In der Natur;" Saint-Saens, pianoforte concerto No. 2, in G minor; Reznicek, overture to "Dona Diana;" Schumann, symphony No. 1, in B-flat major. Mr. Martinus Sieveking will be the pianist.

The Boston Traveler

MONDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1895.

The Sixth Symphony Concert.

Fifteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; sixth concert. Mr. Franz Kneisel, soloist. The programme:

Prelude to "The Ruby. (First time.)
Eugen d'Albert
Concerto for Violin No. 22, in A minor, cadenza by Mr. Kneisel..Giovanni Battista Viotti
Symphony in F major, op. 9....Hermann Goetz
A Steppe-Sketch from Central Asia,
Alexander Borodin
Festival Overture in F major, op. 50,
Robert Volkmann

The concert erred not on the score of respectability; on the other hand it did not stir the pulse in the least degree. The only novelty was Eugene D'Albert's prelude to "The Ruby," his fairy opera written in 1893. This prelude is gorgeously scored and its effect suggests vastness rather than oriental magic. An occasional touch of the later Wagner style is discernible, but the work is very characteristic, nevertheless. In the quick movement there is a deal of dainty melody and clever counterpoint writing. The prelude received splendid treatment from the orchestra.

Whenever Mr. Kneisel appears as soloist in Music Hall, regret that he has not more power and breadth is inevitable. With a proper amount of fire to combine with his extraordinary refinement, he would, in truth, be a great violinist. He played the sunny Vitotti concerto with the great delicacy and beauty of tone that we always expect from him. But even this genial and somewhat antiquated music has more inherent force than was given it.

The Goetz symphony, with its one thoroughly likeable movement, the Borodin programme piece and the Volkmann overture are all familiar and none very remarkable. They were played in a style that admits of no criticism whatever.

W. D. QUINT.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1895.

It will sound almost like fiction to read in the programme of the next concert in New-York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera House on Thursday evening, December 19, that it is the 1,337th performance of this organization since its founding, fourteen years ago. Yet this remarkable total is a fact and establishes a record that probably cannot be duplicated in the world. Some of the older European orchestras have been in existence many more years, and our New-York Philharmonic Society, the parent orchestral organization of this country, can show more than fifty years to its credit, but the lesser number of concerts given annually so reduces the total number that the Boston Symphony Orchestra undoubtedly heads the list. Seven hundred and nineteen performances have been given in Boston and 615 in thirty-seven cities throughout the United States, from Maine to Minnesota. Cambridge, Mass., with a series of ninety-seven concerts, which began the first year of the orchestra's existence and which are given under the auspices of Harvard College in their Memorial Hall, heads the list of cities visited, which we append below with the total number of concerts given in each city:

Cambridge	97	New-Bedford	8
Philadelphia	49	Detroit	7
Providence	47	St. Louis	6
New-York	44	Columbus	6
Washington	44	Springfield, Mass.	6
Brooklyn	42	Lowell	6
Baltimore	35	Fitchburg	6
Worcester	25	Milwaukee	5
Portland, Me.	22	Lynn	5
New-Haven	21	Ann Arbor University	4
Chicago	16	Rochester, N. Y.	3
Buffalo	15	Taunton	3
Pittsburg	13	Newport, R. I.	3
Cleveland	10	Richmond, Va.	2
Louisville	10	Grand Rapids	2
Salem, Mass.	10	Norwich, Conn.	2
Fall River	10	Lawrence	2
Cincinnati	9	Haverhill	2
Hartford	8	Syracuse	2

St. Paul, Minneapolis, Toledo, Albany, Erie, Melrose, Lewiston and Wakefield, one each. With such a remarkable grand total of performances given there is naturally unlimited opportunity for detailed statistics of the greatest variety. Lack of space prevents an extended array of figures, but attention is called to the fact that, assuming an average of five selections for each concert, there have been between 6,000 and 7,000 numbers performed. Over one thousand soloists have appeared, something over one-half of them singers, and the balance divided among pianists, violinists and violoncellists. As the Boston Symphony Orchestra is an organization founded and maintained by a private citizen, it has always been the policy of the management to refrain from the publication of any financial details, but it is safe to assert that even the most moderate average receipts would result in an enormous sum of money expended in the patronage bestowed upon these concerts. Seventeen States are represented in the list of cities given above, excellent evidence that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now a National organization.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.,

MONDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1895.

HUNDREDS OF CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Has Given Over 1300 Performances.

It will seem somehing like a reminiscence of the "oldest inhabitant" to read in the programme of the next concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 16, that it is the thirteen hundred and thirty-fourth performance by this popular organization since its debut fourteen years ago. This remarkable total is, however, a fact which is established beyond doubt, and it is a record which cannot be equalled by any other similar organization in the world. There are orchestras in Europe who have existed many years longer, and our own New York Philharmonic Society, the parent orchestral organization of this country, has already over fifty years to its credit; but the lesser number of concerts given annually so reduces the total number that the Boston Symphony Orchestra undoubtedly heads the list.

Seven hundred and nineteen performances have been given in Boston and six hundred and fifteen in thirty-seven cities throughout the United States, from Maine to Minnesota. Allotting to Cambridge, Mass., the first place on the list of cities visited, with a record of ninety-seven concerts given under the auspices of Harvard College in their Memorial Hall, Philadelphia comes next, with a total of forty-nine, which includes the performance of December 16. Appended is a list of the cities visited, with the total number of performances given in each city:

Cambridge, 97; Philadelphia, 49; Providence, 47; New York, 44; Washington, 44; Brooklyn, 42; Baltimore, 35; Worcester, 25; Portland, Me., 22; New Haven, 21; Chicago, 16; Buffalo, 15; Pittsburg, 13; Cleveland, 10; Louisville, 10; Salem, Mass., 10; Fall River, 10; Cincinanti, 9; Hartford, 8; New Bedford, 8; Detroit, 7; St. Louis, 6; Columbus, 6; Springfield, Mass., 6; Lowell, 6; Fitchburg, 6; Milwaukee, 5; Lynn, 5; Ann Arbor University, 4; Rochester, N. Y., 3; Taunton, 3; Newport, R. I., 3; Richmond, Va., 2; Grand Rapids, 2; Norwich, Conn., 2; Lawrence, 2; Haverhill, 2; Syracuse, 2; St. Paul, Minneapolis, Toledo, Albany, Erie, Melrose, Lewiston and Wakefield, one each.

Assuming an average of five selections for each concert, there have been between six and seven thousand numbers performed. Over one thousand soloists have appeared, something over one-half of them singers and the balance divided among pianists, violinists and violoncellists.

Seventeen States are represented in the list of cities given above, excellent evidence that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now a national organization.

[54]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 1, 1895.

There was a good deal of variety in the sixth Symphony programme, and yet the general effect was decidedly monochromatic—probably because of the insistent domination of the tonalities of A, F and C. A divergence into some remoter key would have been welcome, even if it had come with less good cheer than pervaded most of the selections. The absolute novelty of the concert came first. This was the prelude to Eugen d'Albert's fairy-tale opera, "The Ruby," which was produced at Carlsruhe a couple of years ago. It apparently becomes its position well, because it is for the most part soft, dreamy and lingering in theme and rather ecstatic than exciting in its highest developments. The primary themes are sweet and smooth, presented at first with great simplicity, but afterwards embedded in rich, warm, harmonious instrumentation, throughout which the harp is prominent and many bits of phrase are delivered in pure obbligato. There is a brief episode of gayer mood, but this soon melts back into the slower and more tranquil mood of the opening. Other orchestral numbers were Goetz's interesting and encouraging symphony in F, with its irregular but fascinating intermezzo, its romantic adagio, and its inspiriting allegros; Borodin's quaint Central Asian sketch, wherein, as in the "Desert" of David, the vast plain's palpitating uniformity is hinted in the steady vibrant tones of the violins, while the songs of one and another people are heard in the distance, approach, blend and pass away; and finally Volkmann's "Festival" overture, energetic, jubilant and effective.

For most of the audience surely the gem of the programme was the twenty-second violin concerto of Giovanni Battista Viotti, which was chosen by Mr. Kneisel for his solo number. Although a hundred years old or more, the high-born spirit, flowing melody and elegant finish of this concerto make it seem younger and fresher than many a work of these present days. The love of music as an art and not as an argument pervades it, and its three movements are in turn gently gay, delicately melancholy and naturally brilliant. The whole glides on with perfect apparent ease; but the observant will constantly recognize passages which only a master of the violin could have written and only a virtuoso could play. Mr. Kneisel read it all exquisitely, with growing freedom and animation for the quick movements, and for the slow one more depth of tender feeling than he is wont to show. Of course his performance was perfect in such technical details as pure intonation, limpid harmonics and absolutely clear execution. His own cadenza was appropriate, intricate and masterly.

The seventh programme names Dvorak's "Nature" overture, Reznicek's overture "Donna Diana" and Schumann's first symphony. The soloist is not yet announced.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 1, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme served up to the Symphony patrons last night was of a thoroughly cosmopolitan character, somewhat longer than usual, but withal very interesting. For the opening number the audience listened to the prelude to D'Albert's "The Ruby." The composition is of a rather quiet order in the early measures, the united horns and trumpets being given considerable prominence. In the middle of the number a rapid change takes place The tempo becomes more rapid, and, in fact, the whole character of the composition is changed. This portion shows rich and full orchestration, and with the quick dance movement which shows itself now and again, renders it extremely interesting. Mr. Paur and his band gave it a most adequate rendering, and all its beauties were brought out with beautiful effect.

After this came the works of three composers who are not often heard at these concerts, Viotti, Goetz and Borodin. On this occasion the concerto in A minor of the first named composer was given with Mr. Kneisel as the soloist. The concerto is in three movements and is one of the best ever written by this prince of composers for the violin. Mr. Kneisel seemed to be particularly at home in this number and did it and himself great credit. All his tones were true and well defined and his use of the bow is always to be admired. In fact, this favorite violinist has seldom played any better than on this occasion, and he was rewarded with several recalls.

Goetz's symphony in F major was next on the programme. Of the four movements the second (intermezzo) is by far the most popular, and last night it was given with much spirit, the dainty, tripping passages being played exquisitely by the orchestra. "A Steppe Sketch for Central Asia," by Borodin, and the festival overture by Volkmann completed the programme, and neither is particularly interesting, although well played.

For next week's concert the soloist will be Mr. Martinus Sieveking.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC. 1, 1895.

Franz Kneisel Soloist at Yesterday's Symphony.

The program of the sixth Symphony concert was sufficiently weighty and lengthy to please the most ardent admirer of substantial music. That a portion of the patrons of these concerts, however, disapprove of having the program extended beyond the usual length was shown by the promptness with which a large number of people left the hall after the lapse of the hour and a half, the limit of time to which they have trained themselves to be absorbed in classic melody.

An exodus such as that which preceded the performance of the last number Friday afternoon must have been as amazing to conductor Paur as it was to the majority of the audience, who wished to hear the full program. It is noticeable that those who leave the hall before the end of the concert are often the same people who make a practice of entering after the concert has begun, and squeezing into their seats regardless of the comfort of their neighbors.

Mr Franz Kneisel was the soloist last evening. He was greeted with great heartiness, and his playing was rewarded by enthusiastic applause. Mr Kneisel is probably the ablest of resident violinists; he is unquestionably the most popular among the more intelligent of local music patrons. He is a thorough artist, conscientious and intelligent in his interpretations and unaffected in manner. His annual appearance as a soloist with the Symphony orchestra is a welcome event, as is proven by the increased size and enthusiasm of the audience.

His selection yesterday was Viotti's concerto for violin in A minor, No. 22, a work that is rarely played in these days. It is a scholarly composition and rightly deserves the esteem in which it has long been held as a classic for the violin. It is, however, an excessively elaborated work, and contains very little melody that appeals to popular taste. But it affords excellent opportunities for display of the performer's virtuosity, and for this reason, if no other, it was very acceptable to the audience.

Mr Kneisel's performance was of even excellence. He played the most intricate passages with splendid skill and accuracy of execution. The less elaborately-developed portions of the work were given with much expression, and the performance, as a whole, was remarkable for purity and breadth of tone, beauty of phrasing and refinement of finish.

The audience was especially delighted with the cadenza and its performance. It is of Mr Kneisel's own composition, and is fascinatingly brilliant in its wealth of complicated scales, bewildering runs and trills and captivating harmonic effects.

Hermann Goetz' symphony in F major was admirable played by the orchestra under Mr Paur's intelligent direction. The first movement is very long, and at times almost wearisome in its excessive repetition and over elaboration. The second movement, intermezzo, on the contrary, sparkles with melodious and brilliant orchestral effects, and is thoroughly original in its themes and their development. The horns and wood wind instruments, which are given prominence in this movement, were finely played. The third and fourth movements are interesting, and the former is notable for some odd effects in the figural variations of the first theme.

The prelude to the fairy opera "The Ruby," by Eugene d'Albert was heard here for the first time, and made a rather favorable impression. The themes are dainty and fanciful, occasionally brilliant and always interesting. The orchestration is exceedingly rich and almost all the instruments of the modern orchestra are used.

"A Steppe Sketch from Central Asia," by Alexander Borodin, is an odd bit of descriptive music, thoroughly oriental in character, and it received capital interpretation from the orchestra. Robert Volkmann's festival overture was the final number on the program, and was played with splendid spirit.

The program for the next rehearsal and concert will include: Overture, "Nature," Dvorak; overture, "Donna Diana," Reznicek and symphony No. 1, in B flat major, Schumann. There will also be other selections, and a soloist, to be announced later.

MONDAY, DEC. 2, 1895.

BOSTON STANDARD.

It is a pleasant contrast to look from such a brainless audience to the solid music-loving gathering that crowds the same hall on Saturday evening for the Symphony orchestra concert. One is forcibly reminded to be thankful that there is a rehearsal of the same performance given Friday afternoons, when that same matinee element may abound and not disturb the Saturday night houses.

The Symphony programme Saturday evening was:

Prelude to "The Ruby".....D'Albert
Concerto for violin, in A Minor, No. 22...Viotti
Symphony, F major.....Goetz
Steppe sketch from Central Asia.....Borodin
Fest overture, in F, op. 50.....Volkmann

In the rendering of this programme the orchestra showed, as it never has before, how steeped it is in the genius of the various works it is called to perform, each player seeming, as well, perfectly in sympathy with Conductor's Paul's careful readings, and the leader in turn seeming to have the full breadth of the composer's conception well in mind. Mr. Kneisel was the soloist of the evening, and gave genuine pleasure to the most sensitive musical ear in his interpretation of the Viotti concerto. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Nature," Dvorak; concerto for pianoforte in G minor, Saint-Saens; overture, "Donna Diana," Reznicek; symphony No. 1, Schumann. The soloist is to be Mr. Martinus Sieveking.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the sixth Symphony Concert was as follows:

Eugen d'Albert: Prelude to "Der Rubin." (First time.)
Viotti: Concerto for violin, No. 22, in A minor. (Cadenza by Mr. Kneisel.)
Goetz: Symphony in F major, opus 9.
Borodin: "Eine Steppen-Skizze aus Mittel-Asien."
Volkmann: Festival Overture in F major, opus 50.
Mr. Franz Kneisel was the violinist.

Save for Mr. Kneisel's playing, it might have been called an "off night." It may be posited as almost axiomatic that no symphony programme should be without at least one work by a really first-class man; by Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Brahms, or Wagner. It may also be posited that the better part of every programme, or at least half of it, should be tolerably familiar to the audience. This curiously drawn-up programme complied with neither of these conditions. There was not one great number on it, and it was all unfamiliar. Time was once when Goetz's symphony was familiar to Boston audiences; but that was twenty or twenty-five years ago; it has been virtually forgotten since then.

D'Albert's prelude to "Der Rubin" is a euphonious work, pleasant to listen to, and full of gorgeous orchestral effects and impressive modulations. The quick middle movement seems rather confusedly scored—recalling Berlioz in its general tone-color, but quite lacking his clearness—but the orchestration of the rest is masterly. It is, upon the whole, an agreeable rather than an inspiring work; for one thing, if d'Albert writes this sort of prelude to a "fairy opera," what in heaven's name has he left for a tragic opera in the grand style? It was admirably played, only Mr. Paur's tempo struck us as unimaginably slow. The thing is marked "Langsam," but not "Sehr langsam."

Goetz's symphony well shows the difference between half-developed genius and mere routine cleverness, between real musical creation and "Kapellmeistermusik." True genius is apparent in the work, but also considerable immaturity. It seems to us that the Intermezzo alone is worth preserving. It was excellently well played.

In his "Steppe-Sketch from Central Asia" Borodin seems to have fallen into a not very uncommon artistic error. He has forgotten how very differently quite similar conditions may affect the eye, on the one hand, and the ear on the other. A "naturalistic" canvass picture of a desert may be very sublime; an equally "naturalistic" tone-picture of the same is a terrible bore. We can hardly find this symphonic poem of his very tedious indeed.

Volkmann's overture is Kapellmeistermusik in its fullest bloom. Why rake up a composition of this sort? It does no one any good; least of all, the composer's memory.

Mr. Kneisel made a happy choice in the Viotti concerto. The great difficulty with the other concerts of great violinists (and not entirely great composers) has generally been the finales. These finales are generally cast in the mould of the Haydn rondo; but they, as a rule, lack Haydn's vitality and perennial strength, and sound simply antiquated and dull nowadays. But the final rondo of this concerto of Viotti's is a perfect little gem: full of life, invention, grace, and vigor, and most deliciously scored for the orchestra. Indeed, the whole concerto is a work to be spoken of with more than respect. Mr. Kneisel played it positively superbly; one does not care to ransack the dictionary for adjectives to apply to anything so thoroughly right as his playing of this charming work. It showed the composition just as it is, exhausting all its possibilities. His cadenza to the first movement was a masterpiece in its way; it is extremely seldom that one finds so harmonious an intermarriage between modern violin technique and bravura and the classical musical spirit. His playing of it was the perfection of brilliancy.

The next programme is: Dvorak, overture, "In der Natur;" Saint-Saens, pianoforte concerto No. 2, in G minor; Reznicek, overture to "Dona Diana;" Schumann, symphony No. 1, in B-flat major. Mr. Martinus Sieveking will be the pianist.

The Boston Traveler

MONDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1895.

The Sixth Symphony Concert.

Fifteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; sixth concert. Mr. Franz Kneisel, soloist. The programme:

Prelude to "The Ruby. (First time.)
Eugen d'Albert
Concerto for Violin No. 22, in A minor, cadenza by Mr. Kneisel. Giovanni Battista Viotti
Symphony in F major, op. 9....Hermann Goetz
A Steppe-Sketch from Central Asia.
Alexander Borodin
Festival Overture in F major, op. 50,
Robert Volkmann

The concert erred not on the score of respectability; on the other hand it did not stir the pulse in the least degree. The only novelty was Eugene D'Albert's prelude to "The Ruby," his fairy opera written in 1893. This prelude is gorgeously scored and its effect suggests vastness rather than oriental magic. An occasional touch of the later Wagner style is discernible, but the work is very characteristic, nevertheless. In the quick movement there is a deal of dainty melody and clever counterpoint writing. The prelude received splendid treatment from the orchestra.

Whenever Mr. Kneisel appears as soloist in Music Hall, regret that he has not more power and breadth is inevitable. With a proper amount of fire to combine with his extraordinary refinement, he would, in truth, be a great violinist. He played the sunny Vitotti concerto with the great delicacy and beauty of tone that we always expect from him. But even this genial and somewhat antiquated music has more inherent force than was given it.

The Goetz symphony, with its one thoroughly likeable movement, the Borodin programme piece and the Volkmann overture are all familiar and none very remarkable. They were played in a style that admits of no criticism whatever.

W. D. QUINT.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1895.

It will sound almost like fiction to read in the programme of the next concert in New-York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera House on Thursday evening, December 19, that it is the 1,337th performance of this organization since its founding, fourteen years ago. Yet this remarkable total is a fact and establishes a record that probably cannot be duplicated in the world. Some of the older European orchestras have been in existence many more years, and our New-York Philharmonic Society, the parent orchestral organization of this country, can show more than fifty years to its credit, but the lesser number of concerts given annually so reduces the total number that the Boston Symphony Orchestra undoubtedly heads the list. Seven hundred and nineteen performances have been given in Boston and 615 in thirty-seven cities throughout the United States, from Maine to Minnesota. Cambridge, Mass., with a series of ninety-seven concerts, which began the first year of the orchestra's existence and which are given under the auspices of Harvard College in their Memorial Hall, heads the list of cities visited, which we append below with the total number of concerts given in each city:

Cambridge	97	New-Bedford	8
Philadelphia	49	Detroit	7
Providence	47	St. Louis	6
New-York	44	Columbus	6
Washington	44	Springfield, Mass.	6
Brooklyn	42	Lowell	6
Baltimore	35	Fitchburg	6
Worcester	25	Milwaukee	5
Portland, Me.	22	Lynn	5
New-Haven	21	Ann Arbor University	4
Chicago	16	Rochester, N. Y.	3
Buffalo	15	Taunton	3
Pittsburg	13	Newport, R. I.	3
Cleveland	10	Richmond, Va.	2
Louisville	10	Grand Rapids	2
Salem, Mass.	10	Norwich, Conn.	2
Fall River	10	Lawrence	2
Cincinnati	9	Haverhill	2
Hartford	8	Syracuse	2

St. Paul, Minneapolis, Toledo, Albany, Erie, Melrose, Lewiston and Wakefield, one each. With such a remarkable grand total of performances given there is naturally unlimited opportunity for detailed statistics of the greatest variety. Lack of space prevents an extended array of figures, but attention is called to the fact that, assuming an average of five selections for each concert, there have been between 6,000 and 7,000 numbers performed. Over one thousand soloists have appeared, something over one-half of them singers, and the balance divided among pianists, violinists and violoncellists. As the Boston Symphony Orchestra is an organization founded and maintained by a private citizen, it has always been the policy of the management to refrain from the publication of any financial details, but it is safe to assert that even the most moderate average receipts would result in an enormous sum of money expended in the patronage bestowed upon these concerts. Seventeen States are represented in the list of cities given above, excellent evidence that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now a National organization.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.,

MONDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1895.

HUNDREDS OF CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Has Given Over 1300 Performances.

It will seem something like a reminiscence of the "oldest inhabitant" to read in the programme of the next concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 16, that it is the thirteen hundred and thirty-fourth performance by this popular organization since its debut fourteen years ago. This remarkable total is, however, a fact which is established beyond doubt, and it is a record which cannot be equalled by any other similar organization in the world. There are orchestras in Europe who have existed many years longer, and our own New York Philharmonic Society, the parent orchestral organization of this country, has already over fifty years to its credit; but the lesser number of concerts given annually so reduces the total number that the Boston Symphony Orchestra undoubtedly heads the list.

Seven hundred and nineteen performances have been given in Boston and six hundred and fifteen in thirty-seven cities throughout the United States, from Maine to Minnesota. Allotting to Cambridge, Mass., the first place on the list of cities visited, with a record of ninety-seven concerts given under the auspices of Harvard College in their Memoriti Hall, Philadelphia comes next, with a total of forty-nine, which includes the performance of December 16. Appended is a list of the cities visited, with the total number of performances given in each city:

Cambridge, 97; Philadelphia, 49; Providence, 47; New York, 44; Washington, 44; Brooklyn, 42; Baltimore, 35; Worcester, 25; Portland, Me., 22; New Haven, 21; Chicago, 16; Buffalo, 15; Pittsburg, 13; Cleveland, 10; Louisville, 10; Salem, Mass., 10; Fall River, 10; Cincinanti, 9; Hartford, 8; New Bedford, 8; Detroit, 7; St. Louis, 6; Columbus, 6; Springfield, Mass., 6; Lowell, 6; Fitchburg, 6; Milwaukee, 5; Lynn, 5; Ann Arbor University, 4; Rochester, N. Y., 3; Taunton, 3; Newport, R. I., 3; Richmond, Va., 2; Grand Rapids, 2; Norwich, Conn., 2; Lawrence, 2; Haverhill, 2; Syracuse, 2; St. Paul, Minneapolis, Toledo, Albany, Erie, Melrose, Lewiston and Wakefield, one each.

Assuming an average of five selections for each concert, there have been between six and seven thousand numbers performed. Over one thousand soloists have appeared, something over one-half of them singers and the balance divided among pianists, violinists and violoncellists.

Seventeen States are represented in the list of cities given above, excellent evidence that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now a national organization.

[54]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 2, 1895.

Ideal Programme at Symphony Concert---Points of Interest.

To say that the programme was an ideal one is by no means to say that we enjoyed each one of its numbers, but various schools were represented and each number had its raison d'etre, and its special points of interest. There was D'Albert to show that the moderns have the thunderbolts of Jove in the grand orchestra and do not know what to do with them; there was Goetz to show that beautiful symphonies can exist even in our own times; there was Borodin for outlandish folk-music and Volkmann for a festive climax, as well as Viotti to give a trifle of an old-fashioned and a Chesterfieldian flavor to the proceedings.

D'Albert's prelude to "Der Rubin" was richer in scoring than in ideas. All its rich instrumentation did not suffice to hide its barrenness. Yet it was eminently proper to present such a work, for it shows some of the modern tendencies of composition, and particularly those which obtain in Young Germany. The composer throughout seems afraid of making an ordinary progression; he will not modulate from the tonic to the dominant without gathering in a few augmented fifths or hideous suspensions by the way. Most of the dissonances are put in with malice aforethought, to show how frightful one can make music sound and yet have it technically correct; it is about as artistic as a boy making faces to show how ugly he can make himself. The composer has succeeded in his self-imposed task, and has produced some moments of the most acute cacophony.

Mr. Kneisel is so much a favorite in Boston that the public would flock to hear him play even the Kreutzer exercises, and therefore it was not unexpected to find great enthusiasm following his performance of Viotti's violin concerto in A minor (No. 22), the only one of the numerous compositions for the violin by this old virtuoso that still holds its place upon the repertoire; yet one could as easily have become excited over Richardson's "Pamela" in literature as over this portrayal of the conservative old times of music. It was a tremendous contrast with the D'Albert struggles which had preceded it. If not exciting, it was clear, chaste and serene, and Mr. Kneisel's performance of it was absolutely classical in its repose and steadiness. The cadenza at the close of the first movement was modern enough (probably Mr. Kneisel's own composition), and was an effective placing of the modern technique against the older school of virtuosity. Here one found almost everything that is difficult,—harmonics, double-stopping, chromatic runs, skips, and dashing glissando effects, and all was given with such brilliancy that some of the audience began their applause before the orchestra had finished the movement, and were reproved for their excess of zeal by the older concert-goers.

There was a holy calm in the slow movement which was very delightful after the latterday turbulence, and in this Mr. Kneisel's pure and sufficiently broad tone was especially effective.

The finale was "Agitato Assai," but Viotti's agitation was not more furious than D'Albert's tranquility, it was a mild and placid agitation, like an oyster in a rage. Its end, however, again brought forth some brilliant points of technique and roused the audience to great and most spontaneous applause, Mr. Kneisel being recalled again and again. Now followed Goetz's beautiful symphony (his solitary large instrumental work) which was exquisitely played, sounding better than ever before. Poor Goetz! The world starved him out and killed him during the "fatal thirties," the decade that also proved fatal to Schubert, Mozart, and a host of other great composers. It is a singular fact that many of the masters died between their thirtieth and fortieth year, and also that, this dangerous decade once passed, the great musicians seemed to have a good chance at longevity. Possibly the explanation may be found in the fact that it is generally a fight with the wolf at the door for the rising composer, until forty, and after that he frequently enjoys the fruits of victory. Goetz did not enjoy these fruits; when this very symphony was played in Vienna they sent for the composer to come out of Switzerland and listen to the performance of his work; he wrote back, declining the invitation because of previous engagements, preferring not to publish the fact that he could not afford the railroad fare, and the latest years of his short life are full of equally pathetic incidents, of concerts given where he should have been abed and in the nurse's hands, of fearful hemorrhages brought on even in the green-room because of exertion in performance. And yet this symphony is full of grace and daintiness, never morbid or gloomy in its thoughts. Every part of it is unforced, natural, limpid. What a lesson this man would have taught to the dissonance-mongers had he lived! One can truly apply to him the epitaph that was written for Schubert,—"Fate has buried here a rich possession but yet greater promises."

There is much that is Mendelssohnian in the work, but it is a more modern Mendelssohn; and like Mendelssohn too, we find Goetz enjoying the flute more than the average composer does; in the first and second movements he gives important work to this instrument, and the flute deserves praise for the execution of their important passages. The horns, too, have some prominent passages; in the first movement there was a slip in their work, but in the second, in which their calls give a most effective forest color to the opening theme, they did excellent execution. This second movement, an intermezzo, might well call the fairy scenes in "Midsummer Night's Dream" to mind; fragrant woods and fairy figures are in every

The Adagio contains a wonderfully broad duet between violins and violoncellos, with pizzicato contrabass accompaniment, and this was performed in a manner that made one proud of the orchestra. One must also mention the beautiful clarinette passages in this movement; the clarinettes have never been as strong in our orchestra as they are at present.

The Finale, is to our thinking, the least successful movement of the symphony. It is an "Allegro con Fuoco," and the fiery element was pretty thoroughly quenched in Goetz's nature. The style however, very soon dropped from impetuosity into suavity, and the melodic style of the composer reasserted itself before the close. The symphony was most cordially received by the public.

"Scratch a Russian and you'll find a Tartar." Borodin needed but little scratching to reveal the Oriental that was in him. In "A Steppe-sketch in Central Asia," which followed, one finds a mixture of Vodki and Hasheesh, but it is a striking bit of programme music, nevertheless. Felicien David pictures the expanse of the desert wih prolonged tones of violin, Mendelssohn shows a desolate flat sea, to our ears (in "Becalmed at Sea and Prosperous Voyage") by a sustained A on the violins, and Borodin gives us similar prolonged notes, only now they typify a Steppe more boundless than an American prairie. Yet there is no plagiarism in the matter, only a certain familiarity of color, just as the long crescendo and following diminuendo recall many compositions from Beethoven's Turkish March ("Ruins of Athens") to the "Turkish Patrol." The theme given by English horn is striking and the pizzicato tread of the horses and camels in the caravan is effective enough, as is also the skilful intertwining of the two themes in the later part of the work.

With Volkmann's "Festival Overture" the concert ended. The work is not as excellent as the composer's two symphonies, but everything that Volkmann has written is worthy of respectful attention. He is always clear and concise, his works always being free from padding, and his climaxes are always well worked up. The work lost nothing in Mr. Paur's reading, which was massive and powerful and especially grandiose in the final apotheosis of the theme. The violins did some most brilliant work in the latter part of this overture, but we have come to take marvellous technique from them as a matter of course. Altogether a most fiery ending to an interesting, varied and at the same time educational, programme.

Louis C. Elson.

Sunday Herald
Baltimore
Dec 13.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The next concert in Baltimore by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Music Hall, on Wednesday evening, December 18, will be the 1,336th performance of this celebrated organization since its foundation, 14 years ago. In this record there enter no "Class A and Class B," "70 and 90 footer," or "two and three-year-old" fine distinctions, but rather the sweeping statement that no other similar organization in the world can show such a record. Some of the older European orchestras can show many more years of existence, and the New York Philharmonic Society, the parent orchestral organization of this country, can boast of its rising 50 years; but the lesser number of concerts given annually so reduces the total number that the Boston Symphony Orchestra undoubtedly heads the list with its grand total.

Seven hundred and nineteen performances have been given in Boston, and 615 in 37 cities throughout the United States from Maine to Minnesota. Cambridge, Mass., with a series of 97 concerts, which began the first year of the orchestra's existence, and which are given under the auspices of Harvard College in their Memorial Hall, heads the list of cities visited. Appended below is the total number of concerts given in each city:

Cambridge, 97; Philadelphia, 49; Providence, 47; New York, 44; Washington, 44; Brooklyn, 42; Baltimore, 35; Worcester, 25; Portland, Me., 22; New Haven, 21; Chicago, 16; Buffalo, 15; Pittsburg, 13; Cleveland, 10; Louisville, 10; Salem, Mass., 10; Fall River, 10; Cincinnati, 9; Hartford, 8; New Bedford, 8; Detroit, 7; St. Louis, 6; Columbus, 6; Springfield, Mass., 6; Lowell, 6; Fitchburg, 6; Milwaukee, 5; Lynn, 5; Ann Arbor University, 4; Rochester, N. Y., 3; Taunton, 3; Newport, R. I., 3; Richmond, Va., 2; Grand Rapids, 2; Norwich, Conn., 2; Lawrence, 2; Haverhill, 2; Syracuse, 2; St. Paul, Minneapolis, Toledo, Albany, Erie, Melrose, Lewiston and Wakefield, 1 each.

With such a remarkable grand total of performance given there is naturally unlimited opportunity for detailed statistics of the greatest variety. Lack of space prevents an extended array of figures, but attention is called to the fact that, assuming an average of five selections for each concert, there have been between 6,000 and 7,000 numbers performed. Over 1,000 soloists have appeared, something over one-half of them singers, and the balance divided among pianists, violinists and violoncellists.

As the Boston Symphony Orchestra is an organization founded and maintained by a private citizen, it has always been the policy of the management to refrain from the publication of any financial details, but it is safe to assert that even the most moderate average receipts would result in an enormous sum of money expended in the patronage bestowed upon these concerts.

Seventeen states are represented in the list of cities given above, excellent evidence that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now a national organization.

The soloist for the next concert here will be Franz Ondricek, the famous violinist who, since his recent coming to this country, has created a furore in musical circles. The programme for the concert is as follows:

Haydn.....Symphony No. 13.
Bruch.....Concerto for violin, No. 1.
(a) Handel.....Largo.
(b) Mozart.....Turkish March.
Tschaikowsky....Fantasia for Orchestra, "Francesca da Rimini," Op. 32.
(First time at these concerts.)

BALTIMORE AMERICAN
DECEMBER 1, 1895.

FASHION IN MUSIC.

Is It a Fad to Set Out Grand Orchestral Performances?

From form to fashion is a step which the fair Ophelia has, by suggestion, made easy, if, like a crab, we go backward. There are few people, says the musical critic in the libretto of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who dislike to consider anything so—what shall we call it?—say, frivolous as fashion in connection with the fine arts. Indeed, fashion has come in for little less than hard words from the seriously-inclined art-lover, although the art-purveyor often knows its value as well as another. Wagner has been especially hard on it, and has done his best to rope in Beethoven as a not-to-be-despised auxiliary in the fight against fashion.

It may safely be premised that fashion is something which the upright composer had best not to take into account at all. With the pot-boiling composer it is, naturally, quite another matter; he must follow Fashion with a milliner's sedulousness, bowing ingratiatingly in her train, while washing his hands with invisible soap—less for the sake of keeping them clean than for that of propitiating the goddess. One could wish, however, that great performers—those who really desire to be called great—would take a leaf out of the upright composer's book, and follow Fashion a little less nonchalantly than they sometimes do.

For one thing, their programs would show something more of enlivening variety. One often wonders how it can be that pianists, for instance, so persist in playing the same things all the world over. Is it possible that the great composers, the di majores of the musical Olympus, who gave to the world upwards of a hundred—sometimes over two hundred—opus-numbers apiece, have shown themselves to be really concert-worthy only in from half a dozen to a dozen of their pianoforte compositions? One of the husbands in la Poudre aux Yeux (inimitable comedy!) complains that it is all very well to subscribe to an opera box for two days in the week, but that he would really like it better if it were not "toujours Rigoletto." Well I can remember the time in Boston when we (especially we critics, who have to listen) should have liked it better if it had not been toujours Waldstein sonata—not to mention toujours some other things, by other composers, great and small. That reign of the Waldstein sonata looked very like a fashion, and like little else.

But this is not all. After Joseffy has played the Waldstein sonata, Rosenthal has played the Waldstein sonata, well-nigh all the big bugs have played the Waldstein sonata—what next? Why, here come little Tom, Dick and Harry, and, one and all, play the Waldstein sonata at their come-out recitals. Now, do these small fry of the pianoforte play the Waldstein sonata simply because they have just been fired on by vaulting ambition? H'm! Is it not rather on the principle on which, after seeing a tall, slim, graceful young woman look beautiful (if preposterous) in huge puffed sleeves and bell skirts the short, chunky and no longer young woman can not rest until she has made herself to look preposterous (without looking beautiful) in similar attire? Has not sheer Fashion had something to do with it? Come, lay your hands upon your hearts, and say it is not so.

Again, take the general style of performance at any given epoch in musical history—say, the present day. Think you that it is all owing to pure "modernity of feeling"? I don't. I am pretty sure Fashion has a great deal to do with it. When a famous man plays Beethoven or Mozart with Chopinesque rubatos or Lisztian-Magyar instability of tempo, do you imagine it is all from "modernity of feeling"? I do not see how it well can be. If a man is not an absolute crowbar of emotional inflexibility, he cannot possibly feel Beethoven just in the same way he feels Chopin or Liszt; it can't be done. Please don't bring up Rubinstein, for he is the rock upon which all general principles dash themselves to pieces. Rubinstein had to obey his own genius; when a man comes along with Rubinstein's weight of genius, it will be time to talk. People nowadays play Beethoven and Mozart like Chopin or Liszt, because that style of playing is the fashion, and they either won't or can't be unfashionable. The great people follow the fashion, and the small fry follow them—in most cases, unthinkingly.

As for the influence of Fashion—not specifically musical fashion, this time, but fashion schlechtweg—upon the public at large, and their relations to the art of music, that has been commented on to a considerable extent. And I cannot say that I quite agree with the cynical views of some persons on this subject. We are at times asked to believe that hosts of people go to concerts simply because such concerts are the fashion. This might be an all-sufficient reason for their going once or twice; but all through a season, and year in year out? No. Least of all would it explain their staying through a concert when they had once got there. Fashion is powerful, but not so all-powerful as that!

Baltimore
American
Dec 1895

The concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Baltimore will be the thirteen hundred and thirty-sixth performance given by this famous organization since its inception, fourteen years ago. In this respect the Symphony Orchestra holds the world's record. The soloist is Mr. Frank Ondricek. Mr. Emil Paur is conductor, his predecessors being George Henschel, Wilhelm Gericke, A. Nikisch. The performers number eighty-seven.

[55]

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVIII., NO. 161.
SUNDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1895.

DELIGHTED WITH SIEVEKING.

The Symphony Audience Recalls Him Again and Again.

In the Saint-Saens Concerto He Shows Himself a Pianist of Exceptional Power—Reznicek's "Donna Diana" a Thoroughly Charming Work—An Interesting Programme.

An exceptionally interesting programme was played at last night's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, which, by the way, was, according to the programme book, the 717th performance of the orchestra in Boston, and the 1130th performance, counting the concerts, given here and elsewhere by the organization since its formation 14 years ago. The selections last evening were:

Overture, "Nature".....Dvorak
(First time.)
Concerto for pianoforte, G minor, No. 2,...
Saint-Saens
Overture to "Donna Diana".....Reznicek
(First time.)
Symphony No. 1, B flat.....Schumann

The soloist was M. Martin Sieveking. Of the two novelties the "Donna Diana" overture is the more attractive. It is a brilliant and thoroughly charming work, overflowing with animation, sparkling in its orchestration, delightful in the variety and the warmth of its coloring, and possessed of an original individuality fairly fascinating. It is wholly modern in treatment, but it bubbles over with melody, and is a genuine bit of refined and artistic musical comedy. It is strikingly ingenious in the use the composer has made of its leading themes in subordinate positions, and its gayety is unbroken from the first bar to the last.

Reznicek is a Viennese and is not yet 35 years old, but he has already written three or four operas and a requiem mass, in addition to a large quantity of other music, vocal and instrumental, all of which is said to be marked by strong originality and fluent in graceful and dignified melody. This overture was read and played in a manner that brought out its many beautiful points, notably its effervescent piquancy, with inspiring effectiveness. Its success with the audience was immediate and enthusiastic.

The Dvorak overture, on the other hand, is dull and labored; a curious mingling of pretentiousness and commonplace, and it meanders aimlessly on its way long after what little interest it may have by reason of its rich and skilful orchestration is exhausted. There are some few moments of vigorous power, and the work is free from the extremes of modern extravagance in search of tone color, but on the whole it is without inspiration, and despite the assistance which its title is doubtless intended to afford in regard to the story it tells, is without apparent meaning. Were is not for the flavor that is given it by the instrumentation, its almost silly and tiresome garrulity, anent nothing in particular, would be exasperating. It has every aspect of a pot-boiler, made to order and is quite unworthy the composer. A remarkably strong and thoughtful reading of the Schumann symphony, which was magnificently played from beginning to end, brought one of the most attractive concerts of the season to a fitting close.

Mr. Sieveking's performance of the Saint-Saens concerto showed him to be a pianist of rare ability. He has a beautiful technique, a clean and unerring musical touch, and he plays with fine intelligence and perfect ease. He is without affectations, is not a victim to the wiles of rubato in its irritating excesses, and his style has nothing of sugary sentimentality. On the contrary, his playing is frank, straightforward and artistic in the best sense of the word, and has the distinction of healthy virility. The player never comes between the music and its hearers with displays of disturbing peculiarities of eccentric individuality. In other words, he is an artist to whom it was a constant pleasure to listen. His finger work is exquisite in its certainty and its finish. His use of the pedals is masterly. Nothing could have been more delicate and airy than his playing of the scherzando movement, and his scale runs were as pearly as they were brilliant and even. There was a splendid fire in his performance of the finale, in which his thorough command of all the resources of modern pianoforte technique emphasized in the most convincing manner. Something more in the direction of largeness of style might have been desired, but on the whole the performance was one that could scarcely be too warmly praised. He made an unmistakable conquest of his audience, which applauded him with immense fervor at the close of the first and second movements, and when the concerto was ended it broke into a perfect frenzy of plaudits. Rarely has more enthusiasm as he aroused been earned by an artist in Music Hall, for he was stormily recalled six times.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The programme for the next performance is: Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Brahms; concerto for violin, Beethoven; rhapsody, Liszt. The soloist is to be Mr. Frank Ondricek.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1895.

The program of the sixth Symphony concert given last evening was as follows:

Prelude to The Ruby.....d'Albert
(First time.)
Concerto for violin, No. 22, A minor.....Viotti
Cadenza by Mr. Kneisel.
Symphony, F major.....Götz
A Steppe Sketch from Central Asia.....Borodin
Festival Overture, op. 50.....Volkmann

The overture by Volkmann was played at the concert January 4, 1890. It might well be allowed to gather dust, for it is a cheap, flamboyant thing, distinguished neither for its thought nor for its color. Perhaps it was the noble performance of the orchestra that lent fresh beauty to the symphony by Götz; certainly the charm of much of the intermezzo and the adagio was revealed in full and grateful light.

The overture to The Ruby is interesting throughout, although the first portion (langsam) is the more suggestive and more gorgeously colored. The phrase given out by muted horns and trumpets is very effective, and there are harmonic progressions that are new and impressive. There is one suspension of absolutely delightful ugliness. The second portion (lebhaft) is brilliant enough, but it seems less distinguished and less spontaneous. This overture is a prelude to a fairy opera, with the scene at Bagdad; but d'Albert steers clear of cheap attempts at Orientalism. If he has forgotten his Goldmark he remembers his Wagner. Every now and then in the first portion a mighty wave from that sonorous sea, the prelude to Parsifal, sweeps across the hall.

Pleasing in its deliberate monotony and its suggestion of humanity crawling over desolate nature was the sketch of Borodin, the illustrious chemist, intimate with benzol, cunning in the knowledge of azotic bodies and aldehydes—the inventor of a nitrometer. I wish Mr. Paur would bring out his Second Symphony.

Mr. Kneisel played the fine concerto of Viotti with unfailing accuracy, polished to the highest degree. His cadenza was in good taste, never merely for technical display, not too long. And yet I doubt if Viotti, whose performance according to his contemporaries was "grand, imposing, full toned, amazing for its verve and its variety," ever played this concerto in such a continually amiable and courteous fashion.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC. 8, 1895.

Seventh Symphony Concert.

The program for the seventh concert by the Boston symphony orchestra introduced two overtures new to this city, Dvorak's "In Der Natur" and Reznicek's "Donna Diana," and Mr Martinus Sieveking made his first appearance here as pianist in the Saint Saens concerto for pianoforte. Schumann's symphony in B flat major completed the program.

Dvorak's overture is of the pastoral nature; one of those poetic compositions in which harmonic contrasts describe certain phases of nature, vaguely and irregularly thematic at times, but interesting in the varied combinations of the different instruments which illustrate in a musical way nearly everything from the singing of birds to a thunder storm. Dvorak's characteristics in modulation and turbulent episodes are marked in this work, which is effective as a whole and quite enjoyable. The orchestra was a trifle unsteady in the complex theme which follows the slow introduction, but the development and modulations were charmingly given. The amusing conversations between the horn, flute and clarinet were delightful, and the brilliant coda received a splendid interpretation.

The Reznicek overture, written in the true comic opera vein, is light and buoyant and full of fantastic orchestration and merry lights and shades. Its character is rather romantic, yet the spirit of revelry pervades the work. It was brilliantly played, the staccato passages by the violins and flutes, and their peculiar counter accents against the sustained bars of the clarinet and oboe, being notably quizzical, as it were, and mirth provoking. Schumann's symphony was beautifully read. The vigorous opening was given with requisite pomp by the brasses, and the treatment of the folk-song theme and the dancing melody of the fourth movement were perfect in harmony and rapidity of execution.

Mr Martinus Sieveking's performance of the Saint Saens concerto was admirable. It is impossible to judge of an artist's ability at a single hearing, and that with a large orchestra as a background, but Mr Sieveking showed that his powers as a pianist are of a high order. His execution is very smooth in the rapid passages, either in octaves or triplets, and his runs are not slurred, but clear and even. His forte is, perhaps, a trifle too powerful. The guitar-like accompaniment in the second movement was most delicately played, the skilful use of the pedals producing the desired effect of a stringed instrument. In the coda he exhibited commendable dash and fire. He was rapturously applauded and called out half a dozen times.

The program this week will be as follows: Brahms' symphony in E minor, Beethoven's concerto for violin and a Liszt rhapsody. Mr Franz Ondricek will be the soloist.

SUNDAY, DEC. 8, 1895.

Seventh Symphony Concert, Emil Paur Conductor—New Compositions by Dvorak and Von Reznicek—Martinus Sieveking Plays the G Minor Piano Concerto of Saint Saens.

The program of the Symphony concert last night was as follows:

Overture, "Nature," F major.....Dvorak
(First time.)
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, G minor, Saint-Saens
Overture to "Donna Diana".....Von Reznicek
(First time.)
Symphony No. 1, B-flat major.....Schumann

The concert last evening was the 1339th performance by the orchestra and the 717th performance in Boston.

* * *

Of the two novelties heard last evening, the first, Dvorak's overture, need not detain us. It is thematically weak, inconsequentially developed, and long spun out. "Echoes from Bohemia," or rather "Echoes of Dvorak," is the proper title. What has this music to do with "Nature?" Unless it is Nature as understood by the Germans and Bohemians; a beer garden, with footstools; an unabashed band playing popular ditties; old women knitting and evidently not afraid of the music. Dvorak is a cunning master of instrumentation. But clever tonal effects will not always disguise paucity and triviality of thought.

* * *

The feature of the concert was the acquaintanceship made with the delightful overture to "Donna Diana." I say this with all respect to that excellent pianist, Mr. Sieveking. For pianists come and go. There is always a hero for the hour. Such overtures as "Donna Diana" are rare, and they remain. It is perhaps to be regretted that Mr. Paur did not couple the overture with the Intermezzo-Waltz that is already a favorite in concert halls of London and Continental cities and will be played in Chicago next Saturday. And who is this composer?

* * *

Emil Nikolaus von Reznicek is a name unknown in Boston. He is a young composer, for he was born in Vienna in 1861, the son of an officer. About 1880 he studied for a time at the Leipzig Conservatory. His chief compositions are four operas, "The Maid of Orleans," Prague, June 19, 1887; "Satanella," Prague, May 13, 1888; "Emmerich Fortuna," Prague, Nov. 11, 1889; "Donna Diana," first produced at Prague, Dec. 16, 1894, and afterward given at Carlsruhe, Leipzig and Dessau; and a requiem mass, produced in Prague in November, 1894. The composer of these operas is his own librettist.

This "Donna Diana" is not the only operatic setting of Moreto's comedy. There is "La Principessa Filosofa," by Andreozzi, Naples, 1790, and there is "Donna Diana," by H. Hofmann, Berlin, 1886.

Now this overture of von Reznicek is conspicuous for these qualities: freshness, spontaneity, melody, ingenious thematic development and brilliant and original instrumentation. But there is more than this to be said: the music is the music of comedy. It is the fashion in these days to treat comedy in opera as though the composer were telling the fate of Montezuma or depicting Bajazet in his cage. Could there be any more inappropriate music to "The Taming of the Shrew" than that invented by poor Götz? Look at the overture of d'Albert to "The Ruby;" it was played a week ago last night and possibly you remember it. Would you have ever imagined from that music itself, without gloss or commentary, that it was a prelude to a light fairy opera with comic motives? How opposite the treatment of such subjects by men of genius like Auber or Rossini. And in his noble old age Verdi has shown the wild enthusiasts of Italy, who are steeped in pessimism and write in blood, that music can express hilarious optimism, the chatter of women plotting against Fat Jack, delicious irony, and wit, and humor.

And as Rossini wrote that masterpiece, "The Barber of Seville," and as Verdi wrote "Falstaff," so in similar spirit von Reznicek undoubtedly treated his subject, for we know that in the cities where the opera has been heard, public and critics unite the praise that only comes from honest enjoyment, and surely the man who wrote this overture could not go far wrong in the opera itself.

* * *

Mr. Sieveking made his début at these concerts in the beautiful concerto of Saint-Saëns. In the first movement he showed a tendency to abuse the ritardando and the opening measures of the second movement were none too clearly played. With these exceptions, his performance was excellent. His technique, while it is not overwhelming, is fluent, and amply adequate for such a work as this concerto. His touch is crisp and agreeable. His phrasing last night was generally thoughtful and that of a musician. He did not force tone, however great the temptation. Nor did he give himself airs and graces of any kind. Indeed, the modesty of his bearing was almost as great a pleasure as the ability of his performance. It would be a pleasure to hear him in a program that would test his versatility and make more serious demands on his emotional powers. He pleased mightily the audience last night, for he was recalled again and again.

* * *

A respectable, rather than an inspired, performance of the symphony of Schumann brought the close to a concert that in the main was one of genuine interest and was not too long.

PHILIP HALE.

Martinus Sieveking the Pianist From Holland.

When a stranger pianist, fiddler or singer appears at a Symphony concert there is animal curiosity to know something of the private history of the performer. So there is prattle and there is gossip, as in the days of the Della Crusca, when, as Maginn tells us, "If Mrs. Robinson's dog had a bad night's repose, it was duly and [illegible] Mrs. B.'s patch at the last ball, or the stains on Mr. M.'s full dress coat from the dropping of a chandelier, came before the earth with praiseworthy promptitude." But these childish persons were their own press agents, and peddled the gossip in a cart of their own construction. Today the "secretary" is the middleman.

Of course Mr. Martinus Sieveking does not personally work the tasteless vein that runs through the published record of his life. He is said to be a modest, honest man, free from the foolish, fatuous air that serves as atmosphere to many a wandering star.

We are first informed that Mr. Sieveking "is a Hollander by birth, coming from a very old and aristocratic family, which dates its ancestry back into the 15th century, and still includes among its members many famous statesmen and professional men."

MARTINUS SIEVEKING.

Now of what earthly or artistic importance is this story of a "very old and aristocratic family?" In the first place this particular family is comparatively young. In European families the 15th century is as 1850. I have known several Russian Princes, who had papers dating back to 469 A. D., and I once met an Italian Count who was descended in a straight line from Romulus, at least he said he was, and I know of no reason to doubt his word. All these gentlemen looked as if their line had suffered materially at the hands of Time, and they were very shy about ordering beer in those happy student days in Bohemia; and some were even in the habit of asking for a loan of a couple of marks until they heard from their bankers, who apparently mislaid continually the address of their clients.

What has art to do with this talk about "family?" I have no doubt that Mr. Sieveking has reason to be proud of his ancestors; I have no doubt that the statements are true. But the only question that concerns us is this: "How does he play the piano?"

Then there is the portentous fact that nine-tenths of the celebrated musicians come from humble stock, and Poverty is to them an unkind stepmother. There are notable exceptions, as Meyerbeer and Mendelssohn. But might not these two have sung more passionate strains if they had known struggle and adversity?

It is more to the point that Mr. Sieveking was born in Amsterdam, March 24, 1867. His father was a musician, his mother was an opera singer.

"From his earliest infancy he displayed characteristics indicative of his future career. His parents testify that as soon as old enough to sit up in the cradle he would sway his body back and forward to any music he heard, changing his movements accurately to suit the change of time." Other babies have acted in similar fashion, and yet on arriving at man's estate have never touched a musical instrument, and have adopted some more peaceful calling, as law, a soldier's life, banking or burglary.

Mr. Sieveking's first teacher was his father. The boy, at the age of 10, made his début, playing Beethoven's first concerto. Then he studied for eight years harmony and composition under Franz Coenen, and the piano under Julius Rontgen. He went to Paris, and at the end of two years a suite by him was played at a Lamoureux concert.

In 1890 he went to London, from which place he made two tours with Lloyd, the tenor, Fernando Arboz, violinist, and Popper, the 'cellist. He also was with a Patti concert company. He came to the United States at the time of the World's Fair at Chicago. The summer of 1895 was spent in Holland. He now lives in New York.

* * *

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 8.

The Symphony Concert.

The Symphony Orchestra gave its seventh concert of the season, last evening, in Music Hall. The programme was:

Overture, "Nature".....Dvorak
Concerto for Pianoforte No. 2.....Saint-Saëns
Overture, "Donna Diana".....Emil von Reznicek
Symphony No. 1, B flat major.....Schumann
Soloist, Mr. Martinus Sieveking.

In the way of novelties this programme does not call for extended comment. One may call attention to Dvorak's skill in selecting titles on the lucus a non lucendo principle, and refer to the overture of "Nature" as a fine specimen. Of course nature is so broad and includes so much that those who are gifted with powerful imaginations may detect "impressions aroused by the sight of honeysuckles," or "emotions suggested by the second reading of Herbert Spencer's Psychology" in this overture with the dignified label. The less gifted, however, have the right to complain that in his ten minutes' excursion through space the composer did not set down the item to which he wished to attract attention. A good deal may be said in favor of the artist who wrote, "This is a dog," under a figure that might have been taken for a cat or a sistrum. It does not require much labor to turn human yearning for the beautiful in the right direction, and Dvorak should have known that before his audience could discover what particular aspect of nature he wished them to see the overture would be ended. The work is somewhat trivial and artificial and occasionally brilliant. The only pity is that one can easily persuade one's self that it has all been heard before.

The soloist was a most pleasant surprise; he came here unheralded and yet his work proved that he was a pianist of the very finest calibre. He is amply provided for in the way of technique; he conquers difficulties with the ease and grace of an approved master. His playing is clean, clear, and the workmanship is of the finest quality; it is strong, virile playing without a trace of affected prettiness or morbid sentimentality. Nothing could have been more light and dainty and thoroughly artistic than the interpretation of the second movement of the concerto or more brilliant or dashing than the Presto. Throughout the playing he carried the stamp of high artistic sincerity and demonstrated that he is an artist, that is an interpreter as well as a player, and all his work is marked with largeness of style, beauty of finish and the perfection of technique. Mr. Sieveking was received with the greatest enthusiasm, and was recalled five times; an honor won by his merits alone, and these merits place him in the very first rank. If all his work is as fine as the first specimen given he may have one or two equals but no superiors.

The "Donna Diana" overture is a charmingly bright and melodious work, full of infectious gayety; it is prettily and most effectively scored, and it was beautifully read by Mr. Paur, as was the grand Schumann symphony. The concert was one of the most enjoyable of the season.

The programme for the next concert is: Brahms' symphony in E minor, Beethoven's concerto for violin and a rhapsody by Liest. The soloist is Mr. Franz Ondrieck.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 8, 1895.

A new pianist and two new overtures—that is a pretty liberal proportion of novelty in one concert, and that is what Mr. Paur provided for his seventh Symphony programme. To the man first, then. This was Mr. Martinus Sieveking, of Holland, a tall, fine figure of a young man, with dark eyes and hair and curled-up moustache setting off his rather handsome countenance. He had chosen the second concerto of Saint-Saens, the brilliancy, rapidity and dash of which might well disconcert and possibly overthrow any pianist whose equipment was not of the best. But its difficulties brought neither perplexity nor fatigue to this stranger, who indeed pushed the coda of the flying presto which ends the work to such speed that the orchestra, ready as they were, had to bestir themselves to keep abreast of him. His technique is practically that which is now expected in every player who claims a place in the front rank, and it is evidently qualified by judgment and taste. In the broad, bold, sturdy solo introduction, we feared that he might be inclined to bring too heavy a hand to energetic and ensemble passages; but he generally held himself back from such excess and treated the lighter portions with dainty delicacy. He showed good sense in matching the pianoforte with the orchestra and knew when in the second and third movements he might give himself full freedom in the rendering of his own part. In each of these movements he caught and carried on the spirit of the audience and was recalled several times with honest warmth of pleased approbation.

Mr. Sieveking, we perhaps might mention, used a Mason & Hamlin grand piano, which met his requirements at every point and appeared to great advantage under his hands.

After so shining, affluent and animated a work something strenuously contrasted or unusually clever in a similar vein was obviously required, and Mr. Paur followed on with one of his novelties—the overture to Reznicek's recent opera "Donna Diana," the story of which covers virtually the same ground of light courtly intrigue as Mme. Modjeska's play of the same name. It is a gay, piquant and most fleet-footed little composition, which never stops to take breath, even when a gracious secondary theme steals quietly into the agile mirth. The orchestra played it with immense skill and spirit; but if the programme book were right in saying that it is marked to be played not only as fast as possible but also as lightly, then Mr. Paur ignored the second injunction, for he put a lot of nerve and force into the reading.

The other overture, which began the programme, was Dvorak's "Nature," an agreeable and significant idyl of larger calibre. It begins—akin to David's "Desert" and the Borodin sketch of the previous week—with a long, softly murmured single note, over which is indicated the first theme in forms which suggest the musical awakening of natural life. The songs of birds, the motion of air and leaf and water and the vague content of being are indicated in easily apprehended symbols, and then there follow brief episodes of more eager and definite happiness marching with assured and rhythmic tread. But after reaching their height, these fade down and away and the overture ends in the same vein and with much of the same phrasing which began it.

The symphony was Schumann's first, which received a magnificent rendering, the first movement being particularly ample and noble, and the fourth ascending to a climax even greater of volume and verve.

At the next concert the orchestra will play Brahms's fourth symphony and a Rhapsody of Liszt. Mr. Prank Ondricek will make his Boston debut and play Beethoven's violin concerto.

[56]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1895.

The program of the sixth Symphony concert given last evening was as follows:

Prelude to The Ruby.....d'Albert
(First time.)
Concerto for violin, No. 22, A minor.....Viotti
Cadenza by Mr. Kneisel.
Symphony, F major.....Götz
A Steppe Sketch from Central Asia.....Borodin
Festival Overture, op. 50.....Volkmann

The overture by Volkmann was played at the concert January 4, 1890. It might well be allowed to gather dust, for it is a cheap, flamboyant thing, distinguished neither for its thought nor for its color. Perhaps it was the noble performance of the orchestra that lent fresh beauty to the symphony by Götz; certainly the charm of much of the intermezzo and the adagio was revealed in full and grateful light.

The overture to The Ruby is interesting throughout, although the first portion (langsam) is the more suggestive and more gorgeously colored. The phrase given out by muted horns and trumpets is very effective, and there are harmonic progressions that are new and impressive. There is one suspension of absolutely delightful ugliness. The second portion (lebhaft) is brilliant enough, but it seems less distinguished and less spontaneous. This overture is a prelude to a fairy opera, with the scene at Bagdad; but d'Albert steers clear of cheap attempts at Orientalism. If he has forgotten his Goldmark he remembers his Wagner. Every now and then in the first portion a mighty wave from that sonorous sea, the prelude to Parsifal, sweeps across the hall.

Pleasing in its deliberate monotony and its suggestion of humanity crawling over desolate nature was the sketch of Borodin, the illustrious chemist, intimate with benzol, cunning in the knowledge of azotic bodies and aldehydes—the inventor of a nitrometer. I wish Mr. Paur would bring out his Second Symphony.

Mr. Kneisel played the fine concerto of Viotti with unfailing accuracy, polished to the highest degree. His cadenza was in good taste, never merely for technical display, not too long. And yet I doubt if Viotti, whose performance according to his contemporaries was "grand, imposing, full toned, amazing for its verve and its variety," ever played this concerto in such a continually amiable and courteous fashion.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC. 8, 1895.

Seventh Symphony Concert.

The program for the seventh concert by the Boston symphony orchestra introduced two overtures new to this city, Dvorak's "In Der Natur" and Reznicek's "Donna Diana," and Mr Martinus Sieveking made his first appearance here as pianist in the Saint Saens concerto for pianoforte. Schumann's symphony in B flat major completed the program.

Dvorak's overture is of the pastoral nature; one of those poetic compositions in which harmonic contrasts describe certain phases of nature, vaguely and irregularly thematic at times, but interesting in the varied combinations of the different instruments which illustrate in a musical way nearly everything from the singing of birds to a thunder storm. Dvorak's characteristics in modulation and turbulent episodes are marked in this work, which is effective as a whole and quite enjoyable. The orchestra was a trifle unsteady in the complex theme which follows the slow introduction, but the development and modulations were charmingly given. The amusing conversations between the horn, flute and clarinet were delightful, and the brilliant coda received a splendid interpretation.

The Reznicek overture, written in the true comic opera vein, is light and buoyant and full of fantastic orchestration and merry lights and shades. Its character is rather romantic, yet the spirit of revelry pervades the work. It was brilliantly played, the staccato passages by the violins and flutes, and their peculiar counter accents against the sustained bars of the clarinet and oboe, being notably quizzical, as it were, and mirth provoking. Schumann's symphony was beautifully read. The vigorous opening was given with requisite pomp by the brasses, and the treatment of the folk-song theme and the dancing melody of the fourth movement were perfect in harmony and rapidity of execution.

Mr Martinus Sieveking's performance of the Saint Saens concerts was admirable. It is impossible to judge of an artist's ability at a single hearing, and that with a large orchestra as a background, but Mr Sieveking showed that his powers as a pianist are of a high order. His execution is very smooth in the rapid passages, either in octaves or triplets, and his runs are not slurred, but clear and even. His forte is, perhaps, a trifle too powerful. The guitar-like accompaniment in the second movement was most delicately played, the skilful use of the pedals producing the desired effect of a stringed instrument. In the coda he exhibited commendable dash and fire. He was rapturously applauded and called out half a dozen times.

The program this week will be as follows: Brahms' symphony in E minor, Beethoven's concerto for violin and a Liszt rhapsody. Mr Franz Ondricek will be the soloist.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1895.

Seventh Symphony Concert, Emil Paur Conductor—New Compositions by Dvorak and Von Reznicek—Martinus Sieveking Plays the G Minor Piano Concerto of Saint Saens.

The program of the Symphony concert last night was as follows:

Overture, "Nature," F major .....Dvorak
(First time.)
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, G minor, Saint-Saens
Overture to "Donna Diana"....Von Reznicek
(First time.)
Symphony No. 1, B-flat major.....Schumann

The concert last evening was the 1330th performance by the orchestra and the 717th performance in Boston.

* * *

Of the two novelties heard last evening, the first, Dvorak's overture, need not detain us. It is thematically weak, inconsequentially developed, and long spun out. "Echoes from Bohemia," or rather "Echoes of Dvorak," is the proper title. What has this music to do with "Nature?" Unless it is Nature as understood by the Germans and Bohemians; a beer garden, with footstools; an unabashed band playing popular ditties; old women knitting and evidently not afraid of the music. Dvorak is a cunning master of instrumentation. But clever tonal effects will not always disguise paucity and triviality of thought.

* * *

The feature of the concert was the acquaintanceship made with the delightful overture to "Donna Diana." I say this with all respect to that excellent pianist, Mr. Sieveking. For pianists come and go. There is always a hero for the hour. Such overtures as "Donna Diana" are rare, and they remain. It is perhaps to be regretted that Mr. Paur did not couple the overture with the Intermezzo-Waltz that is already a favorite in concert halls of London and Continental cities and will be played in Chicago next Saturday. And who is this composer?

* * *

Emil Nikolaus von Reznicek is a name unknown in Boston. He is a young composer, for he was born in Vienna in 1861, the son of an officer. About 1880 he studied for a time at the Leipzig Conservatory. His chief compositions are four operas, "The Maid of Orleans," Prague, June 19, 1887; "Satanella," Prague, May 13, 1888; "Emmerich Fortuna," Prague, Nov. 11, 1889; "Donna Diana," first produced at Prague, Dec. 16, 1894, and afterward given at Carlsruhe, Leipzig and Dessau; and a requiem mass, produced in Prague in November, 1894. The composer of these operas is his own librettist.

This "Donna Diana" is not the only operatic setting of Moreto's comedy. There is "La Principessa Filosofa," by Andreozzi, Naples, 1790, and there is "Donna Diana," by H. Hofmann, Berlin, 1886.

Now this overture of von Reznicek is conspicuous for these qualities: freshness, spontaneity, melody, ingenious thematic development and brilliant and original instrumentation. But there is more than this to be said: the music is the music of comedy. It is the fashion in these days to treat comedy in opera as though the composer were telling the fate of Montezuma or depicting Bajazet in his cage. Could there be any more inappropriate music to "The Taming of the Shrew" than that invented by poor Götz? Look at the overture of d'Albert to "The Ruby;" it was played a week ago last night and possibly you remember it. Would you have ever imagined from that music itself, without gloss or commentary, that it was a prelude to a light fairy opera with comic motives? How opposite the treatment of such subjects by men of genius like Auber or Rossini. And in his noble old age Verdi has shown the wild enthusiasts of Italy, who are steeped in pessimism and write in blood, that music can express hilarious optimism, the chatter of women plotting against Fat Jack, delicious irony, and wit, and humor.

And as Rossini wrote that masterpiece, "The Barber of Seville," and as Verdi wrote "Falstaff," so in similar spirit von Reznicek undoubtedly treated his subject; for we know that in the cities where the opera has been heard, public and critics unite the praise that only comes from honest enjoyment, and surely the man who wrote this overture could not go far wrong in the opera itself.

* * *

Mr. Sieveking made his début at these concerts in the beautiful concerto of Saint-Saëns. In the first movement he showed a tendency to abuse the ritardando and the opening measures of the second movement were none too clearly played. With these exceptions, his performance was excellent. His technique, while it is not overwhelming, is fluent, and amply adequate for such a work as this concerto. His touch is crisp and agreeable. His phrasing last night was generally thoughtful and that of a musician. He did not force tone, however great the temptation. Nor did he give himself airs and graces of any kind. Indeed, the modesty of his bearing was almost as great a pleasure as the ability of his performance. It would be a pleasure to hear him in a program that would test his versatility and make more serious demands on his emotional powers. He pleased mightily the audience last night, for he was recalled again and again.

* * *

A respectable, rather than an inspired, performance of the symphony of Schumann brought the close to a concert that in the main was one of genuine interest and was not too long.

PHILIP HALE.

Martinus Sieveking the Pianist From Holland.

When a stranger pianist, fiddler or singer appears at a Symphony concert there is animal curiosity to know something of the private history of the performer. So there is prattle and there is gossip, as in the days of the Della Crusca, when, as Maginn tells us, "If Mrs. Robinson's dog had a bad night's repose, it was duly announced to the world; Mr. Merry's accident in paring his nails solicited a similar sympathy; the falling off of Mrs. R.'s patch at the last ball, or the stains on Mr. M.'s full dress coat from the dropping of a chandelier, came before the earth with praiseworthy promptitude." But these childish persons were their own press agents, and peddled the gossip in a cart of their own construction. Today the "secretary" is the middleman.

Of course Mr. Martinus Sieveking does not personally work the tasteless vein that runs through the published record of his life. He is said to be a modest, honest man, free from the foolish, fatuous air that serves as atmosphere to many a wandering star.

We are first informed that Mr. Sieveking "is a Hollander by birth, coming from a very old and aristocratic family, which dates its ancestry back into the 15th century, and still includes among its members many famous statesmen and professional men."

MARTINUS SIEVEKING.

Now of what earthly or artistic importance is this story of a "very old and aristocratic family?" In the first place this particular family is comparatively young. In European families the 15th century is as 1850. I have known several Russian Princes, who had papers dating back to 469 A. D., and I once met an Italian Count who was descended in a straight line from Romulus, at least he said he was, and I know of no reason to doubt his word. All these gentlemen looked as if their line had suffered materially at the hands of Time, and they were very shy about ordering beer in those happy student days in Bohemia; and some were even in the habit of asking for a loan of a couple of marks until they heard from their bankers, who apparently mislaid continually the address of their clients.

What has art to do with this talk about "family?" I have no doubt that Mr. Sieveking has reason to be proud of his ancestors; I have no doubt that the statements are true. But the only question that concerns us is this: "How does he play the piano?"

Then there is the portentous fact that nine-tenths of the celebrated musicians come from humble stock, and Poverty is to them an unkind stepmother. There are notable exceptions, as Meyerbeer and Mendelssohn. But might not these two have sung more passionate strains if they had known struggle and adversity?

It is more to the point that Mr. Sieveking was born in Amsterdam, March 24, 1867. His father was a musician, his mother was an opera singer.

"From his earliest infancy he displayed characteristics indicative of his future career. His parents testify that as soon as old enough to sit up in the cradle he would sway his body back and forward to any music he heard, changing his movements accurately to suit the change of time." Other babies have acted in similar fashion, and yet on arriving at man's estate have never touched a musical instrument, and have adopted some more peaceful calling, as law, a soldier's life, banking or burglary.

Mr. Sieveking's first teacher was his father. The boy, at the age of 10, made his début, playing Beethoven's first concerto. Then he studied for eight years harmony and composition under Franz Coenen, and the piano under Julius Rontgen. He went to Paris, and at the end of two years a suite by him was played at a Lamoureux concert.

In 1890 he went to London, from which place he made two tours with Lloyd, the tenor, Fernando Arboz, violinist, and Popper, the 'cellist. He also was with a Patti concert company. He came to the United States at the time of the World's Fair at Chicago. The summer of 1895 was spent in Holland. He now lives in New York.

* * *

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 8.

The Symphony Concert.

The Symphony Orchestra gave its seventh concert of the season, last evening, in Music Hall. The programme was:

Overture, "Nature".....Dvorak
Concerto for Pianoforte No. 2.....Saint-Saëns
Overture, "Donna Diana".....Emil von Reznicek
Symphony No. 1, B-flat major.....Schumann
Soloist, Mr. Martinus Sieveking.

In the way of novelties this programme does not call for extended comment. One may call attention to Dvorak's skill in selecting titles on the lucus a non lucendo principle, and refer to the overture of "Nature" as a fine specimen. Of course nature is so broad and includes so much that those who are gifted with powerful imaginations may detect "impressions aroused by the sight of honeysuckles," or "emotions suggested by the second reading of Herbert Spencer's Psychology" in this overture with the dignified label. The less gifted, however, have the right to complain that in his ten minutes' excursion through space the composer did not set down the item, to which he wished to attract atteution. A good deal may be said in favor of the artist who wrote, "This is a dog," under a figure that might have been taken for a cat or a sistrum. It does not require much labor to turn human yearning for the beautiful in the right direction, and Dvorak should have known that before his audience could discover what particular aspect of nature he wished them to see the overture would be ended. The work is somewhat trivial and artificial and occasionally brilliant. The only pity is that one can easily persuade one's self that it has all been heard before.

The soloist was a most pleasant surprise; he came here unheralded and yet his work proved that he was a pianist of the very finest calibre. He is amply provided for in the way of technique; he conquers difficulties with the ease and grace of an approved master. His playing is clean, clear, and the workmanship is of the finest quality; it is strong virile playing without a trace of affected prettiness or morbid sentimentality. Nothing could have been more light and dainty and thoroughly artistic than the interpretation of the second movement of the concerto or more brilliant or dashing than the Presto. Throughout the playing he carried the stamp of high artistic sincerity and demonstrated that he is an artist, that is an interpreter as well as a player, and all his work is marked with largeness of style, beauty of finish and the perfection of technique. Mr. Sieveking was received with the greatest enthusiasm, and was recalled five times; an honor won by his merits alone, and these merits place him in the very first rank. If all his work is as fine as the first specimen given he may have one or two equals but no superiors.

The "Donna Diana" overture is a charmingly bright and melodious work, full of infectious gayety; it is prettily and most effectively scored, and it was beautifully read by Mr. Paur, as was the grand Schumann symphony. The concert was one of the most enjoyable of the season.

The programme for the next concert is: Brahms' symphony in E minor, Beethoven's concerto for violin and a rhapsody by Liest. The soloist is Mr. Franz Ondrieck.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 8, 1895.

A new pianist and two new overtures—that is a pretty liberal proportion of novelty in one concert, and that is what Mr. Paur provided for his seventh Symphony programme. To the man first, then. This was Mr. Martinus Sieveking, of Holland, a tall, fine figure of a young man, with dark eyes and hair and curled-up moustache setting off his rather handsome countenance. He had chosen the second concerto of Saint-Saens, the brilliancy, rapidity and dash of which might well disconcert and possibly overthrow any pianist whose equipment was not of the best. But its difficulties brought neither perplexity nor fatigue to this stranger, who indeed pushed the coda of the flying presto which ends the work to such speed that the orchestra, ready as they were, had to bestir themselves to keep abreast of him. His technique is practically that which is now expected in every player who claims a place in the front rank, and it is evidently qualified by judgment and taste. In the broad, bold, sturdy solo introduction, we feared that he might be inclined to bring too heavy a hand to energetic and ensemble passages; but he generally held himself back from such excess and treated the lighter portions with dainty delicacy. He showed good sense in matching the pianoforte with the orchestra and knew when in the second and third movements he might give himself full freedom in the rendering of his own part. In each of these movements he caught and carried on the spirit of the audience and was recalled several times with honest warmth of pleased approbation.

Mr. Sieveking, we perhaps might mention, used a Mason & Hamlin grand piano, which met his requirements at every point and appeared to great advantage under his hands.

After so shining, affluent and animated a work something strenuously contrasted or unusually clever in a similar vein was obviously required, and Mr. Paur followed on with one of his novelties—the overture to Reznicek's recent opera "Donna Diana," the story of which covers virtually the same ground of light courtly intrigue as Mme. Modjeska's play of the same name. It is a gay, piquant and most fleet-footed little composition, which never stops to take breath, even when a gracious secondary theme steals quietly into the agile mirth. The orchestra played it with immense skill and spirit; but if the programme book were right in saying that it is marked to be played not only as fast as possible but also as lightly, then Mr. Paur ignored the second injunction, for he put a lot of nerve and force into the reading.

The other overture, which began the programme, was Dvorak's "Nature," an agreeable and significant idyl of larger calibre. It begins—akin to David's "Desert" and the Borodin sketch of the previous week—with a long, softly murmured single note, over which is indicated the first theme in forms which suggest the musical awakening of natural life. The songs of birds, the motion of air and leaf and water and the vague content of being are indicated in easily apprehended symbols, and then there follow brief episodes of more eager and definite happiness marching with assured and rhythmic tread. But after reaching their height, these fade down and away and the overture ends in the same vein and with much of the same phrasing which began it.

The symphony was Schumann's first, which received a magnificent rendering, the first movement being particularly ample and noble, and the fourth ascending to a climax even greater of volume and verve.

At the next concert the orchestra will play Brahms's fourth symphony and a Rhapsody of Liszt. Mr. Frank Ondricek will make his Boston debut and play Beethoven's violin concerto.

[56]

[illegible] Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

[illegible] MORNING, DEC. 5, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The audience which assembled in Music Hall last night had the pleasure of listening to the most enjoyable concert of the symphony series thus far given. The programme was a broad one, and every number was rendered magnificently. Further than this there proved to be a genuine surprise in store for the audience in the really brilliant piano playing of Mr. Martinus Sieveking.

Mr. Sieveking may be said to have made his appearance in this city quite unheralded, for beyond the mere fact that he was to be the soloist at the seventh concert, and that he hails from Holland, little or nothing was known of him. He is a rather distinguished looking gentleman and rather modest, but an artist to his fingers' tips. The Saint-Saens concerto, No. 2, has been frequently heard here. In fact, it is a rather popular composition with advanced pianists, since it affords an excellent opportunity for a show of technique. The first movement was passed over with but the ordinary amount of recognition on the part of the audience, but immediately Mr. Sieveking began the scherzo movement it became evident that his playing was of a superior order, and by the time he had finished he had completely won his audience. His playing has a marked individuality and is marked by a directness of purpose and intensity. In the legato and staccato passages he gave the greatest pleasure. His method of execution is simple and lacks entirely the mannerisms and tricks of many solo players, for which he is to be commended. The audience almost insisted on an encore, but they did manage to bring him out some seven times.

The remainder of the programme included the overture to "Nature" by Dvorak, and the overture to "Donna Diana," by Reznicek, both heard here for the first time. The first is full of quaint orchestral combinations, more interesting at the beginning than at any other portion; but the "Donna Diana" overture was as frolicsome a composition as has been heard at a Symphony for some time. From beginning to end it is a series of pretty developments, and one almost wished that the music of the entire opera might be played, if it was as charming as the overture. The Schumann Symphony No. 1 finished the programme and was magnificently played throughout.

The soloist at the next concert will be Mr. Franz Ondricek, violinist, and he will be heard in the Beethoven concerto.

Dec 15

SUNDAY HERALD

We all asked to give space for mention of this good cause, which we very gladly do. A former member of the Symphony orchestra some time ago became insane and is now under confinement on that account. Mr. Goldstein has a very deserving wife and children, and, at the suggestion of Mr. Paur, a concert will be given at the Boston Theatre on Sunday evening, Jan. 5, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Paderewski, Campanari and everybody who is to participate volunteering. The list of those who have already purchased tickets includes some of the very best people, many of them rehearsal and Symphony patrons.

Dec 15

BOSTON COURIER, SU

—A concert for the benefit of the family of Mr. A. Goldstein, formerly of the Symphony Orchestra, will be given at the Boston Theatre on Sunday evening, Jan. 5. Signor Campanini is to sing, Paderewski is to play and the entire symphony orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Paur will be heard to excellent advantage. The public, knowing of the sad affliction which has befallen Mr. Goldstein, will be glad to avail themselves of the opportunity to aid him, and at the same time enjoy the unusually fine programme offered.

Gazette

Dec 15

—A concert, tendered the family of Mr. A. Goldstein (a former member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra) by the courtesy of Mr. Emil Paur and the orchestra, with the valuable assistance of Mr. Paderewski, pianist, and Mr. G. Campanari, baritone, will take place Tuesday evening, Jan. 5, at the Boston Theatre. It will draw out a large audience, many of the smart set having already subscribed. Tickets may be had at the theatre and Music Hall box office.

Dec 15

GLOBE—SUNDAY, D

—On Sunday evening, Jan 5, in the Boston theater, a benefit concert will be given by the symphony orchestra, Padcrewski and Campanari. Every performer offers his services, and the entire receipts will be given to the family of Mr A. Goldstein, a former member of the orchestra. The seats are now on sale at Music hall, and a large number of the regular season ticket holders to the concerts have purchased seats.

[illegible] explanation of the "righteous indignation" was that furnished by [illegible] Boston, proprietor of [illegible] called the Boston Symphony [illegible] recently brought suit against [illegible] to restrain them from using [illegible] Boston Symphony Club" as a [illegible] company which they were [illegible] at the title of Bach- [illegible] from the Boston [illegible] which Mr. Nikisch is direc- [illegible] "club" has had no [illegible] in lieu of the Supreme [illegible] decision in Bach- [illegible] offered title are both

There is in Boston a gentleman of Israelitish descent named Max Borchert. He is the originator of a musical club not overwhelmingly large in numbers, as there are only seven members in the club. He called it the Boston Symphony Orchestral Club. Now this, with a very slight change, is the name of a superb organization that holds the highest position all over the country, and Mr. Borchert knew what he was about when he misapplied the well-known name to his own use. Shortly after the organization of the Boston Symphony Orchestral Club another enterprising fellow formed a similar club and named it the "Boston Symphony Club," whereupon Mr. Borchert, jumping at the conclusion that he had been damaged by the usurpation of that to which he had no legal right, brought suit against the proprietor of the Boston Symony Club for stealing the name. Worst of all, Borchert won the suit. And now the real Boston Symphony orchestra are wondering if Borchert will next make an attack upon them to prevent any further infringement upon his rights.

[illegible] ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 9, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert of Saturday was one that ought to satisfy the most extreme craving for modern works. In comparison with the Opus 91 of Dvorak and a new overture by Reznicek, even the Saint-Saens concerto could hardly be said to belong to the most recent era of music, while the Schumann symphony seemed like a voice from the dim past. The soloist, too, made his first Boston appearance, so the character of the concert was almost wholly contemporaneous.

The opening number was Dvorak's overture, "In der Natur." In this work the composer has regarded nature from a subjective point of view. There is little or no indulgence in shepherds' duets, alpine horns, or other conventional devices of programme music, but the whole piece thrills with the joyous emotions aroused by the freshness of natural beauty. It was evidently a Wagnerian landscape that Dvorak was looking at.

The powerful opening chords, with their drone-bass accompaniment, were not unlike the first few measures of the Siegfried Vorspiel, and when the auditor's imagination was once aroused it became easy for him to find numerous resemblances, all the way from the bird-calls in the Waldesweben to the final theme of Die Walkure. But this similarity is, after all, one of style rather than that of material, and does not detract from the originality of the work. Richness of orchestral coloring is one of the chief characteristics of modern music, and can not be monopolized by any one writer, while the accidental reminiscence of other themes is more than counterbalanced by the treatment and development, which stamps this work as Dvorak's own. The overture is not in the strictest shape, but the harmonic beauty and emotional power of most of its themes received their best expression in the freer form. The work as a whole is a very worthy one, and deserves a high place among modern compositions.

After this came the soloist. Bringing new pianists to Boston may seem a little like carrying coals to Newcastle, but in this case the experiment was a total and instant success. Martinus Sieveking proved himself an artist of high rank, and the enthusiasm he aroused showed that the audience appreciated him to the full. The Saint-Saens G-minor concerto, which he played, is not well suited to display every side of a performer's talent, as it demands less of poetic interpretation than of delicate crispness of execution; but the piano part is given prominence throughout, and affords many chances for the exercise of technical skill and brilliancy. The pianist's technique was of the phenomenal sort, and no doubt won most of his recalls.

The emotional side of his playing was not brought out to any extent, but in the qualities that were demanded by the piece he was fully adequate, and his performance of the work deserves warm commendation. A decided meed of praise must be given to pianist, conductor and orchestra for the remarkable clearness of tempo and precision of attack, especially in the difficult interweavings of the second movement.

Reznicek's overture to his opera, "Donna Diana," was of a somewhat lighter character. It was lively and dashing, full of delicious brightness, and sparkling with attractive harmonies. In one or two places it seemed rather theatrical, but on the whole its standard was exceptionally high for comic opera. Reznicek is a young Viennese composer, now director of the court theatre at Weimar. He has written four operas, of which "Donna Diana" is the latest and most successful.

It was in the beautiful "Spring" symphony of Schumann that the orchestra won its greatest triumph. Mr. Paur's reading of the work was full of dignity and nobility, and it formed an excellent climax for an unusually interesting concert. A detailed account of its presentation would reveal much to applaud and almost nothing to criticise.

It may not be out of place, however, to say that the very slow introduction seemed a trifle too slow, even for andante maestoso, and that one or two phrases in the exposition of the allegro seemed blurred by the rapidity of tempo; but these are minor points, and did not in the least impair the power of the movement as a whole, while the romantic beauty of the slow movement, the brusque gayety of the scherzo, and the dainty grace of the finale were all that could be desired. Arthur Elson.

[illegible] MONDAY, [illegible] 9, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The seventh symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, brought the following programme:

Dvorak: Overture, "In der Natur," in F major, opus 91.
Saint-Saens: Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor, opus 22.
Reznicek: Overture to "Donna Diana." (First time.)
Schumann: Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, opus 38.

Mr. Martinus Sieveking was the pianist.

For general enjoyableness the concert was in sharp contrast with the preceding one: the principal two numbers—the Schumann symphony and the Saint-Saens concerto—were not only masterpieces in their way, but also quite familiar to the bulk of the audience; and the two overtures were interesting and pleasing novelties. We note, by the way, that the management of the Symphony Orchestra has begun to adopt a plan followed by some other musical organizations in the city: that of printing the number of the concert on the programme. It was, no doubt, with some surprise that many of last Saturday's audience read that this was the thirteen hundred and thirtieth concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra since its foundation in 1880; the seven hundred and seventeenth concert given in Boston. This is a pretty large record for not quite fifteen years!

As Dvorak's overture was not marked "first time" on the programme, we suppose it must have been given here before; but we certainly do not remember it. It is a work distinguished more by gracious musical beauty and a certain unobtrusive poetic imaginativeness than by originality. It is romantic in the best sense of the term; that is, poetic and intrinsically musical at the same time; the themes are full of grace and beauty, well and naturally worked out, and the whole composition organically and symmetrically developed. It is music such as is eminently pleasant to listen to. Only one finds little of the composer's specific individuality in it, and neither the themes themselves nor the general atmosphere of the composition seem particularly new. It was excellently well played.

Reznicek's light comic-opera overture is something quite different. The composer is a young Austro-Bohemian nobleman who has taken his musical calling unusually seriously for a man of his antecedents; he has adopted the musical profession in the fullest sense of the word, not contenting himself with composing, but earning his bread and butter also by conducting. After conducting at opera houses in towns of the third and fourth rank, like Graz, Zürich, Mainz and Stettin, he has risen to the conductorship of the court opera in Weimar, one of the most important posts in Germany. The very title of this overture of his is a recommendation to all who have delighted in Moreto's admirable comedy, "El desdén con el desdén." And this little preliminary glow of ready-made sympathy is only increased by finding in Reznicek's work an evident attempt to revive something of the old light comic-opera musical spirit. After the Wagnerian megalomania of Humperdinck's and Eugen d'Albert's preludes to alleged "fairy operas," it is refreshing to find some reflex of the old Rossini-Auber flash and sparkle again in an overture that has nothing to do with lyric tragedy. This overture to "Donna Diana" is of undeniably light calibre; if you look for that force of genius in it that could raise Mozart's rollicking little overture to "Figaro" to the level of a great work, you will be disappointed; but it is full of true humor, go, and dash; it sparkles like champagne; it is never vulgar, and is most deliciously scored. That a composition of this sort ought to hold a permanent place in the symphony concert repertory, may well be doubted; but it is eminently worthy of being introduced to the public at a symphony concert. We, for one, heard it with delight.

Schumann's B-flat symphony is ever welcome. Here is truly great music! One wishes that some means could be devised of overcoming the "panic terror" which attaches to that grand opening proclamation of the horns and trumpets, so that the mighty phrase should be played with complete assurance. In passages of this sort it often seems as if a conductor can do more harm than good; it is far easier for him to frighten his men than to reassure them and hold them together. Intrinsically the phrase is of the sort that ought to go all by itself, so full of rhythmic vitality is it. Last Saturday it went rather lamely and without authoritative boldness of emphasis. But, for the rest, the symphony was grandly given.

Saint-Saen's G minor concerto holds its own bravely as a work which one is ever ready to enjoy. Not a work on the most elevated plane, it is still so full of musical invention, so admirably written, and so wonderfully well scored, that it is always a true pleasure to hear it. Mr. Sieveking made, we believe, his first bow to a large Boston audience at this concert. His playing of the concerto was superb. He evidently possesses great physical strength, the exertion of which he, however, never pushes farther than the pianoforte can bear. His technique is exceedingly brilliant, if not invariably perfectly sure—now and then he strikes wrong notes. But he plays like a master, for all that. In the matter of style he is perhaps just a thought old-fashioned; he plays with more artistic measure than one is quite accustomed to nowadays, and does not by any means abuse the musical pepper-box. In the first movement of the concerto we felt that a little more outspoken grandiosity of manner would have done no harm; Saint-Saens himself takes this movement slower and with a more emphatic underscoring of "effects." But Mr. Sieveking played it with abundant vital force, superb bravura, and genuine depth of feeling. One only felt, in face of his noble simplicity of style, that Saint-Saens's music is really a little more sophisticated than all that, and that its full flavor cannot be got at by the simple methods that would apply to Beethoven. In the Allegretto scherzando Mr. Sieveking fell considerably farther short of the mark; he [illegible] founder emotional [illegible] ment. His playing was [illegible] and agile, but somewhat wooden in regularness—what the French call "matiere." In the saltarello finale, however, he carried everything before him. Since we heard the composer himself play this movement in London in 1879, we have heard no one make the effect with it that Mr. Sieveking did last Saturday. It was the ne plus ultra of irresistible bravura-playing, yet never really, so to speak, outrunning its own legs. As for technique, whew! how those terrible 3rds and 6ths went! It was thoroughly superb. The effect upon the audience was electric; the pianist was recalled seven times.

The next programme is: Brahms, symphony No. 4, in E minor; Beethoven, concerto for violin, in D major; Liszt, Hungarian Rhapsody: Mr. Franz Ondricek will be the violinist.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVIII., NO. 168.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

M. Franz Ondricek, the Soloist, Made an Unmistakable Success.

The eighth concert of the current season of the Boston Symphony orchestra was listened to by a very large audience last evening. The programme was:

Symphony No. 4, in E minor.....Brahms
Concerto for violin.....Liszt
Rhapsody Hongroise, No. 2.....Liszt
(Arranged for orchestra by Karl Muller Berghaus.

The soloist was M. Franz Ondricek. The symphony is not the most interesting of its composer's works in its class, and the movement with which it ends, despite the ingenuity of the variations, on its brief chacenne theme, are steadily ugly and yawn-provoking. The andante, with its constant juggling between G sharp and G natural, which keeps the tonality in doubt, has a seriously striking originality and is peculiarly and pleasingly effective, despite its confusing effect on the ear; and the third movement, with its brightness and gay freshness, is thoroughly charming; but the work has many dry and depressing moments when the composer fully indulges his fondness for carrying thematic development to a point that becomes wearisome. The performance of the work was solid and brilliant, and it was read throughout by Mr. Paur with unbroken clearness. The now famous virtuosity of the orchestra was specially shown in the elaborate and difficult variations of the finale. A splendidly colored rendering of Berghaus' clever and effective arrangement of the Liszt rhapsody was given, the wind instruments in particular acquitting themselves with notable brilliancy. M. Pourtau's performance of the brilliant cadenzas was a superb display of technique in its fiery dash, its pearly clearness and its exquisitely pure tone. The whole interpretation was stirringly fine and impressively sympathetic. The music, it is true, is a sort of refined clap-trap, but its treatment imparted both dignity and artistic interest to it.

Mr. Ondricek, who was welcomed with great heartiness, made an unmistakable success with his audience. He was loudly applauded at the end of the first movement of the concerto, and was recalled at the close of his performance four times with excited enthusiasm. He is a spirited player, immaculately true in intonation, with an able and a daring technique, equal to all emergencies, and a style at once earnest and artistic. His bowing is large, free and graceful, and his phrasing musicianly. His tone is not large, nor is it notably warm, but it is clear and manly. It did not appear that the Beethoven concerto was best calculated to bring out what are the most striking and most characteristic qualities of his style and of his individuality as a virtuoso, and it was made evident that he would have been heard to much better advantage in a work calling for a more modern technique and sentiment than does this one. Under the circumstances it would scarcely be just to pass judgment on him after this single hearing. However, he plays as if it were a pleasure to him, and in a vein that is decidedly artistic, and he also has a personal magnetism that counts for much. It may be added that he is without trickery of any kind, and that he has a fire and an emotional feeling that carry his hearers with him. As has been said, his success was unequivocal, and it is to be hoped that he may be heard here again in a programme arranged to present him at his best.

The selections for the next concert, which is to be given on the evening of Dec. 28, are: Suite, Bach; Largo, Handel; Turkish march, Mozart; Symphony No. 1, Beethoven. The soloist is to be announced later.

[57]

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 8, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The audience which assembled in Music Hall last night had the pleasure of listening to the most enjoyable concert of the Symphony series thus far given. The programme was a broad one, and every number was rendered magnificently. Further than this there proved to be a genuine surprise in store for the audience in the really brilliant piano playing of Mr. Martinus Sieveking.

Mr. Sieveking may be said to have made his appearance in this city quite unheralded, for beyond the mere fact that he was to be the soloist at the seventh concert, and that he hails from Holland, little or nothing was known of him. He is a rather distinguished looking gentleman and rather modest, but an artist to his fingers' tips. The Saint-Saens concerto, No. 2, has been frequently heard here. In fact, it is a rather popular composition with advanced pianists, since it affords an excellent opportunity for a show of technique. The first movement was passed over with but the ordinary amount of recognition on the part of the audience, but immediately Mr. Sieveking began the scherzo movement it became evident that his playing was of a superior order, and by the time he had finished he had completely won his audience. His playing has a marked individuality and is marked by a directness of purpose and intensity. In the legarto and staccato passages he gave the greatest pleasure. His method of execution is simple and lacks entirely the mannerisms and tricks of many solo players, for which he is to be commended. The audience almost insisted on an encore, but they did manage to bring him out some seven times.

The remainder of the programme included the overture to "Nature" by Dvorak, and the overture to "Donna Diana," by Reznicek, both heard here for the first time. The first is full of quaint orchestral combinations, more interesting at the beginning than at any other portion; but the "Donna Diana" overture was as frolicsome a composition as has been heard at a Symphony for some time. From beginning to end it is a series of pretty developments, and one almost wished that the music of the entire opera might be played, if it was as charming as the overture. The Schumann Symphony No. 1 finished the programme and was magnificently played throughout.

The soloist at the next concert will be Mr. Franz Ondricek, violinist, and he will be heard in the Beethoven concerto.

Dec 15

SUNDAY HERALD

We all asked to give space for mention of this good cause, which we very gladly do. A former member of the Symphony orchestra some time ago became insane and is now under confinement on that account. Mr. Goldstein has a very deserving wife and children, and, at the suggestion of Mr. Paur, a concert will be given at the Boston Theatre on Sunday evening, Jan. 5, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Paderewski, Campanari and everybody who is to participate volunteering. The list of those who have already purchased tickets includes some of the very best people, many of them rehearsal and Symphony patrons.

Dec 15

BOSTON COURIER, SU

—A concert for the benefit of the family of Mr. A. Goldstein, formerly of the Symphony Orchestra, will be given at the Boston Theatre on Sunday evening, Jan. 5. Signor Campanini is to sing, Paderewski is to play and the entire symphony orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Paur will be heard to excellent advantage. The public, knowing of the sad affliction which has befallen Mr. Goldstein, will be glad to avail themselves of the opportunity to aid him, and at the same time enjoy the unusually fine programme offered.

Gazette

Dec 15

—A concert, tendered the family of Mr. A. Goldstein (a former member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra) by the courtesy of Mr. Emil Paur and the orchestra, with the valuable assistance of Mr. Paderewski, pianist, and Mr. G. Campanari, baritone, will take place Tuesday evening, Jan. 5, at the Boston Theatre. It will draw out a large audience, many of the smart set having already subscribed. Tickets may be had at the theatre and Music Hall box office.

Dec 15

GLOBE—SUNDAY, D

—On Sunday evening, Jan 5, in the Boston theater, a benefit concert will be given by the symphony orchestra, Paderewski and Campanari. Every performer offers his services, and the entire receipts will be given to the family of Mr A. Goldstein, a former member of the orchestra. The seats are now on sale at Music hall, and a large number of the regular season ticket holders to the concerts have purchased seats.

An amusing example of the "righteous indignation of unholy men" was that furnished by a certain Max Bachert of Boston, proprietor of an organization called the Boston Symphony Orchestral club, who recently brought suit against parties in New York to restrain them from using the words "The Boston Symphony Club" as a name for a concert company which they were forming. Despite the fact that the title of Bachert's "club" was borrowed (?) from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Mr. Nikisch is director and with which Bachert's "club" has had no connection at any time, the Judge of the Supreme Court in New York rendered a decision in Bachert's favor and he and his pilfered title are both

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 9, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert of Saturday was one that ought to satisfy the most extreme craving for modern works. In comparison with the Opus 91 of Dvorak and a new overture by Reznicek, even the Saint-Saens concerto could hardly be said to belong to the most recent era of music, while the Schumann symphony seemed like a voice from the dim past. The soloist, too, made his first Boston appearance, so the character of the concert was almost wholly contemporaneous.

The opening number was Dvorak's overture, "In der Natur." In this work the composer has regarded nature from a subjective point of view. There is little or no indulgence in shepherds' duets, alpine horns, or other conventional devices of programme music, but the whole piece thrills with the joyous emotions aroused by the freshness of natural beauty. It was evidently a Wagnerian landscape that Dvorak was looking at.

The powerful opening chords, with their drone-bass accompaniment, were not unlike the first few measures of the Siegfried Vorspiel, and when the auditor's imagination was once aroused it became easy for him to find numerous resemblances, all the way from the bird-calls in the Waldesweben to the final theme of Die Walkure. But this similarity is, after all, one of style rather than that of material, and does not detract from the originality of the work. Richness of orchestral coloring is one of the chief characteristics of modern music, and can not be monopolized by any one writer, while the accidental reminiscence of other themes is more than counterbalanced by the treatment and development, which stamps this work as Dvorak's own. The overture is not in the strictest shape, but the harmonic beauty and emotional power of most of its themes received their best expression in the freer form. The work as a whole is a very worthy one, and deserves a high place among modern compositions.

After this came the soloist. Bringing new pianists to Boston may seem a little like carrying coals to Newcastle, but in this case the experiment was a total and instant success. Martinus Sieveking proved himself an artist of high rank, and the enthusiasm he aroused showed that the audience appreciated him to the full. The Saint-Saens G-minor concerto, which he played, is not well suited to display every side of a performer's talent, as it demands less of poetic interpretation than of delicate crispness of execution; but the piano part is given prominence throughout, and affords many chances for the exercise of technical skill and brilliancy. The pianist's technique was of the phenomenal sort, and no doubt won most of his recalls.

The emotional side of his playing was not brought out to any extent, but in the qualities that were demanded by the piece he was fully adequate, and his performance of the work deserves warm commendation. A decided meed of praise must be given to pianist, conductor and orchestra for the remarkable clearness of tempo and precision of attack, especially in the difficult interweavings of the second movement.

Reznicek's overture to his opera, "Donna Diana," was of a somewhat lighter character. It was lively and dashing, full of delicious brightness, and sparkling with attractive harmonies. In one or two places it seemed rather theatrical, but on the whole its standard was exceptionally high for comic opera. Reznicek is a young Viennese composer, now director of the court theatre at Weimar. He has written four operas, of which "Donna Diana" is the latest and most successful.

It was in the beautiful "Spring" symphony of Schumann that the orchestra won its greatest triumph. Mr. Paur's reading of the work was full of dignity and nobility, and it formed an excellent climax for an unusually interesting concert. A detailed account of its presentation would reveal much to applaud and almost nothing to criticise.

It may not be out of place, however, to say that the very slow introduction seemed a trifle too slow, even for andante maestoso, and that one or two phrases in the exposition of the allegro seemed blurred by the rapidity of tempo; but these are minor points, and did not in the least impair the power of the movement as a whole, while the romantic beauty of the slow movement, the brusque gayety of the scherzo, and the dainty grace of the finale were all that could be desired.

Arthur Elson.

There is in Boston a gentleman of Israelitish descent named Max Borchert. He is the originator of a musical club not overwhelmingly large in numbers, as there are only seven members in the club. He called it the Boston Symphony Orchestral Club. Now this, with a very slight change, is the name of a superb organization that holds the highest position all over the country, and Mr. Borchert knew what he was about when he misapplied the well-known name to his own use. Shortly after the organization of the Boston Symphony Orchestral Club another enterprising fellow formed a similar club and named it the "Boston Symphony Club," whereupon Mr. Borchert, jumping at the conclusion that he had been damaged by the usurpation of that to which he had no legal right, brought suit against the proprietor of the Boston Symony Club for stealing the name. Worst of all, Borchert won the suit. And now the real Boston Symphony orchestra are wondering if Borchert will next make an attack upon them to prevent any further infringement upon his rights.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The seventh symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, brought the following programme:

Dvorak: Overture, "In der Natur," in F major, opus 91.
Saint-Saens: Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor, opus 22.
Reznicek: Overture to "Donna Diana." (First time.)
Schumann: Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, opus 38.

Mr. Martinus Sieveking was the pianist.

For general enjoyableness the concert was in sharp contrast with the preceding one: the principal two numbers—the Schumann symphony and the Saint-Saens concerto—were not only masterpieces in their way, but also quite familiar to the bulk of the audience; and the two overtures were interesting and pleasing novelties. We note, by the way, that the management of the Symphony Orchestra has begun to adopt a plan followed by some other musical organizations in the city: that of printing the number of the concert on the programme. It was, no doubt, with some surprise that many of last Saturday's audience read that this was the thirteen hundred and thirtieth concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra since its foundation in 1880; the seven hundred and seventeenth concert given in Boston. This is a pretty large record for not quite fifteen years!

As Dvorak's overture was not marked "first time" on the programme, we suppose it must have been given here before; but we certainly do not remember it. It is a work distinguished more by gracious musical beauty and a certain unobtrusive poetic imaginativeness than by originality. It is romantic in the best sense of the term; that is, poetic and intrinsically musical at the same time; the themes are full of grace and beauty, well and naturally worked out, and the whole composition organically and symmetrically developed. It is music such as is eminently pleasant to listen to. Only one finds little of the composer's specific individuality in it, and neither the themes themselves nor the general atmosphere of the composition seem particularly new. It was excellently well played.

Reznicek's light comic-opera overture is something quite different. The composer is a young Austro-Bohemian nobleman who has taken his musical calling unusually seriously for a man of his antecedents; he has adopted the musical profession in the fullest sense of the word, not contenting himself with composing, but earning his bread and butter also by conducting. After conducting at opera houses in towns of the third and fourth rank, like Graz, Zürich, Mainz and Stettin, he has risen to the conductorship of the court opera in Weimar, one of the most important posts in Germany. The very title of this overture of his is a recommendation to all who have delighted in Moreto's admirable comedy, "El desdén con el desdén." And this little preliminary glow of ready-made sympathy is only increased by finding in Reznicek's work an evident attempt to revive something of the old light comic-opera musical spirit. After the Wagnerian megalomania of Humperdinck's and Eugen d'Albert's preludes to alleged "fairy operas," it is refreshing to find some reflex of the old Rossini-Auber flash and sparkle again in an overture that has nothing to do with lyric tragedy. This overture to "Donna Diana" is of undeniably light calibre; if you look for that force of genius in it that could raise Mozart's rollicking little overture to "Figaro" to the level of a great work, you will be disappointed; but it is full of true humor, go, and dash; it sparkles like champagne; it is never vulgar, and is most deliciously scored. That a composition of this sort ought to hold a permanent place in the symphony concert repertory, may well be doubted; but it is eminently worthy of being introduced to the public at a symphony concert. We, for one, heard it with delight.

Schumann's B-flat symphony is ever welcome. Here is truly great music! One wishes that some means could be devised of overcoming the "panic terror" which attaches to that grand opening proclamation of the horns and trumpets, so that the mighty phrase should be played with complete assurance. In passages of this sort it often seems as if a conductor can do more harm than good; it is far easier for him to frighten his men than to reassure them and hold them together. Intrinsically the phrase is of the sort that ought to go all by itself, so full of rhythmic vitality is it. Last Saturday it went rather lamely and without authoritative boldness of emphasis. But, for the rest, the symphony was grandly given.

Saint-Saen's G minor concerto holds its own bravely as a work which one is ever ready to enjoy. Not a work on the most elevated plane, it is still so full of musical invention, so admirably written, and so wonderfully well scored, that it is always a true pleasure to hear it. Mr. Sieveking made, we believe, his first bow to a large Boston audience at this concert. His playing of the concerto was superb. He evidently possesses great physical strength, the exertion of which he, however, never pushes farther than the pianoforte can bear. His technique is exceedingly brilliant, if not invariably perfectly sure—now and then he strikes wrong notes. But he plays like a master, for all that. In the matter of style he is perhaps just a thought old-fashioned; he plays with more artistic measure than one is quite accustomed to nowadays, and does not by any means abuse the musical pepper-box. In the first movement of the concerto we felt that a little more outspoken grandiosity of manner would have done no harm; Saint-Saens himself takes this movement slower and with a more emphatic underscoring of "effects." But Mr. Sieveking played it with abundant vital force, superb bravura, and genuine depth of feeling. One only felt, in face of his noble simplicity of style, that Saint-Saens's music is really a little more sophisticated than all that, and that its full flavor cannot be got at by the simple methods that would apply to Beethoven. In the Allegretto scherzando Mr. Sieveking fell considerably farther short of the mark; he seemed to be less congenially at home in its light, tricksy [illegible] founder emotional region of the first movement. His playing was admirably brilliant and agile, but somewhat wanting in roguishness—what the French call "malice." In the saltarello finale, however, he carried everything before him. Since we heard the composer himself play this movement in London in 1879, we have heard no one make the effect with it that Mr. Sieveking did last Saturday. It was the ne plus ultra of irresistible bravura-playing, yet never really, so to speak, outrunning its own legs. As for technique, whew! how those terrible 3rds and 6ths went! It was thoroughly superb. The effect upon the audience was electric; the pianist was recalled seven times.

The next programme is: Brahms, symphony No. 4, in E minor; Beethoven, concerto for violin, in D major; Liszt, Hungarian Rhapsody: Mr. Franz Ondricek will be the violinist.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVIII., NO. 168.
SUNDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

M. Franz Cndricek, the Soloist, Made an Unmistakable Success.

The eighth concert of the current season of the Boston Symphony orchestra was listened to by a very large audience last evening. The programme was:

Symphony No. 4, in E minor.....Brahms
Concerto for violin.....Liszt
Rhapsody Hongroise, No. 2.....Liszt
(Arranged for orchestra by Karl Muller Berghaus.

The soloist was M. Franz Ondricek. The symphony is not the most interesting of its composer's works in its class, and the movement with which it ends, despite the ingenuity of the variations, on its brief chacenne theme, are steadily ugly and yawn-provoking. The andante, with its constant juggling between G sharp and G natural, which keeps the tonality in doubt, has a seriously striking originality and is peculiarly and pleasingly effective, despite its confusing effect on the ear; and the third movement, with its brightness and gay freshness, is thoroughly charming; but the work has many dry and depressing moments when the composer fully indulges his fondness for carrying thematic development to a point that becomes wearisome. The performance of the work was solid and brilliant, and it was read throughout by Mr. Paur with unbroken clearness. The now famous virtuosity of the orchestra was specially shown in the elaborate and difficult variations of the finale. A splendidly colored rendering of Berghaus' clever and effective arrangement of the Liszt rhapsody was given, the wind instruments in particular acquitting themselves with notable brilliancy. M. Pourtau's performance of the brilliant cadenzas was a superb display of technique in its fiery dash, its pearly clearness and its exquisitely pure tone. The whole interpretation was stirringly fine and impressively sympathetic. The music, it is true, is a sort of refined clap-trap, but its treatment imparted both dignity and artistic interest to it.

Mr. Ondricek, who was welcomed with great heartiness, made an unmistakable success with his audience. He was loudly applauded at the end of the first movement of the concerto, and was recalled at the close of his performance four times with excited enthusiasm. He is a spirited player, immaculately true in intonation, with an able and a daring technique, equal to all emergencies, and a style at once earnest and artistic. His bowing is large, free and graceful, and his phrasing musicianly. His tone is not large, nor is it notably warm, but it is clear and manly. It did not appear that the Beethoven concerto was best calculated to bring out what are the most striking and most characteristic qualities of his style and of his individuality as a virtuoso, and it was made evident that he would have been heard to much better advantage in a work calling for a more modern technique and sentiment than does this one. Under the circumstances it would scarcely be just to pass judgment on him after this single hearing. However, he plays as if it were a pleasure to him, and in a vein that is decidedly artistic, and he also has a personal magnetism that counts for much. It may be added that he is without trickery of any kind, and that he has a fire and an emotional feeling that carry his hearers with him. As has been said, his success was unequivocal, and it is to be hoped that he may be heard here again in a programme arranged to present him at his best.

The selections for the next concert, which is to be given on the evening of Dec. 28, are: Suite, Bach; Largo, Handel; Turkish march, Mozart; Symphony No. 1, Beethoven. The soloist is to be announced later.

[57]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1895.

1337.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its second concert in New York city at the Metropolitan Opera House December 19. It will be its 1,337th performance since its foundation fourteen years ago. How eloquent these figures are. Here is our own Philharmonic Society over a half century in existence, and we would like to know if it can show such a dazzling record!

Little wonder then that Boston's band easily ranks at the top. There is no orchestra in the United States like it; no orchestra in the world like it. What orchestra plays with the supreme finish of this one, despite the gaucherie of its present leader? Fourteen years of incessant rehearsing, think of it gentlemen of the New York Philharmonic Society! Who will dare dispute the claim that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the national orchestra of this land? Some day our sleepy old Philharmonic Society will awaken to the fact that it has been hopelessly outpaced in the race for perfection. The sooner the better say we. It would be a good thing to rehearse more frequently, gentlemen of the Philharmonic Society. Think of Boston's orchestra and rehearse, rehearse, never cease rehearsing.

A REMARKABLE RECORD.

1,339 Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Since its inception, fourteen years ago, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in addition to its annual series of forty-eight concerts in Boston, has made seven Western trips, and in the past eleven years monthly trips of one week's duration to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, and has also visited all the principal New England cities. Including the second monthly trip of this season, which ends on December 21, this now famous organization has given the really remarkable total number of thirteen hundred and thirty-nine performances, thus establishing a record that probably cannot be duplicated in the world. Some of the older European orchestras have been in existence many more years, and our own New York Philharmonic Society, the parent orchestral organization of this country, can show more than fifty years to its credit; but the lesser number of concerts given annually so reduces the total number that the Boston Symphony Orchestra undoubtedly heads the list. Seven hundred and nineteen performances have been given in Boston, and six hundred and twenty in thirty-seven cities throughout the United States, from Maine to Minnesota. Cambridge, Mass., with a series of ninety-seven concerts, which began the first year of the orchestra's existence, and which are held under the auspices of Harvard College in their Memorial Hall, heads the list of cities visited, which we append below, with the total number of concerts given in each city:—

Cambridge,	97	New Bedford,	8
Philadelphia,	49	Detroit,	7
Providence,	47	St. Louis,	6
New York,	44	Columbus,	6
Washington,	44	Springfield, Mass.,	6
Brooklyn,	42	Lowell,	6
Baltimore,	35	Fitchburg,	6
Worcester,	25	Milwaukee,	5
Portland, Me.,	22	Lynn,	5
New Haven,	21	Ann Arbor Uni.,	4
Chicago,	16	Rochester, N.Y.,	3
Buffalo,	15	Taunton,	3
Pittsburg,	13	Newport, R.I.,	3
Cleveland,	10	Richmond, Va.,	2
Louisville,	10	Grand Rapids,	2
Salem, Mass.,	10	Norwich, Conn.,	2
Fall River,	10	Lawrence,	2
Cincinnati,	9	Haverhill,	2
Hartford,	8	Syracuse,	2

St. Paul, Minneapolis, Toledo, Albany, Erie, Melrose, Lewiston, and Wakefield, one each.

With such a remarkable grand total of performances given there is naturally unlimited opportunity for detailed statistics of the greatest variety. Lack of space prevents an extended array of figures; but attention is called to the fact that, assuming an average of five selections for each concert, there have been between six and seven thousand numbers performed. Over one thousand soloists have appeared, something over one-half of them singers, and the rest divided among pianists, violinists and violoncellists. Bearing in mind that all the performances given by the orchestra en route are made up of selections already played in the Boston concerts, there have been over fifteen hundred private rehearsals. It is also worthy of note that ten of the members of the orchestra the first season still remain with the organization, and over one-half the orchestra have been members for ten years.

As the Boston Symphony Orchestra is an organization founded and maintained by a private citizen, it has always been the policy of the management to refrain from the publication of any financial details; but it is safe to assert that even the most moderate average receipts would result in an enormous sum of money expended in the patronage bestowed upon these concerts. Seventeen States are represented in the list of cities given above, excellent evidence that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now a National organization.

The program of the seventh Symphony concert, December 7, the 1,330th performance by the orchestra, and the 717th performance in Boston, was as follows:

Overture, Nature (first time)..... Dvorák
Concerto for piano, No. 2, G minor..... Saint-Saëns
Overture to Donna Diana (first time)..... Reznicek
Symphony No. 1, B flat major..... Schumann

The feature of the concert, in spite of the many excellences in the performance of Mr. Martinus Sieveking, was the acquaintanceship with Reznicek's overture. I do not know whether you have heard it in New York; it is likely that you know it; here in Boston novelties come late. This overture is conspicuous for its spontaneity, grace, originality, and, above all, for its true comedy spirit. It is the tendency of many Germans to exhaust the resources of the orchestra and the patience of the hearers by attempting to be profound and symbolical when they are setting a light and sparkling subject to music. This overture of Reznicek is full of chatter, badinage, woman's laughter, playful intrigue, ironical reflections. Itself is pure comedy from beginning to end. Masterly is the treatment of the chief theme, and the instrumentation is a surprise and a delight.

I hunted about to learn something of Emil Nikolaus von Reznicek. The Signale said lately that he was the son of an officer of high rank; that he was born in Vienna in 1860, and that about 1880 he studied at the Leipsic Conservatory.

Does anyone over here know the merits or the weaknesses of these operas by him: The Maid of Orleans, Prague, 1887; Satanella, Prague, 1888; Emmerich Fortuna, Prague, 1889? Reznicek is his own librettist. A requiem mass by him was performed in Prague in November, 1894.

The overture by Dvorák seemed inconsequential and long drawn out. The dress was brave and glittering, but the body was poorly nourished and of little substance.

Mr. Martinus Sieveking is a pianist of fluent and equally developed technic. His touch is eminently agreeable. In bravura passages he plays as a rule with crystalline clearness and with a certain unostentatious distinction. And there was something last evening very charming about his performance. He came dangerously near belittling the first movement by an abuse of ritardando, and the first measures of the second movement were none too clear. But with these exceptions his performance was such as to elicit genuine admiration. The audience, charmed by him, recalled him again and again. PHILIP HALE.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 15.

The Symphony Concert.

The following is the programme of the eighth symphony concert, given in Music Hall last evening:

Symphony No. 3, E-minor..... Brahms
Concerto for violin, D-major..... Beethoven
Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2..... Liszt
(Scored by Karl Muller Bergham.)
Soloist, Mr. Franz Ondricek.

The Brahms symphony was finely interpreted, so finely and sympathetically that not a single beauty was missed and it was easy to follow the complex thoughts of the composer in all their mutations. The pleasure was great, but it was purely intellectual, which seems to be the result at which modern genius aims. It may be, however, that in a large work of art feeling counts for as much as intellect, and it has yet to be proved that complexity of thought is the highest distinctive mark of things aesthetic. So far as art-loving mortals are concerned the sublimity of thought that is above human understanding and feeling has no higher claim to consideration than that which is beneath the level of thought. In listening, admiringly always, to his works one wishes that Brahms would occasionally forget that he had been called a Grecian and that Schumann had said that the graces and the gods have been his guardians. It is rarely by merely wishing that a man can acquire the heroic proportions of a Pheidian statue, and the effort of continually posing for an ideal must tell even on the best organized nervous tissue. Brahms is so great that one is continually regretting that he is not greater, and regret becomes tinged with indignation when the suspicion arises that the flight of his wings is impeded by the weight of his academical gown. In this noble fourth symphony, for example, what a fine relief there would be if the master now and then allowed us to forget that he had full control of his thoughts and allowed inspiration to take care of itself, or seem to take care of itself. The scholar, however, always rises above the prophet. Brahms is a Greek, and unfortunately centuries of civilization have converted us into Goths, and our king is Wagner.

Of the soloist of the evening, Mr. Franz Ondricek, it would be uncritical to judge, after one hearing; but there is surely no mistake in recognizing him as the gifted artist. He has passion and feeling, brilliancy and dash, and an individuality that overtops every other charactistic, an individuality that impresses one from the start, and abides with one to the end. Then he has a beautiful clearness and purity of intonation and a wild and abrupt impetuosity, the finest grace and tenderness and a technical skill that places him in the front rank as a composer. That he is entirely satisfactory as a Beethoven player cannot be asserted, for he is lacking in largeness, power and majesty. At times there are an unaccountable jerkiness in his playing, a splitting of large phrases into small sentences, and a pretty sentimentalism that are foreign to the genius of Beethoven. Want of space prevents us from going into details, and we can only generalize the sum of the impressions produced by Mr. Ondricek, by saying that his work is marked by sweetness and ease, rather than by dignity and majesty. He is an artist by instinct, but one is more interested in his personality than in his interpretations, a second hearing may modify this judgment, and a man may be a virtuoso without reaching up to the height of a Beethoven.

There will be no symphony concert next week.

Eighth Symphony Concert of the Fifteenth Season — Franz Ondricek, Violinist, Makes His Debut in Boston—Announcements for the Coming Week.

The program of the 1338d performance of the Symphony Orchestra and the 719th in Boston was as follows:

Symphony No. 4, in E mino.r..... Brahms
Concerto for violin, in D major.... Beethoven
(Cadenzas by Joachim.)
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2..... Liszt
(Scored by Mueller-Berghaus.)

The last movement of the fourth symphony of Brahms is still for many a hard nut. They admit gladly the power of the first movement and the strange beauty of the andante, with its shifting or uncertain tonality and its hint at the priests' chorus in the first act of "Aida;" but they cannot crack or do not care to crack the tough shell of the finale. Basso ostinato, passa caglia or chaconne variations—these are fine words. A little definite music would be more to the purpose. As the fourth symphony is to the first, so is the third to the second, and of all these the third is that which undoubtedly pleases the greatest number of musicians and music lovers. It is over ten years since this fourth symphony was first played at Meiningen. Shall we have a fifth from the son of the double bass player? Or is he, as some claim, at the end of his honorable career? Surely the compositions of his last years do not promise greatly for future works of long breath.

* * *

The wild Hungarian rhapsody has been played here with greater fire and freedom, but I doubt if anywhere or at any time has there been a more admirable display of all that is artistic in clarinet playing than that given by Mr. Pourtau. Already in the symphony of Brahms he had made the audience rejoice in his presence. In the rhapsody he showed that a great artist can ennoble triviality or even vulgarity in a catch-penny cadenza. For purity and beauty of tone, brilliancy, audacity of technique, distinction in phrasing, and modest yet unmistakable authority, Mr. Pourtau's performance last night was one long to be remembered. And in this connection it may be added that the work of the wood-wind was conspicuously good throughout the evening, as, in fact, was the technical performance of the whole orchestra.

* * *

Mr. Ondricek met with undoubted popular success, if applause and recalls are any sure manifestations of honest pleasure. He has played the concerto of Beethoven many, many times. In the sketch of his life, on another page of the Journal, allusion is made to this fact. I first heard him in Berlin in February, 1884. He then played this same concerto, and, as I remember, he played it better than he did last evening. Eleven years of wandering virtuoso life are apt to tell on the solidity and the true artistry of any violinist. Now, there was last evening much to praise in Mr. Ondricek's performance, from the technical as well as the spiritual standpoint. It seemed, however, that the concerto itself is not the touchstone of his temperament. It seemed as though it irked him; as though he were eager to break away from it and to find some more congenial, larger outlet for his stormy nature. I say stormy,—and yet this is only an impression; even in fiery passages, he might remain cold, or he might show violence,—not to be despised at times,—rather than any controlled passion or depth of feeling. Would that he had chosen another concerto! For, surely, Mr. Ondricek did not gain his pronounced European reputation by the performance of this concerto alone. I confess that last night he did not move me. Yet many must have been moved, or they would not have been so vigorous in their applause of this modest, unassuming man. Let us have an opportunity of hearing Mr. Ondricek in a recital where he can play pieces that test his versatility and put in full light his temperament and virtuosoship.

PHILIP HALE.

* * *

Franz Ondriczek, or Ondricek, the violinist, who made his début in Boston at the Symphony concert last evening and whose portrait is in the illustrated section of the Journal, was born at Prague, April 29, 1859. He is the son of a professional musician, who was then the violinist at the Landes Theatre. The father was the son's first teacher, and as he led a sort of orchestra for dancing, the boy was able to play in it at a very early age. At the age of 7 Franz played concertos of de Beriot and when he was 14 he entered the conservatory at Prague. Three years after he took the first prize by his performance of the Beethoven concerto. A merchant in the city took enough interest in him to give him the money for study in Paris. Franz entered the famous conservatory, was a pupil of Massart and shared the first prize with Achille Rivarde and Mendels in 1879.

After this honor he sojourned in Paris and other towns of France, appearing in concerts, as those of Pasdeloup, for two years. Since then he has led the life of a wandering virtuoso. When he appeared in Vienna in 1882, Hanslick likened him to Ferdinand Laub, also of Prague, who was born in 1832 and died in 1875. They say that he is the only one to whom Achille Paganini showed the body of his father; for he invaded the vault to thus give testimony of his admiration. But this story is told of other violinists.

Mr. Ondriczek made his début in this country at New York, Nov. 15-16, 1895, when he played Dvorak's concerto.

PHILIP HALE.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1895.

1337.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its second concert in New York city at the Metropolitan Opera House December 19. It will be its 1,337th performance since its foundation fourteen years ago. How eloquent these figures are. Here is our own Philharmonic Society over a half century in existence, and we would like to know if it can show such a dazzling record!

Little wonder then that Boston's band easily ranks at the top. There is no orchestra in the United States like it; no orchestra in the world like it. What orchestra plays with the supreme finish of this one, despite the gaucherie of its present leader? Fourteen years of incessant rehearsing, think of it gentlemen of the New York Philharmonic Society! Who will dare dispute the claim that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the national orchestra of this land? Some day our sleepy old Philharmonic Society will awaken to the fact that it has been hopelessly outpaced in the race for perfection. The sooner the better say we. It would be a good thing to rehearse more frequently, gentlemen of the Philharmonic Society. Think of Boston's orchestra and rehearse, rehearse, never cease rehearsing.

A REMARKABLE RECORD.

1,339 Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Since its inception, fourteen years ago, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in addition to its annual series of forty-eight concerts in Boston, has made seven Western trips, and in the past eleven years monthly trips of one week's duration to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, and has also visited all the principal New England cities. Including the second monthly trip of this season, which ends on December 21, this now famous organization has given the really remarkable total number of thirteen hundred and thirty-nine performances, thus establishing a record that probably cannot be duplicated in the world. Some of the older European orchestras have been in existence many more years, and our own New York Philharmonic Society, the parent orchestral organization of this country, can show more than fifty years to its credit; but the lesser number of concerts given annually so reduces the total number that the Boston Symphony Orchestra undoubtedly heads the list. Seven hundred and nineteen performances have been given in Boston, and six hundred and twenty in thirty-seven cities throughout the United States, from Maine to Minnesota. Cambridge, Mass., with a series of ninety-seven concerts, which began the first year of the orchestra's existence, and which are held under the auspices of Harvard College in their Memorial Hall, heads the list of cities visited, which we append below, with the total number of concerts given in each city:—

Cambridge,	97	New Bedford,	8
Philadelphia,	49	Detroit,	7
Providence,	47	St. Louis,	6
New York,	44	Columbus,	6
Washington,	44	Springfield, Mass.,	6
Brooklyn,	42	Lowell,	6
Baltimore,	35	Fitchburg,	6
Worcester,	25	Milwaukee,	5
Portland, Me.,	22	Lynn,	5
New Haven,	21	Ann Arbor Uni.,	4
Chicago,	16	Rochester, N.Y.,	3
Buffalo,	15	Taunton,	3
Pittsburg,	13	Newport, R.I.,	3
Cleveland,	10	Richmond, Va.,	2
Louisville,	10	Grand Rapids,	2
Salem, Mass.,	10	Norwich, Conn.,	2
Fall River,	10	Lawrence,	2
Cincinnati,	9	Haverhill,	2
Hartford,	8	Syracuse,	2

St. Paul, Minneapolis, Toledo, Albany, Erie, Melrose, Lewiston, and Wakefield, one each.

With such a remarkable grand total of performances given there is naturally unlimited opportunity for detailed statistics of the greatest variety. Lack of space prevents an extended array of figures; but attention is called to the fact that, assuming an average of five selections for each concert, there have been between six and seven thousand numbers performed. Over one thousand soloists have appeared, something over one-half of them singers, and the rest divided among pianists, violinists and violoncellists. Bearing in mind that all the performances given by the orchestra en route are made up of selections already played in the Boston concerts, there have been over fifteen hundred private rehearsals. It is also worthy of note that ten of the members of the orchestra the first season still remain with the organization, and over one-half the orchestra have been members for ten years.

As the Boston Symphony Orchestra is an organization founded and maintained by a private citizen, it has always been the policy of the management to refrain from the publication of any financial details; but it is safe to assert that even the most moderate average receipts would result in an enormous sum of money expended in the patronage bestowed upon these concerts. Seventeen States are represented in the list of cities given above, excellent evidence that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now a National organization.

The program of the seventh Symphony concert, December 7, the 1,330th performance by the orchestra, and the 717th performance in Boston, was as follows:

Overture, Nature (first time)..... Dvorák
Concerto for piano, No. 2, G minor.....Saint-Saëns
Overture to Donna Diana (first time)..... Reznicek
Symphony No. 1, B flat major .....Schumann

The feature of the concert, in spite of the many excellences in the performance of Mr. Martinus Sieveking, was the acquaintanceship with Reznicek's overture. I do not know whether you have heard it in New York; it is likely that you know it; here in Boston novelties come late. This overture is conspicuous for its spontaneity, grace, originality, and, above all, for its true comedy spirit. It is the tendency of many Germans to exhaust the resources of the orchestra and the patience of the hearers by attempting to be profound and symbolical when they are setting a light and sparkling subject to music. This overture of Reznicek is full of chatter, badinage, woman's laughter, playful intrigue, ironical reflections. Itself is pure comedy from beginning to end. Masterly is the treatment of the chief theme, and the instrumentation is a surprise and a delight.

I hunted about to learn something of Emil Nikolaus von Reznicek. The Signale said lately that he was the son of an officer of high rank; that he was born in Vienna in 1860, and that about 1880 he studied at the Leipsic Conservatory.

Does anyone over here know the merits or the weaknesses of these operas by him: The Maid of Orleans, Prague, 1887; Satanella, Prague, 1888; Emmerich Fortuna, Prague, 1889? Reznicek is his own librettist. A requiem mass by him was performed in Prague in November, 1894.

The overture by Dvorák seemed inconsequential and long drawn out. The dress was brave and glittering, but the body was poorly nourished and of little substance.

Mr. Martinus Sieveking is a pianist of fluent and equally developed technic. His touch is eminently agreeable. In bravura passages he plays as a rule with crystalline clearness and with a certain unostentatious distinction. And there was something last evening very charming about his performance. He came dangerously near belittling the first movement by an abuse of ritardando, and the first measures of the second movement were none too clear. But with these exceptions his performance was such as to elicit genuine admiration. The audience, charmed by him, recalled him again and again.

PHILIP HALE.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 15.

The Symphony Concert.

The following is the programme of the eighth symphony concert, given in Music Hall last evening:

Symphony No. 3, E-minor.....Brahms
Concerto for violin, D-major.....Beethoven
Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2.....Liszt
(Scored by Karl Muller Bergham.)
Soloist, Mr. Franz Ondricek.

The Brahms symphony was finely interpreted, so finely and sympathetically that not a single beauty was missed and it was easy to follow the complex thoughts of the composer in all their mutations. The pleasure was great, but it was purely intellectual, which seems to be the result at which modern genius aims. It may be, however, that in a large work of art feeling counts for as much as intellect, and it has yet to be proved that complexity of thought is the highest distinctive mark of things aesthetic. So far as art-loving mortals are concerned the sublimity of thought that is above human understanding and feeling has no higher claim to consideration than that which is beneath the level of thought. In listening, admiringly always, to his works one wishes that Brahms would occasionally forget that he had been called a Grecian and that Schumann had said that the graces and the gods have been his guardians. It is rarely by merely wishing that a man can acquire the heroic proportions of a Pheidian statue, and the effort of continually posing for an ideal must tell even on the best organized nervous tissue. Brahms is so great that one is continually regretting that he is not greater, and regret becomes tinged with indignation when the suspicion arises that the flight of his wings is impeded by the weight of his academical gown. In this noble fourth symphony, for example, what a fine relief there would be if the master now and then allowed us to forget that he had full control of his thoughts and allowed inspiration to take care of itself, or seem to take care of itself. The scholar, however, always rises above the prophet. Brahms is a Greek, and unfortunately centuries of civilization have converted us into Goths, and our king is Wagner.

Of the soloist of the evening, Mr. Franz Ondricek, it would be uncritical to judge, after one hearing; but there is surely no mistake in recognizing him as the gifted artist. He has passion and feeling, brilliancy and dash, and an individuality that overtops every other charactistic, an individuality that impresses one from the start, and abides with one to the end. Then he has a beautiful clearness and purity of intonation and a wild and abrupt impetuosity, the finest grace and tenderness and a technical skill that places him in the front rank as a composer. That he is entirely satisfactory as a Beethoven player cannot be asserted, for he is lacking in largeness, power and majesty. At times there are an unaccountable jerkiness in his playing, a splitting of large phrases into small sentences, and a pretty sentimentalism that are foreign to the genius of Beethoven. Want of space prevents us from going into details, and we can only generalize the sum of the impressions produced by Mr. Ondricek, by saying that his work is marked by sweetness and ease, rather than by dignity and majesty. He is an artist by instinct, but one is more interested in his personality than in his interpretations, a second hearing may modify this judgment, and a man may be a virtuoso without reaching up to the height of a Beethoven.

There will be no symphony concert next week.

Boston Journal

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1895.

Eighth Symphony Concert of the Fifteenth Season — Franz Ondricek, Violinist, Makes His Debut in Boston—Announcements for the Coming Week.

The program of the 1338d performance of the Symphony Orchestra and the 719th in Boston was as follows:

Symphony No. 4, in E minor.....Brahms
Concerto for violin, in D major....Beethoven
(Cadenzas by Joachim.)
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2.....Liszt
(Scored by Mueller-Berghaus.)

The last movement of the fourth symphony of Brahms is still for many a hard nut. They admit gladly the power of the first movement and the strange beauty of the andante, with its shifting or uncertain tonality and its hint at the priests' chorus in the first act of "Aida;" but they cannot crack or do not care to crack the tough shell of the finale. Basso ostinato, passa caglia or chaconne variations—these are fine words. A little definite music would be more to the purpose. As the fourth symphony is to the first, so is the third to the second, and of all these the third is that which undoubtedly pleases the greatest number of musicians and music lovers. It is over ten years since this fourth symphony was first played at Meiningen. Shall we have a fifth from the son of the double bass player? Or is he, as some claim, at the end of his honorable career? Surely the compositions of his last years do not promise greatly for future works of long breath.

* * *

The wild Hungarian rhapsody has been played here with greater fire and freedom, but I doubt if anywhere or at any time has there been a more admirable display of all that is artistic in clarinet playing than that given by Mr. Pourtau. Already in the symphony of Brahms he had made the audience rejoice in his presence. In the rhapsody he showed that a great artist can ennoble triviality or even vulgarity in a catch-penny cadenza. For purity and beauty of tone, brilliancy, audacity of technique, distinction in phrasing, and modest yet unmistakable authority, Mr. Pourtau's performance last night was one long to be remembered. And in this connection it may be added that the work of the wood-wind was conspicuously good throughout the evening, as, in fact, was the technical performance of the whole orchestra.

* * *

Mr. Ondricek met with undoubted popular success, if applause and recalls are any sure manifestations of honest pleasure. He has played the concerto of Beethoven many, many times. In the sketch of his life, on another page of the Journal, allusion is made to this fact. I first heard him in Berlin in February, 1884. He then played this same concerto, and, as I remember, he played it better than he did last evening. Eleven years of wandering virtuoso life are apt to tell on the solidity and the true artistry of any violinist. Now, there was last evening much to praise in Mr. Ondricek's performance, from the technical as well as the spiritual standpoint. It seemed, however, that the concerto itself is not the touchstone of his temperament. It seemed as though it irked him; as though he were eager to break away from it and to find some more congenial, larger outlet for his stormy nature. I say stormy,—and yet this is only an impression; even in fiery passages, he might remain cold, or he might show violence,—not to be despised at times,—rather than any controlled passion or depth of feeling. Would that he had chosen another concerto! For, surely, Mr. Ondricek did not gain his pronounced European reputation by the performance of this concerto alone. I confess that last night he did not move me. Yet many must have been moved, or they would not have been so vigorous in their applause of this modest, unassuming man. Let us have an opportunity of hearing Mr. Ondricek in a recital where he can play pieces that test his versatility and put in full light his temperament and virtuosoship.

PHILIP HALE.

* * *

Franz Ondriczek, or Ondricek, the violinist, who made his début in Boston at the Symphony concert last evening and whose portrait is in the illustrated section of the Journal, was born at Prague, April 29, 1859. He is the son of a professional musician, who was then the violinist at the Landes Theatre. The father was the son's first teacher, and as he led a sort of orchestra for dancing, the boy was able to play in it at a very early age. At the age of 7 Franz played concertos of de Beriot and when he was 14 he entered the conservatory at Prague. Three years after he took the first prize by his performance of the Beethoven concerto. A merchant in the city took enough interest in him to give him the money for study in Paris. Franz entered the famous conservatory, was a pupil of Massart and shared the first prize with Achille Rivarde and Mendels in 1879.

After this honor he sojourned in Paris and other towns of France, appearing in concerts, as those of Pasdeloup, for two years. Since then he has led the life of a wandering virtuoso. When he appeared in Vienna in 1882, Hanslick likened him to Ferdinand Laub, also of Prague, who was born in 1832 and died in 1875. They say that he is the only one to whom Achille Paganini showed the body of his father; for he invaded the vault to thus give testimony of his admiration. But this story is told of other violinists.

Mr. Ondriczek made his début in this country at New York, Nov. 15-16, 1895, when he played Dvorak's concerto.

PHILIP HALE.

...SDAY, DEC. 15, 1895.

...Eighth Symphony Concert.

...celebrated violinist, Franz On... was the soloist at the eighth ...ony concert, the program of ... was as follows: Symphony No. ... E minor, Brahms; concerto for ... in D major, Beethoven; Hungar... rhapsody No. 2, Liszt. The Bee... concerto, probably the most dif... written for the violin, severely ... the abilities of any artist, and ... commendation is due Mr On... for a fine interpretation of this ... composition. The artist's tones ... pure, whether in singles or in ... the harmonies are very sweet ... clear and all difficulties in rapid ... fingering especially staccato, were deft... surmounted and smoothly executed. ... bowing, as a rule, was free from a ... quality in the forte passages and ... the cadenzas he met every require... artistically and with technical ... precision. In the second part of the ... concerto the solo elaborations of the ... theme by the united strings were de... lightfully delicate. The dance themes ... were also brilliantly played. The artist ... was greeted with tumultuous enthus... asm at the close of his performance.

The Brahms overture was admirably played by the orchestra. The many strange cross harmonies which run through this work were given with the usual weird effect, and the musical conflict at times seemed almost unearthly. Mr Paur conducted with authority, possibly accentuating the peculiarities of the overture somewhat too forcefully. The Beethoven number was the artistic success of the program, and showed the perfect team work of the members. The Liszt "Rhapsody" was given with due sonority in the first part, closing with a joyous musical revel in the Friska. The latter was specially spirited, and put the audience in thorough good humor.

The remarkable record of the Boston symphony orchestral concerts probably cannot be duplicated in the world of musical performances. Last night's concert was the 1333d by the organization and the 719th given by the orchestra in this city. Some of the famous orchestras of Europe can show many years more of existence, and the New York philharmonic society, the parent of orchestras in this country, has half a century's work to point to. But the concerts given annually by all these organizations are few in number, while the activity of the Boston organization is practically only limited by the number of days and nights in the season.

Outside of this city Cambridge heads the list with 98 concerts, which began the first year of the orchestra's existence. In no less than 45 other cities and towns in the United States has the Boston symphony orchestra given concerts, from Maine ont to Minnesota. New York, Washington, Philadelphia, Providence, Brooklyn, Baltimore, Chicago, Pittsburg, Louisville, Cincinnati, Milwaukee, St Paul and Minneapolis are among the principal cities visited.

Assuming an average of four selections for each concert, the orchestra has played some 5000 or 6000 numbers. More than a thousand soloists have appeared with the orchestra, about half of them vocalists and among them pianists, violinists and cellists. The standing of the soloists appearing with this orchestra is well known. By its work in 17 states of the union the Boston symphony orchestra may, perhaps, reasonably claim to be the national orchestra.

There will be no concerts this week. The program for Dec 27 and 28 is as follows: Suite, Bach; Largo, Handel; "Turkish March," Mozart, and Beethoven's symphony No. 1. The soloist will be announced later.

French and Italian Opera.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 15, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT, ETC.

The eighth Symphony concert—the 1333rd in the orchestra's full sequence—was popularly notable because it introduced to Boston the Bohemian violinist, Mr. Frank Ondricek. He is an artist who will probably be distinguished in memory more for delicacy than depth, for fancy than for force, for velocity than vehemence, for sweetness than for spirit, for elegance than for emotion. At his debut in New York he played from his countryman—Dvorak—but here in Boston he chose that chief among classics, the one concerto of Beethoven. His performance was alike beautiful and masterly within those lines of discrimination which we have just hinted. His execution was as flawless and free as it was easy and light, his bowing elastic and sweeping, his finger work of perfect distinction, his tone always smooth, persuasive and tender, and in its upper range of that aerial purity which we scarcely expect elsewhere than in harmonies. His phrasing was just and his taste refined and he shone especially in the short slow movement, and in the poising figures and rapid flights of the final allegro. In its genre, it was a performance of the first order and the player's numerous recalls were well won.

The orchestra began the concert with a fine and firm rendering of Brahms's fourth symphony, which has so much true beauty in its second movement, so much good spirit in its third and fourth, and in its first so many learnedly ugly passages than one cannot guess why the composer made them such, for they obscure and burden an exposition which might else edify and gratify. A magnificent performance of Liszt's second Hungarian rhapsody, in the famous orchestration of Muller-Berghaus, ended the programme. And if even that idol of some biassed New Yorkers, Mr. Nikisch, could inspire and cause a more scintillant, buoyant, kaleidoscopic and vitalised reading, we wish he would come over and do it. But then he couldn't.

No concert this week, and for next week this programme: Bach, Suite; a, Haendel, Largo; b. Mozart, Turkish March; Beethoven, Symphony No. 1. Soloist to be announced.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 15, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Another thoroughly enjoyable concert in what is thus far proving the best of the symphony season was that given last night. The Brahms Symphony No. 4 is always well received; Liszt's Hungarian rhapsody No. 2 will always retain its popularity, and add to this a most accomplished violinist in the person of Mr. Franz Ondricek, in the foremost of all violin concertos, Beethoven's D major, and it will easily be seen that here is a delightful programme.

Considerable interest naturally centred in Mr. Ondricek, and he has been rather extravagantly praised in the West. Much had therefore been expected of him, and it is but just to say that he almost realized the expectations of his audience. His method of execution is rather varied, but this feature would be more clearly brought out in a recital, when he would interpret the works of several composers. He has a perfect mastery of the instrument, and his technique is about all the most exacting could demand. The Beethoven concerto presents many technical difficulties, but he overcame them in the easiest possible manner. The short staccato notes fell from his instrument like rain drops, while the sweeping runs were as smooth and as easily executed as could be possible. Mr. Ondricek has perfect self-possession, a strong, sure and steady bow, and his fingers glide over the strings with remarkable smoothness and agility. He has a firm touch, and every note is brought out with great clearness. Especially pleasing was he in the larghetto movement, the beauty of which he seemed to be in sympathy with fully. The audience took very kindly to him, and he was recalled five times.

The Liszt rhapsody was given a magnificent rendering by the orchestra and was a happy ending to the programme.

There will be no concert next week, but for the week after Bach, Handel, Mozart and Beethoven will be the composers heard.

THE BALTIMOREAN.

303 East Baltimore Street.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The next Concert in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be given at the Music Hall, on Wednesday evening next, December 18, it will be the 1,336th performance by this organization since its foundation, 14 years ago. Seven hundred and nineteen performances have been given in Boston, and 615 in 57 cities throughout the United States, 35 of which were given in the city of Baltimore. The Boston Symphony, although but fourteen years old, can boast of having given a greater number of concerts than any other European or American organization of its kind. There have been between 6,000 and 7,000 numbers performed during its existence; over 1,000 soloists have appeared, something over one-half of them singers, and the balance divided among pianists, violinists and violon cellists.

The soloist for the next concert here will be Franz Ondricek, the famous violinist who, since his recent coming to this country, has created a furore in musical circles. The programme for the concert is as follows:

Haydn. . . . . Symphony No. 18.
Bruch. . . . . Concerto for violin, No. 1.
(a) Handel. . . . . Largo
(b) Mozart. . . . . Turkish March
Tschaikowsky. . . Fantasia for Orchestra, "Francesca da Rimini," Op. 32.
(First time at these concerts.)

SUNDAY GLOBE-

...AY, DECEMBER 15, 18...

—On Sunday evening, Jan 5, in the Boston theater, a benefit concert will be given by the symphony orchestra, Paderewski and Campanari. Every performer offers his services, and the entire receipts will be given to the family of Mr A. Goldstein, a former member of the orchestra. The seats are now on sale at Music hall, and a large number of the regular season ticket holders to the concerts have purchased seats.

—Friday afternoon's symphony rehearsal was the 1332d concert given by the organization and the 718th concert given in Boston.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eighth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, was as follows:

Brahms: Symphony No. 4, in E minor, opus 98.
Beethoven: Concerto for violin, in D major, opus 61.
(Cadenzas by Joachim.)
Liszt: Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2.
(Scored for orchestra by Karl Muller-Berghaus.)

Mr. Franz Ondricek was the violinist.

After a Brahms symphony one is somewhat inclined to wonder which particular one of his four one likes best; and the doubting scale of one's liking is very apt to dip in favor of the one heard last. This one in E minor seems, for the nonce, well-nigh matchless. It is not conceived in the grand vein of the symphonies in C minor and F major; it has neither the vast symphonic proportions and depth of passionateness of the former, nor the heroic sweep and constant contrasts of light and shade of the latter; but in a certain exquisiteness of poetic imagination it surpasses them both. It is also somewhat more concisely written than either; here Brahms shows less than usual of the Beethovenish "unwillingness to stop," and more of the French instinct for letting well-enough alone. The great work was excellently played; we were glad to see Mr. Paur cure his former over-slow tempo in the first movement, and no longer emphasize the "non troppo" in the composer's marking to the point of entirely effacing the "Allegro."

Müller-Berghaus has surely never done more entirely fine work in the way of orchestral arranging than in his transcription of Liszt's second rhapsody; to be sure, we have not yet heard his (said-to-be) wonderful arrangement of Beethoven's C-sharp minor quartet—an attempt which seems at first thought to verge dangerously on vandalism—but this transcription of Liszt's rhapsody certainly seems to stand well at the head of all work of the sort. It throws the arrangement of the same piece by Liszt himself and Doppler well into the shade. One can hardly believe it to have been made by the same man who made the coarse and vulgar arrangement of Rubinstein's Valse-Caprice! It was admirably played, Mr. Pourtau doing absolute wonders with the clarinet cadenzas.

Mr. Franz Ondricek, the noted Bohemian violinist, made his first bow before a Boston audience with the Beethoven concerto. His performance of the great work made a somewhat mixed impression upon us. For one thing, it should be said that the concerto was by no means well accompanied, especially in the first movement. In one way Mr. Ondricek's playing gave us unfeigned pleasure: it was generally free from a certain capricious excessiveness that has marred the performance of some great violinists who have visited this city—August Wilhelmj at the head of them. Wilhelmj's playing of the Beethoven concerto (also ill accompanied, by the way) is never to be forgotten by anyone who listened to it intently; we almost wish we had never heard it, for it has, in spite of ourselves, remained in our mind as a sort of background against which we have heard all subsequent performances of the work. Unspeakably grand in power and richness of tone, dazzling in its daring brilliancy of technique, and full of contagious warmth and fire, it was yet perhaps the most wantonly perverse piece of playing we have ever heard from a great performer. It was as if Wilhelmj had searched the (Wagnerian) scriptures to his own confusion. Yet, with all this, it had that in it which made it stick fast in the memory; and, as we have said, it keeps obstinately cropping up in our mind as a sort of diabolically distorted standard by which to judge other performances of the work. It is, as the French say, an "obsession" of which we cannot rid ourselves. When we hear a violinist steer clear of Wilhelmj's sins, we instinctively count it to his credit, and cannot help looking upon this purely negative virtue as a positive one. And this negative virtue Mr. Ondricek certainly has. He has, moreover, a fine, if not very large, tone; great, if somewhat superficial, brilliancy of technique; and considerable warmth of feeling; conspicuous personal magnetism and charm he also has. Yet we could not feel that he showed a totality of conception at all commensurate with the grandeur of the composition; if he seldom displeased or shocked us, he did not really carry us away. His playing was too often of the sort that goes in at one ear and out at the other; leaving no distinct impress upon the memory. Only now and then, in his playing of slow cantilena, did he show what we—with our present limited means of judging—are inclined to think his real Achilles heel; in such passages he seems to aim at emotional expressiveness too exclusively through beauty of tone and poignancy of accent, without taking into account the organic musical structure of the phrase he is playing. His phrasing is often downright bad, of the merely salon-sentimental sort—like Vladimir de Pachmann's, when the great pianist is at his worst (a vastly different thing from De Pachmann's phrasing at its best). Upon the whole, we liked Mr. Ondricek's playing of the slow movement (barring the cantabile passages) best. But there could be no doubt of the impression he produced upon the audience—and this is always worth considering—that was distinctly fine and vital; he was applauded to the echo.

The next programme is: Bach, suite in D minor; Haydn, symphony in G major (Breitkopf & Hartel, No. 13; Peters, No. 8); Handel, Largo from "Serse" (transcribed by Hellmesberger); Mozart, Turkish March from the A major sonata (transcribed by Herbeck); Beethoven, symphony No. 1, in C major, opus 21.

The rehearsal and concert come on Dec. 27 and 28 respectively; there will be no rehearsal and concert this week.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DEC. 14, 1895.

MARTINUS SIEVEKING ESSAYS THE SAINT-SAENS' PIANO CONCERTO IN BOSTON.

This artist appeared at the Seventh Concert of the Symphony Orchestra, and with what success, can be gleaned from the following critique in the "Gazette": The soloist was a most pleasant surprise; he came here unheralded and yet his work proved that he was a pianist of the very finest calibre. He is amply provided for in the way of technique; he conquers difficulties with the ease and grace of an approved master. His playing is clean, clear, and the workmanship is of the finest quality; it is strong, virile playing, without a trace of affected prettiness or morbid sentimentality. Nothing could have been more light and dainty and thoroughly artistic than the interpretation of the second movement of the concerto, or more brilliant or dashing than the Presto. Throughout the playing he carried the stamp of high artistic sincerity, and demonstrated that he is an artist, that is, an interpreter as well as a player, and all his work is marked with largeness of style, beauty of finish, and perfection of technique. Mr. Sieveking was received with the greatest enthusiasm and was recalled five times; an honor won by his merits alone, and these merits place him in the very first rank. If all his work is as fine as the first specimen given, he may have one or two equals, but no superiors.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC. 15, 1895.

Eighth Symphony Concert.

The celebrated violinist, Franz Ondricek, was the soloist at the eighth Symphony concert, the program of which was as follows: Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Brahms; concerto for violin in D major, Beethoven; Hungarian rhapsody No. 2, Liszt. The Beethoven concerto, probably the most difficult written for the violin, severely taxes the abilities of any artist, and general commendation is due Mr Ondricek for a fine interpretation of this complex composition. The artist's tones are pure, whether in singles or in chords, the harmonies are very sweet and clear and all difficulties in rapid fingering especially staccato, were deftly surmounted and smoothly executed. His bowing, as a rule, was free from a harsh quality in the forte passages and in the cadenzas he met every requirement artistically and with technical precision. In the second part of the concerto the solo elaborations of the theme by the united strings were delightfully delicate. The dance themes were also brilliantly played. The artist was greeted with tumultuous enthusiasm at the close of his performance.

The Brahms overture was admirably played by the orchestra. The many strange cross harmonies which run through this work were given with the usual weird effect, and the musical conflict at times seemed almost unearthly. Mr Paur conducted with authority, possibly accentuating the peculiarities of the overture somewhat too forcefully. The Beethoven number was the artistic success of the program, and showed the perfect team work of the members. The Liszt "Rhapsody" was given with due sonority in the first part, closing with a joyous musical revel in the Friska. The latter was specially spirited, and put the audience in thorough good humor.

The remarkable record of the Boston symphony orchestral concerts probably cannot be duplicated in the world of musical performances. Last night's concert was the 1333d by the organization and the 719th given by the orchestra in this city. Some of the famous orchestras of Europe can show many years more of existence, and the New York philharmonic society, the parent of orchestras in this country, has half a century's work to point to. But the concerts given annually by all these organizations are few in number, while the activity of the Boston organization is practically only limited by the number of days and nights in the season.

Outside of this city Cambridge heads the list with 98 concerts, which began the first year of the orchestra's existence. In no less than 45 other cities and towns in the United States has the Boston symphony orchestra given concerts, from Maine ont to Minnesota. New York, Washington, Philadelphia, Providence, Brooklyn, Baltimore, Chicago, Pittsburg, Louisville, Cincinnati, Milwaukee, St Paul and Minneapolis are among the principal cities visited.

Assuming an average of four selections for each concert, the orchestra has played some 5000 or 6000 numbers. More than a thousand soloists have appeared with the orchestra, about half of them vocalists and among them pianists, violinists and cellists The standing of the soloists appearing with this orchestra is well known. By its work in 17 states of the union the Boston symphony orchestra may, perhaps, reasonably claim to be the national orchestra.

There will be no concerts this week. The program for Dec 27 and 28 is as follows: Suite, Bach; Largo, Handel; "Turkish March," Mozart, and Beethoven's symphony No. 1. The soloist will be announced later.

French and Italian Opera.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 15, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT, ETC.

The eighth Symphony concert—the 1333rd in the orchestra's full sequence—was popularly notable because it introduced to Boston the Bohemian violinist, Mr. Frank Ondricek. He is an artist who will probably be distinguished in memory more for delicacy than depth, for fancy than for force, for velocity than vehemence, for sweetness than for spirit, for elegance than for emotion. At his debut in New York he played from his countryman—Dvorak—but here in Boston he chose that chief among classics, the one concerto of Beethoven. His performance was alike beautiful and masterly within those lines of discrimination which we have just hinted. His execution was as flawless and free as it was easy and light, his bowing elastic and sweeping, his finger work of perfect distinction, his tone always smooth, persuasive and tender, and in its upper range of that aerial purity which we scarcely expect elsewhere than in harmonies. His phrasing was just and his taste refined and he shone especiall in the short slow movement, and in the poising figures and rapid flights of the final allegro. In its genre, it was a performance of the first order and the player's numerous recalls were well won.

The orchestra began the concert with a fine and firm rendering of Brahms's fourth symphony, which has so much true beauty in its second movement, so much good spirit in its third and fourth, and in its first so many learnedly ugly passages than one cannot guess why the composer made them such, for they obscure and burden an exposition which might else edify and gratify. A magnificent performance of Liszt's second Hungarian rhapsody, in the famous orchestration of Muller-Berghans, ended the programme. And if even that idol of some biassed New Yorkers, Mr. Nikisch, could inspire and cause a more scintillant, buoyant, kaleidoscopic and vitalized reading, we wish he would come over and do it. But then he couldn't.

No concert this week, and for next week this programme: Bach, Suite; a. Haendel, Largo; b. Mozart, Turkish March; Beethoven, Symphony No. 1. Soloist to be announced.

BOSTON POST.

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 15, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Another thoroughly enjoyable concert in what is thus far proving the best of the Symphony season was that given last night. The Brahms Symphony No. 4 is always well received; Liszt's Hungarian rhapsody No. 2 will always retain its popularity, and add to this a most accomplished violinist in the person of Mr. Franz Ondricek, in the foremost of all violin concertos, Beethoven's D major, and it will easily be seen that here is a delightful programme.

Considerable interest natuarlly centred in Mr. Ondricek, and he has been rather extravagantly praised in the West. Much had therefore been expected of him, and it is but just to say that he almost realized the expectations of his audience. His method of execution is rather varied, but this feature would be more clearly brought out in a recital, when he would interpret the works of several composers. He has a perfect mastery of the instrument, and his technique is about all the most exacting could demand. The Beethoven concerto presents many technical difficulties, but he overcame them in the easiest possible manner. The short staccato notes fell from his instrument like rain drops, while the sweeping runs were as smooth and as easily executed as could be possible. Mr. Ondricek has perfect possession, a strong, sure and steady bow, and his fingers glide over the strings with remarkable smoothness and agility. He has a firm touch, and every note is brought out with great clearness. Especially pleasing was he in the larghetto movement, the beauty of which he seemed to be in sympathy with fully. The audience took very kindly to him, and he was recalled five times.

The Liszt rhapsody was given a magnificent rendering by the orchestra and was a happy ending to the programme.

There will be no concert next week, but for the week after Bach, Handel, Mozart and Beethoven will be the composers heard.

THE BALTIMOREAN.

302 East Baltimore Street.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The next Concert in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be given at the Music Hall, on Wednesday evening next, December 18, it will be the 1,386th performance by this organization since its foundation, 14 years ago. Seven hundred and nineteen performances have been given in Boston, and 615 in 57 cities throughout the United States, 85 of which were given in the city of Baltimore. The Boston Symphony, although but fourteen years old, can boast of having given a greater number of concerts than any other European or American organization of its kind. There have been between 6,000 and 7,000 numbers performed during its existence; over 1,000 soloists have appeared, something over one-half of them singers, and the balance divided among pianists, violinists and violon cellists.

The soloist for the next concert here will be Franz Ondricek, the famous violinist who, since his recent coming to this country, has created a furore in musical circles. The programme for the concert is as follows:

Haydn. . . . . Symphony No. 18.
Bruch. . . . . Concerto for violin, No. 1.
(a) Handel. . . . . Largo
(b) Mozart. . . . . Turkish March
Tschaikowsky. . . Fantasia for Orchestra, "Francesca da Rimini," Op. 32.
(First time at these concerts.)

SUNDAY GLOBE-

AY, DECEMBER 15, 18

——On Sunday evening, Jan 5, in the Boston theater, a benefit concert will be given by the symphony orchestra, Paderewski and Campanari. Every performer offers his services, and the entire receipts will be given to the family of Mr A. Goldstein, a former member of the orchestra. The seats are now on sale at Music hall, and a large number of the regular season ticket holders to the concerts have purchased seats.

——Friday afternoon's symphony rehearsal was the 1332d concert given by the organization and the 718th concert given in Boston.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eighth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, was as follows:

Brahms: Symphony No. 4, in E minor, opus 98.
Beethoven: Concerto for violin, in D major, opus 61.
(Cadenzas by Joachim.)
Liszt: Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2.
(Scored for orchestra by Karl Muller-Berghaus.)
Mr. Franz Ondricek was the violinist.

After a Brahms symphony one is somewhat inclined to wonder which particular one of his four one likes best; and the doubting scale of one's liking is very apt to dip in favor of the one heard last. This one in E minor seems, for the nonce, well-nigh matchless. It is not conceived in the grand vein of the symphonies in C minor and F major; it has neither the vast symphonic proportions and depth of passionateness of the former, nor the heroic sweep and constant contrasts of light and shade of the latter; but in a certain exquisiteness of poetic imagination it surpasses them both. It is also somewhat more concisely written than either; here Brahms shows less than usual of the Beethovenish "unwillingness to stop," and more of the French instinct for letting well-enough alone. The great work was excellently played; we were glad to see Mr. Paur cure his former over-slow tempo in the first movement, and no longer emphasize the "non troppo" in the composer's marking to the point of entirely effacing the "Allegro."

Müller-Berghaus has surely never done more entirely fine work in the way of orchestral arranging than in his transcription of Liszt's second rhapsody; to be sure, we have not yet heard his (said-to-be) wonderful arrangement of Beethoven's C-sharp minor quartet—an attempt which seems at first thought to verge dangerously on vandalism—but this transcription of Liszt's rhapsody certainly seems to stand well at the head of all work of the sort. It throws the arrangement of the same piece by Liszt himself and Doppler well into the shade. One can hardly believe it to have been made by the same man who made the coarse and vulgar arrangement of Rubinstein's Valse-Caprice! It was admirably played, Mr. Pourtau doing absolute wonders with the clarinet cadenzas.

Mr. Franz Ondricek, the noted Bohemian violinist, made his first bow before a Boston audience with the Beethoven concerto. His performance of the great work made a somewhat mixed impression upon us. For one thing, it should be said that the concerto was by no means well accompanied, especially in the first movement. In one way Mr. Ondricek's playing gave us unfeigned pleasure: it was generally free from a certain capricious excessiveness that has marred the performance of some great violinists who have visited this city—August Wilhelmj at the head of them. Wilhelmj's playing of the Beethoven concerto (also ill accompanied, by the way) is never to be forgotten by anyone who listened to it intently; we almost wish we had never heard it, for it has, in spite of ourselves, remained in our mind as a sort of background against which we have heard all subsequent performances of the work. Unspeakably grand in power and richness of tone, dazzling in its daring brilliancy of technique, and full of contagious warmth and fire, it was yet perhaps the most wantonly perverse piece of playing we have ever heard from a great performer. It was as if Wilhelmj had searched the (Wagnerian) scriptures to his own confusion. Yet, with all this, it had that in it which made it stick fast in the memory; and, as we have said, it keeps obstinately cropping up in our mind as a sort of diabolically distorted standard by which to judge other performances of the work. It is, as the French say, an "obsession" of which we cannot rid ourselves. When we hear a violinist steer clear of Wilhelmj's sins, we instinctively count it to his credit, and cannot help looking upon this purely negative virtue as a positive one. And this negative virtue Mr. Ondricek certainly has. He has, moreover, a fine, if not very large, tone; great, if somewhat superficial, brilliancy of technique; and considerable warmth of feeling; conspicuous personal magnetism and charm he also has. Yet we could not feel that he showed a totality of conception at all commensurate with the grandeur of the composition; if he seldom displeased or shocked us, he did not really carry us away. His playing was too often of the sort that goes in at one ear and out at the other; leaving no distinct impress upon the memory. Only now and then, in his playing of slow cantilena, did he show what we—with our present limited means of judging—are inclined to think his real Achilles heel; in such passages he seems to aim at emotional expressiveness too exclusively through beauty of tone and poignancy of accent, without taking into account the organic musical structure of the phrase he is playing. His phrasing is often downright bad, of the merely salon-sentimental sort—like Vladimir de Pachmann's, when the great pianist is at his worst (a vastly different thing from De Pachmann's phrasing at its best). Upon the whole, we liked Mr. Ondricek's play- of the slow movement (barring the cantabile passages) best. But there could be no doubt of the impression he produced upon the audience—and this is always worth considering—that was distinctly fine and vital; he was applauded to the echo.

The next programme is: Bach, suite in D minor; Haydn, symphony in G major (Breitkopf & Hartel, No. 13; Peters, No. 8); Handel, Largo from "Serse" (transcribed by Hellmesberger); Mozart, Turkish March from the A major sonata (transcribed by Herbeck); Beethoven, symphony No. 1, in C major, opus 21.

The rehearsal and concert come on Dec. 27 and 28 respectively; there will be no rehearsal and concert this week.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DEC. 14, 1895.

MARTINUS SIEVEKING ESSAYS THE SAINT-SAENS' PIANO CONCERTO IN BOSTON.

This artist appeared at the Seventh Concert of the Symphony Orchestra, and with what success, can be gleaned from the following critique in the "Gazette": The soloist was a most pleasant surprise; he came here unheralded and yet his work proved that he was a pianist of the very finest calibre. He is amply provided for in the way of technique; he conquers difficulties with the ease and grace of an approved master. His playing is clean, clear, and the workmanship is of the finest quality; it is strong, virile playing, without a trace of affected prettiness or morbid sentimentality. Nothing could have been more light and dainty and thoroughly artistic than the interpretation of the second movement of the concerto, or more brilliant or dashing than the Presto. Throughout the playing he carried the stamp of high artistic sincerity, and demonstrated that he is an artist, that is, an interpreter as well as a player, and all his work is marked with largeness of style, beauty of finish, and perfection of technique. Mr. Sieveking was received with the greatest enthusiasm and was recalled five times; an honor won by his merits alone, and these merits place him in the very first rank. If all his work is as fine as the first specimen given, he may have one or two equals, but no superiors.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 16, 1895.

Programme of Interest and Variety at Symphony Concert.

The concert of Saturday, (the 719th performance of the orchestra in Boston), presented a programme of much interest and of varied style; there was a Brahms symphony for a modern classic, the Beethoven violin concerto, and a Liszt Rapsody for spice.

Brahms' fourth symphony received a really great performance; with an orchestra that has vanquished every tecnical difficulty and a conductor who thoroughly maintains its discipline, and has, besides, the keenest analytical gifts, such a result was but natural, but it was none the less a delightful surprise to find Brahms, the abstruse, Brahms, the incomprehensible, clarifying under the process of intelligent interpretation. Brahms, of course, demands something from the auditor; it requires some degree of mental effort to disentangle the skein of thoughts that he presents, but, once unravelled, one finds symmetry. design, and beauty in almost all of his work. This symphony, in E minor, begins with a conservative scoring, and in its first two movements presents only the regular instruments of the classical orchestra. The modern tendency against repetitions is frequently shown in Brahms, and in this work the themes do not repeat before development. The relation of the themes to each other is rather vague, and the continuous development, even from the first phrase, is apt to puzzle many a non-musician.

The second movement is possibly the most beautiful single movement to be found in any of Brahms' symphonies. In its use of old modes the composer seems to accentuate the fact that his road leads towards the ancient intellectuality in music, (this extreme intellectuality was well analyzed in the programme-book), although he differs so essentially in construction and expression from the old contrapuntists. In the persistent reiteration of the opening figure of this movement one cannot fail to be reminded of the recurring figure (also one of dreamy melancholy), of the slow movement of Beethoven's seventh symphony, and the same brooding character is in the two movements. Waldau's verse might well be the motto of this weirdly attractive Andante:—

There floats in the air an old, old tune,
Not cry of grief nor shout of glee,
Yet sadly-sweet, the ancient rune,
As if it both might be.

The horns and clarinets played exquisitely in this movement, and the balance of all the parts was something to awaken enthusiasm.

In the two last movements Brahms becomes heavier in his scoring, and one finds almost all the most modern paraphernalia from the Allegro Giocoso to the end. Yet, if one must strike a balance, the strength of the symphony lies chiefly in its first two movements. Joviality never seems to sit easily upon Brahms, and he gives us brusque effects instead of playfulness. But this brusquerie was given with such virility, the unison passages went with such a broad sweep, that the movement never seemed to say so much before.

In the finale one finds the devout follower of Beethoven. Just as the great symphonist took a simple conjunct theme in his ninth symphony and made ingenious variations upon it, the modern classicist takes a Passacaglia of eight measures and evolves an endless variety of thoughts from its simple scale-construction. It must be confessed that it is music for the mind rather than for the emotions. The Passacaglia was a stately dance of the old Spanish court, and probably its name did not come from the Spanish ("Pasar" and "Calle"—which would mean "moving along the streets") but from the Italian ("Passo Gallo"—"the Rooster-step") which much better explains its stately, or rather bombastic, character. Even in the scoring Brahms follows Beethoven in some degree, for the contra-bassoon is not used in any obligato but merely doubles the contrabasses, or forms a bass to the woodwind, and trombones and other instruments suggest the finale of the ninth symphony, although the use of a third kettledrum in something that Beethoven did not venture upon. It was a hopeful sign that the public seem to enjoy this symphony and that it received a generous amount of applause.

Boston in the past has had a superabundance of great pianists, but now that one pianist has temporarily secured a monopoly of the art-market we seem to be turning to a number of violinists, and Europe has given us small change for Isaye and Thomson in Marsick, Rivarde, Nndriczek, and others. The violinist made his debut in Beethoven's violin concerto. He made a most favorable impression, although it is possible that he will gain rather than lose by subsequent hearings in other schools. He has not the breadth of Isaye, and in the deeper passages one misses something of the massive power which Beethoven calls for in G string work. But the flawless tone, always absolutely pure in intonation, the brilliant and incisive quality of the passages in high position, the clear harmonics, the masterly double-stopping, all justified the enthusiasm which the artist evoked. His cadenza in the first movement was especially great in double-stopping and was played with seeming ease. Only in those four great accented notes which form the undertone of the whole movement, and which also formed the substratum of the cadenza, one could have asked for more power. He gave the first movement in a somewhat free tempo which made the orchestral support somewhat difficult, but it is to the credit of Mr. Paur that the ensemble was never disturbed. Mr. Ondriczek played the larghetto with absolute beauty and the finale was also all that could be desired. This concerto has the artistic fault that gives all its noblest ideas to the first movement and consequently the [illegible] subsequent movements come in the nature of an anti-climax. There are but four standard masterpieces in this form of composition,—this Beethoven work, the Brahms concerto, the Mendelssohn concerto, and Bruch's violin concerto in G minor; one would wish to hear the artist in one of the last two, for he seems especially gifted in brilliancy and delicacy of performance, both of which are largely called upon in these two works. Mr. Ondriczek is a master of shading and of expression.

Beethoven's concerto for the violin is probably the severest test that any violinist can undertake, for the composer's orchestral mind constantly went beyond his vehicle of expression, and while he does not pile up points of virtuosity in the Paganini manner, he sometimes gives orchestral thoughts to the solo instrument which demand a gigantic power which cannot always be evoked from it. All of Beethoven's concertos, after the C minor piano concerto, are in some degree symphonies, the effect made is generally an orchestral one, and the soloist can scarcely expect the same result for himself that would follow a less homogeneous composition.

Those four accents which give the composition such a rugged power appear in music in many different works; of course they suggest "destiny knocking at the door" in the fifth symphony, but one may also find a very marked appropriation of these poundings in Schubert's great symphony in C major. It is said that Beethoven, always sensitive to rhythmic effects, took the idea from a drunken man pounding on a street-door in Vienna.

It may be interesting to produce here the lines which first announced this concerto in Leipzig, in January, 1807; the correspondent of the "Allgemeine Musik-Zeitung" writes as follows:—

"Those who reverence the Beethoven muse will be interested to hear that this composer has recently completed a violin concerto,—so far as I know, his first,—which the violin-player Klement, greatly admired here, gave recently in a benefit concert with his usual elegance and delicacy"!!

The concert ended with a fiery performance of Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2, arranged for the orchestra by Mueller-Berghaus. This arrangement seems better than the one made by Liszt himself, together with Doppler. Both composers took the work out of its original piano key when scoring it for orchestra (for in orchestral work compositions in many sharps or flats are exceedingly difficult for the wind-instruments, especially the wood-wind), but Liszt put it up a semitone from the original key, gaining brightness by the proceeding, while Mueller-Berghaus lowered it a semitone. Spite of this, however, the latter made the better work. If we are not mistaken this was No. 12 in the original numeration of the Rhapsodies, and the other arrangement was played less than a year ago in these concerts; yet the family resemblance among these rhapsodies is so strong that one might readily mistake one for another. There are some especially exciting points about this score and it was played with all possible orchestral virtuosity. Among the various points of excellence one must single out for especial praise the glorious cadenza work of M. Pourtau, the clarinettist, and the brilliant fortissimo passage, with its soft echo, played by Mr. Schuecker, the harpist. The chromatic work given by full orchestra was something phenomenal; yet when one bears in mind that our orchestra has now given 1333 concerts, and has probably had over 4000 rehearsals, that the material has remained practically unchanged for many years past, that the organization is headed by a man who does not allow the routine work to become lax, one expects great things and can understand why the orchestral concerts of Boston are probably now the foremost of the world.

Louis C. Elson.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 16, 1895.

Programme of Interest and Variety at Symphony Concert.

The concert of Saturday, (the 719th performance of the orchestra in Boston), presented a programme of much interest and of varied style; there was a Brahms symphony for a modern classic, the Beethoven violin concerto, and a Liszt Rapsody for spice.

Brahms' fourth symphony received a really great performance; with an orchestra that has vanquished every tecnical difficulty and a conductor who thoroughly maintains its discipline, and has, besides, the keenest analytical gifts, such a result was but natural, but it was none the less a delightful surprise to find Brahms, the abstruse, Brahms, the incomprehensible, clarifying under the process of intelligent interpretation. Brahms, of course, demands something from the auditor; it requires some degree of mental effort to disentangle the skein of thoughts that he presents, but, once unravelled, one finds symmetry. design, and beauty in almost all of his work. This symphony, in E minor, begins with a conservative scoring, and in its first two movements presents only the regular instruments of the classical orchestra. The modern tendency against repetitions is frequently shown in Brahms, and in this work the themes do not repeat before development. The relation of the themes to each other is rather vague, and the continuous development, even from the first phrase, is apt to puzzle many a non-musician.

The second movement is possibly the most beautiful single movement to be found in any of Brahms' symphonies. In its use of old modes the composer seems to accentuate the fact that his road leads towards the ancient intellectuality in music, (this extreme intellectuality was well analyzed in the programme-book), although he differs so essentially in construction and expression from the old contrapuntists. In the persistent reiteration of the opening figure of this movement one cannot fail to be reminded of the recurring figure (also one of dreamy melancholy), of the slow movement of Beethoven's seventh symphony, and the same brooding character is in the two movements. Waldau's verse might well be the motto of this weirdly attractive Andante:—

There floats in the air an old, old tune,
Not cry of grief nor shout of glee,
Yet sadly-sweet, the ancient rune,
As if it both might be.

The horns and clarinets played exquisitely in this movement, and the balance of all the parts was something to awaken enthusiasm.

In the two last movements Brahms becomes heavier in his scoring, and one finds almost all the most modern paraphernalia from the Allegro Giocoso to the end. Yet, if one must strike a balance, the strength of the symphony lies chiefly in its first two movements. Joviality never seems to sit easily upon Brahms, and he gives us brusque effects instead of playfulness. But this brusquerie was given with such virility, the unison passages went with such a broad sweep, that the movement never seemed to say so much before

In the finale one finds the devout follower of Beethoven. Just as the great symphonist took a simple conjunct theme in his ninth symphony and made ingenious variations upon it, the modern classicist takes a Passacaglia of eight measures and evolves an endless variety of thoughts from its simple scale-construction. It must be confessed that it is music for the mind rather than for the emotions. The Passacaglia was a stately dance of the old Spanish court, and probably its name did not come from the Spanish ("Pasar" and "Calle"—which would mean "moving along the streets") but from the Italian ("Passo Gallo"—"the Rooster-step") which much better explains its stately, or rather bombastic, character. Even in the scoring Brahms follows Beethoven in some degree, for the contra-bassoon is not used in any obligato but merely doubles the contrabasses, or forms a bass to the woodwind, and trombones and other instruments suggest the finale of the ninth symphony, although the use of a third kettledrum in something that Beethoven did not venture upon. It was a hopeful sign that the public seem to enjoy this symphony and that it received a generous amount of applause.

Boston in the past has had a superabundance of great pianists, but now that one pianist has temporarily secured a monopoly of the art-market we seem to be turning to a number of violinists, and Europe has given us small change for Isaye and Thomson in Marsick, Rivarde, Nndriczek, and others. The violinist made his debut in Beethoven's violin concerto. He made a most favorable impression, although it is possible that he will gain rather than lose by subsequent hearings in other schools. He has not the breadth of Isaye, and in the deeper passages one misses something of the massive power which Beethoven calls for in G string work. But the flawless tone, always absolutely pure in intonation, the brilliant and incisive quality of the passages in high position, the clear harmonics, the masterly double-stopping, all justified the enthusiasm which the artist evoked. His cadenza in the first movement was especially great in double-stopping and was played with seeming ease. Only in those four great accented notes which form the undertone of the whole movement, and which also formed the substratum of the cadenza, one could have asked for more power. He gave the first movement in a somewhat free tempo which made the orchestral support somewhat difficult, but it is to the credit of Mr. Paur that the ensemble was never disturbed. Mr. Ondriczek played the larghetto with absolute beauty and the finale was also all that could be desired. This concerto has the artistic fault that gives all its noblest ideas to the first movement and ments come in the nature of an anti-climax. There are but four standard masterpieces in this form of composition,—this Beethoven work, the Brahms concerto, the Mendelssohn concerto, and Bruch's violin concerto in G minor; one would wish to hear the artist in one of the last two, for he seems especially gifted in brilliancy and delicacy of performance, both of which are largely called upon in these two works. Mr. Ondriczek is a master of shading and of expression.

Beethoven's concerto for the violin is probably the severest test that any violinist can undertake, for the composer's orchestral mind constantly went beyond his vehicle of expression, and while he does not pile up points of virtuosity in the Paganini manner, he sometimes gives orchestral thoughts to the solo instrument which demand a gigantic power which cannot always be evoked from it. All of Beethoven's concertos, after the C minor piano concerto, are in some degree symphonies, the effect made is generally an orchestral one, and the soloist can scarcely expect the same result for himself that would follow a less homogeneous composition.

Those four accents which give the composition such a rugged power appear in music in many different works; of course they suggest "destiny knocking at the door" in the fifth symphony, but one may also find a very marked appropriation of these poundings in Schubert's great symphony in C major. It is said that Beethoven, always sensitive to rhythmic effects, took the idea from a drunken man pounding on a street-door in Vienna.

It may be interesting to produce here the lines which first announced this concerto in Leipzig, in January, 1807; the correspondent of the "Allgemeine Musik-Zeitung" writes as follows:—

"Those who reverence the Beethoven muse will be interested to hear that this composer has recently completed a violin concerto,—so far as I know, his first,—which the violin-player Klement, greatly admired here, gave recently in a benefit concert with his usual elegance and delicacy"!!

The concert ended with a fiery performance of Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2, arranged for the orchestra by Mueller-Berghaus. This arrangement seems better than the one made by Liszt himself, together with Doppler. Both composers took the work out of its original piano key when scoring it for orchestra (for in orchestral work compositions in many sharps or flats are exceedingly difficult for the wind-instruments, especially the wood-wind), but Liszt put it up a semitone from the original key, gaining brightness by the proceeding, while Mueller-Berghaus lowered it a semitone. Spite of this, however, the latter made the better work. If we are not mistaken this was No. 12 in the original numeration of the Rhapsodies, and the other arrangement was played less than a year ago in these concerts; yet the family resemblance among these rhapsodies is so strong that one might readily mistake one for another. There are some especially exciting points about this score and it was played with all possible orchestral virtuosity. Among the various points of excellence one must single out for especial praise the glorious cadenza work of M. Pourtau, the clarinettist, and the brilliant fortissimo passage, with its soft echo, played by Mr. Schuecker, the harpist. The chromatic work given by full orchestra was something phenomenal; yet when one bears in mind that our orchestra has now given 1333 concerts, and has probably had over 4000 rehearsals, that the material has remained practically unchanged for many years past, that the organization is headed by a man who does not allow the routine work to become lax, one expects great things and can understand why the orchestral concerts of Boston are probably now the foremost of the world.

Louis C. Elson.

[60]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1895.

Nor does the eighth Symphony concert (December 14) call for extended comment. This was the program:

Symphony, No. 4, E minor.....Brahms
Concerto for violin, D major.....Beethoven
Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2.....Liszt
(Scored by Müller-Berghaus.)

The technical performance of the orchestra was worthy of loudest praise. The reading by Mr. Paur of the symphony was unimaginative. Too often there was heaviness instead of lightness, and rigidity instead of elasticity. The rhapsody by Liszt has been played here with more dazzling brilliancy and keener rhythmic incisiveness. Wonderful and long to be remembered was the artistry of Mr. Pourtau, the first clarinet, in both symphony and rhapsody.

Mr. Ondricek made his début here in a concerto which apparently did not place in clearest light the characteristics that have given him as violinist an enviable reputation in Europe. To be sure, he has played the concerto of Beethoven many times. They say he played it when he took the first prize at the Prague Conservatory. He often chose it in his wandering concert life on the Continent. I heard him play it in Berlin February 11, 1884, at a Philharmonic concert led by Dr. Wüllner, and he then showed a solidity and a control over rhythm that were missed last evening. Perhaps he has since tired of it; or a virtuoso's life has perhaps made him chiefly desirous of tone and reckless brilliancy. There were many hints last evening of genuine temperament; but I cannot say that he moved me for a moment, although I remembered him with pleasure.

A more phlegmatic player might have given greater satisfaction in this concerto, much of which—especially in the rondo—is a good deal of a bore. As Mr. Ondricek will in all probability give a recital in Boston, let us defer further criticism until his next appearance. Suffice it now to say that his tone last evening was not always scrupulously pure, that his rhythm was at times unnecessarily and ineffectively unsteady; and the occasional coarseness, say rather exaggerated vigor, was out of place in this particular work. On the other hand, there were many admirable features in his performance, and the audience was so pleased that it recalled him three or four times.

The program for the 28th—there will be no Symphony concert this week—will be as follows: A suite of Bach; Händel's Largo and Mozart's Turkish March; Beethoven's First Symphony. The soloist's name is not yet announced. What in the world was Mr. Paur thinking of when he made out such a program! Is this what is apologetically described as an "educational concert"?

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

American 12/14/95

Boston Symphony's Second Concert of the Season.

The second concert in Baltimore by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, will be given next Wednesday evening at Music Hall. These concerts have become leading features of the Baltimore musical season, and are attended each year by an ever-widening circle of music-lovers. The individual excellence of the musicians and the carefulness of preparation that characterizes all its performers have established a very high standard for its concerts, and have made the Boston Symphony Orchestra a welcome visitor to Baltimore. Mr. Franz Ondricek, the violin virtuoso, who has been well received in New York, Boston, and Philadelphia will be the soloist in Wednesday's concert, and the following program has been arranged:

Haydn.....Symphony in G major, No. 13
Bruch.....Concerto for Violin, No. 1
(a.) Handel.....Largo
(b.) Mozart.....Turkish March
Tschaikowsky Fantasia for Orchestra, "Francesca da Rimini," Op. 32.
(First time at these concerts.)

Miss Martha Barry, of St. Ann's choir, was the soloist at the Cathedral Sodality services on last Friday evening. Her selection, which was most beautifully rendered, was Cherubini's "Ave Maria."

The Kreisel Quartet, with Harold Randolph as pianist, will render a splendid program at Music Hall next Thursday afternoon.

EVENING TELEGRAPH—PHILADELPHIA.
DECEMBER 14, 1895.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Philadelphia Academy of Music next Monday evening will be the 1335th performance of this organization since its founding, fourteen years ago. This remarkable total establishes a record that probably cannot be duplicated in the world. Some of the older European orchestras have been in existence many more years, and the New York Philharmonic Society, the parent orchestral organization of this country, can show more than fifty years to its credit, but the lesser number of concerts given annually so reduces the total number that the Boston Symphony undoubtedly heads the list. Seven hundred and nineteen performances of the orchestra have been given in Boston and 615 in thirty-seven cities throughout the United States, from Maine to Minnesota. Cambridge, Mass., with a series of ninety-seven concerts, which began the first year of the orchestra's existence and which are given under the auspices of Harvard College in Memorial Hall, heads the list of cities visited, and Philadelphia comes next with forty-nine concerts. Assuming an average of five selections for each concert, there have been between 6,000 and 7,000 numbers performed. Over 1,000 soloists have appeared, something over one-half of them singers, and the balance divided among pianists, violinists, and violoncellists. The programme of Monday evening includes Haydn's Symphony in G Major, No. 13; the preludes to the first and second acts of Richard Strauss' Guntram, and Tschaikowsky's Francesca da Rimini fantasia. The soloist will be Mr. Franz Kneisel, who will play Viotti's concerto for the violin in A minor.

PHILADELPHIA PRESS.—SUNDAY,
DECEMBER 15, 1

The Boston Symphony's Matinees.

The second of the popular matinees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is announced for next Saturday afternoon, December 21, with a very attractive programme, opening with the ever popular overture, "William Tell." The solo performers are Miss Genevieve Clark Wilson, soprano; Mr. Franz Ondricek, the eminent violin virtuoso, and in addition to these a solo part for Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the first 'cello of the orchestra, in the serenade for string orchestra by Volkmann. Mr. Ondricek will play the concerto for violin by Bruch. The orchestral selections, in addition to the "William Tell" overture, will be the largo of Haendel, the Turkish march of Mozart and the well-known Hungarian rhapsody of Lizst. For a second selection Mr. Ondricek will play the famous "Witches' Dances" of Paganini, with piano accompaniment. The Lizst rhapsody No. 2 closes the concert.

To-morrow evening at the Academy of Music its second concert of the season will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The fine programme will be made up of Haydn's symphony in G major, and for the first time at these concerts the preludes to the first and second acts of Richard Strauss' "Guntram" and Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" fantasia. The soloist on the occasion is Franz Kneisel, who will play Viotti's concerto for the violin in A minor.

PHILADELPHIA PRESS.—SUNDAY,
DECEMBER 15, 18

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme announced for the next concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music, on Monday evening contains out of the four numbers to be performed two novelties—the Preludes to Acts I and II of "Guntram," by Richard Strauss, and the orchestral fantasia based upon the story of Francesca da Rimini, by the Russian composer, Tschaikowsky. The other two numbers are the concerto for violin, by Viotti and the Symphony No 13 of Haydn. Both Viotti and Haydn belonged to the last century, so that the programme is evenly divided between the old masters and modern composers.

"Guntram" is the name of a knight who belonged to an order known as "The Fighters for Love," who struggled, not with the sword, but with word and song, and the preludes are from an opera in three acts written by Richard Strauss and first produced at the Musicians' Festival, at Weimar, in 1894, and first given at the Royal Court Opera, in Munich, last April.

The symphony, like most of Haydn's compositions, is of the tuneful, bright order, and by no means the classical monster so often feared by the average concert-goer. In fact, one of the most serious handicaps in the presentation of what is commonly termed "classical music" is the very slight knowledge conveyed to the average concert-goer by the titles of the selections to be performed. The violin concerto, by Viotti, for illustration, to be played by Mr. Kneisel, is one of the most beautiful, tuneful and enjoyable compositions ever written for the violin. It is full of fascinating melodies and has none of the technical difficulties with which modern compositions are too often apt to bristle.

This concert will also be notable as the thirteen hundred and thirty-fourth performance of this now celebrated organization since its foundation fourteen years ago. Some of the older European orchestras can show many more years of existence, and the New York Philharmonic Society, the parent orchestral organization of this country, can boast of its rising fifty years; but the lesser number of concerts given annually so reduces the total number that the Boston Symphony Orchestra undoubtedly heads the list with its grand total.

THE PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER—TUESDAY
DECEMBER 17, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A Classical Performance at the Academy of Music Last Night.

The second of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Academy of Music last night, when there were presented the preludes to Acts I and II of Guntram, Richard Strauss; a concerto for violin by Viotti with cadenza by Mr. Kneisel; Haydn's symphony in G major and Tchaikowsky's fantasia, "Francesca di Rimini."

"Gunthram" has for its subject a company of old time singers, who agreed to fight for Brotherly Love, through the power of song. In the prelude to Act I the theme is worked out in a solemn manner, the strings having the chief work to do. It was delicately rendered by the orchestra, and was in strong contrast to the second prelude, the festival of victory, which was music that was light and joyous, but which sounded more like a bacchanalian march than that which would be given by a company of "pious singers."

The concerto by Viotti is an excellent example of his work. In Mr. Kneisel's hands the beautiful adagio movement was given a rich setting. He is never conscious of his audience, he feels truly what the music means; he has breadth of style, and a clear penetrating tone, and he plays with true intonation. All music-lovers know the Haydn symphony. Nothing could have been more charming than the orchestral rendering of the minuetto movement. Above all composers Haydn was spontaneous, and the players seemed to have caught his spirit, imparting to the movement a rich and delicious swing and rhythm. The Tschaikowsky fantasia is a wildly wierd composition, employing the full strength of the orchestra, the bassos and woodwinds being largely called upon. It abounds in strange harmonies and difficult technical effects, which were pictured with the greatest ease by the players, but it is disappointing, and in various ways strongly recalls Wagner's "Midnight Ride of the Valkyries."

The Academy of Music was crowded with a most enthusiastic audience.

[illegible]
TUESDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1895.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Second Concert of This Season's Series of Five—The Saturday Programme.

Conductor Paur certainly deserves the palm for mixing his palette with contrasting tones. Last night, metaphorically speaking, after leading us up to the gates of heaven with the Guntram music of Strauss—a rather theatrical heaven of the Parsifal type—we were given a peep by means of the Haydn lays at the practicing of a presumably heavenly choir, only to be hurried to the second circle of hell, as interpreted by Tschaikowsky, and left there after being buffeted by rushing winds and general Walpurgis night blasts. So the programme of the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was arranged, and with strong effect, too, save that the Tschaikowsky was a trifle too fantastic, not to say tedious, for even the most inveterate ten years' attendant on the concerts might object to too much of the second circle of Hades, though it be the mis-en-scene of a Florentine poet onomatopoetically treated by a modern Slav.

But aside from Tschaikowsky—and he is to be heard—the programme was thoroughly satisfying. That Mr. Kneisel was the soloist, naturally made it so for many, especially as the concerts chosen—Viotti's in A minor—was such a flawless gem. It was not alone Mr. Kneisel, however, the especially striking morceaux being the largo Haydn's symphony in G major, and the prelude to act 1 from Richard Strauss' "Guntram." The Guntram music was given for the first time here and proved a delightful surprise. The prelude to act 1 was especially rich in fine harmonies, most mystical, and reflected in its strains the idea that is basis of the work, a sort of earthly choir of singers who would externalize the power of the cross in song. It is meant to have a suggestion of holiness and elevation, after the Parsifal method, and so it was that heaven opened the concert. The second prelude was a dance and festival measure, and of the earth earthy, in vivid contrast to the rich effects of the first prelude. It was short and to the point, and went off with a rush.

The second number, the Viotti concert, was a lovely thing as a whole, but the adagio was especially exquisite and delicious. Mr. Kneisel played the opening movement with its florid passages most effectively, and his closing cadenza was Melba-like in its purity of tone and flexibility. Then came the adagio and the closing movement with its agitation and final scurry. Mr. Kneisel's work is always taking, but he seemed to be in particularly fine form last evening in a composition suited to his temperament and technique.

The Haydn symphony is a jolly and lively one, with contrasted phrases, and an especially fine largo which might well be termed quasi religioso as the well known theme, and an impressive one it is, has become one of the solid ornaments of hymnology and was doubtless familiar to most of those present. The largo and the finale, a lively allegro, are its strong features, and Mr. Paur brought out all the beauty there was in the composition. After the symphony came the Tschaikowsky Francesca da Rimini fantasie. This is supposed to describe the meeting of Dante and Francesco and Paolo, and it does that and a good deal more. It was heard for the first time, but is not likely to become a prime favorite.

On Saturday afternoon at 2.30 Mr. Paur will give the second popular concert, and Philadelphia, which unfortunately was denied the pleasure of hearing Rivarde, will hear Ondricek, who is equally well spoken of. The programme is as follows: Rossini, overture, "William Tell;" selection, Miss Genevieve Clark Wilson; Volkman, serenade for string orchestra; solo violoncello, Mr. Alwin Schroeder; Bruch, concerto for violin, No. 1, Mr. Franz Ondricek; Haendel, largo; Mozart, Turkish march, from "Ruins of Athens;" songs with piano, Miss Genevieve Clark Wilson; Paganini, Witches' Dances, Mr. Franz Ondricek; Liszt, Rhapsody No. 2.

PHILADELPHIA TIMES.
DECEMBER 17, 1895.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Large Audience Hears Paur's Orchestra at the Academy of Music.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music was very well attended last night. The programme was one of great attraction. There were only four numbers, but all were notable. The first consisting of the preludes to acts one and two of Richard Strauss' "Guntram," heard for the first time in Philadelphia, was interesting as being a higher operatic flight than is commonly associated with the name of Strauss; both proved excellent examples of the modern unconstrained method of the younger composers, and while somewhat lacking in the symbolic imagination at which they aimed, were yet fairly strong in effect. The second number, a Viotti concerto for the violin, with Mr. Kneisel for the soloist, was a thing of beauty indeed and aroused the greatest enthusiasm. The third, the Haydn symphony in G major was given by Mr. Paur in a real masterly manner, with the greatest dignity and justice, and with all the quiet sympathy that this conductor always feels, but which is not always most expressive when applied to other composers. The programme closed with Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" fantasia, played for the first time at these concerts, and one of the most advanced of modern picturesque fantasias. The subject is indeed one which lends itself singularly well to musical picture drawing, and Tschaikowsky has taken advantage of his opportunities. The storm of purgatory and the flight of the unhappy lovers are suggested with strength and wild imagination. Mr. Paur has added to the repertory of his orchestra a selection which will be often redemanded.

[61]

THE EVENING NEWS.

PUBLISHED BY
THE EVENING NEWS PUBLISHING COMPANY OF BALTIMORE CITY.
Office, No. 201 East Baltimore Street.

CHAS. H. GRASTY, President. DOUGLAS H. GORDON, Secretary-Treasurer.

TUESDAY EVENING, DEC. 17, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

FRANZ ONDRICEK TO BE THE VIOLIN SOLOIST.

The Orchestra Arrives in Town Today and Will Go Over to Washington Tonight, Returning for the Performance at Music Hall Tomorrow Night—Salvini at Ford's—Gladys Wallis at Harris' Academy of Music.

Franz Ondricek of Bohemia, violinist, will be the soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's December concert tomorrow evening. It will be the 1336th concert of that organization since it began business in 1881.

The following is the programme:

Haydn.....Symphony No. 13.
Bruch.....Concerto for Violin No. 1.
(a) Handel.....Largo.
(b) Mozart.....Turkish March.
Tschaikowsky.....Fantasia for Orchestra, "Francesca da Rimini," Op. 32.
(First time at these concerts.)

Ondricek was born in Prague, where his father was a musician, and while quite young he was compelled to assist his father to earn a living for the family. In his 7th year he was advanced sufficiently to play violin concertos. In his 14th year he was admitted to the Conservatory. After three years he received the first prize for his mature rendition of the Beethoven concerto.

Purity of intonation, warm and sympathetic interpretation, individuality of conception, verve and temperament are the salient qualities of Ondricek's playing.

The company arrived here this morning. It will give a concert in Washington tonight.

The Four Conductors.

The orchestra will be under the direction of Mr. Paur. He is the fourth conductor the Symphony Orchestra has had. George Henschel was the first. He served three years, and went back to London. Gericke was the next. After five years of striving for absolute perfection of ensemble, during which time he spared neither himself nor the orchestra, he returned to Vienna.

Nikisch came next—Nikisch, the poetic, the romantic, the graceful Hungarian. He had been the leader of the Stadt Theatre at Leipsic, the first opera house in that city. His reign was for four years, a year longer than that of Mr. Henschel and a year less than Mr. Gericke. One thing the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always done for its conductors—it has given to them greater renown than was theirs when they assumed control.

When Nikisch left the Stadt Theatre in Leipsic to go to Boston he was followed by the same man who succeeded him as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Mr. Emil Paur. It is also worthy of comment that Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur played at the same desk as first violinists at the very same Stadt Theatre several years before. Mr. Paur is cast in a different mold from any of his predecessors, for his enthusiasm manifests itself in a most pronounced fashion whenever he takes the baton in his hand. He is broad in his tastes, appreciative and intelligent in his reading, and a thorough musician.

PUBLIC LEDGER—PHILADELPHIA,
[illegible]ING, DECEMBER 17,

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening drew a very large and appreciative audience. The programme led off with the preludes to Acts I and II of Richard Strauss's "Guntram," for the first time at these concerts. The opera was originally produced at the Musicians' Festival at Weimar in 1894. The first prelude is in a pastoral strain, while the second is typical of a festival of victory and has many marks of merit. The music, while of an advanced order, is not the merely intricate noise which too many fin de siècle compositions are, in the opinion of many who do not consider themselves wanting in musical culture. Viotti's concerto for violin, in A minor, followed, with Mr. Kneisel as soloist. His delightful work was beautifully rendered, and Mr. Kneisel was warmly applauded for his admirable execution. The feast of the evening was Haydn's Symphony in G major, which was given as only Mr. Paur's artists can give it—on this side of the water, at least. The lovely melodies were interpreted with an accuracy and a sympathy that were in fine keeping with the reputation of the orchestra, and furnished new laurels for the accomplished leader. Tschaikowsky's fantasie, "Francesca da Rimini," a weird portrayal of a passage from Dante's "Inferno," concluded the evening's bill.

The second of the orchestra's popular matinées is announced for next Saturday afternoon, December 21, when the orchestra will play the "William Tell" overture of Rossini; the "Serenade," for string orchestra, by Volkmann, with a solo part for Alwin Schroeder, the first 'cello of the orchestra; the "Largo" of Handel, the "Turkish March" of Mozart and the "Hungarian Rhapsody" of Liszt. The soloists will be Miss Genevieve Clark Wilson, a soprano from Chicago, who makes her debut in Philadelphia, and Franz Ondricek, the Bohemian violinist, who plays the No. 1 Concerto of Bruch and the "Witches' Dances" of Paganini.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1895.

Nor does the eighth Symphony concert (December 14) call for extended comment. This was the program:

Symphony, No. 4, E minor.....Brahms
Concerto for violin, D major.....Beethoven
Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2.....Liszt
(Scored by Müller-Berghaus.)

The technical performance of the orchestra was worthy of loudest praise. The reading by Mr. Paur of the symphony was unimaginative. Too often there was heaviness instead of lightness, and rigidity instead of elasticity. The rhapsody by Liszt has been played here with more dazzling brilliancy and keener rhythmic incisiveness. Wonderful and long to be remembered was the artistry of Mr. Pourtau, the first clarinet, in both symphony and rhapsody.

Mr. Ondricek made his début here in a concerto which apparently did not place in clearest light the characteristics that have given him as violinist an enviable reputation in Europe. To be sure, he has played the concerto of Beethoven many times. They say he played it when he took the first prize at the Prague Conservatory. He often chose it in his wandering concert life on the Continent. I heard him play it in Berlin February 11, 1884, at a Philharmonic concert led by Dr. Wüllner, and he then showed a solidity and a control over rhythm that were missed last evening. Perhaps he has since tired of it; or a virtuoso's life has perhaps made him chiefly desirous of tone and reckless brilliancy. There were many hints last evening of genuine temperament; but I cannot say that he moved me for a moment, although I remembered him with pleasure.

A more phlegmatic player might have given greater satisfaction in this concerto, much of which—especially in the rondo—is a good deal of a bore. As Mr. Ondricek will in all probability give a recital in Boston, let us defer further criticism until his next appearance. Suffice it now to say that his tone last evening was not always scrupulously pure, that his rhythm was at times unnecessarily and ineffectively unsteady; and the occasional coarseness, say rather exaggerated vigor, was out of place in this particular work. On the other hand, there were many admirable features in his performance, and the audience was so pleased that it recalled him three or four times.

The program for the 28th—there will be no Symphony concert this week—will be as follows: A suite of Bach; Händel's Largo and Mozart's Turkish March; Beethoven's First Symphony. The soloist's name is not yet announced. What in the world was Mr. Paur thinking of when he made out such a program! Is this what is apologetically described as an "educational concert"?

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.
American Sunday 12/14/95

Boston Symphony's Second Concert of the Season.

The second concert in Baltimore by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, will be given next Wednesday evening at Music Hall. These concerts have become leading features of the Baltimore musical season, and are attended each year by an ever-widening circle of music-lovers. The individual excellence of the musicians and the carefulness of preparation that characterizes all its performers have established a very high standard for its concerts, and have made the Boston Symphony Orchestra a welcome visitor to Baltimore. Mr. Franz Ondricek, the violin virtuoso, who has been well received in New York, Boston, and Philadelphia will be the soloist in Wednesday's concert, and the following program has been arranged:

Haydn.....Symphony in G major, No. 13
Bruch.....Concerto for Violin, No. 1
(a.) Handel.....Largo
(b.) Mozart.....Turkish March
Tschaikowsky Fantasia for Orchestra, "Francesca da Rimini," Op. 32.
(First time at these concerts.)

Miss Martha Barry, of St. Ann's choir, was the soloist at the Cathedral Sodality services on last Friday evening. Her selection, which was most beautifully rendered, was Cherubini's "Ave Maria."

The Kreisel Quartet, with Harold Randolph as pianist, will render a splendid program at Music Hall next Thursday afternoon.

EVENING TELEGRAPH—PHILADELPHIA.
DECEMBER 14, 1895.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Philadelphia Academy of Music next Monday evening will be the 1335th performance of this organization since its founding, fourteen years ago. This remarkable total establishes a record that probably cannot be duplicated in the world. Some of the older European orchestras have been in existence many more years, and the New York Philharmonic Society, the parent orchestral organization of this country, can show more than fifty years to its credit, but the lesser number of concerts given annually so reduces the total number that the Boston Symphony undoubtedly heads the list. Seven hundred and nineteen performances of the orchestra have been given in Boston and 615 in thirty-seven cities throughout the United States, from Maine to Minnesota. Cambridge, Mass., with a series of ninety-seven concerts, which began the first year of the orchestra's existence and which are given under the auspices of Harvard College in Memorial Hall, heads the list of cities visited, and Philadelphia comes next with forty-nine concerts. Assuming an average of five selections for each concert, there have been between 6,000 and 7,000 numbers performed. Over 1,000 soloists have appeared, something over one-half of them singers, and the balance divided among pianists, violinists, and violoncellists. The programme of Monday evening includes Haydn's Symphony in G Major, No. 13; the preludes to the first and second acts of Richard Strauss' Guntram, and Tschaikowsky's Francesca da Rimini fantasia. The soloist will be Mr. Franz Kneisel, who will play Viotti's concerto for the violin in A minor.

PHILADELPHIA TIMES.
DECEMBER 15, 18

The Boston Symphony's Matinees.

The second of the popular matinees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is announced for next Saturday afternoon, December 21, with a very attractive programme, opening with the ever popular overture, "William Tell." The solo performers are Miss Genevieve Clark Wilson, soprano; Mr. Franz Ondricek, the eminent violin virtuoso, and in addition to these a solo part for Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the first 'cello of the orchestra, in the serenade for string orchestra by Volkmann. Mr. Ondricek will play the concerto for violin by Bruch. The orchestral selections, in addition to the "William Tell" overture, will be the largo of Haendel, the Turkish march of Mozart and the well-known Hungarian rhapsody of Lizst. For a second selection Mr. Ondricek will play the famous "Witches' Dances" of Paganini, with piano accompaniment. The Lizst rhapsody No. 2 closes the concert.

To-morrow evening at the Academy of Music its second concert of the season will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The fine programme will be made up of Haydn's symphony in G major, and for the first time at these concerts the preludes to the first and second acts of Richard Strauss' "Guntram" and Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" fantasia. The soloist on the occasion is Franz Kneisel, who will play Viotti's concerto for the violin in A minor.

PHILADELPHIA PRESS.—SUNDAY,
DECEMBER 15, 18

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme announced for the next concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music, on Monday evening contains out of the four numbers to be performed two novelties—the Preludes to Acts I and II of "Guntram," by Richard Strauss, and the orchestral fantasia based upon the story of Francesca da Rimini, by the Russian composer, Tschaikowsky. The other two numbers are the concerto for violin, by Viotti and the Symphony No 13 of Haydn. Both Viotti and Haydn belonged to the last century, so that the programme is evenly divided between the old masters and modern composers.

"Guntram" is the name of a knight who belonged to an order known as "The Fighters for Love," who struggled, not with the sword, but with word and song, and the preludes are from an opera in three acts written by Richard Strauss and first produced at the Musicians' Festival, at Weimar, in 1894, and first given at the Royal Court Opera, in Munich, last April.

The symphony, like most of Haydn's compositions, is of the tuneful, bright order, and by no means the classical monster so often feared by the average concert-goer. In fact, one of the most serious handicaps in the presentation of what is commonly termed "classical music" is the very slight knowledge conveyed to the average concert-goer by the titles of the selections to be performed. The violin concerto, by Viotti, for illustration, to be played by Mr. Kneisel, is one of the most beautiful, tuneful and enjoyable compositions ever written for the violin. It is full of fascinating melodies and has none of the technical difficulties with which modern compositions are too often apt to bristle.

This concert will also be notable as the thirteen hundred and thirty-fourth performance of this now celebrated organization since its foundation fourteen years ago. Some of the older European orchestras can show many more years of existence, and the New York Philharmonic Society, the parent orchestral organization of this country, can boast of its rising fifty years; but the lesser number of concerts given annually so reduces the total number that the Boston Symphony Orchestra undoubtedly heads the list with its grand total.

THE PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER—TUESDAY DECEMBER 17. 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A Classical Performance at the Academy of Music Last Night.

The second of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Academy of Music last night, when there were presented the preludes to Acts I and II of Guntram, Richard Strauss; a concerto for violin by Viotti with cadenza by Mr. Kneisel; Haydn's symphony in G major and Tchaikowsky's fantasia, "Francesca di Rimini."

"Gunthram" has for its subject a company of old time singers, who agreed to fight for Brotherly Love, through the power of song. In the prelude to Act I the theme is worked out in a solemn manner, the strings having the chief work to do. It was delicately rendered by the orchestra, and was in strong contrast to the second prelude, the festival of victory, which was music that was light and joyous, but which sounded more like a bacchanalian march than that which would be given by a company of "pious singers."

The concerto by Viotti is an excellent example of his work. In Mr. Kneisel's hands the beautiful adagio movement was given a rich setting. He is never conscious of his audience, he feels truly what the music means; he has breadth of style, and a clear penetrating tone, and he plays with true intonation. All music-lovers know the Haydn symphony. Nothing could have been more charming than the orchestral rendering of the minuetto movement. Above all composers Haydn was spontaneous, and the players seemed to have caught his spirit, imparting to the movement a rich and delicious swing and rhythm. The Tschaikowsky fantasia is a wildly wierd composition, employing the full strength of the orchestra, the bassos and woodwinds being largely called upon. It abounds in strange harmonies and difficult technical effects, which were pictured with the greatest ease by the players, but it is disappointing, and in various ways strongly recalls Wagner's "Midnight Ride of the Valkyries."

The Academy of Music was crowded with a most enthusiastic audience.

The Press
TUESDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1895.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Second Concert of This Season's Series of Five—The Saturday Programme.

Conductor Paur certainly deserves the palm for mixing his palette with contrasting tones. Last night, metaphorically speaking, after leading us up to the gates of heaven with the Guntram music of Strauss—a rather theatrical heaven of the Parsifal type—we were given a peep by means of the Haydn lays at the practicing of a presumably heavenly choir, only to be hurried to the second circle of hell, as interpreted by Tschaikowsky, and left there after being buffeted by rushing winds and general Walpurgis night blasts. So the programme of the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was arranged, and with strong effect, too, save that the Tschaikowsky was a trifle too fantastic, not to say tedious, for even the most inveterate ten years' attendant on the concerts might object to too much of the second circle of Hades, though it be the mis-en-scene of a Florentine poet onomatopoetically treated by a modern Slav.

But aside from Tschaikowsky—and he is to be heard—the programme was thoroughly satisfying. That Mr. Kneisel was the soloist, naturally made it so for many, especially as the concerts chosen—Viotti's in A minor—was such a flawless gem. It was not alone Mr. Kneisel, however, the especially striking morceaux being the largo Haydn's symphony in G major, and the prelude to act 1 from Richard Strauss' "Guntram." The Guntram music was given for the first time here and proved a delightful surprise. The prelude to act 1 was especially rich in fine harmonies, most mystical, and reflected in its strains the idea that is basis of the work, a sort of earthly choir of singers who would externalize the power of the cross in song. It is meant to have a suggestion of holiness and elevation, after the Parsifal method, and so it was that heaven opened the concert. The second prelude was a dance and festival measure, and of the earth earthy, in vivid contrast to the rich effects of the first prelude. It was short and to the point, and went off with a rush.

The second number, the Viotti concert, was a lovely thing as a whole, but the adagio was especially exquisite and delicious. Mr. Kneisel played the opening movement with its florid passages most effectively, and his closing cadenza was Melba-like in its purity of tone and flexibility. Then came the adagio and the closing movement with its agitation and florid scurry. Mr. Kneisel's work is always taking, but he seemed to be in particularly fine form last evening in a composition suited to his temperament and technique.

The Haydn symphony is a jolly and lively one, with contrasted phrases, and an especially fine largo which might well be termed quasi religioso as the well known theme, and an impressive one it is, has become one of the solid ornaments of hymnology and was doubtless familiar to most of those present. The largo and the finale, a lively allegro, are its strong features, and Mr. Paur brought out all the beauty there was in the composition. After the symphony came the Tschaikowsky Francesca da Rimini fantasie. This is supposed to describe the meeting of Dante and Francesco and Paolo, and it does that and a good deal more. It was heard for the first time, but is not likely to become a prime favorite.

On Saturday afternoon at 2.30 Mr. Paur will give the second popular concert, and Philadelphia, which unfortunately was denied the pleasure of hearing Rivarde, will hear Ondricek, who is equally well spoken of. The programme is as follows: Rossini, overture, "William Tell;" selection, Miss Genevieve Clark Wilson; Volkman, serenade for string orchestra; solo violoncello, Mr. Alwin Schroeder; Bruch, concerto for violin, No. 1, Mr. Franz Ondricek; Haendel, largo; Mozart, Turkish march, from "Ruins of Athens;" songs with piano, Miss Genevieve Clark Wilson; Paganini, Witches' Dances, Mr. Franz Ondricek; Liszt, Rhapsody No. 2.

PHILADELPHIA TIMES.
DECEMBER 17, 1895.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Large Audience Hears Paur's Orchestra at the Academy of Music.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music was very well attended last night. The programme was one of great attraction. There were only four numbers, but all were notable. The first consisting of the preludes to acts one and two of Richard Strauss' "Guntrain," heard for the first time in Philadelphia, was interesting as being a higher operatic flight than is commonly associated with the name of Strauss; both proved excellent examples of the modern unconstrained method of the younger composers, and while somewhat lacking in the symbolic imagination at which they aimed, were yet fairly strong in effect. The second number, a Viotti concerto for the violin, with Mr. Kneisel for the soloist, was a thing of beauty indeed and aroused the greatest enthusiasm. The third, the Haydn symphony in G major was given by Mr. Paur in a real masterly manner, with the greatest dignity and justice, and with all the quiet sympathy that this conductor always feels, but which is not always most expressive when applied to other composers. The programme closed with Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" fantasia, played for the first time at these concerts, and one of the most advanced of modern picturesque fantasias. The subject is indeed one which lends itself singularly well to musical picture drawing, and Tschaikowsky has taken advantage of his opportunities. The storm of purgatory and the flight of the unhappy lovers are suggested with strength and wild imagination. Mr. Paur has added to the repertory of his orchestra a selection which will be often redemanded.

THE BALTIMORE NEWS.

PUBLISHED BY
THE EVENING NEWS PUBLISHING COMPANY OF BALTIMORE CITY.
Office, No. 201 East Baltimore Street.

CHAS. H. GRASTY, President. DOUGLAS H. GORDON, Secretary-Treasurer.

TUESDAY EVENING, DEC. 17, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

FRANZ ONDRICEK TO BE THE VIOLIN SOLOIST.

The Orchestra Arrives in Town Today and Will Go Over to Washington Tonight, Returning for the Performance at Music Hall Tomorrow Night—Salvini at Ford's—Gladys Wallis at Harris' Academy of Music.

Franz Ondricek of Bohemia, violinist, will be the soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's December concert tomorrow evening. It will be the 1336th concert of that organization since it began business in 1881.

The following is the programme:

Haydn.....Symphony No. 13.
Bruch.....Concerto for Violin No. 1.
(a) Handel.....Largo.
(b) Mozart.....Turkish March.
Tschaikowsky.....Fantasia for Orchestra, "Francesca da Rimini," Op. 32.
(First time at these concerts.)

Ondricek was born in Prague, where his father was a musician, and while quite young he was compelled to assist his father to earn a living for the family. In his 7th year he was advanced sufficiently to play violin concertos. In his 14th year he was admitted to the Conservatory. After three years he received the first prize for his mature rendition of the Beethoven concerto.

Purity of intonation, warm and sympathetic interpretation, individuality of conception, verve and temperament are the salient qualities of Ondricek's playing.

The company arrived here this morning. It will give a concert in Washington tonight.

The Four Conductors.

The orchestra will be under the direction of Mr. Paur. He is the fourth conductor the Symphony Orchestra has had. George Henschel was the first. He served three years, and went back to London. Gericke was the next. After five years of striving for absolute perfection of ensemble, during which time he spared neither himself nor the orchestra, he returned to Vienna.

Nikisch came next—Nikisch, the poetic, the romantic, the graceful Hungarian. He had been the leader of the Stadt Theatre at Leipsic, the first opera house in that city. His reign was for four years, a year longer than that of Mr. Henschel and a year less than Mr. Gericke. One thing the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always done for its conductors—it has given to them greater renown than was theirs when they assumed control.

When Nikisch left the Stadt Theatre in Leipsic to go to Boston he was followed by the same man who succeeded him as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Mr. Emil Paur. It is also worthy of comment that Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur played at the same desk as first violinists at the very same Stadt Theatre several years before. Mr. Paur is cast in a different mold from any of his predecessors, for his enthusiasm manifests itself in a most pronounced fashion whenever he takes the baton in his hand. He is broad in his tastes, appreciative and intelligent in his reading, and a thorough musician.

PUBLIC LEDGER—PHILADELPHIA,
ING, DECEMBER 17,

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening drew a very large and appreciative audience. The programme led off with the preludes to Acts I and II of Richard Strauss's "Guntram," for the first time at these concerts. The opera was originally produced at the Musicians' Festival at Weimar in 1894. The first prelude is in a pastoral strain, while the second is typical of a festival of victory and has many marks of merit. The music, while of an advanced order, is not the merely intricate noise which too many fin de siècle compositions are, in the opinion of many who do not consider themselves wanting in musical culture. Viotti's concerto for violin, in A minor, followed, with Mr. Kneisel as soloist. His delightful work was beautifully rendered, and Mr. Kneisel was warmly applauded for his admirable execution. The feast of the evening was Haydn's Symphony in G major, which was given as only Mr. Paur's artists can give it—on this side of the water, at least. The lovely melodies were interpreted with an accuracy and a sympathy that were in fine keeping with the reputation of the orchestra, and furnished new laurels for the accomplished leader. Tschaikowsky's fantasie, "Francesca da Rimini," a weird portrayal of a passage from Dante's "Inferno," concluded the evening's bill.

The second of the orchestra's popular matinées is announced for next Saturday afternoon, December 21, when the orchestra will play the "William Tell" overture of Rossini; the "Serenade," for string orchestra, by Volkmann, with a solo part for Alwin Schroeder, the first 'cello of the orchestra; the "Largo" of Handel, the "Turkish March" of Mozart and the "Hungarian Rhapsody" of Liszt. The soloists will be Miss Genevieve Clark Wilson, a soprano from Chicago, who makes her début in Philadelphia, and Franz Ondricek, the Bohemian violinist, who plays the No. 1 Concerto of Bruch and the "Witches' Dances" of Paganini.

[61]

THE PHILADELPHIA RECORD, TUESDAY, DECEMBER 17, 189

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy.

An unusually interesting programme was presented last evening at the Academy of Music by Conductor Emil Paur, and rarely has his well-trained orchestra been heard to greater advantage. There were two novelties given—selections from Richard Strauss' opera of "Guntram," and the "Francesca da Rimini Fantasia," by Tschaikowsky. The other numbers included Haydn's symphony in G minor (No. 13), and the elaborate concerto for violin, by Giovanni Viotti. The soloist of the evening was drawn from the ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, First Violinist Kneisel sustaining the burden of the Viotti concerto. He played with conscientious care, no ordinary skill, a large measure of graceful expression, and in several passages exhibited a complete mastery over his instrument. His work as a whole, pleasing as it was, however, lacked that ringing tonal strength which is so generally associated with artists of the first rank. Leader Paur's treatment of the Haydn symphony was marked by that artistic and sympathetic direction which is characteristic of this leader, although the final movements somehow left an impression that the number was being hurried. This criticism cannot, however, be applied to the opening diversion, which was most admirably and exquisitely performed. The Strauss selections, while interesting from the manner in which they were given, failed to arouse any demonstrative show of appreciation, but certainly a most hearty welcome was accorded to the Tschaikowsky composition, a weird, grotesque (yet, in portions, tenderly sentimental) concept, which was played with a coloring and expression exactly adjusted to the evident intentions of the composer. The meeting of Paola and Francesca da Rimini in the second circle of the poet's imagined hell is the chief episode of this fantastical musical creation, and the tender sighing of love and the mournful cadence of grief are most weirdly alternated in an almost demoniac whirl of shrieking wind. This eccentric composer has not departed from anything that might be expected from him in a musical illustration of a scene so dramatic, and his elaboration of the theme is surely Doresque in its effect. On Saturday afternoon there will be another popular matinee concert, the soloists of the occasion being Miss Genevieve Clark Wilson and Mr. Franz Ondricek.

NORTH AMERICAN, PHILADELPHIA, DECEMBER 17, 1895.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

The Second Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There was the usual crowd at the Academy of Music last evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Emil Puar, gave the second concert in its series for the current season. The notable feature of the programme was the violent nature of the contrasts which it presented. Two of the numbers on the programme, the Haydn Symphony and the Viotti Concerto, were admirable examples of the classic style, while the other two, the Strauss preludes and the Tschaikowsky fantasia, illustrated in a very emphatic and impressive manner the furthermost vagaries of the ultra-advanced modern school. It is probable that most hearers derived more enjoyment from the old than from the new. Of the two Strauss preludes, the first is mystic to the point of unintelligibility, while the second is such an extraordinary example of cacophony as has no parallel save in some New Year's eve charvari. The "Francesca da Rimini" music is more comprehensible. It portrays in a very vivid and eloquent manner the sufferings of the famous lovers in that circle of the Inferno to which Dante assigned them, and it exhibits in an impressive manner the imaginative power and the musical genius of its distinguished author. But after all, for music pure and simple, the Haydn and Viotti numbers were greatly to be preferred. The former was rendered by the orchestra with superb spirit and appreciative sentiment, while the interpretation of the Viotti violin concerto by Mr. Franz Kneisel, facile, masterly and sympathetic, well deserved the tumultuous applause which it elicited.

The orchestra will give a matinee concert at the Academy next Saturday, when the following will be the programme: Rossini overture, "William Tell". Selection, Miss Genevieve Clark Wilson. Volkmann serenade for string orchestra. Solo violoncello, Mr. Alwin Schroeder. Bruch concerto for violin, No. 1. Mr. Franz Ondricek. a. Haendel, largo. b. Mozart, "Turkish March," from "Ruins of Athens." Songs with piano, Miss Genevieve Clark Wilson. Paganini, Witches' Dances. Mr. Franz Ondricek. Liszt Rhapsody, No. 2.

AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC,

Philharmonic Concert,

BY

The Boston Symphony ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Emil Paur, Director.

SOLOISTS,

Mme. DeVERE SAPIO,

FRANZ KNEISEL.

FRIDAY EVENING, December 20, At 8:15.

Tickets at Brooklyn Institute, 502 Fulton St; also at Chandler's 300 Fulton St.

SECOND POPULAR MATINEE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA | ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.
ASSISTED BY
Miss GENEVIEVE CLARK WILSON, Soprano, and Mr. FRANZ ONDRICEK, Violinist.
Saturday Afternoon, December 21, at 2.30.
PROGRAMME.

Rossini.....Overture, "William Tell"
Selection—Miss Genevieve Clark Wilson.
Volkmann.....Serenade for String Orchestra
Solo Violoncello, Mr. Alwin Schroeder.
Bruch.....Concerto for Violin, No. 1
Mr. Franz Ondricek.
a. Haendel.....Largo
b. Mozart.....''Turkish March''
Songs with Piano—Miss Genevieve Clark Wilson.
Paganini.....''Witches' Dances''
Mr. Franz Ondricek.
Liszt.....Rhapsody No. 2

Tickets now on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut street.

Notes of Coming Music.

The opera season will open in Brooklyn on Tuesday evening with an offering which indicates that Abbey and Grau wish to deal fairly by their Brooklyn patrons. The work will be "Carmen," with the magnetic Calve, who was so sorely missed at the performance of that opera here last year. With her will be Lubert, the tenor; Saville as Michaela, Ancona as the toreador and Bauermeister, De Vries and Van Cauteren. Guiri will be the solo dancer and Bevignani will conduct. These, except Ancona, have been the artists in the New York cast, and all of them have been found satisfactory there, the house being packed at every performance. Maurel has not been a satisfactory bull fighter vocally, and his absence from the Brooklyn cast will be one of those things that never will be missed. Brooklyn will hope to hear this great actor later as Falstaff, a part which depends less upon vocal beauty than dramatic skill.

The important concerts this week are crowded into the last two days. On Friday night the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the auspices of the institute, will give the second of its series of concerts at the Academy. The programme this time swings as far to the highly musical as before it ran to the popular. The opening symphony is Brahms No. 4 in E minor, and Brahms is a pretty hard nut for a popular audience. However, the uneducated listeners had their turn on the "Lucia" scales and it is only fair to give the music students a chance. This symphony will be followed by a violin concerto, No. 22 in A minor by Viotti, played by that thorough artist, Franz Kneisel. Clementine De Vere Sapio, who has not been heard in Brooklyn for some years and who has won high praise in Europe since, will sing the mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet." This is showy but not comic like the one from "Lucia" in which Melba disported herself. Then follow two familiar but beautiful things for the orchestra, Handel's "Largo," which has retained its vogue ever since Mr. Thomas popularized it, and Mozart's "Turkish March." The concert will end with a genuine novelty, the preludes to acts one and two of Richard Strauss' opera "Guntram." This Strauss is principally known here by his symphonic poem, "Death and Glorification," which is music of a high order. If these preludes prove as fine the audience will have reason to be grateful to the institute for their presentation.

The third of Miss Hooper's series of morning concerts at the Pouch mansion will be given next Saturday and will serve to introduce Lilian Blauvelt in some of those songs in which she is most charming. Miss Hooper's own violin playing, which has been modestly kept in the background so far, and a new child pianist, Laura Sanford, who has made something of a sensation when she has appeared in New York, Albany and Chicago. She is a pupil of Amy Fay, and is expected to do wonders when she grows up, so remarkable are her present achievements.

On Saturday evening a new pianist, the Countess Gilda Ruta, will be introduced to Brooklyn at Historical hall under the management of E. H. Colell. She is an Italian composer and pianist who has appeared but little in this country, but who has been praised where she has been heard. She will have the assistance of Selma Luster, sopiano. Signor Pisacane, baritone, and a double quartet for the accompaniments in the following programme:

Nocturne, "Danz Mistica e Musette," allegra appassionate ..... Gilda Ruta
Countess Gilda Ruta.
Lent ..... Mazzone
Sig. J. Pisacane.
a Adagio, sonata op. 27 ("Moonlight")..Beethoven
b Minuetto ..... Mozart
c Serenade ..... Van Westerhout
d Rondo ..... Scarlatti
Countess Gilda Ruta.
Waltz from the opera "Narcisse".....Giannini
Miss Selma Luster.
Adagio from concerto in C minor.....Gilda Ruta
For piano and double quartet.
Nocturne in F major .....Chopin
'Hungarian Fantasie'' ..... Liszt
For two pianos.
First piano, Countess Gilda Ruta.
Second piano, Cav. Albano Seismut-Doda.
Aria from "Carmen"..... Bizet
Sig. Pisacane.
Polacca ..... Gilda Ruta
For piano and double quartet.
Countess Gilda Ruta.

The [illegible] Press
DAILY EDITION.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1895.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Something About Its Attractive Programme for To-morrow Evening.

Here is the programme for the second Boston Symphony concert here at the Metropolitan Opera House to-morrow evening:

Symphony in G minor (No. 13).....Hadyn
Fantasie on Scotch Folk Melodies for violin
Max Bruch
Fantasie for orchestra, "Francesca da Rimini"
Tschaikowsky
Preludes to Acts I. and II. of Guntram
Richard Strauss

Mr. Adamowski will be the solo attraction. Tschakowsky's fantasia and the Strauss preludes will be given for the first time at these concerts.

The fantasia is a piece of fantastic picturesque writing, its poetic keynote being the "cruellest winds under a dark and gloomy air" of the second circle of hell, as described by Dante. The poet's meeting with Francesca and Paolo is an episode about the middle of the piece.

"Guntram" was first brought out at the Musicians' Festival at Weimar in 1894, and was given at the Royal Court Opera in Munich last April. The subject is the "Fighters for Love," an order of knights who fight for the Cross and brotherly love with word and song.

Haydn's symphony in G was written for Paris in 1786.

The Telegram

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1895.

A REMARKABLE RECORD.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert List a Wonderful One.

Since its inception, fourteen years ago, the Boston Symphony orchestra, in addition to its annual series of forty-eight concerts in Boston, has made seven Western trips, and in the past eleven years monthly trips of one week's duration to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and has also visited all the prinicpal New England cities. Including the second monthly trip of this season, which ends on Dec. 21, this famous organization has given the really remarkable total number of 1,309 performances, thus establishing a record that probably can not be duplicated in the world. Some of the older Europen orchestras have been in existence many more years, and the New York Philharmonic society, the parent orchestral organization of this country, can show more than fifty years to its credit; but the lesser number of concerts given annually so reduces the total number that the Boston Symphony orchestra undoubtedly heads the list. Seven hundred and nineteen performances have been given in Boston, and 623 in 37 cities throughout the United States from Maine to Minnesota. Cambridge, Mass., with a series of ninety-seven concerts, which began the first year of the orchestra's existence, and which are held under the auspices of Harvard college in the Memorial hall, heads the list of cities visited, with Providence well toward the head of the list with forty-seven concerts.

With such a remarkable grand total of performances given there is naturally unlimited opportunity for detailed statistics of the greatest variety.: Lack of space prevents an extended array of figures; but attention is called to the tournament at Barre, winning a number of prizes. As this was out of the distance allowed by class A riders without a special sanction, both men were transferred to class B by Chairman Gideon.

performances given by the orchestra en route are made up of selections already played in the Boston concerts, there have been over 1,500 private rehearsals. It is also worthy of note that ten of the members of the orchestra the first season still remain with the organization, and over one-half the orchestra have been members for ten years.

As the Boston Symphony orchestra is an organization founded and maintained by a private citizen, it has always been the policy of the management to refrain from the publication of any financial details; but it is safe to assert that even the most moderate average receipts would result in an enormous sum of money expended in the patronage bestowed upon these concerts. Seventeen states are represented in the list of cities given above, excellent evidence that the Boston Symphony orchestra is now a national organization.

The Washington Post
WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1895.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Ondricek Was the Soloist and the Orchestral Numbers Were Well Rendered.

The concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave last night was the 1,335th performance of that famous organization, and the forty-fourth in this city. It was one of the most satisfactory of the whole series.

The Brahms symphony, which opened the programme, is a work of great classicality, but by no means cold or unimpassioned. It abounds in many beautiful melodies and afforded frequent opportunities for the artists in the orchestra to demonstrate their skill as soloists. Mr. Paur's reading was in thorough harmony with the spirit of the composer, and the generous applause which was given to the work was richly deserved. The other orchestral numbers were the largo from "Xerxes," by Handel, and though this extremely beautiful number has been given here before by the orchestra, it is safe to say that its deeply religious sentiment was never more impressively emphasized. It served also as a vehicle for the display of the splendid development of the strings, and in this alone, apart from its sympathetic interpretation, was a striking contribution to the evening's programme. The preludes to the first and second acts of "Guntram," by Richard Strauss, were novelties, and were extremely interesting, both as melodious works and as technical compositions.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Franz Ondricek, who played Bruch's concerto for the violin with much feeling, breadth of tone, and a true and artistic instinct. He had perfect command over the instrument, exhibiting admirable technique, and the finale was given in a masterly manner.

Baltimore American AND COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY YEARS OLD, AND THE OLDEST DAILY NEWSPAPER IN AMERICA.

"WE BUILD."

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1895.

ONDRICEK, THE VIOLINIST,

Established in Favor of Music Lovers—Boston Symphony.

The second Boston symphony concert took place last evening at Music Hall, and, as usual, a large and enthusiastic audience was present. These concerts are now being appreciated at their true worth, as they are of high artistic excellence. One could wish for greater eclecticism in the program schemes, however, for Mr. Paur is keeping to a very classic regimen this season. Last evening's program contained but one modern composer in the orchestral selections, and was as follows: Symphony in G major, Haydn; concerto, for violin, in G minor, Bruch; the "Largo," of Handel, and "Turkish March," of Mozart, and the "Francesca da Rimini" fantasia, of Tchaikowsky.

Hadyn is justly called the real creator of the modern symphony. He enlarged the form as a whole, extended the separate movements, and developed the so-called art of free thematic treatment. In his development of this principle is recognized a power of invention and fertility of imagination only equaled by few others. He also laid the foundation of modern orchestration, and his originality cannot be over-estimated. He was the immediate precursor of Mozart and Beethoven, in whom the symphony found its highest and greatest expression. In this G-major symphony we find the geniality and playfulness so characteristic of Hadyn, and it was performed with the limpidity, smoothness and crispness it demands.

Bruch's fine first violin concerto served as a most effective medium to introduce the soloist, Mr. Franz Ondricek. This violinist, although occupying for several years a high position in the world of music in Europe, is a newcomer here this season. It did not take him longer than his first appearance in New York to establish his artistic claims, and his every appearance has been attended with enormous success. His playing proved him the possessor of a pure, vibrant tone, not very large, but of fine, penetrating quality; a free, impassioned style, and great virtuosity, and his success with the audience was immediate. He gave a very artistic interpretation of the concerto, throughout which his intonation was nearly flawless. He was enthusiastically recalled a half-dozen times.

The next two numbers, Handel's "Largo" and Mozart's "Turkish March," were, of course, the most popular of the program, and the demand for an encore to the former, although refused, was most insistent. A great deal of the applause for this number was due Mr. Kneisel, the concert-master, whose, big, lovely tone and broad style made his obligato one of the treats of the evening.

The concert was brought to a close by a stirring performance of the Tchaikowsky "Fantasia." This is an intensely dramatic piece of writing, entirely without traditional form, and brings in all the resources of the modern orchestra. Without doubt, Tchaikowsky's mastery of technical expression is as of much value in his compositions as the material he expresses, and in none of his works is it better proven than in this "Fantasia." The playing of the orchestra was superb throughout the whole concert, and Mr. Paur is to be congratulated on its splendid condition this season.

Violinist Ondricek, with his brother Charles, paid a visit to the City Hall yesterday, and was introduced to Mayor Hooper by Frank Rohan and B. Gregr, two well-known Bohemians.

[62]

INCOMPLETE

THE SUN.

BALTIMORE, THURSDAY, DEC. 19, 1

ONDRICEK, VIOLINIST.

His First Appearance Here with the Boston Orchestra.

The second of the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at Music Hall before an audience which seemed even larger than was present at the first one.

The programme was not so interesting as is usually presented by the orchestra, although nothing but praise can be said concerning the playing and conducting of Director Paur. The tendency of the management this season seems to be to try to please all tastes, so that it has decided at times to introduce compositions which are hardly worthy of a place on the programme of such a magnificent orchestra.

The symphony performed was the Haydn G major. It is refreshing in this age of lavish orchestration to hear occasionally the simple and restful strains of Haydn's somewhat antiquated compositions.

Haydn's music is as distinctly typical of the eighteenth century—an age of formalism—as French rationalism or rococco furniture. Along with its artificiality, however, there is the freshness and cheeriness of the composer's genial nature. The symphony was also interesting in that it offered an opportunity for the comparison of Haydn's resources with the methods of modern orchestration.

The other side of the comparison was supplied by the closing number on the programme—a descriptive Fantasia for orchestra, "Francesca da Rimini," by Tschaikowsky. This work is as modern, both in the matter of scoring and in the style of composition, as the symphony is archaic. Tschaikowsky even gets beyond Berlioz's most sonorous efforts.

The soloist of the evening was Franz Ondricek, violinist, who is now visiting the United States for the first time. His performance can only merit the high praise which has been bestowed upon him uniformly during his present tour. He played the first Bruch concerto in G minor, which, although performed before at these concerts, probably never received a more interesting and musicianly interpretation.

The orchestra also played a "Turkish March," by Mozart.

The inevitable Hændel Largo, which, as played by the orchestra, is, in spite of its frequent repetitions, incomparable, afforded the audience an opportunity of showing its appreciation of Mr. Franz Kneisel's superb work. As to encores, frequent criticisms were passed upon Mr. Paur's chariness.

THE MORNING HERALD

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 19.

ONDRICEK AND KNEISEL.

They Divide Honors at the Concert Given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Summed up, the performance given in Music Hall last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a veritable "Feast of the Fiddles."

Solo honors were, beyond a doubt, divided between two masters of the bow, both named Franz. One was featured as the star of the occasion, while the other as concert-meister, revealed new magnificence in an old and time-honored composition. There was the Haydn G major symphony, the Bruch concerto and the largo from Handel's opera "Xerxes," leaving only the fantasie "Francesca da Rimini," by Tschaikowsky, to give any play at all to the heavier instruments; yet this number, which concluded the concert, was by far the feature of the orchestral work.

Chief interest was centred, however, in the appearance of Franz Ondricek, whose fame as a violin virtuoso had preceded him to the city. Others of equal reputation have been here before him, but the signal triumphs of Sarasate, Thomsen and Ysaye are, as yet, new to those who frequent concerts of this nature. There is always an inherent inclination at comparison when the work of musical giants are considered, but in the case of Ondricek this is hardly possible, because in form, style and method he stands alone. Despite his stature he impresses one immediately with the vigor and sincerity with which he gets to work.

There is ample in the Bruch concerto, so vainly attempted by violinists of the day and mastered by so few, to tax the resources of the artist, but with Ondricek the difficulties were as mere child's play, and it was probably this confidence of the master of technique that caused him at times to hurry unnecessarily the quick passages, causing the intermediary tones to become at times indistinct. And this was his only fault. A broad, beautiful tone, clear harmonics and precise intonation of accord, either in stuccato or slurred, characterizes quickly the artistic accomplishments of the man. His performance of the beautiful Adagio was splendid, and those present evinced their disappointment at his not being down on the programme for a second number by recalling him again and again after the number was completed, hoping in vain for an encore.

Hardly had the applause for Ondricek died away before there was a storm of appreciative recognition for Kneisel. He played the solo in the Handel Largo, beautifully arranged with harp accompaniment, by Hellmesberger, of Vienna, and both Mr. Pauer and his talented concert-meister were given an ovation.

The Haydn Symphony was somewhat of a disappointment. One hardly looks for a composition of such a light nature on a Boston orchestra programme. And then, again, modern interpolations in an ancient arrangement, no matter how well done, are very rarely of a satisfactory nature. In decided contrast was the Tschaikowski number, with its wealth of tone coloring and theoretical revelations. The composition is descriptive of Dante's visit to the inner circle of hell, where he hears the story of Francesca da Rimini. There is, indeed, novelty in the tuba and trombones playing in contra melody to the combined strings and reed, yet neither overpowering them nor marring the effect of continuous chromatics which tell vividly of the "cruel'st winds under a dark and gloomy air." In weird and striking melody of Russian ring the tale is told, and the whole brought to an inspiring [illegible]

Der Deutsche Correspondent.

Donnerstag, den 19. Dezember 1895

Ondricek und die Bostoner.

Erstes Auftreten des berühmten böhmischen Geigenvirtuosen Ondricek im zweiten Concert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters.

„Nur wo die Fertigkeit höheren Zwecken dient, hat sie Werth;" diese Wahrheit, welche sich in Schumann's „musikalischen Haus- und Lebens-Regeln" findet, ist verkörpert in Franz Ondricek, dem berühmten böhmischen Geigen-Virtuosen, der gestern Abend in dem Conzerte, welches das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester in der Musik-Halle gab, als Solist die zahlreichen Zuhörer erfreute. In der That hat nur jene Virtuosität immer künstlerischen Werth, welche ihr technisches Können nicht als Selbstzweck herauskehrt, sondern als Mittel zu dem Zwecke benützt, den Inhalt der Tondichtung in vollendeter Gestalt wieder zu geben.

Die hiesige Kunst-Gemeinde hat in den letzten Jahren gar manchen Geigen-Virtuosen gehört, Thompson, Ysaye u. A. und jetzt Ondricek, und Alle strebten darnach, dem Altmeister Joachim es gleich zu thun, welcher als der größte und vornehmste Violinvirtuos jetzt dasteht.

Franz Ondricek, welcher gestern vor dem hiesigen Publikum zum ersten Mal erschien, ist, wie sein Spiel zeigte, ein Geiger großen Styls, ein Virtuose bester Bedeutung. Sein Ton ist süß, voll und markig, die Intonation sicher und glockenrein, seine Technik außerordentlich, ebenso solid wie brillant. Was aber besonders interessant bei ihm ist, das ist, daß er seinen Sinn streng auf den Inhalt des Tonwerkes hält, musikalische Empfindung mit einer von virtuosem Geflunker freien Technik zu verbinden sich bestrebt und dadurch einen künstlerischen Genuß in vollem Maße bietet.

Für seine Darbietung hatte er sich Max Bruch's G-Moll Violin-Conzert gewählt, eines der klassischsten Werke, welche für die Geige geschrieben sind. Wie sehr sein brillantes Spiel die Zuhörer entzückte, bewies der Beifall, welcher bereits nach dem Adagio sich Bahn brach, mehr aber noch der viermalige ehrende Hervorruf, welcher dem Künstler nach dem Vortrage zu Theil wurde. Sicherlich würde aber dieser noch mehr zur Geltung gekommen sein, wenn die Begleitung des Orchesters eine etwas zurückhaltendere gewesen wäre. Es wäre dies aus dem Grunde zu empfehlen gewesen, weil Ondricek's Ton kein gerade großer ist, und es bei dem schnellen Spiel auch nicht sein konnte.

Uebrigens war Hr. Ondricek nicht der einzige Violin-Solist, wenngleich er allein als solcher auf dem Programm verzeichnet stand. Hr. Franz Kneisel spielte nämlich das Solo in dem bekannten Händel'schen „Largo," das eine sehr schöne Darlegung fand u. dem Dirigenten Paur und Hrn. Kneisel anhaltenden Applaus eintrug. Immerhin war es aber doch etwas Befremdendes, bei aller Anerkennung, die man Hrn. Kneisel als Solisten zollen muß, daß Hr. Paur das „Largo" auf das Programm gesetzt und gleich hinter dem Violin-Conzert, das Ondricek spielte, folgen ließ.

Als symphonisches Werk bildete Haydn's G-Dur-Symphonie die Eröffnung des Conzerts. Hr. Paur wußte ihr mit seinem Orchester eine kraftvolle, frische Wiedergabe zu bereiten. Das Allegretto und das letzte Allegro erhielten den meisten Beifall. Mozart's „türkischer Marsch" wurde mit Feuer und Schwung gespielt und gefiel natürlich sehr. Den Schluß des Conzertes bildete eine Orchester-Fantasie „Francesca da Rimini" von Tschaikowsky, ein bizarres Tonwerk, welches eine Stelle aus Dante's großem Epos in musikalischem Bilde vorführt, und in dem der Componist einen Sturm mit allen ihm zu Gebote stehenden Instrumenten den Zuhörern vorführt und aus diesem Hintergrunde melodiöses Andante cantabile sich als Episode ablösen läßt, um dann wieder in den rasenden Wirbelsturm überzugehen. Die Darbietung des fantastischen Stückes seitens des Orchesters war eine anerkennenswerthe, wie man es bei den Bostonern voraussetzen darf. Das nächste Conzert findet am 22. Januar statt. Eine starke Delegation der hiesigen böhmischen Kolonie wohnte dem gestrigen Conzerte bei.

THE WORLD: FRIDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

De Koven's Unstinted Praise of the 1337th Concert of This Splendid Organization of Players.

At the Metropolitan Opera-House last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared at the 1337th concert it has given since its foundation, about fifteen years ago. Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist.

One can better appreciate the enormous number of concerts given by this orchestra during its comparatively short career when one considers that the Philharmonic Society, during its fifty-three years of existence, has only given about 600 in all. And the playing of the two orchestras is about in proportion to the number of concerts given by each.

In spite of its daintiness and vivacity, the rare elegance of style and finish which it exhibits, and the fresh and gay melodic beauties which glow on every page of the score, Haydn's G major symphony—No. 8 in the Peters, No. 13 in the Breikopf and Hartel editions, and letter "V" in the catalogue of the London Philharmonic Society—struck me, I must confess, as a trifle archaic. The surpassing excellence of the strings of the Boston Orchestra was most evident in the exquisite rendering of this number, which was read by Mr. Paur with spirit, dignity and classic feeling. It evidently was an admirable foil to the rich modernity of Bruch's "Scotch Fantasia" for violin, which followed it on the programme.

Admirably written for orchestra as well as for the solo instrument, I have always thought this fantasia the best concert solo of the entire violin repertoire, as it is full of interest, varied and appropriate local color, romantic feeling and picturesque effects. Mr. Adamowski has always appealed to me as an artist of much temperament, refinement and true poetic and artistic feeling, but his admirable playing of this number proved conclusively that he has of late grown in breadth and authority of style, and in technical finish, force and facility. His tone, always smooth and mellow, has also notably increased in power and fulness, while losing nothing of its sweetness. When we have such artists in this country, I fail to see the necessity of the present heavy importation of violinists from abroad.

Mr. Adamowski's violin sings and wooes one with caresses rather than commands, and this is true of his playing in general, which lacks, perhaps, something of temperamental energy. But most artistic and enjoyable violin playing for all that; I have not heard better, if, indeed, as good this season. The exquisite poetic tenderness of the andante and the brilliancy, dash and technical accuracy of the finale were alike admirable. The artistic intelligence of Mr. Adamowski's phrasing, the purity of his intonation and the clarity of his runs and passage work struck me especially. He was most warmly received, being recalled several times.

Tschaikowsky may rage and storm in turbulent passion, as in the "Francesca da Riminis" fantasies, superbly played last night, but he is never coarse and repellant like Koch, Richard Strauss et al. This fantasia is by no means the equal of the "Hamlet" in either interest power or beauty and yet is instinct with all of the composer's individuality, emotional force and faculty of pictorial expression. Two preludes from Richard Strauss's opera, "Guntram," also forcibly played — how horribly noisy and blatant he is at times—brought an enjoyable concert to a close. I can hardly believe that the good people of New York realize what they miss in the way of absolutely unsurpassed orchestral playing in failing to attend these concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in larger numbers. There is certainly no orchestra in this country that can hold a candle to it.

REGINALD DE KOVEN.

The World.

Published by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PARK ROW, New York.

FRIDAY, DEC. 20, 1895.

Mr. "Tim" Adamowski was the soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra last night. Mr. Adamowski wears good clothes and plays the violin very well. He is also a great friend of Mrs. "Jack" Gardner, a fact that some people know and others do not know. Mr. Adamowski is not a great player, but he is music to the tips of his fingers, and if he would take the trouble would rank considerably higher as a violinist than he does. But it is a pleasure to hear him play. He goes on about his business, and has no time for the affected manners of soloists in general. He played last night the "Fantasia, or Scotch-Folk Melodies," by Max Bruch. This is almost a great composition. Mr. Adamowski did not get much out of the first two movements, but he got his bearings later on and played the andante and finale in really fine style. Mr. Paur's programme was rather an odd affair. Nobody but Mr. Paur would have started off with Haydn's "Symphony" in G major, and followed it with the fantasia and Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Remini" and Richard Strauss's preludes to acts one and two of "Guntram." The last number didn't amount to much, but Tschaikowsky's fantasia was very enjoyable. It is fully scored and depicts scenes in hell. The Metropolitan Opera-House was well filled.

THE MAIL EXPRESS.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY [illegible]

DECEMBER 20, 1895.

The Boston Symphony Orchestral Concert—"Tristan und Isolde."

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at the Metropolitan Opera House, Herr Paur leading and Mr. T. Adamowsky being the soloist. Haydn's G major symphony, No. 8, in the Peters edition, was the opening number, and the charming quaintness and dainty simplicity of the work were enjoyed with the usual pleasure.

Mr. Adamowski's rich and well-rounded violin tones were heard to advantage in Max Bruch's Fantasia of Scotch Folk Melodies. This work affords grateful opportunity for the soloist to display tenderness and feeling as well as technical skill, and Mr. Adamowski embraced the chance with unfailing ability. The breadth and yet gentleness with which the memory-laden old English and Scotch airs flowed from under his bow appealed deeply to his hearers.

The tragic and portentous "Francesca da Rimini" fantasia of Tschaikowsky followed Bruch's work, and this was rendered by the orchestra with the ominous and awe-inspiring might that were appropriate. Herr Paur and his forces entered most fully into the spirit of the unearthly composition, and the recondite and mysterious elements were brought out with intelligence and yet without suffering from a too obvious or matter-of-fact interpretation.

The preludes to acts I. and II. of Richard Strauss's "Guntrum," concluded the programme. The second of these preludes had been played at the first New York Symphony concert. Herr Strauss is an enthusiastic composer who has made use of every orchestral device and artifice to color and "season" his music. Frequently these outside adornments appear to weigh rather too heavily on his laboring muse, and the result, while novel and even interesting, does not invariably bring satisfaction.

NEW YORK RECORDER

DECEMBER 20, 1895.

ITS SECOND CONCERT.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Delights a Big Audience at the Opera House.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert last evening at the Metropolitan Opera House. The programme, one of potent contrast, comprised Haydn's G major Symphony, Tschaikowsky Orchestral Fantaisie, Francesca da Krimini, and the preludes to acts one and two of Richard Strauss' Guntram. The soloist was Mr. T. Adamowski, who played Bruch's Fantasie on Scotch Folk melodies, and who proved quite as popular a favorite as any prima donna.

From the lucidity, the harmonic clarity of Haydn's work to the ultra-modern high-colored moods of Tschaikowsky' and Strauss was a step to place the orchestra on its mettle. It took it, however, with signal success. No less pure and delicately outlined was the symphony than were the Tschaikowsky and Strauss works vivid, sonorous and boldly traced.

Mr. Paur improves. He showed last evening more graceful susceptibility joined to a warmer glow than at any previous New York appearance. In the Tschaikowsky number he warmed up to something like magnetic fervor, and conducted with amazing fire and abandon. Again, in the prelude of No. 2, of Strauss he showed verve and abandon in a degree novel to him, and the orchestra, obedient to his lead, played with superb tone, vigor, warmth and color.

To hear the Boston Symphony is to set one on the search for due terms of praise which shall not be a repetition of old enconiums. The force, the beauty in detail, the control of nuance, the finish of this band are unsurpassed, and whatever may be urged against Mr. Paur's lack of poetry or passion, there can be no gainsaying that the band played last evening to match its best record of old, and the fact is beginning to make itself suspected that the mountain is moving toward Mahomet. Mr. Paur seems warming up and fitting himself more duly to evoke the best possibilities of the band, which for a time put forth many prominent beauties unsuggested, while others were hidden away in the shade.

The symphony was delightfully given, the largo and minnetto following were delivered with rare purity and grace. The volume and glow in the passionate Tschaikowsky work, the feverish sweep and gorgeous color were brought out with powerful effect, and, of course, the instrumental poise was as ever a thing to delight in.

The first Strauss prelude, a feverish bit of Wagnerism, in which the composer forgot about taking any thematic material with him when he set out, is not a match for the second, which was played with immense life and dash, a gorgeous bit of revel.

Mr. Adamowski, a soloist of sufficient beauty and polish of style to make him desirable to be heard oftener, played the Bruch Fantaisie with delightfully smooth purity and finish. A slight wavering in intonation in the pretty sherzo, when the solo instrument coquets so daintily with the orchestra, was the one blemish on an otherwise beautiful performance. His tone is even and mellow, his style flowing, and his phrasing exceptionally smooth and intelligent. He had an enthusiastic reception, as he deserved, and had four recalls.

There was a good house, although no Melba was this time in the case.

[63]

THE MORNING ADVERTISER.
Y, DECEMBER 20,

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A GOOD PROGRAMME PLAYED.

Adamowski, the Soloist, Mr. Paur, Leader, and the Orchestra Acquit Themselves Creditably.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert in the Metropolitan Opera House last night. It was not a programme of unmixed joy, because there were several numbers on it that might profitably have been omitted. After tasting of the lyric exaltation and shivering in the stormy blasts of hell in Tschaikowsky's marvelous "Francesca da Rimini," the brilliant brutalities of Richard Strauss' "Guntram," were sadly anti-climacteric. Strauss is wonderful at handling orchestral masses. He is a painter, a theatrical scene painter, not a poet psychologist like Tschaikowsky. So the prelude to his "Guntram"—a music drama on Wagnerian lines, and produced in Weimar—was meaningless after the passionate wailings of that pair who forever are whirled in hell's fury because "out of the book they read no more that day."

The "Francesca da Rimini" is one of its composer's greatest works. It is not programme music, yet the intellectual scheme is indicated by the title. A tremendous thunder-riven poem, full of pain and the passion that is pain. Of the beauty of the scoring, it is unnecessary to speak. It is a great vibrant fresco.

The "Guntram" prelude is pitched in the "Lohengrin" mood, but Mr. Strauss has not much to say. The prelude to the second act was introduced here by Walter Damrosch at the first Symphony Society concert. It is full of bright, superficial animation.

Emil Paur opened his evening with a Haydn symphony, faultlessly played, technically considered, but a little too stiff and thin for the Haydn lover. It lacked the naive, joyous touch. Timothee Adamowski gave us a most finished and amiable performance of Bruch's arrangement of Scottish airs for violin and orchestra, a clever work and less patchwork than you would imagine. It has been played here, and I think that I heard Sarasate in it, but I am not sure, for I may be confounding this Scotch fantasy with his performance of MacKenzie's "Pibroch."

Mr. Adamowski, who is known as "Handsome Tim," is an artist of modest demeanor, who plays gracefully and musically. There are plenty of stiff hedges to jump over in this showy piece, but his technique never failed him. In cantabile passages his tone was charming, and he played the old melodies of Scotland with genuine emotion. He was recelled five times. The orchestra is composed of angels, not men; you can hear their wings rustle as they play, and even the tympanist sings in his resilient instrument. The Tschaikowsky symphonic poem sent me home happy.

JAMES HUNEKER.

THE SUN, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1895.

Boston Symphony Concert.

Schumann said many wise things, among them this: "Without enthusiasm nothing comes out right in art." It seems to us New Yorkers that no body of musicians ever had more enthusiasm and esprit de corps than the Boston Symphony orchestra. Their concert last evening held indisputable evidence of the intensity and earnestness possessed by each single member of the band as well as proof of their exceeding skill. One of the numbers, Tschaikowsky's Fantasia called "Francesca da Rimini," was a marvel of execution. The composition itself is worthy of the highest praise, being at the very height of its author's powers in his most inspired mood. Those who know Tschaikowsky's abilities will recognize that his best work is to be classified with the loftiest in modern composition, and that it holds its own well, even when in juxtaposition with the old classic writers. The fantasia is a mass of beauties; it is thickly woven with exquisite phrases that are intertwined with a deftness more wonderful than ever was called to the making of tapestries or princely textures. And underneath the mass of sound surge continually waves of passion so restless and compelling that the listener finds his own emotions dragged and pulled irresistibly along until he is left quivering and panting with the rush of agitated feeling that this powerful music excites. No one who heard Paur's interpretation of this glorious bit of orchestral eloquence could say that it fell short of absolute perfection. The plastic welding of phrases, the elastic swing, the ebb and flow of crescendo and diminuendo, everything needful to an entirely ideal rendering, was found in the playing of the Boston men.

No less exact and admirable was the dear old Haydn Symphony in G major, so sunshiny, so full of that simple, childlike faith, without which no soul gets very far either in this world or the next. It is an essence too much hidden and neglected in these latter days, and it is therefore refreshing to find it embodied in music for us, and it is something to be thankful for when leaders bring out the restful, confiding, quaint old things. They are like nature's own healing—like grass, trees, flowers, blue skies, and balmy air.

Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist of the evening. He gave Bruch's arrangement of "Scotch Airs." It is a pleasing composition, with mellow orchestration and considerable sentiment, some of which Mr. Adamowski brought to light. He also revealed a neat and facile, though by no means dashing, technique, and a cold and unimpassioned manner, with distinct limitations in artistic temperament.

Strauss's extracts from "Guntram" made but a poor showing against the radiant background of Tschaikowsky's work. They are full of talent and a clever bent for orchestration, but their roots do not strike deep into the soil of fame.

New-York Daily Tribune.
FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.
FRIDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1895.

In the evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert at the Opera House. In most respects, but particularly in the matter of attendance, the affair was in rather sharp contrast with the first concert a month ago. The audience, though not numerous, was extremely kind and gave a full measure of appreciation to the orchestra's work, which was much better in the latter part of the programme, devoted to Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini," and two preludes from Richard Strauss's "Guntram," (the second of which had previously been played here by the Symphony Society) than it was in the first part, filled by Haydn's sunshiny symphony in G major, No. 8, in the Peters edition. In this there was too little grace, too little continuity of idea, too little attention to euphony, too much isolation of phrases and striving for thickness of tone. It was all but impossible to avoid a comparison with the band's performance of the same work under Gericke—a performance that was set down, and deservedly so, as memorable. After the symphony Mr. Adamowski played Bruch's Fantasie on Scotch airs, and put to his credit the best performance with which he has favored New-York. But the work is broader in spirit than he conceives it.

The Evening Post.
New York, Friday, Dec. 20, 1895.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Probably the audiences at the New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be larger than they are if Mr. Paur would condescend to make up occasionally an interesting programme. It ought to be obvious without comment that a Haydn symphony is utterly out of place in so vast a house as the Metropolitan. You can hear the music, but there is no caloric in it; it leaves you cold and impassive. Max Bruch's "Fantasia on Scotch Folk Melodies," on the other hand, is warmly enough scored for a large hall, but it is interesting only in so far as the folk melodies are in evidence; Bruch's own contributions are commonplace. This piece in four movements was played by Mr. Adamowski, with clever technique but somewhat cool expression. Then came the only really enjoyable piece on the programme, Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini," which Mr. Paur and his musicians played superbly. But why this should have been followed up by the preludes to acts i. and ii. of Richard Strauss's "Guntram" passes comprehension. The second is all sound and fury, without the semblance of an idea, and the first is a ludicrous mixture of fragments from Wagner's two Grail operas; you never know whether the next bar will suggest "Lohengrin" or "Parsifal," but feel sure that it will be one or the other. The next concert of the Boston Orchestra will be on January 23.

NEW YORK HERALD.
— DECEMBER 20, 1895.—

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Music by Haydn, Bruch, Tschaikowsky and Richard Strauss, interpreted by the great Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Emil Paur's direction, should have attracted a larger audience to the Metropolitan Opera House last evening. Only a few boxes were filled and many seats were unoccupied.

Haydn's symphony in G major was the first number on the programme. The melodious Largo was magnificently played. The symphony was followed by a brilliant rendering of Max Bruch's Scotch Fantasia by Mr. T. Adamowsky, the well known violinist, with the accompaniment of the orchestra. Mr. Adamowsky well deserved the applause and many recalls given him.

The best and most enlivening number of the concert was the fantasie "Francesca da Rimini," by Tschaikowsky, the interpretation of which called for all the resources of the orchestra. It was given with all the spirit and vigor demanded.

The concluding numbers were the preludes to the first and second acts of Richard Strauss' "Guntram."

The Press
DAILY EDITION.
NEW YORK, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1895.

A NEW STRAUSS OPERA.

Not Johann, but Richard, and the Symphony Orchestra Played It.

Mr. Adamowsky certainly can't complain of the welcome he received in this city last night at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season. He played Max Bruch's "Fantasie on Scotch Melodies" with great spirit and was recalled again and again.

The other numbers on the programme were Haydn's Symphony in G, No. 13, Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini Fantasie" and the preludes to Acts I. and II. of Richard Strauss's new opera, "Guntram," which was given in the Royal Court Opera in Munich last April.

The band, under Emil Paur, did fine work. The Metropolitan Opera House was fairly well filled.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVIII., NO. 173.
FRIDAY, DEC. 20, 1895.

SYMPHONY IN NEW YORK.

Its Artistic Offering Received by a Comparatively Small Audience.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, Dec. 19, 1895. Music by Haydn, Bruch, Tschaikowsky and Richard Strauss, interpreted by the great Boston Symphony orchestra, under Emil Paur's direction, should have attracted a larger audience to the Metropolitan Opera House this evening. Only a few boxes were filled, and many seats were unoccupied.

Haydn's symphony in G major was the first number on the programme. The melodious largo was magnificently played. The symphony was followed by a brilliant rendering of Max Bruch's Scotch fantasie by Mr. T. Adamowski, with the accompaniment of the orchestra. Mr. Adamowski well deserved the applause and many recalls given him.

The best and most enlivening number of the concert was the fantasie "Francesca da Rimini," by Tschaikowsky, the interpretation of which called for all the resources of the orchestra. It was given with all the spirit and vigor demanded. The concluding number were the preludes to the first and second acts of Richard Strauss' "Guntram."

Brooklyn Daily Eagle
SATURDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 21, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The second of the season's orchestral concerts under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute occurred at the Academy of Music last night, and while the holiday shopping affected the attendance to a slight degree, the audience was far larger than it used to be when the Symphonists were giving concerts here on their own responsibility. It was not an ideal programme that Mr. Paur offered, however. As he had been criticised for frivoling at the first concert, he resolved to rebuke the critics by abstinence from lightness this time, and he put on the abstruse Fourth symphony of Brahms, and the preludes to two acts of Richard Strauss' "Guntram" as the pieces of resistance. The lightening offsets, however, were light enough. There was another mad scene—an improvement on the Donizetti one, as it was from Ambroise Thomas' "Hamlet"—the Viotti concerto for violin and Mozart's "Turkish March," with Herbeck's orchestration. The best thing on the programme and one on which all tastes could meet in common, thereby proving its worth and greatness, was Handal's largo, solid, strong and beautiful, and played by the matchless strings, harp and horns, of this great band in a superb manner. The audience wanted this piece to be played again, and it was one of the rare occasions when a repetition would have been excusable; but Mr. Paur ruled otherwise, though he and Mr. Kneisel, who had the solo phrases, were kept bowing long enough to have played it half through.

It can hardly be said the Brahms symphonies improve on acquaintance. Remarkable ingenuity they have, and all the scientific resources of the muscian, but music is not primarily or consciously a science; it is an art and will be so regarded while there are voices or instruments to give breath to it. The Fourth symphony of this writer perhaps is the least stirring and musical of the series. It is prose all through. Strange that a man with such a technic of utterance should find so little to say with it. And even as to form, Brahms is exceeding cautious of beauty. Once or twice, to be sure, he forgets himself in the andante, and admits a hint of the charm that we look and listen for, but catching himself at it he promptly reforms and goes bumbling around with his confounded problems of harmonic resolution and other disagreeable mathematics, and when, at the last, he says to himself that the pupils have learned their lesson and can have a little fun, his chaconne comes in like the gambol of a hippopotamus.

While the orchestra's work in this number was of its usual perfection, on the face, the musicians did not appear to be much in sympathy with the work, and it proceeded with obvious heaviness. The Viotti concerto that followed was refreshing by comparison. It was music of a less ambitious and scientific sort, but it was fresh and simple, and it exhibited the solo player, Franz Kneisel, to advantage. His smooth, firm tone, his easy mastery of the strings, his nice sense of meaning, won not only the applause of the audience, but brought the ratta from his associates. But a good deal of the bravura was not worth the playing, now, was it? The broad and noble largo of Handel was followed by the Mozart march, which was played with spirit, and the closing number was the "Guntram" music of Strauss. The serious Strauss. In this the composer has out-Wagnered Wagner, or tried to. He has broken away from form as far as it is possible to do so, and has made Brahms seem almost classically regular by contrast. His instrumentation is as vehement and independent as his manner, and if Liszt had lived to hear the explosions in the second prelude of his "Guntram" series wouldn't he have been mad! The trouble with Strauss is that he unconsciously imitates his master, instead of taking inspiration from him. "Parsifal" has been his model in the first of the two preludes, and there is the sustaining of strings in alt that we have grown used to in that opera and in "Lohengrin." But while there is force there is lack of intensity and purpose in it. It is force going to waste. The second prelude has vivacity and a kind of gayety, as is fitting to a record of victory.

Clementine De Vere Sapio was the singer of the Thomas number. She has improved in voice during her wanderings over the face of the earth and through the various concert halls thereof, and sings with more breadth and certainty, though her upper notes occasionally resist, with a trifle of rasp, the effort to force them. The piece, separated from its illustrative action, is a piece of show; but she sang the scales rapidly, and when it came to the little Swedish folk song, sandwiched into the exhibition, she gave it a really artistic and sentimental interest. Mrs. Sapio was in good voice and spirits, and her work was applauded with enthusiasm. The next concert of the orchestra will be given on January 24.

THE STAR.
SATURDAY EVENING, DEC. 21, 1895.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Truly the union of the Brooklyn Institute with the Boston Orchestra, is proving a blessing and a joy. Despite the proximity of Christmas, not to mention a rather formidable programme, the Academy of Music was well filled last evening, if not completely full. In place of the rows upon rows of empty seats so noticeable last winter, there were attentive individuals, and where coldness once reigned supreme, enthusiasm seems to have become the order of the day. Mr. Paur is Mr. Paur, but the orchestra is one of the institutions of the country, and to listen to its marvellous performances is always a privilege and a delight. There is not an orchestra in New York that can be mentioned in the same day with this from Boston, when the pure technical excellence, which comes from constant drill is the matter in question. As for the reading of the compositions which they essay, there is where the conductor becomes all important, and it is only a partisan who can be satisfied with the majority of the interpretations by Mr. Paur. At the same time he is a strict disciplinarian, and his men are allowed to perform no slovenly work. It is enough to make one weep to see the results obtained by continual rehearsal alone, when we observe certain talented conductors laboring with much preoccupied or indifferent material. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is a striking example of the magnificent prizes, which may be won through just "keeping at it."

For those who like Brahms, the fourth symphony, in E minor, will prove just the sort of thing they like! It is eminently intricate, elaborate and scholarly, but in the whole four movements there is scarcely one peg to hang the imagination upon, and as for musical feeling, except in a most formal, mathematical and and sublimated form—perish the thought! Those who don't like Brahms, who find him exceedingly dry and tedious, would not enjoy his compositions even in the hands of the Boston Orchestra. Yet, the performance was admirable, the symphony being more in harmony with Mr. Paur's tactics and methods than some others we wot of, and this first number on the programme ended amidst acclamations and applause. Later on we had Handel's exquisite Largo, with Mr. Kneisel at the violin, immediately succeeded by Mozart's fascinating "Turkish March," orchestrated by Herbeck. The remaining orchestral numbers were Richard Strauss' Preludes to the first and second acts of "Guntram," two ambitious and somewhat turgid examples of modern music writing, inevitably suggesting the omnipresent influence of Wagner.

Perhaps the most delightful number of the evening was Viotti's concerto for violin, in A minor,, which gave ample opportunity for Mr. Kneisel to do some of his effective work. So true an artist could not fail to bring out the limpid harmonies, the classical beauty, of Viotti's charming composition. Each of the three movements was heartily applauded, and one would have been glad to hear more of that sweet, refined, lovely tone, that sincere conception and finished tecnique. This concerto and the Handel Largo, which latter received four rounds of applause, exemplify the power of music in its most pure, gentle and inspiring form.

Curious what a vogue the mad scene from "Hamlet" is having this winter! First it was Melba, with her voice of velvet and her perfect floriture. Then Calve, with her marvelous histrionic gifts. Last night it was Mme. Clementine De Vere Sapio, with an inferior vocal equipment to either. The aria was sung well, for Mme. Sapio has an excellent and highly cultivated, if somewhat worn, voice. As long as the singer confined herself to her middle and lower register, all went well, but the high tones were often a trifle harsh. Her execution was easy and fluent, however, and the brilliant ornamentation was neither slighted nor butchered.

Mr. Paur was as prompt with his audience as with his men, the concert began on time and no number lagged, and it was precisely two hours in length. Nobody was tired, and the evening proved more than satisfactory, if countenances and enthusiasm are any indication. The third concert of the season with the Boston Orchestra will take place Jan. 24.

SYMPHONY'S 1336TH CONCERT.

Franz Ondricek Is Given a Hearty Reception.

The audience liked the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1336th concert so much at Music Hall last night that it insisted on having some of the numbers repeated. But Conductor Paur would not break the rule. Haydn's music, simple and strong, was the feature of the orchestral selections. The audience gave Franz Ondricek, the Bohemian violinist, an enthusiastic reception, which must have warmed his heart toward America. In his first tour in this country he is being welcomed by appreciative audiences in the principal American cities. The orchestra left Baltimore this morning for New York.

[64]

Nos. 302 to 308 FULTON ST.
Opposite the City Hall.
Receiving the Entire United Press Telegraphic Service.
Entered at the Brooklyn, N. Y., Post Office as second-class

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 21.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Second Concert of the Season at the Academy of Music.

The popularity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was evinced again last night by the attendance of Brooklyn's best people at the Academy of Music, which was well filled. Mr. Emil Paur, the conductor, had selected a choice classical programme, and every number was listened to with rapt attention, and the proverbial pin might have been heard to drop, not only in the soli but in the choruses. Johannes Brahm's Symphony, No. 4, in E-minor, op. 98, was the first number, in four movements, every one of which was freely applauded, but the second movement (andante moderato) probably gave most satisfaction, especially the second theme in E-major.

The second number was Giovanni Battista Viotti's Concerto for violin, in A-minor, in three movements, in which Franz Kneisel, the violinist, scored a great success, and he was vigorously applauded after every movement, and when he retired he was twice recalled. The great audience at times seemed to suspend its breath and not a shading was lost on the hearers. When Mr. Kneisel left the stage the applause of his associates in the orchestra was as liberal as that of the audience, a tribute seldom accorded to performers.

Mme. Clementine De Vere-Sapio was heard to advantage in the mad scene from "Hamlet," by Ambroise Thomas. Mme. Sapio has been heard so frequently, and she is so great a favorite with Brooklyn audiences that it unnecessary to say that her reception was hearty, and it is also unnecessary to say that the song was well sung, and that it was well received, the singer being recalled twice.

In the largo from Handel's "Serse" (Xerxes), arranged by Joseph Hellmesberger, a duo for violin and harp is the striking feature. Mr. Kneisel was the violinist and Mr. Heinrich Schuecker was the harpist. This was more acceptable to the audience than any of the other numbers, and Mr. Paur had to wait for several minutes for the applause to cease. It was renewed again and again, but there was no encore.

Mozart's "Turkish March" and the preludes to Acts I. and II. of "Guntram," by Richard Strauss, were the last two numbers of the programme. The orchestra maintained its high reputation for precision and execution. Mr. Paur is not the one to allow any slighting of any part, and he is ably seconded by the performers, individually and collectively.

The following appeared in THE AMERICAN HEBREW of Dec. 9

THE AMERICAN HEBREW

On Thursday evening the second Concert of the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Metropolitan Opera House. The programme arranged by Mr. Paur exhibited all the best qualities of his orchestra. The first selection was the symphony in G. Major by Haydn. The fourth movement of this symphony is one of the prime favorites among Haydn's symphonic rondeaus. Max Bruch's Fantasia on Scotch folk-melodies for violin was performed in a masterly manner by Mr. Max Adamoski. Max Bruch is one of the most distinguished of modern composers. His Kol Nidre is among the most popular of modern compositions and his choral works indicate great dramatic power.

Tschaikowsky's Fantasia for orchestra, "Francesca da Rimini," and Richard Strauss' Preludes to Guntram were played for the first time.

All lovers of what is best in music should not fail to attend these concerts. The leader is in thorough sympathy with his work. The orchestra responds to his every call, and the compositions are worthy of interpretation by such an orchestra. No wonder that this organization announces its 1337th concert with such deserved pride.

[illegible] WORLD [illegible] DECEMBER 22, 1895

[illegible] the [illegible] concert [illegible] was that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was the best performance given by the orchestra since its organization—not so long ago but that we can all remember it. The concert was on the whole a most enjoyable one. I should have preferred myself something a little less archaic in pattern and mould than the Haydn symphony, but as played by the orchestra it had a quaint, old-fashioned flavor by no means without its charm. It also furnished an admirable contrast to Bruck's "Scotch Fantasie," to my thinking the very best violin solo in the whole concert repertoire which followed it.

The concerto was admirably played by Mr. T. Adamowski, one of the first violins of the orchestra. I have always looked upon Mr. Adamowski as a player of great temperament, poetic feeling and refinement, but his really most artistic and finished playing of this concerto convinced me that of late he has been working hard at his art, and has in consequence gained notably in breadth, authority and technical finish and facility. Beautiful violin playing surely! Sometimes it seems to me hardly worth while to import so many violin players of rather doubtful attainments from abroad when we have such artists at home.

It struck me that Tschaikowski's fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," was very much improved in sequence and compactness by the very judicious cuts and condensations made by Mr. Paur. It is hardly equal to the "Hamlet" fantasia overture as a bit of fantastic, picturesque writing, but it was intelligently read and delightfully rendered by Mr. Paur and the orchestra. Richard Strauss is certainly more sane and contained in his "Guntram" music, as far as it has been played here, than in his symphonic poems, but I cannot hold with such blatant Wagnerism run riot as his orchestral writings exhibit.

Ondricek's Debut.

The second popular matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon before the thinnest audience to which that famous and superb organization has played in this city in a number of years. The occasion was notable, too, for the debut of Franz Ondricek, the Bohemian violinist, whose playing of Beethoven's celebrated concerto was one of the features of the recent anniversary jubilee in honor of that great maestro's memory. This virtuoso of the bow played yesterday the solo violin in Max Bruch's Concerto in G minor, Op. 26, and Paganini's "Witches' Dances." A heavy-built, square-shouldered and square-jawed performer, with a heavy lock dangling from his shaggy pate over his broad forehead, his personality was an unbelying index to his artistic style. There was no fascinating touch to his bowing or stopping, and no enthusiastically inspiring tones coaxed from his violin; but his bowing was powerful and broad, his management of the shifts a perfect art of compact mastery, and his interpretations were deeply intellectual, if not sparklingly sensuous. In the adagio movement there was, unfortunately, however, a slight tonal discord in one of the strings at certain intervals. The other feature of the afternoon was Mr. Alvin Schroeder's splendid performance of the violoncello solo in Volkmann's Serenade in D minor, Op. 69. He proved himself to be a finely sympathetic 'cellist, while the entire concert served to reveal the varied beauty of the entire strings. Miss Genevieve Clark Wilson was the vocal soloist.

Record

OPERA AND CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second matinee for the season at the Academy of Music on Saturday afternoon, and although, owing to the determents of the strike and the attractions of Christmas shopping, the audience was small, the concert was a most delightful one. Chief among the orchestral features were a superb rendering of the magnificent "William Tell" overture, a most sympathetic and beautiful interpretation of Volkmann's D minor string serenade, the 'cello obligato of which was exquisitely played by Mr. Schroeder, and a masterly performance of Handel's familiar "Largo." The occasion was made additionally interesting by the first appearance of Franz Ondricek, a violinist of great power, who played the Bruch G minor concerto in a most masterly way, and of Miss Genevieve Clark Wilson, a mezzo-soprano singer of decided attainments, who undoubtedly has a brilliant future before her. The third of these matinees is announced for Saturday, January 25.

H. Lancecraft

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony popular Saturday concerts were announced as experiments. Judging from yesterday's very meager attendance the experiment is not likely to prove a success unless special efforts are made to attract the public by means of great names. The strike was no doubt responsible for part of the falling off, but the slump, for it was slump when you compare it with the first concert which jammed the Academy, was due to the fact that a programme presenting largely as an attraction the orchestra and a virtuoso on the violin is not a drawing card in Philadelphia. It may be a sad state of affairs, but it seems to be so. Of course, the concert was a fine one and Ondricek, the only great violinist Philadelphia has heard this year in any sort of repertoire, proved himself a master indeed. His tone is rich, sonorous and poetical and his technique of the highest order.

Press

News 12/17

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

FRANZ ONDRICEK TO BE THE VIOLIN SOLOIST.

The Orchestra Arrives in Town Today and Will Go Over to Washington Tonight, Returning for the Performance at Music Hall Tomorrow Night—Salvini at Ford's—Gladys Wallis at Harris' Academy of Music.

Franz Ondricek of Bohemia, violinist, will be the soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's December concert tomorrow evening. It will be the 1336th concert of that organization since it began business in 1881.

The following is the programme:

Haydn.....Symphony No. 13.
Bruch.....Concerto for Violin No. 1.
(a) Handel.....Largo.
(b) Mozart.....Turkish March.
Tschaikowsky.....Fantasia for Orchestra, "Francesca da Rimini," Op. 32.
(First time at these concerts.)

Ondricek was born in Prague, where his father was a musician, and while quite young he was compelled to assist his father to earn a living for the family. In his 7th year he was advanced sufficiently to play violin concertos. In his 14th year he was admitted to the Conservatory. After three years he received the first prize for his mature rendition of the Beethoven concerto.

Purity of intonation, warm and sympathetic interpretation, individuality of conception, verve and temperament are the salient qualities of Ondricek's playing.

The company arrived here this morning. It will give a concert in Washington tonight.

The Four Conductors.

The orchestra will be under the direction of Mr. Paur. He is the fourth conductor the Symphony Orchestra has had. George Henschel was the first. He served three years, and went back to London. Gericke was the next. After five years of striving for absolute perfection of ensemble, during which time he spared neither himself nor the orchestra, he returned to Vienna.

Nikisch came next—Nikisch, the poetic, the romantic, the graceful Hungarian. He had been the leader of the Stadt Theatre at Leipsic, the first opera house in that city. His reign was for four years, a year longer than that of Mr. Henschel and a year less than Mr. Gericke. One thing the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always done for its conductors—it has given to them greater renown than was theirs when they assumed control.

When Nikisch left the Stadt Theatre in Leipsic to go to Boston he was followed by the same man who succeeded him as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Mr. Emil Paur. It is also worthy of comment that Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur played at the same desk as first violinists at the very same Stadt Theatre several years before. Mr. Paur is cast in a different mold from any of his predecessors, for his enthusiasm manifests itself in a most pronounced fashion whenever he takes the baton in his hand. He is broad in his tastes, appreciative and intelligent in his reading, and a thorough musician.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The second concert of this magnificent organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will take place next Wednesday, December 18, at the Music Hall. This is the fourteenth year of their existence, and next Wednesday's concert will be the 1336th performance which has been given by them in 17 States and 45 cities. The soloist at Wednesday's concert will be Mr. Franz Ondricek, the famous violinist, whose recent coming to this country has created a furore in musical circles and captivated the cities of New York, Boston and Philadelphia. The programme for the concert is as follows:

Haydn, Symphony No. 13; Bruch, Concerto for violin, No. 1; a. Handel, Largo; b. Mozart, Turkish March; Tschaikowsky, Fantasia for orchestra, "Francesca da Rimini" (first time at the concert). The sale at seats begins Monday at Albert's.

Herald 12/16

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall next Wednesday evening—which, by the way, is the 1,336th performance of this now famous organization since its founding 14 years ago, and the 35th performance in Baltimore—has for its programme the works of five composers, Haydn, Handel, Mozart, Tschaikowsky and Bruch. As is usually the case in programmes of orchestral concerts at the present time, four out of five of these composers are no longer living, and in fact three of them, Haydn, Handel and Mozart, belong to a past century. It is indeed a tribute to the lasting quality of the music written by these men of years ago that their works retain the position of honor upon nearly every programme.

The Haydn Symphony No. 13, which opens the programme, is of the joyous, tuneful nature to be expected of this composer. Next comes the violin concerto No. 1, of Bruch, a selection due to the fact that this composer achieved his greatest reputation by his works for the violin.

The Largo of Handel is one of the most effective and popular selections ever rendered by the Boston Symphony or, in fact, any other orchestra. The title of the selection conveys but a very faint idea of its beauty. After a short introduction, the melody or air is played by the first violin as a solo, accompanied by the harp; then repeated by all the violins in unison, with the accompaniment at the last of the full orchestra. The effect of this number upon every audience is instantaneous, and if the custom of the Boston Symphony Orchestra allowed encores this number would never fail to gain one.

It is a great pity that Tschaikowsky, whose fantasia "Francesca da Rimini" closes the programme, could not have lived to a ripe old age, for his works gave promise of greater compositions to come, and the musical public is indeed loser by his recent death.

The soloist, Mr. Franz Ondricek, is a Bohemian, with an established European reputation, who made his debut in this country on the 15th of last month in New York. He has recently appeared with the Boston SymphonyOrchestra in its regular series of concerts in Boston.

Sun 12/14 95

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at Music Hall next Wednesday evening.

The soloist will be Franz Ondricek, the Bohemian violinist, who is making his first concert tour of America this winter.

He began his tour just a month ago with a highly successful appearance in connection with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, and his subsequent concerts are described as a continued triumph. In both Europe and this country his playing has been compared to that of Paganini.

The programme for the concert includes Haydn's "Symphony in G Major, No. 13;" Bruch, "Concerto for Violin No. 1;" Handel's "Largo" Mozart's "Turkish March," and Tschaikowsky's fantasia for orchestra, entitled "Francesca da Rimini," the first time at these concerts. Mr. Emil Paur will be the conductor.

American 12/15

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Boston Symphony's Second Concert of the Season.

The second concert in Baltimore by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, will be given next Wednesday evening at Music Hall. These concerts have become leading features of the Baltimore musical season, and are attended each year by an ever-widening circle of music-lovers. The individual excellence of the musicians and the carefulness of preparation that characterizes all its performers have established a very high standard for its concerts, and have made the Boston Symphony Orchestra a welcome visitor to Baltimore. Mr. Franz Ondricek, the violin virtuoso, who has been well received in New York, Boston, and Philadelphia will be the soloist in Wednesday's concert, and the following program has been arranged:

Haydn.....Symphony in G major, No. 13
Bruch.....Concerto for Violin, No. 1
(a.) Handel.....Largo
(b.) Mozart.....Turkish March
Tschaikowsky Fantasia for Orchestra, "Francesca da Rimini," Op. 32.
(First time at these concerts.)

Miss Martha Barry, of St. Ann's choir, was the soloist at the Cathedral Sodality services on last Friday evening. Her selection, which was most beautifully rendered, was Cherubini's "Ave Maria."

The Kreisel Quartet, with Harold Randolph as pianist, will render a splendid program at Music Hall next Thursday afternoon.

[65]

The Brooklyn Citizen.
Nos. 397 to 403 FULTON ST.
Opposite the City Hall.
Receiving the Entire United Press Telegraphic Service.
Entered at the Brooklyn, N. Y., Post Office as second-class
SATURDAY, DECEMBER 21.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Its Second Concert of the Season at the Academy of Music.

The popularity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was evinced again last night by the attendance of Brooklyn's best people at the Academy of Music, which was well filled. Mr. Emil Paur, the conductor, had selected a choice classical programme, and every number was listened to with rapt attention, and the proverbial pin might have been heard to drop, not only in the soli but in the choruses. Johannes Brahm's Symphony, No. 4, in E-minor, op. 98, was the first number, in four movements, every one of which was freely applauded, but the second movement (andante moderato) probably gave most satisfaction, especially the second theme in E-major.

The second number was Giovanni Battista Viotti's Concerto for violin, in A-minor, in three movements, in which Franz Kneisel, the violinist, scored a great success, and he was vigorously applauded after every movement, and when he retired he was twice recalled. The great audience at times seemed to suspend its breath and not a shading was lost on the hearers. When Mr. Kneisel left the stage the applause of his associates in the orchestra was as liberal as that of the audience, a tribute seldom accorded to performers.

Mme. Clementine De Vere-Sapio was heard to advantage in the mad scene from "Hamlet," by Ambroise Thomas. Mme. Sapio has been heard so frequently, and she is so great a favorite with Brooklyn audiences that it unnecessary to say that her reception was hearty, and it is also unnecessary to say that the song was well sung, and that it was well received, the singer being recalled twice.

In the largo from Handel's "Serse" (Xerxes), arranged by Joseph Hellmesberger, a duo for violin and harp is the striking feature. Mr. Kneisel was the violinist and Mr. Heinrich Schuecker was the harpist. This was more acceptable to the audience than any of the other numbers, and Mr. Paur had to wait for several minutes for the applause to cease. It was renewed again and again, but there was no encore.

Mozart's "Turkish March" and the preludes to Acts I. and II. of "Guntram," by Richard Strauss, were the last two numbers of the programme. The orchestra maintained its high reputation for precision and execution. Mr. Paur is not the one to allow any slighting of any part, and he is ably seconded by the performers, individually and collectively.

The following apheared in
THE AMERICAN HEBREW of Dec. 2

THE AMERICAN HEBREW

On Thursday evening the second Concert of the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Metropolitan Opera House. The programme arranged by Mr. Paur exhibited all the best qualities of his orchestra. The first selection was the symphony in G. Major by Haydn. The fourth movement of this symphony is one of the prime favorites among Haydn's symphonic rondeaus. Max Bruch's Fantasia on Scotch folk-melodies for violin was performed in a masterly manner by Mr. Max Adamoski. Max Bruch is one of the most distinguished of modern composers. His Kol Nidre is among the most popular of modern compositions and his choral works indicate great dramatic power.

Tschaikowsky's Fantasia for orchestra, "Francesca da Rimini," and Richard Strauss' Preludes to Guntram were played for the first time.

All lovers of what is best in music should not fail to attend these concerts. The leader is in thorough sympathy with his work. The orchestra responds to his every call, and the compositions are worthy of interpretation by such an orchestra. No wonder that this organization announces its 1337th concert with such deserved pride.

THE WORLD: SUNDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1895

ing musical work.

The principal—almost the only—concert event of last week was that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was the 1,337th performance given by the orchestra since its organization—not so long ago but that we can all remember it. The concert was on the whole a most enjoyable one. I should have preferred myself something a little less archaic in pattern and mould than the Haydn symphony, but as played by the orchestra it had a quaint, old-fashioned flavor by no means without its charm. It also furnished an admirable contrast to Bruck's "Scotch Fantasie," to my thinking the very best violin solo in the whole concert repertoire which followed it.

The concerto was admirably played by Mr. T. Adamowski, one of the first violins of the orchestra. I have alweys looked upon Mr. Adamowski as a player of great temperament, poetic feeling and refinement, but his really most artistic and finished playing of this concerto convinced me that of late he has been working hard at his art, and has in consequence gained notably in breadth, authority and technical finish and facility. Beautiful violin playing surely! Sometimes it seems to me hardly worth while to import so many violin players of rather doubtful attainments from abroad when we have such artists at home.

It struck me that Tschaikowski's fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," was very much improved in sequence and compactness by the very judicious cuts and condensations made by Mr. Paur. It is hardly equal to the "Hamlet" fantasia overture as a bit of fantastic, picturesque writing, but it was intelligently read and delightfully rendered by Mr. Paur and the orchestra. Richard Strauss is certainly more sane and contained in his "Guntram" music, as far as it has been played here, than in his symphonic poems, but I cannot hold with such blatant Wagnerism run riot as his orchestral writings exhibit.

Ondricek's Debut.

The second popular matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon before the thinnest audience to which that famous and superb organization has played in this city in a number of years. The occasion was notable, too, for the debut of Franz Ondricek, the Bohemian violinist, whose playing of Beethoven's celebrated concerto was one of the features of the recent anniversary jubilee in honor of that great maestro's memory. This virtuoso of the bow played yesterday the solo violin in Max Bruch's Concerto in G minor, Op. 26, and Paganini's "Witches' Dances." A heavy-built, square-shouldered and square-jawed performer, with a heavy lock dangling from his shaggy pate over his broad forehead, his personality was an unbelying index to his artistic style. There was no fascinating touch to his bowing or stopping, and no enthusiastically inspiring tones coaxed from his violin; but his bowing was powerful and broad, his management of the shifts a perfect art of compact mastery, and his interpretations were deeply intellectual, if not sparklingly sensuous. In the adagio movement there was, unfortunately, however, a slight tonal discord in one of the strings at certain intervals. The other feature of the afternoon was Mr. Alvin Schroeder's splendid performance of the violoncello solo in Volkmann's Serenade in D minor, Op. 69. He proved himself to be a finely sympathetic 'cellist, while the entire concert served to reveal the varied beauty of the entire strings. Miss Genevieve Clark Wilson was the vocal soloist.

Record

OPERA AND CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second matinee for the season at the Academy of Music on Saturday afternoon, and although, owing to the determents of the strike and the attractions of Christmas shopping, the audience was small, the concert was a most delightful one. Chief among the orchestral features were a superb rendering of the magnificent "William Tell" overture, a most sympathetic and beautiful interpretation of Volkmann's D minor string serenade, the 'cello obligato of which was exquisitely played by Mr. Schroeder, and a masterly performance of Handel's familiar "Largo." The occasion was made additionally interesting by the first appearance of Franz Ondricek, a violinist of great power, who played the Bruch G minor concerto in a most masterly way, and of Miss Genevieve Clark Wilson, a mezzo-soprano singer of decided attainments, who undoubtedly has a brilliant future before her. The third of these matinees is announced for Saturday, January 25.

H. American

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony popular Saturday concerts were announced as experiments. Judging from yesterday's very meager attendance the experiment is not likely to prove a success unless special efforts are made to attract the public by means of great names. The strike was no doubt responsible for part of the falling off, but the slump, for it was slump when you compare it with the first concert which jammed the Academy, was due to the fact that a programme presenting largely as an attraction the orchestra and a virtuoso on the violin is not a drawing card in Philadelphia. It may be a sad state of affairs, but it seems to be so. Of course, the concert was a fine one and Ondricek, the only great violinist Philadelphia has heard this year in any sort of repertoire, proved himself a master indeed. His tone is rich, sonorous and poetical and his technique of the highest order.

Press

News 12/17

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

FRANZ ONDRICEK TO BE THE VIOLIN SOLOIST.

The Orchestra Arrives in Town Today and Will Go Over to Washington Tonight, Returning for the Performance at Music Hall Tomorrow Night—Salvini at Ford's—Gladys Wallis at Harris' Academy of Music.

Franz Ondricek of Bohemia, violinist, will be the soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's December concert tomorrow evening. It will be the 1336th concert of that organization since it began business in 1881.

The following is the programme:

Haydn.....Symphony No. 13.
Bruch.....Concerto for Violin No. 1.
(a) Handel.....Largo.
(b) Mozart.....Turkish March.
Tschaikowsky.....Fantasia for Orchestra, "Francesca da Rimini," Op. 32.
(First time at these concerts.)

Ondricek was born in Prague, where his father was a musician, and while quite young he was compelled to assist his father to earn a living for the family. In his 7th year he was advanced sufficiently to play violin concertos. In his 14th year he was admitted to the Conservatory. After three years he received the first prize for his mature rendition of the Beethoven concerto.

Purity of intonation, warm and sympathetic interpretation, individuality of conception, verve and temperament are the salient qualities of Ondricek's playing.

The company arrived here this morning. It will give a concert in Washington tonight.

The Four Conductors.

The orchestra will be under the direction of Mr. Paur. He is the fourth conductor the Symphony Orchestra has had. George Henschel was the first. He served three years, and went back to London. Gericke was the next. After five years of striving for absolute perfection of ensemble, during which time he spared neither himself nor the orchestra, he returned to Vienna.

Nikisch came next—Nikisch, the poetic, the romantic, the graceful Hungarian. He had been the leader of the Stadt Theatre at Leipsic, the first opera house in that city. His reign was for four years, a year longer than that of Mr. Henschel and a year less than Mr. Gericke. One thing the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always done for its conductors—it has given to them greater renown than was theirs when they assumed control.

When Nikisch left the Stadt Theatre in Leipsic to go to Boston he was followed by the same man who succeeded him as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Mr. Emil Paur. It is also worthy of comment that Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur played at the same desk as first violinists at the very same Stadt Theatre several years before. Mr. Paur is cast in a different mold from any of his predecessors, for his enthusiasm manifests itself in a most pronounced fashion whenever he takes the baton in his hand. He is broad in his tastes, appreciative and intelligent in his reading, and a thorough musician.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The second concert of this magnificent organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will take place next Wednesday, December 18, at the Music Hall. This is the fourteenth year of their existence, and next Wednesday's concert will be the 1336th performance which has been given by them in 17 States and 45 cities. The soloist at Wednesday's concert will be Mr. Franz Ondricek, the famous violinist, whose recent coming to this country has created a furore in musical circles and captivated the cities of New York, Boston and Philadelphia. The programme for the concert is as follows:

Haydn, Symphony No. 13; Bruch, Concerto for violin, No 1; a. Handel, Largo; b. Mozart, Turkish March; Tschaikowsky, Fantasia for orchestra, "Francesca da Rimini" (first time at the concert). The sale at seats begins Monday at Albert's.

Herald 12/6

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall next Wednesday evening—which, by the way, is the 1,336th performance of this now famous organization since its founding 14 years ago, and the 35th performance in Baltimore—has for its programme the works of five composers, Haydn, Handel, Mozart, Tschaikowsky and Bruch. As is usually the case in programmes of orchestral concerts at the present time, four out of five of these composers are no longer living, and in fact three of them, Haydn, Handel and Mozart, belong to a past century. It is indeed a tribute to the lasting quality of the music written by these men of years ago that their works retain the position of honor upon nearly every programme.

The Haydn Symphony No. 13, which opens the programme, is of the joyous, tuneful nature to be expected of this composer. Next comes the violin concerto No. 1, of Bruch, a selection due to the fact that this composer achieved his greatest reputation by his works for the violin.

The Largo of Handel is one of the most effective and popular selections ever rendered by the Boston Symphony or, in fact, any other orchestra. The title of the selection conveys but a very faint idea of its beauty. After a short introduction, the melody or air is played by the first violin as a solo, accompanied by the harp; then repeated by all the violins in unison, with the accompaniment at the last of the full orchestra. The effect of this number upon every audience is instantaneous, and if the custom of the Boston Symphony Orchestra allowed encores this number would never fail to gain one.

It is a great pity that Tschaikowsky, whose fantasia "Francesca da Rimini" closes the programme, could not have lived to a ripe old age, for his works gave promise of greater compositions to come, and the musical public is indeed loser by his recent death.

The soloist, Mr. Franz Ondricek, is a Bohemian, with an established European reputation, who made his debut in this country on the 15th of last month in New York. He has recently appeared with the Boston SymphonyOrchestra in its regular series of concerts in Boston.

Sun 12/14 95

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at Music Hall next Wednesday evening.

The soloist will be Franz Ondricek, the Bohemian violinist, who is making his first concert tour of America this winter.

He began his tour just a month ago with a highly successful appearance in connection with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, and his subsequent concerts are described as a continued triumph. In both Europe and this country his playing has been compared to that of Paganini.

The programme for the concert includes Haydn's "Symphony in G Major, No. 13;" Bruch, "Concerto for Violin No. 1;" Handel's "Largo" Mozart's "Turkish March," and Tschaikowsky's fantasia for orchestra, entitled "Francesca da Rimini," the first time at these concerts. Mr. Emil Paur will be the conductor.

American 12/15

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Boston Symphony's Second Concert of the Season.

The second concert in Baltimore by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, will be given next Wednesday evening at Music Hall. These concerts have become leading features of the Baltimore musical season, and are attended each year by an ever-widening circle of music-lovers. The individual excellence of the musicians and the carefulness of preparation that characterizes all its performers have established a very high standard for its concerts, and have made the Boston Symphony Orchestra a welcome visitor to Baltimore. Mr. Franz Ondricek, the violin virtuoso, who has been well received in New York, Boston, and Philadelphia will be the soloist in Wednesday's concert, and the following program has been arranged:

Haydn.....Symphony in G major, No. 13
Bruch.....Concerto for Violin, No. 1
(a.) Handel.....Largo
(b.) Mozart.....Turkish March
Tschaikowsky Fantasia for Orchestra, "Francesca da Rimini," Op. 32.
(First time at these concerts.)

Miss Martha Barry, of St. Ann's choir, was the soloist at the Cathedral Sodality services on last Friday evening. Her selection, which was most beautifully rendered, was Cherubini's "Ave Maria."

The Kreisel Quartet, with Harold Randolph as pianist, will render a splendid program at Music Hall next Thursday afternoon.

[65]

SUNDAY, . DECEMBER 22, 1895.

Since its inception, 14 years ago, the Boston Symphony orchestra, in addition to its annual series of 48 concerts in Boston, has made seven Western trips, and in the past 11 years monthly trips of one week's duration to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and has also visited all the principal New England cities. Including the second monthly trip of this season, which ends on Dec. 21, this now famous organization has given the really remarkable total number of 1339 performances, thus establishing a record that probably cannot be duplicated in the world. Some of the older European orchestras have been in existence many more years, and the New York Philharmonic society, the parent orchestral organization of this country, can show more than 50 years to its credit; but the lesser number of concerts given annually so reduces the total number that the Boston Symphony orchestra undoubtedly heads the list. Seven hundred and nineteen performances have been given in Boston and 620 in 37 cities throughout the United States, from Maine to Minnesota. Cambridge, Mass., with a series of 97 concerts, which began the first year of the orchestra's existence, and which are held under the auspices of Harvard college in their Memorial hall, heads the list of the cities visited. With such a remarkable grand total of performances given, there is naturally unlimited opportunity for detailed statistics of the greatest variety. Lack of space prevents an extended array of figures. As the Boston Smyphony orchestra is an organization founded and maintained by a private citizen, it has always been the policy of the management to refrain from the publication of any financial details; but it is safe to assert that even the most moderate average receipts would result in an enormous sum of money expended in the patronage bestowed upon these concerts.

e Independent, N. Y. C.

DEC 26 1895

Music.

BY E. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.

THE orchestral concert of last week was the Boston Symphony's second one of the season. It was also the one thousand, three hundred and thirty-seventh concert since the orchestra was organized, fourteen years ago. The program made an acrobatic leap from the old to the new in contrasting Haydn's cheerful and lucid G Major Symphony (P. E. No. 8) with Tschaikofsky's "Francesca da Rimini" fantasia, and two orchestral extracts from Richard Strauss's opera "Guntram." The "Scotch Fantasia" of Max Bruch was also given, with that fluent and elegant violinist, Mr. Timothée Adamofski as soloist. The performance of the orchestra was of finer finish than has been the case with its recent work here; and Mr. Paur and that surpassing band, with whose presidency he has been honored, received much applause from a small but contented audience. In further reference to the extraordinary industry and success of the Orchestra, it may be said that out of the full series of concerts above enumerated, 719 have been given in Boston, and 615 have been divided among other American cities. Cambridge has heard 97; Philadelphia, 49; Providence, 47; New York and Washington, 44 each; Brooklyn, 42; Baltimore, 35; Worcester, 25; Portland, 22; New Haven, 21; Chicago, 16; Buffalo, 15; Pittsburg, 13; and a long group of important towns from ten to two apiece. Between six thousand and seven thousand numbers have furnished the programs, and more than a thousand soloists have been heard. It is to be remembered that the Orchestra still rests on the basis of a private subsidy from one art-loving Boston gentleman, who does for the public of his city and country what no Esterhazy or Harcourt would do.

Life 12/14

* * *

MUSIC HALL—BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The next Concert in Baltimore by this great orchestrian organization will be at the Music Hall, Mt. Royal avenue, on Wednesday next, December 18th, being the 1,336th performance of this celebrated aggregation of artists since its foundation. Seven hundred and nineteen performances have been given in Boston, and 615 in 37 large cities throughout the United States from Maine to Minnesota. Cambridge, Mass., with a series of 97 concerts, which began the first year of the orchestra's existence, and which are given under the auspices of Harvard College in their Memorial Hall, heads the list of the cities visited. With such a remarkable grand total of performances given there is naturally unlimited opportunity for detailed statistics of the greatest variety. Lack of space prevents an array of figures. As the Boston Symphony Orchestra is an organization founded and maintained by a private citizen, it has always been the policy of the management to refrain from the publication of any financial details, but it is safe to assert that even the most moderate average receipts would result in an enormous sum of money expended in the patronage bestowed upon these concerts. The soloist for the next concert here will be Franz Ondricek, the famous violinist, who, since his recent coming to this country, has created a furore in musical circles. The programme for the concert is a choice one and should please the most exacting.

News 12/12

OVER 1300 CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Holds the World's Records.

It will seem something like a reminiscence of the "oldest inhabitant" to read in the programme of the next concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall on December 18 that it is the 1336 performance by that organization since its debut, 14 years ago. This total is, however, a fact established beyond doubt, and is probably the world's record. There are orchestras in Europe which have existed many years longer, and the New York Philharmonic Society, the parent orchestral organization of this country, has already over 50 years to its credit, but the lesser number of concerts given annually so reduces the total number that the Boston Symphony undoubtedly heads the list.

Seven hundred and nineteen performances have been given in Boston and 615 in 37 cities throughout the United States, from Maine to Minnesota. Cambridge, Mass., with a series of 97 concerts, which began the first year of the orchestra's existence and which are given under the auspices of Harvard College, heads the list of cities visited.

Assuming an average of five selections for each concert, between 6000 and 7000 numbers have been performed. Over 1000 soloists have appeared, more than one-half of them being singers, while the rest have been divided among pianists, violinists and violoncellists.

THE DAILY LEDGER.

TACOMA, WASHINGTON,

DECEMBER 23, 1895.

A REMARKABLE RECORD.

Thirteen Hundred and Thirty-nine Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Since its inception, fourteen years ago, the Boston Symphony orchestra, in addition to its annual series of forty-eight concerts in Boston, has made seven western trips, and in the past eleven years monthly trips of one week's duration to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, and has also visited all the principal cities of New England. Including the second monthly trip of this season, which ends on December 21, this now famous organization has given the really remarkable total number of thirteen hundred and thirty-nine performances, thus establishing a record that probably cannot be duplicated in the world. Some of the older European orchestras have been in existence many more years, and our own New York Philharmonic society, the parent orchestral organization of this country, can show more than fifty years to its credit; but the lesser number of concerts given annually so reduces the total number that the Boston Symphony undoubtedly heads the list. Seven hundred and nineteen performances have been given in Boston, and six hundred and twenty in thirty-seven cities throughout the United States, from Maine to Minnesota. Cambridge, Mass., with a series of ninety-seven concerts, which began the first year of the orchestra's existence, and which are held under the auspices of Harvard college in their Memorial hall, heads the list of cities visited, which we append below, with the total number of concerts given in each city:

Cambridge,	97.	New Bedford,	8.
Philadelphia,	49.	Detroit,	7.
Providence,	47.	St. Louis,	6.
New York,	44.	Columbus,	6.
Washington,	44.	Springfield, Mass.,	6
Brooklyn,	42.	Lowell,	6.
Baltimore,	35.	Fitchburg,	6.
Worcester,	25.	Milwaukee,	5.
Portland, Me.,	22.	Lynn,	5.
New Haven,	21.	Ann Arbor, Uni.,	4.
Chicago,	16.	Rochester, N. Y.,	3.
Buffalo,	15.	Taunton,	3.
Pittsburg,	13.	Newport, R. I.,	3.
Cleveland,	10.	Richmond, Va.,	2.
Louisville,	10.	Grand Aapids,	2.
Salem, Mass.,	10.	Norwich, Conn.,	2.
Fall River,	10.	Lawrence,	2.
Cincinnati,	9.	Haverhill,	2.
Hartford,	8.	Syracuse,	2.

St. Paul, Minneapolis, Toledo, Albany, Erie, Melrose, Lewiston and Wakefield, one each.

With such a remarkable grand total of performances given there is naturally unlimited opportunity for detailed statistics of the greatest variety. Lack of space prevents an extended array of figures; but attention is called to the fact that, assuming an average of five selections for each concert, there have been between six and seven thousand soloists have appeared, something over one-half of them singers, and the rest divided among pianists, violinists and violoncellists. Bearing in mind that all the performances given by the orchestra en route are made up of selections already played in the Boston concerts, there have been over fifteen hundred private rehearsals. It is also worthy of note that ten of the members of the orchestra the first season still remain with the organization, and over one-half the orchestra have been members for ten years.

As the Boston Symphony orchestra is an organization founded and maintained by a private citizen, it has always been the policy of the management to refrain from the publication of any financial details; but it is safe to assert that even the most moderate average receipts would result in an enormous sum of money expended in the patronage bestowed upon these concerts. Seventeen states are represented in the list of cities given above, excellent evidence that the Boston Symphony orchestra is now a national organization.

THE RICHMOND DISPATCH

FRIDAY.....DECEMBER 20, 1895.

A REMARKABLE RECORD.

1,339 Concerts Given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played in Washington and in Baltimore this week. This superb organization, in addition to its annual series of forty-eight concerts in Boston, has made seven western trips, and in the past eleven years monthly trips of one week's duration, to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, and has also visited all the principal New England cities. Including the second monthly trip of this season, which ends on December 21st, this now famous organization has given the really-remarkable total number of thirteen hundred and thirty-nine performances, thus establishing a record that probably cannot be duplicated in the world. Some of the older European orchestras have been in existence many more years, and our own New York Philharmonic Society, the parent orchestral organization of this country, can show more than fifty years to its credit; but the lesser number of concerts given annually so reduces the total number that the Boston Symphony Orchestra undoubtedly heads the list. Seven hundred and nineteen performances have been given in Boston, and six hundred and twenty in thirty-seven cities throughout the United States, from Maine to Minnesota. Cambridge, Mass., with a series of ninety-seven concerts, which began the first year of the orchestra's existence, and which are held under the auspices of Harvard College in their Memorial Hall, heads the list of cities visited, which we append below, with the total number of concerts given in each city:

Cambridge	97
Philadelphia	49
Providence	47
New York	44
Washington	44
Brooklyn	42
Baltimore	35
Worcester	25
Portland, Me.	22
New Haven	21
Chicago	16
Buffalo	15
Pittsburg	13
Cleveland	10
Louisville	10
Salem, Mass.	10
Fall River	10
Cincinnati	9
Hartford	8
New Bedford	8
Detroit	7
St. Louis	6
Columbus	6
Springfield, Mass.	6
Lowell	6
Fitchburg	6
Milwaukee	5
Lynn	5
Ann Arbor University	4
Rochester, N. Y.	3
Taunton	3
Newport, R. I.	3
Richmond, Va.	2
Grand Rapids,	2
Norwich, Conn.	2
Lawrence	2
Haverhill	2
Syracuse	2

St. Paul, Minneapolis, Toledo, Albany, Erie, Melrose, Lewiston, and Wakefield, one each.

With such a remarkable grand total of performances given there is naturally unlimited opportunity for detailed statistics of the greatest variety. Lack of space prevents an extended array of figures; but attention is called to the fact that, assuming an average of five selections for each concert, there have been between six and seven thousand numbers performed. Over one thousand soloists have appeared, something over one half of them singers, and the rest divided among pianists, violinists, and violoncellists. Bearing in mind that all the performances given by the orchestra en route are made up of selections already played in the Boston concerts, there have been over fifteen hundred private rehearsals. It is also worthy of note that ten of the members of the orchestra the first season still remain with the organization, and over one half the orchestra have been members for ten years.

As the Boston Symphony Orchestra is an organization founded and maintained by a private citizen, it has always been the policy of the management to refrain from the publication of any financial details; but it is safe to assert that even the most moderate average receipts would result in an enormous sum of money expended in the patronage bestowed upon these concerts. Seventeen states are represented in the list of cities given above, excellent evidence that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now a national organization.

PROVIDENCE

DECEMBER 15, 1895

A REMARKABLE RECORD.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert List a Wonderful One.

Since its inception, fourteen years ago, the Boston Symphony orchestra, in addition to its annual series of forty-eight concerts in Boston, has made seven Western trips, and in the past eleven years monthly trips of one week's duration to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and has also visited all the principal New England cities. Including the second monthly trip of this season, which ends on Dec. 21, this famous organization has given the really remarkable total number of 1,309 performances, thus establishing a record that probably cannot be duplicated in the world. Some of the older Europen orchestras have been in existence many more years, and our New York Philharmonic society, the parent orchestral organization of this country, can show more than fifty years to its credit; but the lesser number of concerts given annually so reduces the total number that the Boston Symphony orchestra undoubtedly heads the list. Seven hundred and nineteen performances have been given in Boston, and 623 in 37 cities throughout the United States from Maine to Minnesota. Cambridge, Mass., with a series of ninety-seven concerts, which began the first year of the orchestra's existence, and which are held under the auspices of Harvard college in the Memorial hall, heads the list of cities visited, with Providence well toward the head of the list with forty-seven concerts.

With such a remarkable grand total of performances given there is naturally unlimited opportunity for detailed statistics of the greatest variety. Lack of space prevents an extended array of figures; but attention is called to the fact that, assuming an average of five selections for each concert, there have been between 6,000 and 7,000 numbers performed. Over 1,000 soloists have appeared, something over one-half of them singers, and the rest divided among pianists, violinists and violoncellists. Bearing in mind that all the performances given by the orchestra en route are made up of selections already played in the Boston concerts, there have been over 1,500 private rehearsals. It is also worthy of note that ten of the members of the orchestra the first season still remain with the organization, and over one-half the orchestra have been members for ten years.

As the Boston Symphony orchestra is an organization founded and maintained by a private citizen, it has always been the policy of the management to refrain from the publication of any financial details; but it is safe to assert that even the most moderate average receipts would result in an enormous sum of money expended in the patronage bestowed upon these concerts. Seventeen states are represented in the list of cities given above, excellent evidence that the Boston Symphony orchestra is now a national organization.

[66]

Ohio State Journal.

SUNDAY, - DECEMBER 22, 1895.

Since its inception, 14 years ago, the Boston Symphony orchestra, in addition to its annual series of 48 concerts in Boston, has made seven Western trips, and in the past 11 years monthly trips of one week's duration to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and has also visited all the principal New England cities. Including the second monthly trip of this season, which ends on Dec. 21, this now famous organization has given the really remarkable total number of 1339 performances, thus establishing a record that probably cannot be duplicated in the world. Some of the older European orchestras have been in existence many more years, and the New York Philharmonic society, the parent orchestral organization of this country, can show more than 50 years to its credit; but the lesser number of concerts given annually so reduces the total number that the Boston Symphony orchestra undoubtedly heads the list. Seven hundred and nineteen performances have been given in Boston and 620 in 37 cities throughout the United States, from Maine to Minnesota. Cambridge, Mass., with a series of 97 concerts, which began the first year of the orchestra's existence, and which are held under the auspices of Harvard college in their Memorial hall, heads the list of the cities visited. With such a remarkable grand total of performances given, there is naturally unlimited opportunity for detailed statistics of the greatest variety. Lack of space prevents an extended array of figures. As the Boston Smyphony orchestra is an organization founded and maintained by a private citizen, it has always been the policy of the management to refrain from the publication of any financial details; but it is safe to assert that even the most moderate average receipts would result in an enormous sum of money expended in the patronage bestowed upon these concerts.

The Independent, N. Y. C.

DEC 26 1895

Music.

BY E. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.

THE orchestral concert of last week was the Boston Symphony's second one of the season. It was also the one thousand, three hundred and thirty-seventh concert since the orchestra was organized, fourteen years ago. The program made an acrobatic leap from the old to the new in contrasting Haydn's cheerful and lucid G Major Symphony (P. E. No. 8) with Tschaikofsky's "Francesca da Rimini" fantasia, and two orchestral extracts from Richard Strauss's opera "Guntram." The "Scotch Fantasia" of Max Bruch was also given, with that fluent and elegant violinist, Mr. Timothée Adamofski as soloist. The performance of the orchestra was of finer finish than has been the case with its recent work here; and Mr. Paur and that surpassing band, with whose presidency he has been honored, received much applause from a small but contented audience. In further reference to the extraordinary industry and success of the Orchestra, it may be said that out of the full series of concerts above enumerated, 719 have been given in Boston, and 615 have been divided among other American cities. Cambridge has heard 97; Philadelphia, 49; Providence, 47; New York and Washington, 44 each; Brooklyn, 42; Baltimore, 35; Worcester, 25; Portland, 22; New Haven, 21; Chicago, 16; Buffalo, 15; Pittsburg, 13; and a long group of important towns from ten to two apiece. Between six thousand and seven thousand numbers have furnished the programs, and more than a thousand soloists have been heard. It is to be remembered that the Orchestra still rests on the basis of a private subsidy from one art-loving Boston gentleman, who does for the public of his city and country what no Esterhazy or Harcourt would do.

Life 12/14

* * *

MUSIC HALL—BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The next Concert in Baltimore by this great orchestrian organization will be at the Music Hall, Mt. Royal avenue, on Wednesday next, December 18th, being the 1,336 h performance of this celebrated aggregation of artists since its foundation. Seven hundred and nineteen performances have been given in Boston, and 615 in 37 large cities throughout the United States from Maine to Minnesota. Cambridge, Mass., with a series of 97 concerts, which began the first year of the orchestra's existence, and which are given under the auspices of Harvard College in their Memorial Hall, heads the list of the cities visited. with such a remarkable grand total of performances given there is naturally unlimited opportunity for detailed statistics of the greatest variety. Lack of space prevents an array of figures. As the Boston Symphony Orchestra is an organization founded and maintained by a private citizen, it has always been the policy of the management to refrain from the publication of any financial details, but it is safe to assert that even the most moderate average receipts would result in an enormous sum of money expended in the patronage bestowed upon these concerts. The soloist for the next concert here will be Franz Ondricek, the famous violinist, who, since his recent coming to this country, has created a furore in musical circles. The programme for the concert is a choice one and should please the most exacting.

* *

News 12/2

OVER 1300 CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Holds the World's Records.

It will seem something like a reminiscence of the "oldest inhabitant" to read in the programme of the next concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall on December 18 that it is the 1336 performance by that organization since its debut, 14 years ago. This total is, however, a fact established beyond doubt, and is probably the world's record. There are orchestras in Europe which have existed many years longer, and the New York Philharmonic Society, the parent orchestral organization of this country, has already over 50 years to its credit, but the lesser number of concerts given annually so reduces the total number that the Boston Symphony undoubtedly heads the list.

Seven hundred and nineteen performances have been given in Boston and 615 in 37 cities throughout the United States, from Maine to Minnesota. Cambridge, Mass., with a series of 97 concerts, which began the first year of the orchestra's existence and which are given under the auspices of Harvard College, heads the list of cities visited.

Assuming an average of five selections for each concert, between 6000 and 7000 numbers have been performed. Over 1000 soloists have appeared, more than one-half of them being singers, while the rest have been divided among pianists, violinists and violoncellists.

THE DAILY LEDGER.

TACOMA, WASHINGTON,

DECEMBER 23, 1895.

A REMARKABLE RECORD.

Thirteen Hundred and Thirty-nine Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Since its inception, fourteen years ago, the Boston Symphony orchestra, in addition to its annual series of forty-eight concerts in Boston, has made seven western trips, and in the past eleven years monthly trips of one week's duration to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, and has also visited all the principal cities of New England. Including the second monthly trip of this season, which ends on December 21, this now famous organization has given the really remarkable total number of thirteen hundred and thirty-nine performances, thus establishing a record that probably cannot be duplicated in the world. Some of the older European orchestras have been in existence many more years, and our own New York Philharmonic society, the parent orchestral organization of this country, can show more than fifty years to its credit; but the lesser number of concerts given annually so reduces the total number that the Boston Symphony orchestra undoubtedly heads the list. Seven hundred and nineteen performances have been given in Boston, and six hundred and twenty in thirty-seven cities throughout the United States, from Maine to Minnesota. Cambridge, Mass., with a series of ninety-seven concerts, which began the first year of the orchestra's existence, and which are held under the auspices of Harvard college in their Memorial hall, heads the list of cities visited, which we append below, with the total number of concerts given in each city:

Cambridge,	97.	New Bedford,	8.
Philadelphia,	49.	Detroit,	7.
Providence,	47.	St. Louis,	6.
New York,	44.	Columbus,	6.
Washington,	44.	Springfield, Mass.,	6
Brooklyn,	42.	Lowell,	6.
Baltimore,	35.	Fitchburg,	6.
Worcester,	25.	Milwaukee,	5.
Portland, Me.,	22.	Lynn,	5.
New Haven,	21.	Ann Arbor, Uni.,	4.
Chicago,	16.	Rochester, N. Y.,	3.
Buffalo,	15.	Taunton,	3.
Pittsburg,	13.	Newport, R. I.,	3.
Cleveland,	10.	Richmond, Va.,	2.
Louisville,	10.	Grand Aapids,	2.
Salem, Mass.,	10.	Norwich, Conn.,	2.
Fall River,	10.	Lawrence,	2.
Cincinnati,	9.	Haverhill,	2.
Hartford,	8.	Syracuse,	2.

St. Paul, Minneapolis, Toledo, Albany, Erie, Melrose, Lewiston and Wakefield, one each.

With such a remarkable grand total of performances given there is naturally unlimited opportunity for detailed statistics of the greatest variety. Lack of space prevents an extended array of figures; but attention is called to the fact that, assuming an average of five selections for each concert, there have been between six and seven thousand soloists have appeared, something over one-half of them singers, and the rest divided among pianists, violinists and violincellists. Bearing in mind that all the performances given by the orchestra en route are made up of selections already played in the Boston concerts, there have been over fifteen hundred private rehearsals. It is also worthy of note that ten of the members of the orchestra the first season still remain with the organization, and over one-half the orchestra have been members for ten years.

As the Boston Symphony orchestra is an organization founded and maintained by a private citizen, it has always been the policy of the management to refrain from the publication of any financial details; but it is safe to assert that even the most moderate average receipts would result in an enormous sum of money expended in the patronage bestowed upon these concerts. Seventeen states are represented in the list of cities given above, excellent evidence that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now a national organization.

THE RICHMOND DISPATCH.

FRIDAY.....DECEMBER 20, 1895.

A REMARKABLE RECORD.

1,339 Concerts Given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played in Washington and in Baltimore this week. This superb organization, in addition to its annual series of forty-eight concerts in Boston, has made seven western trips, and in the past eleven years monthly trips of one week's duration, to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, and has also visited all the principal New England cities. Including the second monthly trip of this season, which ends on December 21st, this now famous organization has given the really-remarkable total number of thirteen hundred and thirty-nine performances, thus establishing a record that probably cannot be duplicated in the world. Some of the older European orchestras have been in existence many more years, and our own New York Philharmonic Society, the parent orchestral organization of this country, can show more than fifty years to its credit; but the lesser number of concerts given annually so reduces the total number that the Boston Symphony Orchestra undoubtedly heads the list. Seven hundred and nineteen performances have been given in Boston, and six hundred and twenty in thirty-seven cities throughout the United States, from Maine to Minnesota. Cambridge, Mass., with a series of ninety-seven concerts, which began the first year of the orchestra's existence, and which are held under the auspices of Harvard College in their Memorial Hall, heads the list of cities visited, which we append below, with the total number of concerts given in each city:

Cambridge	97
Philadelphia	49
Providence	47
New York	44
Washington	44
Brooklyn	42
Baltimore	35
Worcester	25
Portland, Me.	22
New Haven	21
Chicago	16
Buffalo	15
Pittsburg	13
Cleveland	10
Louisville	10
Salem, Mass.	10
Fall River	10
Cincinnati	9
Hartford	8
New Bedford	8
Detroit	7
St. Louis	6
Columbus	6
Springfield, Mass.	6
Lowell	6
Fitchburg	6
Milwaukee	5
Lynn	5
Ann Arbor University	4
Rochester, N. Y.	3
Taunton	3
Newport, R. I.	3
Richmond, Va.	2
Grand Rapids,	2
Norwich, Conn.	2
Lawrence	2
Haverhill	2
Syracuse	2

St. Paul, Minneapolis, Toledo, Albany, Erie, Melrose, Lewiston, and Wakefield, one each.

With such a remarkable grand total of performances given there is naturally unlimited opportunity for detailed statistics of the greatest variety. Lack of space prevents an extended array of figures; but attention is called to the fact that, assuming an average of five selections for each concert, there have been between six and seven thousand numbers performed. Over one thousand soloists have appeared, something over one half of them singers, and the rest divided among pianists, violinists, and violoncellists. Bearing in mind that all the performances given by the orchestra en route are made up of selections already played in the Boston concerts, there have been over fifteen hundred private rehearsals. It is also worthy of note that ten of the members of the orchestra the first season still remain with the organization, and over one half the orchestra have been members for ten years.

As the Boston Symphony Orchestra is an organization founded and maintained by a private citizen, it has always been the policy of the management to refrain from the publication of any financial details; but it is safe to assert that even the most moderate average receipts would result in an enormous sum of money expended in the patronage bestowed upon these concerts. Seventeen States are represented in the list of cities given above, excellent evidence that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now a national organization.

TELEGRAM, PROVIDENCE,

DECEMBER 15, 1895

A REMARKABLE RECORD.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert List a Wonderful One.

Since its inception, fourteen years ago, the Boston Symphony orchestra, in addition to its annual series of forty-eight concerts in Boston, has made seven Western trips, and in the past eleven years monthly trips of one week's duration to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and has also visited all the principal New England cities. Including the second monthly trip of this season, which ends on Dec. 21, this famous organization has given the really remarkable total number of 1,309 performances, thus establishing a record that probably can not be duplicated in the world. Some of the older Europen orchestras have been in existence many more years, and the New York Philharmonic society, the parent orchestral organization of this country, can show more than fifty years to its credit; but the lesser number of concerts given annually so reduces the total number that the Boston Symphony orchestra undoubtedly heads the list. Seven hundred and nineteen performances have been given in Boston, and 623 in 37 cities throughout the United States from Maine to Minnesota. Cambridge, Mass., with a series of ninety-seven concerts, which began the first year of the orchestra's existence, and which are held under the auspices of Harvard college in the Memorial hall, heads the list of cities visited, with Providence well toward the head of the list with forty-seven concerts.

With such a remarkable grand total of performances given there is naturally unlimited opportunity for detailed statistics of the greatest variety. Lack of space prevents an extended array of figures; but attention is called to the fact that, assuming an average of five selections for each concert, there have been between 6,000 and 7,000 numbers performed. Over 1,000 soloists have appeared, something over one-half of them singers, and the rest divided among pianists, violinists and violoncellists. Bearing in mind that all the performances given by the orchestra en route are made up of selections already played in the Boston concerts, there have been over 1,500 private rehearsals. It is also worthy of note that ten of the members of the orchestra the first season still remain with the organization, and over one-half the orchestra have been members for ten years.

As the Boston Symphony orchestra is an organization founded and maintained by a private citizen, it has always been the policy of the management to refrain from the publication of any financial details; but it is safe to assert that even the most moderate average receipts would result in an enormous sum of money expended in the patronage bestowed upon these concerts. Seventeen states are represented in the list of cities given above, excellent evidence that the Boston Symphony orchestra is now a national organization.

[66]

BLANK PAGE

Dec 25

THE MUSICAL COURIER

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last Thursday night in the Metropolitan Opera House. The attendance was slim, for Mr. Emil Paur, the conductor, is not a favorite in New York city, but it was a satisfying program and a satisfying performance, despite Mr. Paur's readings. The program was this:

Symphony in G major (Breitkopf & Härtel, No. 13; Peters, No. 8).....Josef Haydn
Fantasia on Scotch folk melodies, for violin, op. 46...Max Bruch
Introduction, grave (E flat minor).
Adagio cantabile (E flat major).
Scherzo, allegro (G major).
Andante sostenuto (A flat major).
Finale, allegro guerriero (E flat major).
Fantasie for orchestra, Francesca da Rimini, op. 32, Peter Ilyitch Tschaikowsky
(First time at these concerts.)
Preludes to Acts I. and II. of Guntram, op. 25...Richard Strauss
(First time at these concerts.)

Mr. Timothée Adamowski was the solo violinist.

Mr. Paur made an error in playing both the Guntram preludes. The second, which we have heard at Mr. Damrosch's hands, would have sufficed, or, better still, to have ended the evening with Tschaikowsky's noble poem.

Richard Strauss is primarily a theatrical scene painter. He had the theatre in his mind's eye when he composed Guntram, a work of inordinate length and almost insuperable difficulties. The prelude to Act I. is conceived in a Lohengrin mood, but on a plane of higher dynamic intensity. It is scored remarkably, even in these days, when every young composer who has nothing to say yet contrives to say it amazingly well. Dazzling white this prelude moves in Graal-like processional tones. The strongly marked mystic element, Guntram, the "Fighter for Love," love of the Cross, becomes monotonous, for we miss the context, the music drama itself. As program writing this prelude is empty, devoid of appreciable content, yet it means much in the theatre.

The second prelude is a bright, animated picture containing some of Strauss' eccentric harmonic effects, but after all not ungrateful in the concert room.

How different is the effect of that great, passionate Francesca da Rimini, a tremendous thunder-riven poem, full of pain and the passion that is pain and the regrets of that world famous pair who "read no more that day" of the fatal book. It was a foregone conclusion that Tschaikowsky would be enthralled by Dante's hapless lovers, the twain in hell's stormy blast. He has made a poem of the story that is worth a dozen music dramas by latterday composers, and, if the truth be boldly spoken, a score in pregnant motifs, marvelous molding of material color and dramatic truthfulness that far exceeds in sheer musical value many symphonies by classicists in which the themes are without vitality because of the forbidding frozen form. In a word Tschaikowsky is a poet-psychologist as well as a composer. To quote a writer in THE MUSICAL COURIER, "he says great things in a great manner," and this sympathetic poem is a specimen. Its whirling fury, hopeless despair, "all hope abandon ye who enter here" is carved on its harmonic portals, its unflagging life and its tenderness make us again sorrow for the dead master.

Even Emil Paur could not prevent his band from playing superbly in this number. Technically it was a superb performance. As a reader Mr. Paur is too constrained, too angular and unpoetic to dig deep in the passionate vein before him, but he worked hard and doubtless was surprised himself at the result.

The Haydn symphony, a gem among its composer's flawless gems—was rather pedestrian, lacking in grace and naïveté, although a clean cut performance.

The Scotch fantasia was played here last season by M. Ysaye. It is a clever orchestral collocation of familiar Scotch melodies and, while not symphonically welded, the treatment by the composer is dignified, consistent and far from suggesting patchwork, as do most paraphrases of the sort. The solo instrument has plenty of stiff technical work, and a breadth of style is certainly called for, especially in the last section. Mr. Adamowski played with much ease and graceful finish, suggesting limitless work since he was heard here last. He was hardly big enough for the warlike last allegro, but he displayed much spirit, abundant technic, and in the cantabiles he was smooth and agreeable, if not very hot blooded. He got five recalls.

The orchestra, an exemplar among all orchestras, did some remarkable things. The brilliancy of attack, the sensuous tonal beauty, the élan, elasticity and unanimity in feeling—especially in the expression of searching emotion—were as ever wonderful. It is a practical object lesson to hear this band play, and from the tympanist to the harpist all are artists. We listened with extreme pleasure to the lovely tone of Mr. Pourtau's clarinet. It is a great band.

Mrs. Genevieve Clark Wilson, of Chicago, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Philadelphia this week. Mrs. Wilson is not a stranger to Boston. She was here a few days on her return from London, where she passed the summer studying with Mr. Georg Henschel. While here she sang for the Cecilia, and made a great impression. She is said to be a dramatic soprano with a voice of exceptional sonority. She began her studies in Boston, where she will be well remembered as the soprano of one of the leading Roxbury churches.

The Boston Symphonians came over on Friday night and played for us. There was a good and eager house, but if the first concert was purposely made light that the Philistines might be lured in and taught to know an orchestra when they saw one, I fear that some of them repented of their interest before this second concert was over. For Mr. Paur had prepared a phenomenally unattractive program. That Fourth Symphony of Brahms is an interesting piece of mechanism, or even of philosophy, if you like, but there isn't a heart throb, there isn't a moment of tenderness, there isn't a lapse into dream, there isn't a ray of sunshine. Pardon me for not being able to agree with some folks who think otherwise, but that is the view of it that is forced upon one citizen of this republic. If a man puts his character into his work, what is Brahms when he is at home? He sounds like a rough and opinionated Bismarck; a Dr. Johnson, an "ursa major," and I wonder if he has a Boswell. The andante alone, of the whole symphony, has some instants of charm, but these seem to have crept in unbeknownst. It cannot be that Brahms ever intended them. So, good people, who never heard a real orchestra before, don't imagine that this is the kind of thing that all orchestras play all of the time. There are pieces by Beethoven, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Wagner, Schubert and a lot of other folks that I am sure you would like if you heard Mr. Paur play them; pieces with tunes in them and likewise hearts in them.

Mrs. Clementine de Vere-Sapio, who has widened vocally, artistically and a little bit physically, sang the mad scene from Thomas' Hamlet. It will be observed that Mr. Paur is heading a bull movement in mad scenes. At the last concert he gave us the crazy business from Lucia. We are wondering whether some new man has written something in the same line for the next concert. A mad scene from Fritz in an Asylum, or Francis Fischer Powers, Italo Campanini and M. W. Whitney in The Wild Man of Borneo, or some more dainty little thing from The Gay Parisians might hit the popular taste and swell the box receipts. But, seriously, if we promise to be very, very good, will you please let us have something different, Mister?

Mrs. Sapio sang the mad scene well enough. It is not worth singing in concert anyway, except for the little Swedish folk song that interrupts the number, and this was so much more feeling and beautiful than the scales that the judicious wondered why it was and why it is that singers like this will choose to merely display their technics instead of their minds and souls and the art that informs them. But it will be a long day before the music is accepted as better than the musician or the singer. The other soloist was Mr. Franz Kneisel, who did his part in the Händel largo and the Viotti concerto with skill and modesty, though in the concerto there was likewise a good deal that was not worth while. The cadenza at the end of the moderato seemed about a quarter of an hour long. As to the largo it was magnificent. It swept glooms and cobwebs out of brains, it visibly and audibly soared from the earth and took the listeners with it. Where will Brahms be in the next century? Händel will be here just the same.

Mozart's brisk little Turkish march was played with the animation of an Armenian atrocity, and was timely because of the newspaper narratives. Richard Strauss' two preludes from Guntram wound up the bill in an awakening and pyrotechnic fashion. Turning to Mr. Apthorp's usually critical and instructive observations in the program we were all grieved to find that there was no narrative. Mr. Apthorp had sighed resignedly into print, "Neither of these two movements is susceptible of technical analysis." And no more are they, for a fact. You can't analyze the aurora borealis, or the Jabberwock, or Mr. George Francis Train his mind; therefore you cannot analyze anything so utterly formless as the Guntram episodes. Let it pass that they are more different kinds of music in ten minutes than all of the nine symphonies, and that Wagner is the master of Mr. Strauss and that the pupil tries only to follow his master.

There is a sense of harmony in the man, too, and the second of the preludes has a rejoicing mood, but while the violins are proclaiming their happiness the drums and cymbals and triangles and jewsharps and other instruments of calathembian origin fall upon the helpless strings and wipe the academy up with them. And great is the chortling and wild the hubbub when this thing happens. Why could we not have just one sane, easy, melodious, agreeable thing for a wind up? And there will be no more symphonies until January 24.

Baltimore 12/14

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The next Concert in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be given at the Music Hall, on Wednesday evening next, December 18, it will be the 1,356th performance by this organization since its foundation, 14 years ago. Seven hundred and nineteen performances have been given in Boston, and 615 in 87 cities throughout the United States, 85 of which were given in the city of Baltimore. The Boston Symphony, although but fourteen years old, can boast of having given a greater number of concerts than any other European or American organization of its kind. There have been between 6,000 and 7,000 numbers performed during its existence; over 1,000 soloists have appeared, something over one-half of them singers, and the balance divided among pianists, violinists and violoncellists.

The soloist for the next concert here will be Franz Ondricek, the famous violinist who, since his recent coming to this country, has created a furore in musical circles. The programme for the concert is as follows:

Haydn.....Symphony No. 13
Bruch.....Concerto for violin, No. 1
(a) Handel.....Largo
(b) Mozart.....Turkish March.
Tschaikowsky.....Fantasia for Orchestra, "Francesca da Rimini," Op. 32.
(First time at these concerts.)

MUSIC HALL

Mt. Royal Ave. & Cathedral St.

BOSTON

Symphony Orchestra,

MR. EMIL PAUL, Conductor.

SECOND CONCERT,

Wednesday Evening, December 18th, at 8.15.

—PROGRAMME.—

Haydn, Symphony No. 13. Bruch, Concerto or Violin, No. 1. Handel, Largo. Mozart, Turkish March. Tschaikowsky, Fantasia for Orchestra, "Francesca da Rimini," Opus 32.

Soloist, Mr. Franz Ondricek.

Tickets on sale at Alberts', 13 N. Charles Street.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1895.

A New Music Hall.

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

The question as to the necessity of a new Music Hall for Providence is not an easy one to answer from my point of view. In the first place it is always a difficult matter to provide at one and the same time an auditorium perfectly adapted for concert performances and also available for other entertainments. The best appointed opera house is not by any means always the best concert room. The Metropolitan Opera House, New York, for instance, is somewhat too large for purely orchestral concerts, and Carnegie Music Hall is equally unadapted for operatic performances.

A happy combination of both opera house and concert hall would be a most desirable feature in any of our largest cities, both from an artistic standpoint and as a business investment, and yet such a combination, I venture to say, cannot be found in this country.

There is no question whatever as to the value to Providence of a music hall properly constructed, of good capacity and easy of access, but unless such a hall can be used for a great variety of entertainments, it is not at all likely that a sufficient number of concerts of the highest order would be given, not only in Providence, but in any other city, to justify the investment necessary for such a hall. Infantry Hall, from its very location, being a long flight of stairs above the level of one street and considerably below the level of another, of course, leaves much to be desired, as the audience room of such an organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but fairness compels the admission that it compares favorably with audience rooms in other cities.

Architects all over the world have found no more vexed problem for their consideration than the successful construction of a concert hall. If the acoustics are perfect—which is very rarely the case—the ventilation is faulty and vice versa. My own idea of an auditorium, such as not only Providence, but every other city in this country needs to-day, is an opera house perfect in all its appointments, sufficiently isolated from the street to be free from any of its disturbing noises, and so constructed that it can be reduced in size to the smaller requirements of a concert hall, this last being accomplished by movable screens cutting off the upper balconies.

It is a very easy matter to say that a location in the very heart of the city is the most easy of access, and therefore the most desirable, but again, there arises the heavy investment necessary for ground rent in such a centre.

Everything considered, Infantry Hall must continue the concert room for all first-class musical attractions in Providence, until some public-spirited citizen, actuated by a noble sentiment rather than by his business judgment, shall give to your city an auditorium satisfactory both to your public and to amusement organizations visiting your city.

FREDERIC R. COMEE,
Assistant Manager,
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Boston, Dec. 26, 1895.

[68]

Dec. 25

THE MUSICAL COURIER

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last Thursday night in the Metropolitan Opera House. The attendance was slim, for Mr. Emil Paur, the conductor, is not a favorite in New York city, but it was a satisfying program and a satisfying performance, despite Mr. Paur's readings. The program was this:

Symphony in G major (Breitkopf & Härtel, No. 13; Peters, No. 8).....Josef Haydn
Fantasia on Scotch folk melodies, for violin, op. 46...Max Bruch
Introduction, grave (E flat minor).
Adagio cantabile (E flat major).
Scherzo, allegro (G major).
Andante sostenuto (A flat major).
Finale, allegro guerriero (E flat major).
Fantasie for orchestra, Francesca da Rimini, op. 32, Peter Ilyitch Tschaikowsky
(First time at these concerts.)
Preludes to Acts I. and II. of Guntram, op. 25...Richard Strauss
(First time at these concerts.)

Mr. Timothée Adamowski was the solo violinist.

Mr. Paur made an error in playing both the Guntram preludes. The second, which we have heard at Mr. Damrosch's hands, would have sufficed, or, better still, to have ended the evening with Tschaikowsky's noble poem.

Richard Strauss is primarily a theatrical scene painter. He had the theatre in his mind's eye when he composed Guntram, a work of inordinate length and almost insuperable difficulties. The prelude to Act I. is conceived in a Lohengrin mood, but on a plane of higher dynamic intensity. It is scored remarkably, even in these days, when every young composer who has nothing to say yet contrives to say it amazingly well. Dazzling white this prelude moves in Graal-like processional tones. The strongly marked mystic element, Guntram, the "Fighter for Love," love of the Cross, becomes monotonous, for we miss the context, the music drama itself. As program writing this prelude is empty, devoid of appreciable content, yet it means much in the theatre.

The second prelude is a bright, animated picture containing some of Strauss' eccentric harmonic effects, but after all not ungrateful in the concert room.

How different is the effect of that great, passionate Francesca da Rimini, a tremendous thunder-riven poem, full of pain and the passion that is pain and the regrets of that world famous pair who "read no more that day" of the fatal book. It was a foregone conclusion that Tschaikowsky would be enthralled by Dante's hapless lovers, the twain in hell's stormy blast. He has made a poem of the story that is worth a dozen music dramas by latterday composers, and, if the truth be boldly spoken, a score in pregnant motifs, marvelous molding of material color and dramatic truthfulness that far exceeds in sheer musical value many symphonies by classicists in which the themes are without vitality because of the forbidding frozen form. In a word Tschaikowsky is a poet-psychologist as well as a composer. To quote a writer in THE MUSICAL COURIER, "he says great things in a great manner," and this sympathetic poem is a specimen. Its whirling fury, hopeless despair, "all hope abandon ye who enter here" is carved on its harmonic portals, its unflagging life and its tenderness make us again sorrow for the dead master.

Even Emil Paur could not prevent his band from playing superbly in this number. Technically it was a superb performance. As a reader Mr. Paur is too constrained, too angular and unpoetic to dig deep in the passionate vein before him, but he worked hard and doubtless was surprised himself at the result.

The Haydn symphony, a gem among its composer's flawless gems—was rather pedestrian, lacking in grace and naiveté, although a clean cut performance.

The Scotch fantasia was played here last season by M. Ysaye. It is a clever orchestral collocation of familiar Scotch melodies and, while not symphonically welded, the treatment by the composer is dignified, consistent and far from suggesting patchwork, as do most paraphrases of the sort. The solo instrument has plenty of stiff technical work, and a breadth of style is certainly called for, especially in the last section. Mr. Adamowski played with much ease and graceful finish, suggesting limitless work since he was heard here last. He was hardly big enough for the warlike last allegro, but he displayed much spirit, abundant technic, and in the cantabiles he was smooth and agreeable, if not very hot blooded. He got five recalls.

The orchestra, an exemplar among all orchestras, did some remarkable things. The brilliancy of attack, the sensuous tonal beauty, the élan, elasticity and unanimity in feeling—especially in the expression of searching emotion—were as ever wonderful. It is a practical object lesson to hear this band play, and from the tympanist to the harpist all are artists. We listened with extreme pleasure to the lovely tone of Mr. Pourtau's clarinet. It is a great band.

Mrs. Genevieve Clark Wilson, of Chicago, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Philadelphia this week. Mrs. Wilson is not a stranger to Boston. She was here a few days on her return from London, where she passed the summer studying with Mr. Georg Henschel. While here she sang for the Cecilia, and made a great impression. She is said to be a dramatic soprano with a voice of exceptional sonority. She began her studies in Boston, where she will be well remembered as the soprano of one of the leading Roxbury churches.

The Boston Symphonians came over on Friday night and played for us. There was a good and eager house, but if the first concert was purposely made light that the Philistines might be lured in and taught to know an orchestra when they saw one, I fear that some of them repented of their interest before this second concert was over. For Mr. Paur had prepared a phenomenally unattractive program. That Fourth Symphony of Brahms is an interesting piece of mechanism, or even of philosophy, if you like, but there isn't a heart throb, there isn't a moment of tenderness, there isn't a lapse into dream, there isn't a ray of sunshine. Pardon me for not being able to agree with some folks who think otherwise, but that is the view of it that is forced upon one citizen of this republic. If a man puts his character into his work, what is Brahms when he is at home? He sounds like a rough and opinionated Bismarck; a Dr. Johnson, an "ursa major," and I wonder if he has a Boswell. The andante alone, of the whole symphony, has some instants of charm, but these seem to have crept in unbeknownst. It cannot be that Brahms ever intended them. So, good people, who never heard a real orchestra before, don't imagine that this is the kind of thing that all orchestras play all of the time. There are pieces by Beethoven, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Wagner, Schubert and a lot of other folks that I am sure you would like if you heard Mr. Paur play them; pieces with tunes in them and likewise hearts in them.

Mrs. Clementine de Vere-Sapio, who has widened vocally, artistically and a little bit physically, sang the mad scene from Thomas' Hamlet. It will be observed that Mr. Paur is heading a bull movement in mad scenes. At the last concert he gave us the crazy business from Lucia. We are wondering whether some new man has written something in the same line for the next concert. A mad scene from Fritz in an Asylum, or Francis Fischer Powers, Italo Campanini and M. W. Whitney in The Wild Man of Borneo, or some more dainty little thing from The Gay Parisians might hit the popular taste and swell the box receipts. But, seriously, if we promise to be very, very good, will you please let us have something different, Mister?

Mrs. Sapio sang the mad scene well enough. It is not worth singing in concert anyway, except for the little Swedish folk song that interrupts the number, and this was so much more feeling and beautiful than the scales that the judicious wondered why it was and why it is that singers like this will choose to merely display their technics instead of their minds and souls and the art that informs them. But it will be a long day before the music is accepted as better than the musician or the singer. The other soloist was Mr. Franz Kneisel, who did his part in the Händel largo and the Viotti concerto with skill and modesty, though in the concerto there was likewise a good deal that was not worth while. The cadenza at the end of the moderato seemed about a quarter of an hour long. As to the largo it was magnificent. It swept glooms and cobwebs out of brains, it visibly and audibly soared from the earth and took the listeners with it. Where will Brahms be in the next century? Händel will be here just the same.

Mozart's brisk little Turkish march was played with the animation of an Armenian atrocity, and was timely because of the newspaper narratives. Richard Strauss' two preludes from Guntram wound up the bill in an awakening and pyrotechnic fashion. Turning to Mr. Apthorp's usually critical and instructive observations in the program we were all grieved to find that there was no narrative. Mr. Apthorp had sighed resignedly into print, "Neither of these two movements is susceptible of technical analysis." And no more are they, for a fact. You can't analyze the aurora borealis, or the Jabberwock, or Mr. George Francis Train his mind; therefore you cannot analyze anything so utterly formless as the Guntram episodes. Let it pass that they are more different kinds of music in ten minutes than all of the nine symphonies, and that Wagner is the master of Mr. Strauss and that the pupil tries only to follow his master.

There is a sense of harmony in the man, too, and the second of the preludes has a rejoicing mood, but while the violins are proclaiming their happiness the drums and cymbals and triangles and jewsharps and other instruments of calathembian origin fall upon the helpless strings and wipe the academy up with them. And great is the chortling and wild the hubbub when this thing happens. Why could we not have just one sane, easy, melodious, agreeable thing for a wind up? And there will be no more symphonies until January 24.

Baltimorean 12/14

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The next Concert in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be given at the Music Hall, on Wednesday evening next, December 18, it will be the 1,386th performance by this organization since its foundation, 14 years ago. Seven hundred and nineteen performances have been given in Boston, and 615 in 87 cities throughout the United States, 85 of which were given in the city of Baltimore. The Boston Symphony, although but fourteen years old, can boast of having given a greater number of concerts than any other European or American organization of its kind. There have been between 6,000 and 7,000 numbers performed during its existence; over 1,000 soloists have appeared, something over one-half of them singers, and the balance divided among pianists, violinists and violoncellists.

The soloist for the next concert here will be Franz Ondricek, the famous violinist who, since his recent coming to this country, has created a furore in musical circles. The programme for the concert is as follows:

Haydn.....Symphony No. 13
Bruch.....Concerto for violin, No. 1
(a) Handel.....Largo
(b) Mozart.....Turkish March.
Tschaikowsky...Fantasia for Orchestra, "Francesca da Rimini," Op. 32.
(First time at these concerts.)

MUSIC HALL

Mt. Royal Ave. & Cathedral St.

BOSTON

Symphony Orchestra,

MR. EMIL PAUL, Conductor.

SECOND CONCERT,

Wednesday Evening, December 18th, at 8.15.

—PROGRAMME.—

Haydn, Symphony No. 13. Bruch, Concerto or Violin, No. 1. Handel, Largo. Mozart, Turkish March. Tschaikowsky, Fantasia for Orchestra, "Francesca da Rimini," Opus 32.

Soloist, Mr. Franz Ondricek.

Tickets on sale at Alberts', 13 N. Charles Street.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1895.

A New Music Hall.

To the Editor of the Sunday Journal:

The question as to the necessity of a new Music Hall for Providence is not an easy one to answer from my point of view. In the first place it is always a difficult matter to provide at one and the same time an auditorium perfectly adapted for concert performances and also available for other entertainments. The best appointed opera house is not by any means always the best concert room. The Metropolitan Opera House, New York, for instance, is somewhat too large for purely orchestral concerts, and Carnegie Music Hall is equally unadapted for operatic performances.

A happy combination of both opera house and concert hall would be a most desirable feature in any of our largest cities, both from an artistic standpoint and as a business investment, and yet such a combination, I venture to say, cannot be found in this country.

There is no question whatever as to the value to Providence of a music hall properly constructed, of good capacity and easy of access, but unless such a hall can be used for a great variety of entertainments, it is not at all likely that a sufficient number of concerts of the highest order would be given, not only in Providence, but in any other city, to justify the investment necessary for such a hall. Infantry Hall, from its very location, being a long flight of stairs above the level of one street and considerably below the level of another, of course, leaves much to be desired, as the audience room of such an organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but fairness compels the admission that it compares favorably with audience rooms in other cities.

Architects all over the world have found no more vexed problem for their consideration than the successful construction of a concert hall. If the acoustics are perfect—which is very rarely the case—the ventilation is faulty and vice versa. My own idea of an auditorium, such as not only Providence, but every other city in this country needs to-day, is an opera house perfect in all its appointments, sufficiently isolated from the street to be free from any of its disturbing noises, and so constructed that it can be reduced in size to the smaller requirements of a concert hall, this last being accomplished by movable screens cutting off the upper balconies.

It is a very easy matter to say that a location in the very heart of the city is the most easy of access, and therefore the most desirable, but again, there arises the heavy investment necessary for ground rent in such a centre.

Everything considered, Infantry Hall must continue the concert room for all first-class musical attractions in Providence, until some public-spirited citizen, actuated by a noble sentiment rather than by his business judgment, shall give to your city an auditorium satisfactory both to your public and to amusement organizations visiting your city.

FREDERIC R. COMEE,
Assistant Manager,
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston, Dec. 26, 1895.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DEC. 28, 1895.

THE SUPERB QUALITIES OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RECOGNIZED.

The New York music reviewers are gradually becoming cognizant of the superiority of this superb orchestra and the intellectual and musical powers of its gifted conductor, Mr. Emil Paur. The New York "World" speaks in this strain of the noble organization's concert last week:

"At the Metropolitan Opera House, December 19, the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared at the 1,337th concert it has given since its foundation, about fifteen years ago. One can better appreciate the enormous number of concerts given by this orchestra during its comparatively short career when one considers that the Philharmonic Society, during its fifty-three years of existence, has only given about 600 in all. And the playing of the two orchestras is about in proportion to the number of concerts given by each.

"In spite of its daintiness and vivacity, the rare elegance of style and finish which it exhibits, and the fresh and gay melodic beauties which glow on every page of the score, Haydn's G major Symphony struck me, I must confess, as a trifle archaic. The surpassing excellence of the strings of the Boston Orchestra was most evident in the exquisite rendering of this number, which was read by Mr. Paur with spirit, dignity and classic feeling. It evidently was an admirable foil to the rich modernity of Bruch's 'Scotch Fantasia' for violin, which followed it.

"Tschaikowsky may rage and storm in turbulent passion, as in the 'Francesca da Rimini fantasie, superbly played last night, but he is never coarse and repellant like Koch, Richard Strauss et al. This fantasia is by no means the equal of the 'Hamlet' in either interest, power or beauty, and yet is instinct with all of the composers individuality, emotional force and faculty of pictoral expression. Two preludes from Richard Strauss's opera, 'Guntram,' also forcibly played—how horribly noisy and blatant he is at times—brought an enjoyable concert to a close.

"I can hardly believe that the good people of New York realize what they miss in the way of absolutely unsurpassed orchestral playing in failing to attend these concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in larger numbers. There is certainly no orchestra in this country that can hold a candle to it."

REGINALD DE KOVEN.

The New York "Sun" is no less pronounced in its admiration of the results achieved:

"Schumann said many wise things, among them this: 'Without enthusiasm nothing comes out right in art.' It seems to us New Yorkers that no body of musicians ever had more enthusiasm and esprit de corps than the Boston Symphony orchestra. Their concert last evening held indisputable evidence of the intensity and earnestness possessed by each single member of the band as well as proof of their exceeding skill. One of the numbers, Tschaikowsky's Fantasie called 'Francesca de Rimini,' was a marvel of execution. The composition itself is worthy of the highest praise, being at the very height of its author's powers in his most inspired mood. Those who know Tschaikowsky's abilities will recognize that his best work is to be classified with the loftiest in modern composition, and that it holds its own well, even when in juxtaposition with the old classic writers. The fantasia is a mass of beauties; it is thickly woven with exquisite phrases that are intertwined with a deftness more wonderful than ever was called to the making of tapestries or princely textures. And underneath the mass of sound surge continually waves of passion so restless and compelling that the listener finds his own emotions dragged and pulled irresistibly along until he is left quivering and panting with the rush of agitated feeling that this powerful music excites.

"No one who heard Paur's interpretation of this glorious bit of orchestral eloquence could say that it fell short of absolute perfection. The plastic welding of phrases, the elastic swing, the ebb and flow of crescendo and diminuendo, everything needful to an entirely ideal rendering, was found in the playing of the Boston men.

"No less exact and admirable was the dear old Haydn Symphony in G major, so sunshiny, so full of that simple, childlike faith, without which no soul gets very far, either in this world or the next. It is an essence too much hidden and neglected in these latter days, and it is therefore refreshing to find it embodied in music for us, and it is something to be thankful for when leaders bring out the restful, confiding, quaint old things. They are like nature's own healing—like grass, trees, flowers, blue skies, and balmy air."

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.

VOL. XCVIII., NO. 182.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven Contribute to the Programme.

Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven contributed to the programme of the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall, last evening. The selections were evidently made with a historical interest in view, the Haydn symphony being one of the composer's least pretentious and most naive, and that by Beethoven being his first. The absence of anything even remotely suggesting music of the modern school gave the programme a novel but not unpleasing aspect. It was as follows:

Suite in D major.....J. S. Bach
Symphony in G major (the "Surprize")..Haydn
Turkish march, from the A major sonata....
Mozart
(Arranged by Herbech.)
Largo from "Xerxes".....Handel
(Arranged by Hellmesberger.)
Symphony No. 1.....Beethoven

The familiar air in the Bach suite and the Handel largo were the successes of the evening as far as applause was concerned, the latter meeting with so much favor that an effort was made to encore it, but in vain. All which again bears testimony to the fondness of even a Symphony audience for a simple tune. It is not easy to believe in these days of massive instrumentation, to which one listens with utter calm, that the drum-stroke in the andante from which the Haydn symphony takes its name could have startled the audience that first heard it as it is said to have done. Listened to with modern ears, it is the tamest of all possible attempts at a surprise; but, then, modern ears are so accustomed to the blaring of brass, the swishing of cymbals and the banging of tympani and bass drums that it would be difficult to surprise them with anything short of a thinly arranged score. The least effective number was the arrangement of the Mozart march, which, though instrumented cleverly enough, is not improved by transposition from the pianoforte to the orchestra, and it made no very marked impression.

The Bach suite was given with a keenly sympathetic feeling for the spirit of the music, the opening movement, the lento and the two gavottes notably so. Mr. Paur is always notably felicitous in his reading of Haydn, and a charmingly piquant rendering of the work further enforced this fact. The performance throughout was delightful in its daintiness and its finish, but it must be confessed that if the symphony were never heard again Haydn's fame would in no wise suffer, for the music has become quaintly archaic, and is far from deserving to rank among the composer's more important work in its class. The Handel largo was splendidly played, the perfection of the unrivalled string orchestra looming out, if possible, more convincingly than ever.

There was a very large audience, that seemed to be in an admirable mood for enjoying the performances, and its applause was heartier and more frequent than at any of the preceding concerts of the season.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "La Patrie," Bizet (first time); suite, "Namouna," Lalo (first time); symphony, B flat, Volkmann. The soloist is to be Miss Rosa Olitzka of the Metropolitan Opera company, who will sing the aria, "Parto, parto," from Mozart's "Titus," and "Ah mon fils" from "Le Prophete," by Meyerbeer.

PRAISED BY GOTHAM CRITICS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Fine Favor in New York.

The music critics of the New York papers, in their notices of the performances by the Boston Symphony orchestra there this season, are overstinted in their praise of the efficiency of the orchestra. They seem to take a special pleasure in affirming that New York has no such admirable body of instrumental performers, and some do not hesitate to express the belief that there is no more perfectly disciplined orchestra in existence. They have never before been so enthusiastic in their commendation of the organization, nor so persistent in demonstrating it. This fact is, of course, very flattering to Mr. Paur, for it is not to be supposed that the orchestra has brought itself up to the high state of perfection that has so stirred the admiration of New York, although, to judge by the utterances of some of the less friendly critics, who still continue to mourn the passing of Mr. Nikisch, one might fancy that they believed it possible that an orchestra can lift itself by its own bootstraps, unaided by its conductor. The organization was left in a very demoralized state by Mr. Paur's predecessor. It went from good to bad, and from bad to worse, with distressing steadiness, and, if Mr. Nikisch had ruled over its destinies for a few years longer, he would have undone completely all that Mr. Gericke achieved with it. However, that misfortune was luckily avoided by Mr. Nikisch's departure, and after two years under the sway of Mr. Paur the orchestra has not only recovered its earlier standard, but, under its present conductor, has won a recognition in New York remarkable for the unreserve and the frank heartiness that characterize it. Some of the critics, in praising the performances, forget to mention Mr. Paur's name in connection with them, while others are inclined to suggest that the fine results obtained are in spite of the conductor; but one might as well assume that a vessel goes on its course uninfluenced by the man at the wheel; or that an officer directing military evolutions does so under the discipline of the rank and file. An orchestra, no heed how admirable may be the material of which it is composed, cannot regulate its own performances. Whether it acquit itself well or otherwise, the conductor is responsible, and to him pertains the praise or the blame, as each is called for. The orchestra remains, fundamentally, essentially, the same, as far as its components are concerned, that it was under Mr. Nikisch, and, if it now wins greater praise in New York than was ever bestowed on it before, the credit for its fuller efficiency must naturally and justly be given to the conductor under whom it has become entitled to such increased laudation.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 29.

The Symphony Concert.

The Symphony Orchestra gave its ninth concert last evening in Music Hall. The programme was:

Suite in D-major.....Bach
Symphony, G-major.....Haydn
Turkish March.....Mozart
Largo from Serse.....Handel
Symphony No. 1, C-major.....Beethoven

A very attractive if not novel programme; a programme that allowed one to forget modern restlessness, turbulence and progress, and to temporarily return to a world of art that we are said to have outgrown. It is always a delight to harken to genius, especially genius sanctified by time, and the delight is not lessened by the privilege we latest-born moderns enjoy, of combining tolerance with pleasure. We are not cruel enough to rob the old masters of their immortality, but we add to our intellectual stature by referring to their quaintness and simplicity, thus implying how much better we moderns could do the work if we had the time. Whenever Haydn or Handel is dealt with, the modern advanced critic feels it a duty to himself and to posterity to play the part of patron, and to first excuse the genius that he is good-natured enough to praise.

There is no destructive power in quaintness, however; it will not bite, as Hazlitt said of the allegory in the Fairy Queen, and considering what a burden of quaintness we of today are preparing for the student's of music of the future, quaintness burdened with ponderosity, we can well afford to forgive the great musicians for having the misfortune of being born before us, and of being guided by a fashion which is not ours.

The programme was delightfully interpreted by Mr. Paur and his orchestra, and without a trace of patronage; the Bach suite was given with a fine flowing geniality; the second movement particularly being given with exquisite grace and sweetness there was quaintness of course; but as all good music is always modern and as much modern music is not good, the suite lost nothing by being quaint, rather gained from being written at a time when "barn-door shuffles" were an undreamed of possibility of the future.

The Haydn symphony was most delightfully and sympathetically read, Mr. Paur, with all his deference for modern genius, being singularly happy in interpreting the work of the classic old composers. There were spirit, grace and sweetness; brilliancy and playfulness; a perfect reading of a most delightful work.

The Mozart march is taken from the A-major pianoforte sonata and was scored for the orchestra by Herbeck of Vienna; scored coarsely, noisily, with much noise of drums, cymbals and triangle, suggesting ambulant musicians calling attention to a Punch and Judy show. We all know how Mr. Wopsle honored Shakspeare with a pair of tights, and Herbeck of Vienna rendered the same service to Mozart by means of drum and cymbals.

The arrangement of the Handel largo by Hellmesberger is more reverent, even though it is somewhat startling in the way of tone color, this work was most charmingly played by the orchestra and aroused the the audience to a rare pitch of enthusiasm. Equally meritorious was the playing of the Beethoven symphony; in short, no better and more sympathetic work has been given by the Symphony Orchestra than the work of last evening. It was a light holiday programme of the finest quality.

The programme for the next concert is; Overture "La Patrie," Bizet; Suite "Namoura," Lalo; and symphony in B flat major, Volkmann. The soloist has not yet been announced.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 29, 1895.

The proof of all puddings is in their eating, and Mr. Paur's ninth concert—the 1341st in his orchestra's long series—was more delightful and proportionate in performance than it promised to be. For he had arranged one of his progressive-composition programmes, as they might be called, proceeding from Bach to Beethoven via Haydn, Handel and Mozart. But there were good contrasts and evolutions, there was spirit, the choices were discreet, and in one number there was a deal of novelty, although the thing itself belongs with those which concert-goers know by heart—or think they do when they hear them.

The concert began with Bach's D-major suite, in which there was a plenty of breadth and depth in spite of the master's limited instrumental scheme. In the lento the bits for solo violin supported by the reduced band were charmingly set off against the returns with the full force, and the subsequent dance figures had a firm step and yet an elastic one. Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, not too often heard nowadays, followed in a light and cheery reading from which was not absent just that touch of humor which gives the symphony its name by bursting unexpectedly into the smooth andante. Mozart's Turkish march, from his A-major sonata, and far better suited to the Hopkinson Smith imaginary Turk than to the "unspeakable" creature of Armenian tyranny, was tinglingly marked off, and then came the favorite Largo from Handel's "Xerxes." But not altogether as of old, with a long thin line of violinists drawing it out in unison all across the platform. A version made by Hellmesberger was used and stirred an unwonted enthusiasm, for if gave a new sensation. Introduced over a calm basis of wooden wind and horn tone, the air was first deliciously rendered by Kneisel to Mr. Schueckers's harp accompaniment, and then passed to all the first violins, the support gradually increasing until the full orchestra brought in a thrilling climax more rich and voluminous than the common version dreams of. An excellent reading of Beethoven's first symphony, in whose pages dwells openly the influence of Mozart beside the genius of the new master, ended the concert.

For next Saturday this will be the programme: Bizet, Overture, "La Patrie," (first time); Lalo, Suite, "Namouna," (first time); Volkmann, Symphony in B-flat major. Soloist to be announced.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Herald.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1895.

Ninth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, Emil Paur Conductor—A Familiar Program and No Soloist.

The program of the Symphony concert last evening was as follows:

Suite in D major .....Bach
Symphony in G major. "Surprise"...Haydn
Turkish March from the A major Sonata .....Mozart
(Scored for orchestra by Herbeck.)
Largo from "Serse".....Handel
(Scored for violins and orchestra by Hellmesberger.)
(Violin Solo by Mr. Franz Kneisel.)
Symphony No. 1 .....Beethoven

This program was certainly a singular one. It had no historical or "educational" significance, although one might at first have supposed that Mr. Paur intended to show the growth in instrumentation; but the vulgar arrangement of the childish music of Mozart is distinctively modern, and so is Hellmesberger's arrangement of the air from "Xerxes," or, to speak by the card, "Serse." If Mr. Paur proposed to give a light and gay concert, one in sympathy with the season, he is apparently without sense of humor.

Here was a program without contrast. Now contrast is the very essence of vitality in a concert. No one of the pieces chosen, except the Turkish arrangement, is to be objected to per se; but when they are solemnly paraded in a row, and when the first symphony of Beethoven brings up the rear, the result is monotony. There are people who think it the proper thing to be conservative; conservatism they regard as the undiscriminating worship of composers alleged to be great. These people are very apt to shy at the name of a modern composer, especially if no one in whose authority they can rely has told them, "really, he's not a bad fellow after all; you will find his music interesting." No doubt these same people enjoyed thoroughly the concert of last night from A to Izzard.

* * *

About this concert there is little to be said. Do you wish, oh reader, an elaborate discussion of the gavotte, bourée, gigue? Or a Plutarchian comparison between Mozart and Haydn as writers of symphonies? It would be very easy to thus fill two or three columns. Do you wish an inquiry into the character of Turkish music before 1638, when Amurat IV. saved the life of Schah Culi, a famous harper, at Bagdad, and took him to Turkey, where he honored him? Or would you like to hear of the dismal failure of Handel's "Xerxes," when it was first brought out? It failed ignobly, although there was a comic character in it, and a few little choruses, a rare thing in the opera of Handel's day. Or would you be pleased with a disquisition on the youth of Beethoven, with the introduction of the approved phrase, "paw of the lion?" The proper place for all these essays is the program book; not in a review of a concert in which the numbers are very familiar. Besides the reader that glances at reviews is supposed to be a person of musical intelligence; and really, what is the use of a reviewer playing the pedagogue on such slight provocation?

Suffice it then to say that the air of Bach, finely played by Mr. Kneisel and the orchestra, the andante of Haydn's Symphony, and the largo of Handel pleased the audience mightily. Indeed, the applause that followed the largo was the most genuine and the most protracted that I have heard at a Symphony concert after any purely orchestral number for five years. The symphony of Beethoven was played by the orchestra in a rather perfunctory manner; and no wonder. It was at the end of a program that was of little interest to the players, and the work itself does not inspire under such circumstances.

* * *

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC. 29, 1895.

Ninth Symphony Concert.

Last week's Symphony program was of a very substantial nature, consisting of Bach's suite in D major, Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, Mozart's "Turkish March," the largo from Handel's "Serse" and Beethoven's symphony No. 1. Mr Franz Kneisel played the violin solo in the Handel work. The audience was conservative in applause and enthusiasm, except in the latter number, in which the notably artistic performance of Mr Kneisel and the harpist, Mr Schuecker, aroused a storm of plaudits.

The largo, as arranged by Hellmesberger, gives prominence to the violin and harp, the aria of Xerxes in the first act being the theme given to the violin, this instrument being supported throughout by the harp. The extreme delicacy of Mr Kneisel's playing calls for high commendation. The pure, cautabel quality of his tones and the beautiful shadings, made his performance the feature of the concert. Equal praise is due Mr Schuecker, whose work, though less prominent, was all that could be desired. The blending of the two instruments was perfect, and the artists were justly entitled to the marks of appreciation showered upon them.

The different styles of the compositions showed the orchestra to good advantage. In the Bach suite the "irregularities" of the first movement were played with admirable precision, and Mr Kneisel performed his share in the solo parts well. The strings gave excellent results in the familiar second part, and the different dance themes, which complete the suite, were distinctly and characteristically set forth. Haydn's "Surprise" symphony was smoothly given as a rule, the elaborate fantasia of the first movement being, perhaps, taken at a little too rapid tempo. The "crashes" in the second part were not over accentuated, which is somewhat rare in this movement.

The Beethoven symphony was brilliantly interpreted. The cadence fortissimo of the first movement was notably smooth and vigorous, and the lighter passages, so varied and playful, were brilliant examples of the fine team work of the orchestra. The vivacity of the menuetto and country dance tunes was splendidly preserved. Mozart's "Turkish March" seemed merely child's play to the men, and it was performed with all due pomp and percussion effects.

The program this week will consist of two novelties, Bizet's overture, "La Patrie" and Lalo's suite, "Namoura" and the Volkmann symphony in B flat major. Miss Olitzka will be the soloist.

[69]

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DEC. 28, 1895.

THE SUPERB QUALITIES OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RECOGNIZED.

The New York music reviewers are gradually becoming cognizant of the superiority of this superb orchestra and the intellectual and musical powers of its gifted conductor, Mr. Emil Paur. The New York "World" speaks in this strain of the noble organization's concert last week:

"At the Metropolitan Opera House, December 19, the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared at the 1,337th concert it has given since its foundation, about fifteen years ago. One can better appreciate the enormous number of concerts given by this orchestra during its comparatively short career when one considers that the Philharmonic Society, during its fifty-three years of existence, has only given about 600 in all. And the playing of the two orchestras is about in proportion to the number of concerts given by each.

"In spite of its daintiness and vivacity, the rare elegance of style and finish which it exhibits, and the fresh and gay melodic beauties which glow on every page of the score, Haydn's G major Symphony struck me, I must confess, as a trifle archaic. The surpassing excellence of the strings of the Boston Orchestra was most evident in the exquisite rendering of this number, which was read by Mr. Paur with spirit, dignity and classic feeling. It evidently was an admirable foil to the rich modernity of Bruch's 'Scotch Fantasia' for violin, which followed it.

"Tschaikowsky may rage and storm in turbulent passion, as in the 'Francesca da Rimini fantasie, superbly played last night, but he is never coarse and repellant like Koch, Richard Strauss et al. This fantasia is by no means the equal of the 'Hamlet' in either interest, power or beauty, and yet is instinct with all of the composers individuality, emotional force and faculty of pictoral expression. Two preludes from Richard Strauss's opera, 'Guntram,' also forcibly played—how horribly noisy and blatant he is at times—brought an enjoyable concert to a close.

"I can hardly believe that the good people of New York realize what they miss in the way of absolutely unsurpassed orchestral playing in failing to attend these concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in larger numbers. There is certainly no orchestra in this country that can hold a candle to it."

REGINALD DE KOVEN.

The New York "Sun" is no less pronounced in its admiration of the results achieved:

"Schumann said many wise things, among them this: 'Without enthusiasm nothing comes out right in art.' It seems to us New Yorkers that no body of musicians ever had more enthusiasm and esprit de corps than the Boston Symphony orchestra. Their concert last evening held indisputable evidence of the intensity and earnestness possessed by each single member of the band as well as proof of their exceeding skill. One of the numbers, Tschaikowsky's Fantasie called 'Francesca de Rimini,' was a marvel of execution. The composition itself is worthy of the highest praise, being at the very height of its author's powers in his most inspired mood. Those who know Tschaikowsky's abilities will recognize that his best work is to be classified with the loftiest in modern composition, and that it holds its own well, even when in juxtaposition with the old classic writers. The fantasia is a mass of beauties; it is thickly woven with exquisite phrases that are intertwined with a deftness more wonderful than ever was called to the making of tapestries or princely textures. And underneath the mass of sound surge continually waves of passion so restless and compelling that the listener finds his own emotions dragged and pulled irresistibly along until he is left quivering and panting with the rush of agitated feeling that this powerful music excites.

"No one who heard Paur's interpretation of this glorious bit of orchestral eloquence could say that it fell short of absolute perfection. The plastic welding of phrases, the elastic swing, the ebb and flow of crescendo and diminuendo, everything needful to an entirely ideal rendering, was found in the playing of the Boston men.

"No less exact and admirable was the dear old Haydn Symphony in G major, so sunshiny, so full of that simple, childlike faith, without which no soul gets very far, either in this world or the next. It is an essence too much hidden and neglected in these latter days, and it is therefore refreshing to find it embodied in music for us, and it is something to be thankful for when leaders bring out the restful, confiding, quaint old things. They are like nature's own healing—like grass, trees, flowers, blue skies, and balmy air."

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.

VOL. XCVIII., NO. 182.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven Contributed to the Programme.

Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven contributed to the programme of the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall, last evening. The selections were evidently made with a historical interest in view, the Haydn symphony being one of the composer's least pretentious and most naive, and that by Beethoven being his first. The absence of anything even remotely suggesting music of the modern school gave the programme a novel but not unpleasing aspect. It was as follows:

Suite in D major.....J. S. Bach
Symphony in G major (the "Surprize")..Haydn
Turkish march, from the A major sonata....
Mozart
(Arranged by Herbech.)
Largo from "Xerxes".....Handel
(Arranged by Hellmesberger.)
Symphony No. 1.....Beethoven

The familiar air in the Bach suite and the Handel largo were the successes of the evening as far as applause was concerned, the latter meeting with so much favor that an effort was made to encore it, but in vain. All which again bears testimony to the fondness of even a Symphony audience for a simple tune. It is not easy to believe in these days of massive instrumentation, to which one listens with utter calm, that the drum-stroke in the andante from which the Haydn symphony takes its name could have startled the audience that first heard it as it is said to have done. Listened to with modern ears, it is the tamest of all possible attempts at a surprise; but, then, modern ears are so accustomed to the blaring of brass, the swishing of cymbals and the banging of tympani and bass drums that it would be difficult to surprise them with anything short of a thinly arranged score. The least effective number was the arrangement of the Mozart march, which, though instrumented cleverly enough, is not improved by transposition from the pianoforte to the orchestra, and it made no very marked impression.

The Bach suite was given with a keenly sympathetic feeling for the spirit of the music, the opening movement, the lento and the two gavottes notably so. Mr. Paur is always notably felicitous in his reading of Haydn, and a charmingly piquant rendering of the work further enforced this fact. The performance throughout was delightful in its daintiness and its finish, but it must be confessed that if the symphony were never heard again Haydn's fame would in no wise suffer, for the music has become quaintly archaic, and is far from deserving to rank among the composer's more important work in its class. The Handel largo was splendidly played, the perfection of the unrivalled string orchestra looming out, if possible, more convincingly than ever.

There was a very large audience, that seemed to be in an admirable mood for enjoying the performances, and its applause was heartier and more frequent than at any of the preceding concerts of the season.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "La Patrie," Bizet (first time); suite, "Namouna," Lalo (first time); symphony, B flat, Volkmann. The soloist is to be Miss Rosa Olitzka of the Metropolitan Opera company, who will sing the aria, "Parto, parto," from Mozart's "Titus," and "Ah mon fils" from "Le Prophete," by Meyerbeer.

PRAISED BY GOTHAM CRITICS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Fine Favor in New York.

The music critics of the New York papers, in their notices of the performances by the Boston Symphony orchestra there this season, are overstinted in their praise of the efficiency of the orchestra. They seem to take a special pleasure in affirming that New York has no such admirable body of instrumental performers, and some do not hesitate to express the belief that there is no more perfectly disciplined orchestra in existence. They have never before been so enthusiastic in their commendation of the organization, nor so persistent in demonstrating it. This fact is, of course, very flattering to Mr. Paur, for it is not to be supposed that the orchestra has brought itself up to the high state of perfection that has so stirred the admiration of New York, although, to judge by the utterances of some of the less friendly critics, who still continue to mourn the passing of Mr. Nikisch, one might fancy that they believed it possible that an orchestra can lift itself by its own bootstraps, unaided by its conductor. The organization was left in a very demoralized state by Mr. Paur's predecessor. It went from good to bad, and from bad to worse, with distressing steadiness, and, if Mr. Nikisch had ruled over its destinies for a few years longer, he would have undone completely all that Mr. Gericke achieved with it. However, that misfortune was luckily avoided by Mr. Nikisch's departure, and after two years under the sway of Mr. Paur the orchestra has not only recovered its earlier standard, but, under its present conductor, has won a recognition in New York remarkable for the unreserve and the frank heartiness that characterize it. Some of the critics, in praising the performances, forget to mention Mr. Paur's name in connection with them, while others are inclined to suggest that the fine results obtained are in spite of the conductor; but one might as well assume that a vessel goes on its course uninfluenced by the man at the wheel; or that an officer directing military evolutions does so under the discipline of the rank and file. An orchestra, no heed how admirable may be the material of which it is composed, cannot regulate its own performances. Whether it acquit itself well or otherwise, the conductor is responsible, and to him pertains the praise or the blame, as each is called for. The orchestra remains, fundamentally, essentially, the same, as far as its components are concerned, that it was under Mr. Nikisch, and, if it now wins greater praise in New York than was ever bestowed on it before, the credit for its fuller efficiency must naturally and justly be given to the conductor under whom it has become entitled to such increased laudation.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 29.

The Symphony Concert.

The Symphony Orchestra gave its ninth concert last evening in Music Hall. The programme was:

Suite in D-major.....Bach
Symphony, G-major.....Haydn
Turkish March.....Mozart
Largo from Serse.....Handel
Symphony No. 1, C-major.....Beethoven

A very attractive if not novel programme; a programme that allowed one to forget modern restlessness, turbulence and progress, and to temporarily return to a world of art that we are said to have outgrown. It is always a delight to harken to genius, especially genius sanctified by time, and the delight is not lessened by the privilege we latest born moderns enjoy, of combining tolerance with pleasure. We are not cruel enough to rob the old masters of their immortality, but we add to our intellectual stature by referring to their quaintness and simplicity, thus implying how much better we moderns could do the work if we had the time. Whenever Haydn or Handel is dealt with, the modern advanced critic feels it a duty to himself and to posterity to play the part of patron, and to first excuse the genius that he is good-natured enough to praise.

There is no destructive power in quaintness, however; it will not bite, as Hazlitt said of the allegory in the Fairy Queen, and considering what a burden of quaintness we of today are preparing for the student's of music of the future, quaintness burdened with ponderosity, we can well afford to forgive the great musicians for having the misfortune of being born before us, and of being guided by a fashion which is not ours.

The programme was delightfully interpreted by Mr. Paur and his orchestra, and without a trace of patronage; the Bach suite was given with a fine flowing geniality; the second movement particularly being given with exquisite grace and sweetness there was quaintness of course; but as all good music is always modern and as much modern music is not good, the suite lost nothing by being quaint, rather gained from being written at a time when "barn-door shuffles" were an undreamed of possibility of the future.

The Haydn symphony was most delightfully and sympathetically read, Mr. Paur, with all his deference for modern genius, being singularly happy in interpreting the work of the classic old composers. There were spirit, grace and sweetness; brilliancy and playfulness; a perfect reading of a most delightful work.

The Mozart march is taken from the A-major pianoforte sonata and was scored for the orchestra by Herbeck of Vienna; scored coarsely, noisily, with much noise of drums, cymbals and triangle, suggesting ambulant musicians calling attention to a Punch and Judy show. We all know how Mr. Wopsle honored Shakspeare with a pair of tights, and Herbeck of Vienna rendered the same service to Mozart by means of drum and cymbals.

The arrangement of the Handel largo by Hellmesberger is more reverent, even though it is somewhat startling in the way of tone color, this work was most charmingly played by the orchestra and aroused the the audience to a rare pitch of enthusiasm. Equally meritorious was the playing of the Beethoven symphony; in short, no better and more sympathetic work has been given by the Symphony Orchestra than the work of last evening. It was a light holiday programme of the finest quality.

The programme for the next concert is; Overture "La Patrie," Bizet; Suite "Namoura," Lalo; and symphony in B flat major, Volkmann. The soloist has not yet been announced.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 29, 1895.

The proof of all puddings is in their eating, and Mr. Paur's ninth concert—the 1341st in his orchestra's long series—was more delightful and proportionate in performance than it promised to be. For he had arranged one of his progressive-composition programmes, as they might be called, proceeding from Bach to Beethoven via Haydn, Handel and Mozart. But there were good contrasts and evolutions, there was spirit, the choices were discreet, and in one number there was a deal of novelty, although the thing itself belongs with those which concert-goers know by heart—or think they do when they hear them.

The concert began with Bach's D-major suite, in which there was a plenty of breadth and depth in spite of the master's limited instrumental scheme. In the lento the bits for solo violin supported by the reduced band were charmingly set off against the returns with the full force, and the subsequent dance figures had a firm step and yet an elastic one. Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, not too often heard nowadays, followed in a light and cheery reading from which was not absent just that touch of humor which gives the symphony its name by bursting unexpectedly into the smooth andante. Mozart's Turkish march, from his A-major sonata, and far better suited to the Hopkinson Smith imaginary Turk than to the "unspeakable" creature of Armenian tyranny, was tinglingly marked off, and then came the favorite Largo from Handel's "Xerxes." But not altogether as of old, with a long thin line of violinists drawing it out in unison all across the platform. A version made by Hellmesberger was used and stirred an unwonted enthusiasm, for if gave a new sensation. Introduced over a calm basis of wooden wind and horn tone, the air was first deliciously rendered by Kneisel to Mr. Schueckers's harp accompaniment, and then passed to all the first violins, the support gradually increasing until the full orchestra brought in a thrilling climax more rich and voluminous than the common version dreams of. An excellent reading of Beethoven's first symphony, in whose pages dwells openly the influence of Mozart beside the genius of the new master, ended the concert.

For next Saturday this will be the programme: Bizet, Overture, "La Patrie," (first time); Lalo, Suite, "Namouna," (first time); Volkmann, Symphony in B-flat major. Soloist to be announced.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1895.

Ninth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, Emil Paur Conductor—A Familiar Program and No Soloist.

The program of the Symphony concert last evening was as follows:

Suite in D major .....Bach
Symphony in G major. "Surprise"...Haydn
Turkish March from the A major Sonata .....Mozart
(Scored for orchestra by Herbeck.)
Largo from "Serse".....Handel
(Scored for violins and orchestra by Hellmesberger.)
(Violin Solo by Mr. Franz Kneisel.)
Symphony No. 1 .....Beethoven

This program was certainly a singular one. It had no historical or "educational" significance, although one might at first have supposed that Mr. Paur intended to show the growth in instrumentation; but the vulgar arrangement of the childish music of Mozart is distinctively modern, and so is Hellmesberger's arrangement of the air from "Xerxes," or, to speak by the card, "Serse." If Mr. Paur proposed to give a light and gay concert, one in sympathy with the season, he is apparently without sense of humor.

Here was a program without contrast. Now contrast is the very essence of vitality in a concert. No one of the pieces chosen, except the Turkish arrangement, is to be objected to per se; but when they are solemnly paraded in a row, and when the first symphony of Beethoven brings up the rear, the result is monotony. There are people who think it the proper thing to be conservative; conservatism they regard as the undiscriminating worship of composers alleged to be great. These people are very apt to shy at the name of a modern composer, especially if no one in whose authority they can rely has told them, "really, he's not a bad fellow after all; you will find his music interesting." No doubt these same people enjoyed thoroughly the concert of last night from A to Izzard.

* * *

About this concert there is little to be said. Do you wish, oh reader, an elaborate discussion of the gavotte, bourée, gigue? Or a Plutarchian comparison between Mozart and Haydn as writers of symphonies? It would be very easy to thus fill two or three columns. Do you wish an inquiry into the character of Turkish music before 1638, when Amurat IV. saved the life of Schah Culi, a famous harper, at Bagdad, and took him to Turkey, where he honored him? Or would you like to hear of the dismal failure of Handel's "Xerxes," when it was first brought out? It failed ignobly, although there was a comic character in it, and a few little choruses, a rare thing in the opera of Handel's day. Or would you be pleased with a disquisition on the youth of Beethoven, with the introduction of the approved phrase, "paw of the lion?" The proper place for all these essays is the program book; not in a review of a concert in which the numbers are very familiar. Besides the reader that glances at reviews is supposed to be a person of musical intelligence; and really, what is the use of a reviewer playing the pedagogue on such slight provocation?

Suffice it then to say that the air of Bach, finely played by Mr. Kneisel and the orchestra, the andante of Haydn's Symphony, and the largo of Handel pleased the audience mightily. Indeed, the applause that followed the largo was the most genuine and the most protracted that I have heard at a Symphony concert after any purely orchestral number for five years. The symphony of Beethoven was played by the orchestra in a rather perfunctory manner; and no wonder. It was at the end of a program that was of little interest to the players, and the work itself does not inspire under such circumstances.

* * *

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC. 29, 1895.

Ninth Symphony Concert.

Last week's Symphony program was of a very substantial nature, consisting of Bach's suite in D major, Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, Mozart's "Turkish March," the largo from Handel's "Serse" and Beethoven's symphony No. 1. Mr Franz Kneisel played the violin solo in the Handel work. The audience was conservative in applause and enthusiasm, except in the latter number, in which the notably artistic performance of Mr Kneisel and the harpist, Mr Schuecker, aroused a storm of plaudits.

The largo, as arranged by Hellmesberger, gives prominence to the violin and harp, the aria of Xerxes in the first act being the theme given to the violin, this instrument being supported throughout by the harp. The extreme delicacy of Mr Kneisel's playing calls for high commendation. The pure, cantabel quality of his tones and the beautiful shadings, made his performance the feature of the concert. Equal praise is due Mr Schuecker, whose work, though less prominent, was all that could be desired. The blending of the two instruments was perfect, and the artists were justly entitled to the marks of appreciation showered upon them.

The different styles of the compositions showed the orchestra to good advantage. In the Bach suite the "irregularities" of the first movement were played with admirable precision, and Mr Kneisel performed his share in the solo parts well. The strings gave excellent results in the familiar second part, and the different dance themes, which complete the suite, were distinctly and characteristically set forth. Haydn's "Surprise" symphony was smoothly given as a rule, the elaborate fantasia of the first movement being, perhaps, taken at a little too rapid tempo. The "crashes" in the second part were not over accentuated, which is somewhat rare in this movement.

The Beethoven symphony was brilliantly interpreted. The cadence fortissimo of the first movement was notably smooth and vigorous, and the lighter passages, so varied and playful, were brilliant examples of the fine team work of the orchestra. The vivacity of the menuetto and country dance tunes was splendidly preserved. Mozart's "Turkish March" seemed merely child's play to the men, and it was performed with all due pomp and percussion effects.

The program this week will consist of two novelties, Bizet's overture, "La Patrie" and Lalo's suite, "Namoura" and the Volkmann symphony in B flat major. Miss Olitzka will be the soloist.

[69]

BOSTON POST.
SUNDAY DECEMBER 29.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Five composers were represented on last night's programme at the ninth Symphony concert, and a somewhat unusual feature was the performance of two symphonies, Haydn's G major and Beethoven's No. 1 in C major, the latter ending the programme.

The Bach suite in five movements opened the programme, and was played in beautiful fashion, especially the popular second movement for strings only, and which is frequently heard in chamber concerts, and which on this occasion gave unbounded pleasure, if judged by the amount of applause which it received. The Haydn symphony is always a pleasing composition, for its several melodious phrases are so prettily developed as to present a series of beautiful tone pictures. The second movement contains the surprise, which gives the symphony its name, and which consists of a crash on a fortissimo chord, following upon several pianissimo measures on the strings. In this movement a good idea is had of how many variations can be evolved out of a simple theme.

Mozart's Turkish march, which, to be apropos of the times, should have followed something of an Armenian character, gave the brasses a good opportunity to work off some of their surplus energy. It is rather noisy in character, but is of much more dignity than such pieces are wont to be. Handel's "Largo" proved to be something of a triumph for Mr. Kneisel, who played the solo part. He gave it a beautiful and effective rendering, and at its close was obliged to acknowledge the applause four times. Although the largo has been played very many times, it is doubtful if the entire orchestra was ever before in such perfect touch with the composition, and the result was a smooth and even reading throughout. The Beethoven symphony closed a most enjoyable programme. It was played in a spirited manner, much of it being taken at a rather rapid tempo.

At next week's concert two novelties will be heard for the first time, Biset's overture to "La Patrie" and Lalo's suite, "Namouna." The Volkmann symphony in B flat major will also be played. The soloist of the occasion will be announced later.

MONDAY, DEC. 30, 1895.

BOSTON STANDARD.

They Say Director Emil Paur Has a Hair Cut for Christmas.

One of Conductor Emil Paur's Xmas presents was a haircut. A closely cropped beard went with it. Naturally enough then, when he mounted the platform to direct the 1341st performance of the Boston Symphony orchestra—the 721st in Boston—he was not readily recognized. Mr. Paur has never been over long in the habit of his coiffure, like many of his players, but this was a sudden reduction from the average contour and aspect of his physiognomic symphony in brown. However, all that was soon forgotten in the hearing of this program:

Suite in D major.....J. S. Bach
Symphony in G major (the "Surprise")..Haydn
Turkish march, from the A major sonata...
Mozart
(Arranged by Herbech.)
Largo from "Xerxes".....Handel
(Arranged by Hellmesberger.)
Symphony No. 1.....Beethoven

There was nothing modern in the selections as if to sympathize with the passing of the old year, though Mozart's Turkish march made the tramp of the departing gay and tinkling.

After sawing away—most sympathetically, too—among the cobwebs of Bach's suite in D major, a happier and more interesting mood was mustered up in the hearing of Haydn's "Surprise" symphony. Handel's largo was the most pronounced success of the evening, Mr. Kneisel receiving several encores on his solo. The romantic flavor of it was delicious and had a most sympathetic reading from Conductor Paur and his men. The humor of even a Saturday night symphony was shown in its grateful and gracious reception of so simple an air, as in contrast to its cold stony stare and hurried exit after the dreary Beethoven symphony.

The program for the next concert is: Overture, "La Patria," Bizet (first time); suite, "Namouna," Lalo (first time); symphony, B flat, Volkmann. The soloist is to be Miss Rosa Olitzka of the Metropolitan Opera company, who will sing the aria, "Parto, parto," from Mozart's "Titus," and "Ah mon fils," from "Le Prophete," by Meyerbeer.

—o—

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 30, 1895.

The Symphony Concert--A Simple Programme Well Performed.

Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Handel and the Beethoven of the first period (when he resembled Haydn) was a return to first principles with a vengeance. Such a list was bound to suffer from lack of contrast even though it was brimful of tunes such as the most modern composers affect to scorn, and the laity love. It was possibly to avoid giving the men much rehearsal work during the holiday season that so simple a programme was compiled, and it is as well to state at once that audience was not less in size than if more exciting works had been given, even the rows of seatless ones remaining to the very end, and the applause being more enthusiastic than ever.

Bach's Suite in D major gave the string orchestra its opportunity, and it was played most brilliantly. Only in the Gavotte did a degree of over-confidence lead to a few ragged attacks. The triumph of the strings was shared in by the trumpeter, Mr. Mueller, who had most difficult work to do in this suite, but journeyed along his thorny path without a break. Mr. Kneisel played the solo of the second movement with great beauty, and the fine effect of the contrabass pizzicati must also be noted. The Gavotte, spite of the exception mentioned above, was very effective. Bach always keeps to the true style of the gavotte, even to the beginning upon the third beat, which gives the dance its dainty syncopation, and which Corelli and other ancients did not always do. The Gigue might have been taken quicker, but perhaps Mr. Paur tempered the tempo to the wind, for the trumpet could scarcely have borne a greater speed. The era of Bach and Handel was the golden epoch of trumpet-playing, and some of the trumpet passages which they wrote seem almost impossible to the modern player, even on the keyed trumpet. It must be borne in mind, however, that they possessed trumpets of narrower tube than those of today.

Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, the "symphony with the kettledrum stroke" as the Germans call it, seemed a rather thin dilution of music, after the practical joke of following a soft and soothing passage with a bang was passed. Yet Haydn must have enjoyed just this second movement, the best of the work, for he afterwards used the theme as accompaniment to "With Eagerness the Husbandman" in his "Creation." But the practical joke is by no means the best in the classical repertoire; Beethoven's drunken bassoonist, with his three notes, in the sixth symphony. Mendelssohn's snoring ophicleide and braying bassoon (two phases of Bottom, the weaver,) in the "Midsummer-night's dream" overture, or Mozart's "Musical Jokes" in which a country bandmaster without ideas or learning sets out to compose a classical work, are all on a higher plane, and perhaps a movement from the last-named work might sometime be performed when the programme leans to the rollicking mood.

The symphony was, however, excellently played, and the kettle-drummer, who used to run amuck through the classics in former years, and was then suppressed, enjoyed his new-found liberty.

The arrangement of Mozart's Turkish movement from one of his piano sonatas was interesting because of Herbeck's ingenious instrumentation; but it is about as Turkish in its character as the fig-paste sold by street venders nereabouts as genuine "Rahat Lakoum." Beethoven fell into the same error as Mozart in supporting that clatter and bang and skips and short grace-notes would probably picture everything Oriental in music. After all it is chiefly St. Saens who has given a true idea of Oriental music to the Occidental concert-room. Instead of staccato skips we should have portamento wails, the augmented second should play an important part as well as the flat seventh, and the rhythm although persistent, should never be as powerful as in the Mozart or Beethoven Turkish pieces.

Although there was no soloist upon the programme, Mr. Kneisel, besides the obligato mentioned above, played the melody of the Handel "Largo" with the utmost expression, and this, together with Mr. Schuecker's harp-playing, gave something of the individuality of solo-playing to parts of the concert. Besides this, the performance of the Largo theme in unison by all the violins as climax to this number was a magnified solo that aroused an enthusiasm beyond any orchestral number given this season. The men played it better than they did some years ago when they all stood in line at the footlights,—at least at the front of the platform,—and gave it in more sensational guise.

The concert ended with Beethoven's first symphony, the weakest of the nine, and evidently a graft, although a fine one, upon the Haydn tree. Although Beethoven began the century with its symphonies (this, although composed in 1799 was first heard in 1800) he did not begin a new era at once; it was not until 1804 and the Heroic symphony that Haydn and his methods were brushed almost entirely aside by a broader treatment, a vaster development, and a Coda that made a true climax. But there are touches in the symphony that deeply interest the musical student, in the light of what came after it; one finds, for example, in the second movement, a kettle-drum passage that was immeasureably more independent than anything that had preceded it on this instrument; earlier composers had used the kettle-drum only as an instrument of rhythm, but Beethoven liberated it, as he afterwards did other of the humbler instruments of the orchestra, notably the contrabasses.

It is interesting, too, to see the great freedom of the minuet as compared with the formalism of Haydn, and even of Mozart, in this movement. Haydn had laid down the law that every full sonata form must present the minuet as one of its movements; this was much as if every modern composer were obliged to give one waltz in each large instrumental composition that he wrote; Beethoven follows the rule of his teacher, but his minuet is more of a scherzo than the scherzo of the second symphony,—the first symphonic scherzo of the repertoire.

But in the finale Beethoven is again the obedient follower of Haydn. As the idea of the symphony came from the suite, and as the suite ended with a rollicking gigue, it was held to be essential to end the symphonic form with a lively and jovial movement. In this symphony Beethoven achieved just this point; he is genial, melodic, rollicking, but he is not the giant of tones, and the finale is not a climax. Already in the second symphony one finds the more resolute finale foreshadowed, and from the time of the third symphony the sop to Cerberus of a lively movement to send people away in a good humor is put away altogether. The reading of the work was all that could have been desired, and the general execution proved that the plaudits of the New York press which have been recently showered upon our orchestra are not undeserved, for the organization was never in more perfect and artistic condition than it is now. Louis C. Elson.

NOTES.

The soloist at this week's symphony concert will be Miss Rosa Olitzka of the Metropolitan Opera Co. of New York, who will sing an aria from Mozart's "Titus" and "Ah! Mon Fils!" from Meyerbeer's "Prophete."

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1895.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the ninth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, was as follows:

Bach: Suite in D major.
Haydn: Symphony in G major, "Surprise" (B. & H., No. 6; Peters, No. 4).
Mozart: Turkish March from the A major Sonata. (Scored for Orchestra by Herbeck.
Handel: Largo from "Serse." (Scored for Violins and Orchestra by Hellmesberger.) Violin solo by Mr. Franz Kneisel.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 1, in C major, opus 21.

Probably one of the most astonishing programmes on record! A Bach suite, a Haydn symphony, Beethoven's earliest symphony (which belongs to his first, or Haydn-Mozart manner), and two transcriptions, thrown in as tidbits; both of the latter being arrangements of things lying within the same general chronological circle! It is like a five-course dinner of nothing but beef—cooked in five different ways. Somewhat too much of a good thing!

The opening overture of the Bach suite (Grave and fugued Vivace), was capitally played; with good ensemble, fire and vigor of accent. Mr. Kneisel's full-tone playing of the violin solo passages was simply admirable. The three trumpets, with Mr. Pierre Müller at their head, also did splendidly, as indeed they did throughout the suite. The favorite air (second movement) satisfied us less. There were too many modern salon airs and graces in the phrasing of the first violins, too mush instability of tempo, in a word, too much merely skin-deep sentiment. And we know of only one word in any language fitly to characterize the notion of having each section of the movement first played by a solo violin and then repeated by all the first violins, and this is the French word bete. Both the Gavottes and the Bourrée seemed to us to be played rather weakly, with insufficient force of accent, and somewhat too slow. The final Gigue, too, seemed to lack something of its native brilliancy and dash. Taken as a whole, we have seldom heard this suite produce so little effect.

Haydn's "Surprise" symphony is not often heard here nowadays; but it is a charming work, full of Haydn's best qualities. The Andante—with its single crash of Paukenschlag surprise—is treated with such exquisite humor that whatever of "childishness" there may be in its theme is nothing but fascinating. The performance was decidedly the best of the evening, and did full justice to the composition; it was full of life, tricksy delicacy, and force.

Herbeck's scoring of Mozart's Turkish March was done with a certain definite purpose; the march, so arranged, was to be played between the acts of "Die Entführung aus dem Serail," with the Turkish subject of which opera the march has some affinity. Herbeck accordingly scored it for the same orchestra that Mozart used in the overture and the more fully orchestrated numbers of the opera itself. With the artistic propriety of introducing this march between the acts of the "Entführung" we have nothing to do here. But we must say that it seems rather a futile trifle to put upon the programme of a Symphony concert. It was excellently well played, but called forth more smiles than enthusiasm.

The notorious Handel Largo is a horse of another color. That this unspeakable piece of vulgarity should be exceedingly popular is nothing surprising; what is more surprising is that conductors of Symphony concerts should care to cater to the worst phase of popular taste in performing it. Hellmesberger has here taken an essentially charming little quasi-pastoral air by Handel—in its original shape it is a perfect musical expression of elegant dolce far niente, you can almost imagine Xerxes yawning while singing it—transposed it to a more brilliant key, changed its tempo from easily flowing Larghetto to a portentous Largo, and so dressed it up in impressive modern orchestration that it sounds for all the world like another Matthias Keller's "American Hymn." Rescoring Beethoven's first symphony for full "Nibelungen" orchestra, with all Meyerbeer's instruments of percussion, and playing it half as slow again as it was written (to enable the contrabass-tuba to keep up with the 'celli and basses), would be no worse offence against musical common sense and good taste. If this deplorable piece is ever played again here, we heartily recommend having four cornets play parallel with the violins on the melody; then the audience may at last feel for itself how vulgar it is!

It has become the fashion lately to sneer at Beethoven's C major symphony, on the ground that, in it, one does not get "the whole Beethoven." But we think that, had the score been signed by Mozart or Haydn, instead of by Beethoven, no such sneers would have ever been heard of. We have always found it an entirely charming work, fully worthy of its composer; there is not a moment of weakness nor dulness in it; and, because Bethoven has done far greater things in a far greater way, we cannot see why this essentially fine and genial composition should be cast into oblivion by them. But we certainly do not want to hear this symphony played as it was last Saturday evening. All All four movements were terribly dragged; it seemed almost as if Mr. Paur wished to prove to the audience that the work was not of sufficient calibre to stand "Brahms" tempi. Curiously enough—and, we imagine, quite unprecedentedly in the experience of most concert-goers—he took the first two movements (Allegro con brio, and Andante cantabile con moto) at exactly the same tempo! His beat gave the rhythmical unit at precisely 96 of the metronome in both cases. And the Minuet (Allegro molto e vivace) went only just a shade faster, with the beat at 102! The Finale (with the half-note at 76 and a fraction) was also too slow. All the life and go was taken clean out of the symphony. We do not know the authority of the metronome-marks in Peters's edition of the full score: half-note at 112 for the first Allegro; eighth-note at 120 for the Andante; dotted half-note at 108 for the Minuet; and half-note at 88 for the Finale. But these markings certainly seem to us more in harmony with the character of the work than Mr. Paur's tempi.

It is the fashion nowadays to pooh-pooh metronome-marks as superfluous guides to the intelligent interpreter. It is a little curious, however, that three of the most noted come-outers in all musical history, three of the most determined pioneers in new and unexplored musical directions, should have valued the metronome very highly. These were Beethoven, Berlioz and Wagner; men by no means chargeable with musical "Philistinism." Beethoven was immensely interested in the metronome, and attributed a high degree of importance to it. Berlioz was a persistent champion of the metronome, as the only unmistakable interpreter between composer and performer in the matter of correct tempo. Wagner, to be sure, gave up using the metronome after "Tannhäuser;" but why? As he himself has been at pains to tell us, it was solely and simply because, after all the trouble he had taken carefully to metronomize every tempo and every change of tempo in "Rienzi," the "Holländer," and "Tannhäuser," sore experience taught him that conductors did not mind his metronome-marks in the least. He accordingly abandoned the metronome, not because it was intrinsically useless and superfluous, but because he could not get conductors to pay any regard whatever to his marking. It has often seemed to us that the now current fashion of pooh-poohing the metronome has its basis, not in the fact that the metronome is a purely mechanical—and hence "inartistic"—instrument, but in the quite different fact that authentic metronome marks set a hard-and-fast limit to that "individuality of interpretation," without which many conductors and performers today would find it hard to discover their own reason of being. The metronome, once recognized as an unquestionable expression of the composer's intention as regards tempo, would sadly curtail what seems at times to be the most cherished "right" (Heaven save the mark!) of the modern conductor and performer—the "right" of doing everything differently from everybody else.

The next programme is: Bizet, overture, "Patrie;" Lalo, suite, "Namouna;" Volkmann, symphony No. 2, in B-flat major, opus 53; songs to be announced. Miss Olitzka will be the singer.

The Boston Traveler
MONDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1895.

THE SYMPHONY.

An Ultra-Classical Programme. Which Was Played Very Finely in the Main.

Fifteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; ninth concert. The programme:
Suite in D major.....John Sebastian Bach
Symphony in G major, "Surprise".....
Franz Josef Haydn
Turkish March from the A major Sonata (scored for orchestra by Herbeck).....
Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart
Largo from "Serse" (scored for violins and orchestra by Hellmesberger.) Violin solo by Mr. Frank Kneisel.)....George Frideric Handel Symphony No. 1, in C major, op. 21.....
Ludwig van Beethoven

It was classicism with a vengeance, and yet the concert was not o'er long, nor was there even the usual rush for home before the final movement of the closing symphony. One could not escape a slight feeling of cloyedness, however, for everything was in practically the same mold, spite of the pleasing varieties upon that mold. Only the Mozart march climbed out of the rut, and sounded new and almost modern.

The Bach suite is a fine example of the old master's dainty and courtly music of that style, and it was beautifully played, Mr. Muller distinguishing himself by his trumpet work and Mr. Kneisel by his violin.

Haydn's "Surprise" symphony was not so surprising as in former years. In fact the full orchestra's crash after each repetition of the second movement theme was very mild, indeed, and no one unacquainted with the work would have felt the slightest wonderment or moved a single inch in his seat. Otherwise, the symphony went with charming ease and grace.

Mozart's Turkish march, in which there is nothing Turkish, was brought forth with splendid rythm and tone color for so aged a work. It really might have been published yesterday and not have been called antique.

What is there about Handel's "Largo" that always raises the most furious uproar whether it is played at a beer garden, a theatre or a symphony? The people went into the usual raptures Saturday night, and for no special reason other than that it was the "Largo," for it has been better performed in this city. It seemed overburdened with orchestration, garish and affected, where simplicity should have been its prevailing spirit.

The Beethoven first symphony was excellently played, but it is gradually becoming ineffective and ought to be played only on rare occasions simply to show the wonderful difference in the composer's later manners.

Boston Transcript
WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 1, 1896.

IT WAS A FINE CONCERT.

To the Editor of the Transcript:

Probably I shall be called a musical barbarian by some people, but at the same time I would like to thank Mr. Paur through your columns for the very delightful programme which he gave us at the Symphony rehearsal and concert of last week.

And I have good reason to think that the majority of those who were present on those occasions will agree with me in pronouncing the programme as the most enjoyable of the season thus far.

BEACON HILL.

Boston, Dec. 31, 1895.

[70]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 1, 1896.

The program of the ninth Symphony concert, in Music Hall, last evening, was as follows:

Suite in D major, ... Bach
Symphony G major, Surprise, ... Haydn
Turkish march from the A major sonata, . . . Mozart
(Scored for orchestra by Herbeck.)
Largo from Serse, ... Händel
(Scored for violins and orchestra by Hellmesberger.)
(Violin solo by Mr. Franz Kneisel.)
Symphony No. 1, ... Beethoven

Truly an astounding program! One without any possible historical value; for the arrangements of the march of Mozart and the air of Händel are distinctively modern. And, pray, what excuse can Mr. Paur give?

Such a program does not inspire an orchestra or a reviewer. I do not propose to take your space by dilating upon the performance or digressing after the manner of the pedagogue. The air from the suite, finely played by Mr. Kneisel and orchestra, as well as the andante from Haydn's symphony, was applauded warmly. For the last five years I have never heard such genuine and long protracted applause as that which followed the performance of Handel's Largo last night.

The program of the Symphony concert Saturday, January 4, will include Bizet's overture La Patrie, suite, Noumana, Lalo; Volkmann's B flat major symphony. Miss Olitzka will sing airs by Mozart and Meyerbeer.

PHILIP HALE.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.

VOL. XCIX., NO. 5.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 5, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Two Musical Novelties—Miss Rosa Olitzka Received with a Chilling Reserve.

Two musical novelties and a new singer were the features of the tenth Boston Symphony concert of the season in Music Hall last night. The programme was:

Symphony No. 2, D minor.....Dvorak
Aria, "Parto, parto," "Titus".....Mozart
Suite, "Namouna".....Lalo
"Ah, mon fils!" "Le Prophete".....Meyerbeer
Overture, "Patrie".....Bizet

The novelties were the "Namouna" suite and the Bizet overture, and the singer was Miss Rosa Olitzka. The Lalo music, as given, consists of a prelude, a serenade, a theme with variations, a market day show and a market day festival. It was written for a ballet, but has little of the grace and lightness that characterizes French ballet music generally, and does not suggest dancing except in the last two movements, which have a boisterous swing adapted to a rude bucolic merry making. The score is abundant in extraordinary harmonies, reckless dissonances, strange accents and odd rhythmic unconventionalities. Of flowing melody there is little, except in the first of the two market movements, where there are a few movements of charming tunefulness; but, on the whole, the music is chiefly tone color, and wonderful enough it is in its originality, its variety and its brilliancy.

This score again emphasizes the fact that the modern French composer has learned every secret of instrumental effect, and is the master, par excellence, of piquancy, picturesqueness, contrast and daintiness in orchestration. The music itself is labored, and shows every sign of deliberate manufacture. It never for the briefest moment suggests spontaneity in invention, and when it is all over one carries nothing away but a memory of the remarkable skill of the composer in imparting interest to his bald platitudes through the agency of splendid and almost unique orchestration. It was brilliantly and perfectly played, and was warmly applauded, the noise and unceasing bustle of the closing movement having excited the audience to an enthusiasm that the music itself, as music pure and simple, scarcely merited. The Bizet overture is of little musical value, and is scarcely worthy the composer. It is vague in form, and says but little that was worth the saying with so much of pompous pretentiousness. There are several fine instrumental climaxes, and the scoring generally is rich and massive, particularly toward the end of the overture, where there is a gorgeous piling up of one powerful effect upon another, but it is fustian after all, and one is deafened rather than convinced.

Miss Olitzka, who, by the way, was received with a chilling reserve that must have proved far from encouraging to her, has a beautiful contralto voice of large range and evenly balanced through its whole compass. It is full, sympathetic in quality, and shows every evidence of careful cultivation. Unfortunately, she has a distressing tremolo, and a tendency to make an excessive use of portamento in and out of season, "scooping" up and down with persistency that imparts a monstrously lachrymose effect to her singing. Her style is somewhat exaggerated, and is better adapted to the operatic than to the concert stage, the latter requiring a reserve, a reserve and an artistic discretion of a higher order than Miss Olitzka manifested in her performance last night. She sang the Mozart aria intelligently, and to some extent in the Mozart spirit, but the effort, as a whole, was ineffective, and was marred by the tremolo already mentioned, and also by exaggeration in expression. The Meyerbeer aria was better and more broadly sung, and with a sincerity that was unmistakable. The audience, though it was not stirred to enthusiasm by her, was quite generous in its applause, and recalled her after each selection.

The Dvorak symphony does not improve upon acquaintance, and seemed to-night dull and over-garrulous, while the movement, despite its energy and dramatic intent, scarcely escaped becoming tedious. Mr. Paur read the work fine-ly, bringing out every point and accenting the individual character of the music with perfect clearness, and the orchestra was at its best through the concert.

The programme this week is: Symphony No. 6, Tschaikowsky; Scotch fantasy for violin and orchestra, Max Bruch; aria, Miss Margaret Ruthven Lang (first time); overture, "The Corsair," Berlioz (first time). Mr. T. Adamowski is to play the solo part in the Bruch fantasy, and Miss Gertrude Franklin will sing Miss Lang's aria.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 5.

The Symphony Concert.

Last evening, the tenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall. The following is the programme:

Symphony No. 2, D minor.....Dvorak
Aria "Parto Parto".....Mozart
Suite, "Namouna".....Lalo
Arioso from "Il Profeto".....Meyerbeer
Overture, "Patrie".....Bizet
Soloist, Miss Rosa Olitza.

In listening to Dvorak's music, a lover of pure music must occasionally regret that he cannot summon up enthusiasm at will, and go into ecstasies over work that moves him only to calm admiration. It cannot be denied that Dvorak is an artist; but the last word has not been said as to his power as a creator. To one unbiassed by theory, who does not instinctively and reverentially doff his hat to folk-song, and find the end of the evolution of art in its beginnings, who simply asks for good music, utterly indifferent as to its nationality Dvorak appears, not infrequently, dull and prolix, and his art work a fine imitation, rather than a genuine article. It is always safe to doubt the inspiration of an artist who has a theory, and the sounder his theme the greater should be the doubt. The hen cackles after the egg is laid; but no amount of cackling will produce the egg which is a gift of nature; an inheritance not purchasable, and inexplicable even after science has finished its demonstration.

Dvorak is a maker of music, not a producer; the materials given, he can work them up into a most attractive symphony; but with him there is no spontaneous generation of material; no soul gift, no transmution of baser metal through the alchemy of imagination. In the way of creative power there is nothing new in this symphony in D-minor. It is all very old material worked over again by the artist, who has gained in dexterity but not in ideas. The manufacture is of the best, but the real merit of the wine lies in its label only. When modern art theorists, after a prejudiced trial, have condemned Beauty to execution, she may perhaps ascend the scaffold, exclaiming: "Oh, folk song, what crimes are committed in thy name!" Be this as it may, there is nothing of high imagination or of high thought in the Dvorack's symphony; there is noise that affects dignity as in all modern works; there are spirit, brilliancy and learning, but after hearing all we are not filled with the enthusiasm of the poet, but rather with the intellectual pleasure of the anatomist who stands before his work exclaiming: "What a wonderful piece of work is the human skeleton."

Of the soloist of the evening, Miss Rosa Olitza, a long criticism is not necessary. Miss Olitza's voice is cloudy, not particularly pleasant in quality and of exceeding tremulousness that grows monotorous through persistency. Miss Olitza sings with taste and feeling, and the selection from Meyerbeer was interpreted with intensity and dramatic power. The Mozart aria was sung with less effect; it was defective both on the side of art and nature. It is only just to add that the singer aroused much enthusiasm in the audience, and after the Mozart aria received two bouquets.

The Lalo suite is a charming work, fresh, dainty and piquant; it is not of a high order, but it is marked by sincerity and filled with ideas, and so one will readily forget to ask why it was given at a symphony concert. The Bizet overtueas was a disappointment; noisy, commonplace and occasionally vulgar. It was brilliantly played by the orchestra; but, unfortunately, no emotional Frenchman can write of "Patrie" and retain his taste and judgment at the same time.

The programme for the next concert is: Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6; Bruch's Scotch Fantasy; Aria by Miss Margaret R. Lang, and Berlioz's overture, "Corsair." The soloists are Miss Franklin and Mr. Adamowski.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 5, 1896.

Sunday ought to be welcome to the attendants upon last night's Symphony concert—the tenth in the current series—because it will give them the needed opportunity for resting their ears and recovering their nerves. A more noisy and exhausting concert we have rarely heard, save from some avowedly brass-band organization in a Gilmore or a Sousa programme. The usual brass choir, flanked by the brass tuba and a pair of cornets, and pretty nearly all the instruments of percussion, —except the marrow-bones and cleavers and Bottom's favorite, the tongs—were in full play most of the time; and even when some provision for gentler moments had been made, orchestra and conductor alike seemed unable to condescend to it. What can have induced Mr. Paur to perpetrate so uproarious a programme it is hard to guess; unless, failing to find any contrasts to suit him, he concluded to go on at a high pressure from beginning to end.

The symphony was Dvorak's second—in D minor—which is in itself neither cheerful nor cal mative. It has delicate bits and suave passages, particularly in the opening allegro and adagio; there are sweetly melodic phrases, which flow prettily along for short distances with harmonious thirds and fifths; there are fine tissues and rich colorings; there are interesting combinations and quaint instants, like the odd punctuation-marks which the trombones drop into the phrasing of the second movement; but, as a whole, it is an aggressive music, which compels attention and quite wearies the listener by the severity and sternness of its assertions. Even its scherzo—like so many modern ones—is not true to its name and is neither gay nor tricky, but only bizarre, while the adagio itself has to rise into a fierce outburst before it can end Per contra, the final allegro dies down midway, as if it were a Titan dropping to earth for an instant, to gather up new energy for another battle.

The second orchestral number was a novelty—Lalo's "Namouna" suite. Why "Namouna?" If there be any reason, the programme-book did not know it or did not deign to impart it. But the suite is exciting and admirable none the less. As has been said before, Lalo united Spanish ardor with French elegance, and in these numbers he is fervid to Orientalism, vehement, clangorous and dominants but poetry, fancy and tasteful sensitiveness are not forgotten. He glows with as many colors and revels in as many devices as Richard Strauss, but he is not lurid, extravagant or vulgar. His prelude is like the slow dawning of of a tropical sunrise over rolling wastes of mighty waters. Radiance and motion are doubly redoubled and intensified until a magnificent, glorious and resplendent day asserts itself in superb command. Or if one prefers, this shall be a gorgeous sunset, whose splendors seem nobler, grander and more luminous than noonday. Then a serenade, quaintly gay, floating from windy voices over the violin strings and the harps, twangling their broken chords. Then a lively air set out in fanciful variations and rhapsodic digressions. Finally two scenes of "Market Day Shows and Festivals," in which mirth, jollity and fantasy almost run riot through a score of instrumental ingenuities.

To end the programme Mr. Paur had set another new thing—Bizet's "Patrie" overture, a spread-eagle, hip-hip-hurrah-boys thing which seemed as though it might have been written for the first day of the Venezuela uproar. It thumped and stamped, banged and clattered, set all the drums and cymbals rattling, clashing and rumbling, and could not keep down toward placidity any longer or better than the famous fiddler of the Fezziwig dancing-party. It is an able composition, of course, but it glares in color and exceeds in demonstrativeness.

Between these numbers were put two vocal selections assigned to Miss Rosa Olitzka, one of the Metropolitan opera contraltos, who had chosen "Parto, Parto," from Mozart's "Clemenza di Tito," and "Ah, mon fils," from Meyerbeer's "Prophet." From the first some gentle coolness and simple grace were confidently hoped. But alas! Miss Olitzka delivered her Mozart just as she did her Meyerbeer and as she might have delivered her Verdi and her Wagner, if she had had any—with a tremolo so pronounced that at times it seemed trying to be a trill, and a melodramatic portamento which was too much even for the second air. She is young, piquant and modish, and she has a noble, beautiful natural voice, extending from low G to high B, rich and resounding in quality and capable of true emotional expression. But she forces it into a pharyngeal tone-production in order to augment its apparent volume, and she has overworked it evidently in contention with arduous music and implacable orchestras—just as Miss Brema was doing with her voice last year. The consequences are some gain in power and a greater loss in art and truth.

In the course of the programme were many obbligati—some of considerable length—and Messrs. Mole, Muller and Pourtau especially distinguished themselves.

The next programme stands thus: Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 6, second performance; Bruch, Scotch Fantasy, Mr. Adamowski; Margaret Ruthven Lang, Aria, first time, Miss Franklin; Berlioz, overture, "Corsair," first time.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 1, 1896.

The program of the ninth Symphony concert, in Music Hall, last evening, was as follows:

Suite in D major, ... Bach
Symphony G major, Surprise, ... Haydn
Turkish march from the A major sonata, . . . Mozart
(Scored for orchestra by Herbeck.)
Largo from Serse, ... Händel
(Scored for violins and orchestra by Hellmesberger.)
(Violin solo by Mr. Franz Kneisel.)
Symphony No. 1, ... Beethoven

Truly an astounding program! One without any possible historical value; for the arrangements of the march of Mozart and the air of Händel are distinctively modern. And, pray, what excuse can Mr. Paur give?

Such a program does not inspire an orchestra or a reviewer. I do not propose to take your space by dilating upon the performance or digressing after the manner of the pedagogue. The air from the suite, finely played by Mr. Kneisel and orchestra, as well as the andante from Haydn's symphony, was applauded warmly. For the last five years I have never heard such genuine and long protracted applause as that which followed the performance of Handel's Largo last night.

The program of the Symphony concert Saturday, January 4, will include Bizet's overture La Patrie, suite, Noumana, Lalo; Volkmann's B flat major symphony. Miss Olitzka will sing airs by Mozart and Meyerbeer.

PHILIP HALE.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.

VOL. XCIX., NO. 5.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 5, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Two Musical Novelties—Miss Rosa Olitzka Received with a Chilling Reserve.

Two musical novelties and a new singer were the features of the tenth Boston Symphony concert of the season in Music Hall last night. The programme was:

Symphony No. 2, D minor.....Dvorak
Aria, "Parto, parto," "Titus".....Mozart
Suite, "Namouna".....Lalo
"Ah, mon fils!" "Le Prophete".....Meyerbeer
Overture, "Patrie".....Bizet

The novelties were the "Namouna" suite and the Bizet overture, and the singer was Miss Rosa Olitzka. The Lalo music, as given, consists of a prelude, a serenade, a theme with variations, a market day show and a market day festival. It was written for a ballet, but has little of the grace and lightness that characterizes French ballet music generally, and does not suggest dancing except in the last two movements, which have a boisterous swing adapted to a rude bucolic merry making. The score is abundant in extraordinary harmonies, reckless dissonances, strange accents and odd rhythmic unconventionalities. Of flowing melody there is little, except in the first of the two market movements, where there are a few movements of charming tunefulness; but, on the whole, the music is chiefly tone color, and wonderful enough it is in its originality, its variety and its brilliancy.

This score again emphasizes the fact that the modern French composer has learned every secret of instrumental effect, and is the master, par excellence, of piquancy, picturesqueness, contrast and daintiness in orchestration. The music itself is labored, and shows every sign of deliberate manufacture. It never for the briefest moment suggests spontaneity in invention, and when it is all over one carries nothing away but a memory of the remarkable skill of the composer in imparting interest to his bald platitudes through the agency of splendid and almost unique orchestration. It was brilliantly and perfectly played, and was warmly applauded, the noise and unceasing bustle of the closing movement having excited the audience to an enthusiasm that the music itself, as music pure and simple, scarcely merited. The Bizet overture is of little musical value, and is scarcely worthy the composer. It is vague in form, and says but little that was worth the saying with so much of pompous pretentiousness. There are several fine instrumental climaxes, and the scoring generally is rich and massive, particularly toward the end of the overture, where there is a gorgeous piling up of one powerful effect upon another, but it is fustian after all, and one is deafened rather than convinced.

Miss Olitzka, who, by the way, was received with a chilling reserve that must have proved far from encouraging to her, has a beautiful contralto voice of large range and evenly balanced through its whole compass. It is pure, sympathetic in quality, and shows every evidence of careful cultivation. Unfortunately, she has a distressing tremolo, and a tendency to make an excessive use of portamento in and out of season, "scooping" up and down with a persistency that imparts a monstrously lachrymose effect to her singing. Her style is somewhat exaggerated, and is better adapted to the operatic than to the concert stage, the latter requiring a finish, a reserve and an artistic discretion of a higher order than Miss Olitzka manifested in her performance last night. She sang the Mozart aria intelligently, and to some extent in the Mozart spirit, but the effort, as a whole, was ineffective, and was marred by the tremolo already mentioned, and also by affectation in expression. The Meyerbeer aria was better and more broadly sung, and with a sincerity that was unmistakable. The audience, though it was not stirred to enthusiasm by her, was quite generous in its applause, and recalled her after each selection.

The Dvorak symphony does not improve upon acquaintance, and seemed often dull and over-garrulous, while the finale, despite its energy and dramatic sentiment, scarcely escaped becoming tiresome. Mr. Paur read the work finely, bringing out every point and accenting the individual character of the work with perfect clearness, and the orchestra was at its best through the whole concert.

The programme this week is: Symphony No. 6, Tschaikowsky; Scotch fantasy for violin and orchestra, Max Bruch; aria, Miss Margaret Ruthven Lang (first time); overture, "The Corsair," Berlioz (first time). Mr. T. Adamowski is to play the solo part in the Bruch fantasy, and Miss Gertrude Franklin will sing Miss Lang's aria.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 5.

The Symphony Concert.

Last evening, the tenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall. The following is the programme:

Symphony No. 2, D minor.....Dvorak
Aria "Parto Parto".....Mozart
Suite, "Namouna".....Lalo
Arioso from "Il Profeto".....Meyerbeer
Overture, "Patrie".....Bizet
Soloist, Miss Rosa Olitza.

In listening to Dvorak's music, a lover of pure music must occasionally regret that he cannot summon up enthusiasm at will, and go into ecstasies over work that moves him only to calm admiration. It cannot be denied that Dvorak is an artist; but the last word has not been said as to his power as a creator. To one unbiassed by theory, who does not instinctively and reverentially doff his hat to folk-song, and find the end of the evolution of art in its beginnings, who simply asks for good music, utterly indifferent as to its nationality Dvorak appears, not infrequently, dull and prolix, and his art work a fine imitation, rather than a genuine article. It is always safe to doubt the inspiration of an artist who has a theory, and the sounder his theme the greater should be the doubt. The hen cackles after the egg is laid; but no amount of cackling will produce the egg which is a gift of nature; an inheritance not purchasable, and inexplicable even after science has finished its demonstration.

Dvorak is a maker of music, not a producer; the materials given, he can work them up into a most attractive symphony; but with him there is no spontaneous generation of material; no soul gift, no transmution of baser metal through the alchemy of imagination. In the way of creative power there is nothing new in this symphony in D minor. It is all very old material worked over again by the artist, who has gained in dexterity but not in ideas. The manufacture is of the best, but the real merit of the wine lies in its label only. When modern art theorists, after a prejudiced trial, have condemned Beauty to execution, she may perhaps ascend the scaffold, exclaiming: "Oh, folk song, what crimes are committed in thy name!" Be this as it may, there is nothing of high imagination or of high thought in the Dvorack's symphony; there is noise that affects dignity as in all modern works; there are spirit, brilliancy and learning, but after hearing all we are not filled with the enthusiasm of the poet, but rather with the intellectual pleasure of the anatomist who stands before his work exclaiming: "What a wonderful piece of work is the human skeleton."

Of the soloist of the evening, Miss Rosa Olitza, a long criticism is not necessary. Miss Olitza's voice is cloudy, not particularly pleasant in quality and of exceeding tremulousness that grows monotorous through persistency. Miss Olitza sings with taste and feeling, and the selection from Meyerbeer was interpreted with intensity and dramatic power. The Mozart aria was sung with less effect; it was defective both on the side of art and nature. It is only just to add that the singer aroused much enthusiasm in the audience, and after the Mozart aria received two bouquets.

The Lalo suite is a charming work, fresh, dainty and piquant; it is not of a high order, but it is marked by sincerity and filled with ideas, and so one will readily forget to ask why it was given at a symphony concert. The Bizet overtueas was a disappointment; noisy, commonplace and occasionally vulgar. It was brilliantly played by the orchestra; but, unfortunately, no emotional Frenchman can write of "Patric" and retain his taste and judgment at the same time.

The programme for the next concert is: Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6; Bruch's Scotch Fantasy: Aria by Miss Margaret R. Lang, and Berlioz's overture, "Corsair." The soloists are Miss Franklin and Mr. Adamowski.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 5, 1896.

Sunday ought to be welcome to the attendants upon last night's Symphony concert—the tenth in the current series—because it will give them the needed opportunity for resting their ears and recovering their nerves. A more noisy and exhausting concert we have rarely heard, save from some avowedly brass-band organization in a Gilmore or a Sousa programme. The usual brass choir, flanked by the brass tuba and a pair of cornets, and pretty nearly all the instruments of percussion, —except the marrow-bones and cleavers and Bottom's favorite, the tongs—were in full play most of the time; and even when some provision for gentler moments had been made, orchestra and conductor alike seemed unable to condescend to it. What can have induced Mr. Paur to perpetrate so uproarious a programme it is hard to guess; unless, failing to find any contrasts to suit him, he concluded to go on at a high pressure from beginning to end.

The symphony was Dvorak's second—in D minor—which is in itself neither cheerful nor cal mative. It has delicate bits and suave passages, particularly in the opening allegro and adagio; there are sweetly melodic phrases, which flow prettily along for short distances with harmonious thirds and fifths; there are fine tissues and rich colorings; there are interesting combinations and quaint instants, like the odd punctuation-marks which the trombones drop into the phrasing of the second movement; but, as a whole, it is an aggressive music, which compels attention and quite wearies the listener by the severity and sternness of its assertions. Even its scherzo—like so many modern ones—is not true to its name and is neither gay nor tricky, but only bizarre, while the adagio itself has to rise into a fierce outburst before it can end Per contra, the final allegro dies down midway, as if it were a Titan dropping to earth for an instant, to gather up new energy for another battle.

The second orchestral number was a novelty—Lalo's "Namouna" suite. Why "Namouna?" If there be any reason, the programme-book did not know it or did not deign to impart it. But the suite is exciting and admirable none the less. As has been said before, Lalo united Spanish ardor with French elegance, and in these numbers he is fervid to Orientalism, vehement, clangorous and dominants but poetry, fancy and tasteful sensitiveness are not forgotten. He glows with as many colors and revels in as many devices as Richard Strauss, but he is not lurid, extravagant or vulgar. His prelude is like the slow dawning of of a tropical sunrise over rolling wastes of mighty waters. Radiance and motion are doubly redoubled and intensified until a magnificent, glorious and resplendent day asserts itself in superb command. Or if one prefers, this shall be a gorgeous sunset, whose splendors seem nobler, grander and more luminous than noonday. Then a serenade, quaintly gay, floating from windy voices over the violin strings and the harps, twangling their broken chords. Then a lively air set out in fanciful variations and rhapsodic digressions. Finally two scenes of "Market Day Shows and Festivals," in which mirth, jollity and fantasy almost run riot through a score of instrumental ingenuities.

To end the programme Mr. Paur had set another new thing—Bizet's "Patrie" overture, a spread-eagle, hip-hip-hurrah-boys thing which seemed as though it might have been written for the first day of the Venezuela uproar. It thumped and stamped, banged and clattered, set all the drums and cymbals rattling, clashing and rumbling, and could not keep down toward placidity any longer or better than the famous fiddler of the Fezziwig dancing-party. It is an able composition, of course, but it glares in color and exceeds in demonstrativeness.

Between these numbers were put two vocal selections assigned to Miss Rosa Olitzka, one of the Metropolitan opera contraltos, who had chosen "Parto, Parto," from Mozart's "Clemenza di Tito," and "Ah, mon fils," from Meyerbeer's "Prophet." From the first some gentle coolness and simple grace were confidently hoped. But alas! Miss Olitzka delivered her Mozart just as she did her Meyerbeer and as she might have delivered her Verdi and her Wagner, if she had had any—with a tremolo so pronounced that at times it seemed trying to be a trill, and a melodramatic portamento which was too much even for the second air. She is young, piquant and modish, and she has a noble, beautiful natural voice, extending from low G to high B, rich and resounding in quality and capable of true emotional expression. But she forces it into a pharyngeal tone-production in order to augment its apparent volume, and she has overworked it evidently in contention with arduous music and implacable orchestras—just as Miss Brema was doing with her voice last year. The consequences are some gain in power and a greater loss in art and truth.

In the course of the programme were many obbligati—some of considerable length—and Messrs. Mole, Muller and Pourtau especially distinguished themselves.

The next programme stands thus: Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 6, second performance; Bruch, Scotch Fantasy, Mr. Adamowski; Margaret Ruthven Lang, Aria, first time, Miss Franklin; Berlioz, overture, "Corsair," first time.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 5, 1896.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Badly Arranged Program With Two Novelties.

The Voice of Rosa Olitzka Better Than Her Art.

The program of the tenth Symphony Concert in Music Hall last evening was as follows:

Symphony No. 2, in D minor, Op. 70..Dvorak
Aria, "Parto, parto," from "La Clemenza di Tito".....Mozart
(Clarinet obbligato by Mr. Leon Pourtau.)
Suite, "Namouna".....Lalo
(First time.)
Arioso, "Ah! My Son," from "The Prophet".....Meyerbeer
Overture, "Patrie".....Bizet
(First time.)

This concert was another proof of the awkwardness of Mr. Paur in program-making. There was little or no contrast. With the exception of the dull and antiquated aria of Mozart, the selections were from composers of the romantic school. The symphony of Dvorak is not among the most distinguished of his works. Neither of the Frenchmen was shown at his best. One selection like the suite from "Namouna" is enough for a concert; a great overture or a great symphony, or at least some widely differing piece should be played the same evening.

The ballet of "Namouna," produced March 6, 1882, at the Paris Opéra, is founded on an episode in the memoirs of Casanova, who enjoys justly the reputation of being the most entertaining scoundrel and blackguard that ever cheated at cards or broke a woman's heart. Namouna, a Greek slave, is won at dice from a corsair, Adriani, by Don Ottavio. There are adventures and murderous plots. The corsair is killed and the lovers married after their long and arduous dance and pantomime.

Lalo wrote the music of this ballet at great disadvantage. Vaucorbeil, who had promised to produce his "Roi d'Ys," kept putting off the performance and finally proposed a ballet. He gave Lalo three months for the task. Lalo worked night and day, for he wrote slowly and conscientiously. One night he was striken by paralysis. They say that Gounod generously assisted him in scoring the last act.

The ballet was a failure. Lalo had the unenviable reputation in Paris of being a serious musician, a writer of orchestral pieces and chamber music. It was assumed that he could not write a ballet. The audience went to see it chiefly to confirm its suspicions.

The suite from this ballet, however, has been played all over Europe, and in certain American cities. It deserved last night a more cordial reception in Boston. While the music has not the sensuous charm, the fascinating grace, or the irresistible rhythm of Delibes's ballets, it is nevertheless worthy of the attention of all lovers of tonal color. The prelude is singular, with a monotony that is not without charm; it is full of ingenuity in the instrumentation. The serenade of Namouna is clever but not distinguished.

The theme with variations is in the ballet a "divertissement des fleurs." The theme is one of refined beauty rather than one that appeals at once to a large audience. The variations are ingenious, and the use of the brass is at times remarkable. The fourth movement, "Market Day Shows" and "Market Day Festival," is the one that first arouses the average hearer to even mild enthusiasm. There is a striking effect gained by a cornet that seems to me worth more than the whole development of the final jig, for it is original; it stands out; it remains in the memory.

Lalo won his first success with "Le Roi d'Ys" when he was 65 years old. Bizet died without knowing of the success of "Carmen" before he was 37 years old.

They tell this story about "Patrie!" which was first played at a Pasdeloup concert, Feb. 15, 1874. The title was at first simply "Ouverture dramatique." Bizet had thought of his beloved France, her humiliation and mourning. But believing that such a theme would not suit a time of peace in the city that had seen the German soldiers parading in triumph, he took for his subject Poland. Pasdeloup suggested shortly before the concert the title by which the overture is now known.

This same overture seems to me the weakest thing of Bizet that I have ever heard. I find in it neither depth of thought nor brilliancy of expression. The opening march seems ordinary and tiresome. The body of the overture is not impressive. Not once either in attempt to depict shock of battle or the desolation of a conquered country was there the feeling of nobility or strength. The piece seems to me labored and dull from beginning to end. It is, indeed, perfunctory music. Nor can I understand why the composer of "L'Arlésienne" and "Carmen" allowed this overture to leave his portfolio of attempts and failures.

* * *

There are charming passages in the symphony. The scherzo throughout is delightful, and there are beautiful spots in the adagio. But the symphony as a whole appears to be a study in experimental instrumentation rather than a firmly-knit and convincing work.

* * *

They that are interested in Miss Olitzka, who made her début in Boston last evening, will find a true sketch of her career in another column. When she sang in Berlin early in 1891, before she was known in opera, she sang the same old air of Mozart. It is therefore probably her show piece. The air itself is as dead as the opera from which it is taken. When Carolina Perini first sang it audiences were accustomed to such unmeaning and undramatic airs. That Sextus, a Roman lover, was played by a woman, was a part of the old practice of "opera seria," for the hero in the 17th century and also frequently in the 18th was a male soprano.

Miss Olitzka has naturally a fine voice, liberal in compass, rich and beautiful in quality. I fear she has never learned some of the rudiments of the art of singing. Her tone-production cannot honestly be praised, and her glowing temperament is not under artistic control. While she has a certain facility in coloratura, her agility is reckless rather than finished. Her attack is often a scoop. And she has the German trick of pouncing upon a favorite tone in her voice and shaking it and holding it and calling attention to it and doing all sorts of queer and wonderful things with it.

In "Ah! My Son"—she sang the air in French—she showed undoubted dramatic feeling. She did not sing it, however, with authority, and, it may be said here, that her "stage presence" is, unfortunately, neither graceful nor one that at once inspires confidence in ability to perform the task. But let us wait and hear her in opera.

* * *

The program book was noticeable for inaccurate statements and unaccountable omissions.

Bizet died at Bougival, not at Paris, as stated by the program book.

"On his return from Rome, he (Bizet) brought out an opera, 'Vasco de Gama,' in 1863, but with little success." Bizet never wrote an opera with such a title. He did write a symphony with choruses, entitled "Vasco de Gama." It was his second "envoi de Rome." It was played at a concert of the Société Nationale des Beaux-Arts. After his death this "Ode Symphonique" was published by Choudens.

The program book speaks of the "immediate and overwhelming success" of "Carmen." The fact is that "Carmen" was almost a failure when it was first brought out in Paris. It was condemned by sleek burgesses as "immoral." Its lack of success hastened the death of Bizet. Produced March 3, 1875, it was performed only 47 times that year, and not until it had triumphed throughout Germany was it appreciated in Paris.

There is no mention of Bizet's opera "Don Procopio," opera bouffe in two acts sent to the Academy from Rome in 1859. The manuscript was found only a year or two ago.

No one would infer from the biographical sketch of Lalo in the program book that the French composer died April 22, 1892, at Paris. There is no mention of his opera "La Jacquerie," which, finished after his death by Arthur Coquard, was produced at Monte Carlo, March 8, 1895, with Mrs. Deschamps, Miss Loventz, Bouvet and Jéhin as the chief singers.

"A Serenade and a Fantaisie Norvégienne, for violin and orchestra were first played in Berlin." The serenade is for violin. The "Rhapsodie Norvégienne," not "Fantaisie, etc.," is for orchestra. It was produced in Berlin, Oct. 26, 1879. The concerto for 'cello was produced in Berlin, not "in Paris." There is no mention of the singular music written by Lalo for "Nero," produced at the Hippodrome, March 28, 1891, or of the piano concerto, played by Diemer at Châtelet.

"Namouna * * * was given only 15 times." It was given 16 times according to Noel and Stoullig.

There is on page 341 a list of operas entitled "La Clemenza di Tito." Instead of "Jommelli (Stuttgart, about 1758)," read "Jommelli (Ludwigsburg, 1765)." Nor is the list complete. These should be added: Caldara (Vienna, 1734); Mazzoni (Lisbon, 1755); Grua (Mannheim, 1748); Galuppi, about 1760.

"La Clemenza di Tito," by Mozart, was not called a "dramma serioso;" it was called "opera seria."

Mr. Apthrop, the compiler of the program book, says: "The air (Parto, parto) has not been heard in Boston, I believe, for many years." But this air was sung Feb. 20, 1890, at a Baermann concert in Union Hall by Miss Franklin, and Mr. Strasser played the clarinet obligato.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIX., NO. 3.

FRIDAY, JAN. 3, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY SOLOIST.

Mlle. Rosa Olitzka Chats of Herself and Boston.

The Singer's Personality—Is Visiting a Sister—Her Teacher and Her Early Career—Debut in Opera—Her Roles—Her London Success—Enthusiastic Over Boston and the Orchestra.

This afternoon at the Symphony rehearsal Boston will hear for the first time one of the strangers of the Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau opera company, Mlle. Rosa Olitzka, a countrywoman of the popular Jean de Reszke, of Paderewski and Modjeska, as well as of Adamowski.

Mlle. Olitzka arrived in town two days ago, and is staying with her sister, Mrs. Strook, on Wyman street, in Jamaica Plain, where early last evening she was seen by a representative of The Herald.

Mlle. Olitzka is an interesting woman, with bright black eyes and a piquant face, framed in the blackest of hair, and when she received her caller yesterday was attired in a dark red street frock, trimmed with black, and very becoming to her decided brunette type. She has an engaging manner and pretty desire to be liked, and speaks English, as all Poles do, fluently, but with a pretty hesitancy and a very pronounced and very engaging accent. She is not tall, but her figure is round and graceful, and her speaking voice is beautiful.

Mlle. Olitzka, on her own evidence, was born at Warsaw, although the London papers have set her natal place down several times as Saragossa, and indeed she looks much more Spanish than northern in every way. She was born in 1872, and has been before the public but little over four years, having made her debut at the age of 19, while still a student in Berlin.

Her father, who had a beautiful voice, was cantor in the first Jewish synagogue in Berlin, where his chanting of the Jewish melodies was a feature of the service. All of his children inherited his musical nature, although none but Mlle. Rosa has ever appeared in public. There is, however, a younger sister with a soprano voice, of whose future the family have great hopes, but she is still studying.

Mlle. Olitzka submitted to being questioned with perfect equanimity and graciousness, sympathizing with the desire to have things straight, and doing her best to make them so.

"You won't mind questions, Mlle. Olitzka, of course?"

"I should be pleased to answer them," was the first reply.

"You were born where?"

"At Warsaw, in Poland."

"And educated where?"

"In Berlin, where my father lived. My first teacher was Mme. Artot Padilla, and afterward I was with Prof. Julius Hey.

"And when did you make your very first appearance in public?"

"While I was studying I often appeared in concerts in Berlin and at Frankfort-on-the-Main and Magdeburg."

"Can you remember the date of your first appearance in concert?"

"I am afraid that I cannot. It was at a philharmonic concert. I often appeared at those concerts in Berlin given by Count Frizky, a famous German pianist, who had but one arm, and yet who was a marvellous pianist, making music with his one hand that sounded in volume and tone like an organ. He was famous in Germany. Afterward he was first intendant at the Court Opera at Pesth, but I think he has retired now. He lost his wife, and it was a great grief to him. Then I appeared at Wagner concerts, and the Museum's at Frankfort and Magdeburg. All these are regular concerts of the musical season and well known all over Germany."

"And when did you make your debut in opera?"

"At Brunn in September, 1892, as Azucema, in 'Il Trovatore.' I was engaged there for that entire season, and sang a great many parts, including Fides in 'Le Prophet,' Ortrud in 'Lohengrin,' 'Carmen,' 'Mignon,' Fricka in 'Walkure,' 'Orfeo' and all the usual contralto and mezzo-soprano roles."

"And you went from there to the Kroll Opera, Hamburg?"

"I did, for the season of '92 and '93, but before that, in the summer of 1892, I was invited to sing in Berlin, and I appeared there once, singing the same role in which I had made my debut at Brunn, Azucema. I made my debut in Hamburg in October, 1892, again as Azucema in 'Il Trovatore,' and the following year I went to England, where much of my time has been spent since."

"Then you have not sung at Vienna at all?"

"No. I had an offer to appear there, but my father was not willing to have me go so far from home, and although I have always had it in my mind to sing at the Court Opera House there, I have never yet done it. Hamburg was not so far, and he liked it better that I should go there, and therefore I did."

Mlle. Olitzka made her first appearance in London at the Press Fund dinner at the Hotel Metropole. That was in June, 1893, and the following week she gave a concert at the Prince's Hall. Sir Augustus Harris then heard her and engaged her for three years, and she made her debut at Covent Garden in "Seigfried" that same season, as Erda, and later was one of the company that was sent into the provinces to sing such roles as Ortrud and Azucena and Carmen. She has been a member of the Covent Garden company ever since, and has now several years' contract to fulfil, returning at once that her American season is finished in May to London for the next season there.

Mlle. Olitzka was one of the first members of the company to come to America, and she sang in London up to the very last evening of her stay there, having been in the autumn the most successful member of the Grand English opera company, which with the aid of Sir Augustus Harris, Mr. E. C. Hedmondt got together for a season of opera at Covent Garden, and with which two Americans, Alice May Estey and Marie Duma (Maude Starkweather), were connected. On the very last night in London Mlle. Olitzka sang Carmen with great success to tumultuous applause.

"I am afraid," said the young singer, when the questioning was over, "that I tell it to you all so badly. I have once had something written about me in London by a gentleman who have known all about me, and it was everything all correct, so I regret that my brother-in-law is not at home. I am sure that he has it in a book, but my sister cannot find it. It is such a pity, because it might serve you to get right what I do not remember. And, if you please, I have also to apologize for my bad English, I fear."

On being assured that her English was far from bad, indeed, that it was very pretty, she repaid the compliment by saying that the interviewer's English was the pure English of London town and very different from that of the New Yorkers that she had met. "I have sung in four languages," she added, "French, Italian, German and English, and I like English to sing some roles in. In the company they say to me: 'Well, madamoiselle, why do you not sing your next role in Chinese?' That is, I suppose, because so many singers, especially French and Italian, do not trouble to learn English."

Questions about her career being done, Mlle. Olitzka became quite cheerful, and with a sigh of relief began talking about Boston and the Symphony orchestra, meeting both subjects with an enthusiasm which she found some difficulty in putting into words.

"Oh, you have such a beautiful city," she exclaimed, clasping her hands rapturously, and with a genuine manner that there was no doubt but that she meant it. "I cannot tell you how beautiful it seems to me. I am so glad to stay out here with my sister, who married an American six years ago, and we have not seen her, oh, for a great while. We had intended to stop at the Brunswick Hotel, is it? But our sister would not hear of it, and it is very delightful to drive into the city from here, and the country all about it is so pretty; and, oh, your orchestra. I do assure you I have heard the big orchestras in Vienna and all over Europe, and all the big English orchestras, that led by Sir Charles Halle, in particular; but I have never heard such an orchestra as this. It was our first experience, also, of Herr Paur as a conductor, but, of course, we know all about him, and had very many times at home heard him as a pianist. Oh, yes; Emil Paur was well known there. What a conscientious, musicianly conductor he is, too; so careful that everything shall be just right. I enjoyed the rehearsal very much, and every one was very kind to me, and after I sung, the musicians all applauded me very heartily. I felt very grateful to them."

The singer had seen many curiosities about Boston which reminded her, as it does all foreigners, of London. She wanted to know, with some anxiety, if the musical set liked Mozart, and she was curious in regard to the building in which opera was given here, and asked many questions about its size and peculiarities, which showed that the subject was a matter of conversation. She was also, very naturally, curious to know what operas and what artists drew big houses, and whether or not the immense temporary opera house was often full or n[ot].

Mlle. Olitzka is accompanied by a married sister, who came with her from Europe, and is her constant companion. There is a strong family likeness between them, but the elder sister is much stouter than the singer, and watches over her, even in a conversation, with an almost maternal solicitude that everything should be quite right.

Mlle. Olitzka's voice is, to quote an English writer, "of remarkable compass, and she finds no difficulty in singing from the C in alt to the lower C in the small octave. Her voice has puzzled critics both here (which means in London) and in Germany, and she has been described both as a mezzo-soprano and a contralto, but she prides herself on possessing a pure contralto voice," and that is something which the Boston critics will find out tomorrow.

ROSA OLITZKA.

Next week, to the singer's great delight, she appears for the first time in New York as Fricka, which, with Fides, in "Le Prophet," and Ortrud, in "Lohengrin," are her favorite roles. In regard to her part in the opera season at Mechanics' Hall next month she, of course, as yet knows nothing.

Boston Sunday Globe

SUNDAY, JAN. 5, 1896.

Echoes from Yesterday's Symphony Concert.

Mlle Rosa Olitzka, the soloist at the 10th symphony concert, proved to be an artist of undoubted ability. The range of her voice is extensive and the pure contralto register is sonorous, sweet and quite powerful. The upper tones are clear, but they sounded slightly metallic. There was also a slight vibrato in the forte passages, though it was not prominent enough to suggest uncertainty in tone production. Her first selection, an aria from Mozart's "La Clemenza di Tito," was excellently phrased and, excepting the slight deviation from the pitch in the upper notes, there was little to criticise in the performance. Her voice harmonized well with the obligato of the clarinet, that instrument being superbly played by Mr Pourtau.

Her interpretation of the Fides aria, "Figlio, il ciel," from "The Prophet," was admirable throughout, the lines being given with dramatic intensity and without marring their musical effect. In this number the noble quality of Mlle Olitzka's deeper register was specially evident, the sustained notes being resonant, full and finished smoothly without deflecting in power. In these numbers the artist plainly indicated that in opera she should prove even more satisfactory than on the concert platform. Mlle Olitzka was presented with a large laurel wreath and recalled several times after each selection.

The orchestral numbers were Dvorak's symphony No. 2 in D minor, Lalo's "Namouna" suite and Bizet's overture, "Patrie," the latter played for the first time here. Dvorak's composition, so largely strenuous and somber in material, showed the great ensemble work capable with this orchestra, and throughout the performance Mr Paur evidently had his men under perfect control. All of the forte and fortissimo passages were well set forth by the different contingents. In the second movement the elaborate melodies were played without a break in the various rhythms, and the contrasted themes in the third movement were piquantly and delicately given.

The ballet music of "Namouna" received a brilliant interpretation, although the drum beats in the fourth movement were of an uneven tempo. The curious play of sensuous melodies in the first part of the movement were specially delightful. The Bizet overture was performed with true military pomposity and percussion effect. The composition is showy and elaborate, and these elements were not lacking in its rendition.

Miss Gertrude Franklin and Mr. T. Adamowski will be this week's soloists. The program will be as follows: Symphony No. 6, Tschaikowsky; Scotch fantasy, Bruch; Aria, Margaret Ruthven Lang; overture, "Corsair," Berlioz. The last two numbers will be performed for the first time.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, JANUARY 6, 1896.

Concert at the Boston Theatre for the Benefit of the Family of Mr. E. Goldstein — Appearance of Paderewski.

The program of the concert given last night at the Boston Theatre by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Miss Franklin and Mr. Paderewski for the benefit of the family of Mr. E. Goldstein was as follows:

Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, in C major, op. 72.....Beethoven
Ave Maria.....Gounod
(Violin obligato by Mr. T. Adamowski.)
Miss Franklin.
Fantasie Polonaise, op. 19.....Paderewski
Mr. Paderewski.
Suite, "Namouna".....Lalo
"Repentir".....Gounod
Miss Franklin.
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2.....Liszt
(Scored by Karl Muller-Berghaus.)
Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini
Accompanist, Mr. Max Zach.

Surely there was a noble response to a call for a deserving charity. Mr. Goldstein was for several years the leader of the double-basses of the Symphony Orchestra. He was most diligent in his public duties; estimable in his private life; highly accomplished as a master of his instrument. He contributed in no mean degree to the state of proficiency that now gives this orchestra its enviable reputation throughout the musical world.

Mr. Goldstein is now in the McLean Asylum hopelessly insane. It is believed that his madness, which first manifested itself by his declarations of his enormous wealth and correspondingly charitable intentions, is the result of a fall which injured the back of the skull, but from which it was at first supposed he recovered.

* * *

To assist in raising a fund to provide for the family of this unfortunate musician, the Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Paur gladly contributed their services. Mr. Paderewski, with his accustomed generosity and manly interest in humanity, desired to give his aid. Mr. Campanari, formerly of the orchestra, was equally eager, but he is under an inexorable contract with his managers, and as his services were needed in New York, he was unable to sing last night. Miss Franklin consented kindly, and at short notice, to take his place.

* * *

The theatre was crowded with an enthusiastic audience. The orchestral numbers were performed brilliantly under Mr. Paur's direction. Mr. Paderewski played with his usual maestria, and was applauded vociferously. He played in response the arrangement by Liszt of Schubert's "Hark, hark the Lark," and a waltz by Chopin. Miss Franklin sang with her customary skill. The net receipts, we are told, will be about $3000.

[72]

ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 6, 1896.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday--Clangor and Sensation.

The concert of Saturday (the 723d of the Boston series)' was as full of clangor and sensation as its predecessor had been of tranquility and classicism. Mr. Paur must have taken a lesson from the chef of the Bowery restaurant who recommended that the hairs and the butter be served on separate plates. The programme began with Dvorak's second symphony. This work scarcely represents the best school of this composer; in it Dvorak seems to endeavor to become abstruse and achieves dulness rather than profundity. It is as if he were trying on the mantle of Brahms and found it rather a loose fit. The symphony plunges into a strange path even from its very first figure, and the entire first movement, although its shape is quite correct and according to classical rule, seems disjointed and heterogeneous.

The Scherzo is probably the clearest bit of the symphony, and Mr. Paur brought out its swingy character in an excellent manner. The influence of folk-music is apparent in almost every part of the symphony, spite of the involved character of some of the treatment. The finale was very finely played. It is characteristic and powerful, the best movement of the whole work. It was given with an analytical clearness that brought its different themes and contrasts into bold relief, and the sinister theme with its baleful augmented second, very like "Telramund's Curse-motif" in "Lohengrin," was especially effective.

Now followed the soloist of the concert, Miss Rosa Olitzka, who sang Mozart's seldom heard "Parto, Parto," from "La Clemenza di Tito." She did not sing it well, possibly from nervousness, for her voice had a tremolo that sometimes almost obliterated the pitch, there seemed to be considerable insecurity of intonation, and the portamento was pushed to the verge of vocal tobogganing. Nevertheless, the artist was recalled three times, received floral tributes, and sang much better in "Ah! Mon Fils" (which she gave in French), a song more adapted to her expressive and dramatic manner than the first number. Miss Olitzka seems out of her element in the concert-room, and judging by the fervor displayed in the Meyerbeer number, needs the adjuncts of footlights, costumes, and dramatic action. Even in the second number the portamento was decidedly overused and became a glissando.

Lalo's suite entitled "Namouna" was a number full of interest, just such a novelty as we need occasionally upon our programmes irrespective of its merits or defects, to show what is being done by the moderns in the various schools of composition. Without the explicit statement that "Namouna" is a series of excerpts from a ballet, the suite would be almost unintelligible, for its begins with a prelude that is sufficient to usher in the Fates and it ends with a musical circus. It is scored in better fashion than any ballets that we know of except certain parts if Rubinstein's "Feramors" or "The Demon."

The scoring sometimes suggests Wagner, sometimes Goldmark, and calls for heavier forces than any except the greatest works. Two harps were used and were most necessary in certain parts of the suite, but of course the ophicleide could not be furnished in America and the bass tuba took its place, although the latter has not quite the rancous tone-color of the instrument with the Greek name.

The first movement of the suite was a noble glow of tone-color, and the constant reiteration of the harp-figures made an effective kind of pedal-point that we do not often hear.

The second movement, a very short one, was a "Serenade," and presented scale-progressions as wierd as those used by Brahms in the slow movement of his fourth symphony. Its short and direct melody and the simple effect produced by the pizzicati of strings and the accompaniment of the harps could not fail to please the audience, and the movement won much applause.

There was the most brilliant orchestration in the variations which constituted the next movement, but no really sustained thought or continuity such as one expects in these days when variation has become thematic development.

The two last movements (which merge into one) constituted the circus aforesaid. The performance was something superb (bravo! Mr. Paur and orchestra), the scoring as spicy as if Lalo had emptied the entire pepper-box into this portion of the work, but again the thoughts, per se, were weak and spasmodic. Cornet double-tongueing, a snappy rhythm that caused feet to tap and heads to wag, a couple of thundering climaxes, and that was all. One must, however, not censure Lalo too greatly for this, but remember that the work was written under exceptional pressure and with necessary haste. Yet with even this excuse made, it may be charged against the modern French school that its development of ideas has not kept pace with its progress in orchestration; Berlioz led the way to the latter, but when will some great French composer arise to lead these skilful scorers towards a working out of work on broader lines? The French composers of the present mostly give us a succession of little pictures, never a broad canvas with appropriate coherency.

The overture by Bizet, entitled "Patrie," is something unworthy of his fame and it came at the wrong time, too, for it is a work brimful of noise and fury, succeeding after the excitement of Lalo had had the nature of an anti-climax. Instead there was presented to the audience brilliant orchestration in lieu of ideas, and this from the composer who has ideas in his usual compositions more than any other Frenchman of them all! In the overture we have so distinct a reminiscence that it amounts to plagiarism; it is simply the idea of the "Bacchanalian March" as treated in "The Damnation of Faust," repeated in almost every detail, with a gentler episode thrown in as counterpoise. Yet even in this unworthy and unoriginal pasticcio one could occasionally get a glimpse of genius as, for example, in the central portion of the work, just before the return of the rather tawdry march-theme. Such a work, however weak it may be, has a certain right upon the Boston Symphony programmes, for Bizet is great enough that we should know all that he has done in the large forms, and to watch him copying Berlioz is not uninteresting; but the work came at decidedly the wrong moment, and either "Nomouna" or "Patrie" should have been kept waiting for a more fitting opportunity, and the two compositions should not have been suffered to neutralize each other.

The reviewer had almost forgotten to mention the excellent clarinette obligato to the Mozart aria, which was played by M. Pourtau; it was of course most artistically done, and called to mind the fact that Mozart was the first composer to really appreciate the clarinette. Handel, the great experimenter in early orchestration, used the simple clarinette of his time (then called Shawm) once only, and then gave it up as a poor instrument, but Mozart in his latest years was continually giving this instrument a post of prominence, although even he did not realize all its possibilities, and the spectral tone-color of its deepest register was first properly employed by Weber in the incantation scene of "Der Freischuetz," and by Mendelssohn in the Scotch symphony. As a supporting instrument against the voice the clarinette has some advantages over the flute, for its middle register comes nearer to the tone-color of the human voice than the flute does. Especially is this the case with a mezzo soprano or alto voice, and here the clarinette blends most perfectly, producing a duet that more artistic than the flute-and-voice, and trumpet-and-voice combinations which Handel inaugurated.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Daily Globe.
MONDAY, JAN. 6, 1896.

PADEREWSKI PLAYS.

This Time for the Benefit of a Former Member of the Symphony Orchestra—Enormous Audience and Large Receipts.

The concert given last evening, in aid of the family of Mr A. Goldstein, a former member of the Boston symphony orchestra, attracted one of the largest and perhaps the most fashionable audience ever assembled in the Boston theater on a Sunday evening. Every seat was occupied and all the standing room on the floor, and in the balconies was crowded, so there must have been nearly 4000 people present.

The receipts were larger than hoped for, and as the expenses were very small, all who had participated in the entertainment concert having freely volunteered their services, it is thought that Mr Goldstein's family will receive the substantial sum of $3000.

Aside from the satisfaction afforded by contributing to a worthy cause, the audience was well repaid for attending the concert by the excellence of the program. Paderewski was naturally the chief attraction, and the announcement of his appearance alone would no doubt have been sufficient to crowd the theater. It was exceedingly kind of the distinguished pianist to volunteer his services, and his generosity cannot be too heartily praised.

It was at considerable personal inconvenience that he was enabled to play here last evening, for it necessitated his travelling two nights on the railroad. He arrived yesterday morning, having left New York, after his concert there Saturday night, and was obliged to leave Boston on the midnight train, so as to fill his engagement in Syracuse this evening.

Every number of last evening's program was thoroughly enjoyable, and received enthusiastic applause from the appreciative audience. Mr G. Campanari had expected to be the vocal soloist, but was obliged to sing at a concert in New York, so Miss Gertrude Franklin kindly consented to appear. Mr Paur and all the members of the Symphony orchestra contributed their services.

The program was as follows:

Beethoven,
Overture to Leonore, No. 3, in C major, op 72
Gounod .....Ave Maria
(Violin obligato by Mr T. Adamowski.)
Miss Franklin.
Paderewski .....Fantasie polonaise, op 19
Mr Paderewski.
Lalo .....Suite, Namouna
Gounod .....Repentir
Miss Franklin.
Franz Liszt .....Hungarian rhapsody No. 2
(Scored by Karl Muller-Berghaus.)
Rossini .....Overture, William Tell

Mr Paderewski so recently played his Fantasie Polonaise here that it is unnecessary at this time to again comment upon the brilliancy of the composition or reiterate praises of its superb interpretation. A second hearing of the work increases one's admiration for its manifold beauties. It is not exactly the sort of a composition that would appeal very strongly to the average Sunday evening assemblage, but yesterday's audience was no ordinary gathering, and there was no doubt about the polonaise and its performance being thoroughly appreciated. Mr Paderewski was applauded with the wildest enthusiasm, and after he had returned and bowed his acknowledgments half a dozen times, he played Liszt's arrangement of Schubert's song, "Hark! Hark! the Lark," and played it exquisitely.

Miss Franklin's singing of the "Ave Maria" was thoroughly artistic and enjoyable, and scarcely less delightful was her interpretation of the "Repentir." Both selections were cordially applauded.

Regarding the playing of the orchestra under Mr Paur's direction, it is only necessary to state that each selection was played as it only could be played by this incomparable band. The audience seemed to enjoy the Lalo suite, "Namouna," more than any other number, and it certainly was superbly played.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIX., NO. 6.
MONDAY, JAN. 6, 1896.

THE GOLDSTEIN CONCERT.

The grand concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in the Boston Theatre, last evening, in aid of the family of Mr. A. Goldstein, a former member of that organization, brought out a remarkably brilliant and fashionable audience. Every seat in the house was occupied, and, on the lower floor, all the available standing room. The receipts were something over $3000, and a handsome sum, therefore, will go to the cause for which the entertainment was given. Mr. Goldstein was the principal contrabassist of the orchestra from its formation up to the time when the distressing malady that overtook him rendered him incapable of pursuing his professional duties, and made his removal to an insane asylum imperative. He was an excellent musician, and a masterly performer on the instrument to which he devoted his talents. His disease is incurable, and he will pass the rest of his days in confinement. His family being left without support, his late comrades took this method to come to his assistance, and with the gratifying results named.

Mr. Paderewski and Miss Gertrude Franklin assisted, the latter kindly replacing Mr. G. Campanari, who was to have appeared, but whose duties at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York prevented his coming hither. Mr. Paderewski played his Fantasie Polonaise. The reception accorded him, it is hardly necessary to add, was enthusiastic, and his playing was, as usual, rewarded with a tempest of applause. Not only this, but he was recalled so persistently, and the demand for more was so unmistakable and irresistible, that he responded first with the Liszt transcription of Schubert's "Hark, the Lark," and then with a Chopin waltz.

Miss Franklin, who was also cordially received, sang Gounod's "Ave Maria" and "Repentir," by the same composer, in her familiar artistic and masterly manner, and was vigorously applauded and recalled after each effort. The orchestra played Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3, Lalo's "Namouna" suite, the Berghaus arrangement of Liszt's Rhapsodie Hongroise No. 2 and Rossini's "William Tell" overture, under the direction of Mr. Paur, whose welcome was of the heartiest.

The occasion was a notable and gratifying success in every way.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, JANUARY 6, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the tenth symphony concert, last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Dvorak: Symphony No. 2, in D minor, opus 70.
Mozart: Aria, "Parto, parto," from "La Clemenza di Tito."
(Clarinet obbligato by Mr. Léon Pourtau.)
Lalo: Orchestral suite, "Namouna."
(First time.)
Meyerbeer: Arioso, "Ah! mon fils," from "Le Prophète."
Bizet: Overture, "Patrie!" opus 19.
(First time.)
Miss Rosa Olitzka was the singer.

Dverak's second symphony grows upon one at every fresh hearing. There is, perhaps, nothing in it which quite equals the wonderful exordium of his first, in D major, for originality and brilliancy; but, taken as a whole, it is decidedly the superior work of the two. The excellence of the writing in it, its general stoutness of construction, struck us forcibly even at the first hearing here, several years ago; but we were then far enough from suspecting the real wealth of musical invention it contained, and the genuine depth and beauty of the sentiment shown in it. At first, it reminded us of so many other composers, especially of Weber, in several parts of the last movement, that we could not accept it as reflecting any single, distinct musical individuality. Indeed, as is often apt to be the case with what seems to be an imitation, a good deal of it struck us as rather trivial and merely skin-deep in feeling. But closer acquaintance now reveals the work to us as essentially a complete, well-rounded, and individual whole; what once appeared like triviality and commonplace seems so no longer; we now fully feel the nobility, beauty, and admirable quality of the composition. We are now inclined to rank it very close behind the Brahms symphonies. The performance last Saturday evening was excellent to a high degree: clear, full of fire and expression, beautiful in tone-quality, and admirable in its total impression.

The two new French things—Lalo's "Namouna" and Bizet's "Patrie!"—made quite different impressions upon us, in one way, though both gave rise to much the same reflections, in another. What a wonderful sense of color these Frenchmen have! How never-sleeping and pervasive is their sense for brilliancy and elegance! And yet, comparing the best of them with the best contemporary Germans and Czechs, how lacking they seem in depth, Gemüth, and truly poetic sense! Lalo and Bizet, for instance, find no true correlatives in German music; the appeal they make to you is far and away higher and more distinguished than that made, say, by Richard Strauss or Humperdinck; but they do not begin to rise to the level of Brahms or Dvorak. The place they fill in the art of music can be better compared to that filled in the art of painting by some famous Germans, by Makart and some of his best followers; whereas the French correlatives of Brahms and Dvorak are found in painters like Millet or Corot, not among French musicians.

The five movements of Lalo's "Namouna" are delightful to listen to; the music is ingenious, by no means without beauty, full of gorgeous and delicate color, replete with genially picturesque suggestion. But we could not find a measure in the whole work to make the heart beat faster, not a phrase that pierced beyond the flattered and caressed ear. To say that the thing was originally a ballet, is not adequately to excuse this. There is an Adagio and [illegible] though

---

HOME JOURNAL
A PAPER OF TO-DAY
SATURDAY, JAN. 11, 1896.

THE Goldstein benefit last Sunday evening under the auspices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a complete success, not only musically, but, what is almost more important in the present instance, financially. The programme offered was of great interest, and its interpretation was to the evident satisfaction of its hearers. There was naturally some regret at the non-appearance of Campanari, the artist's services being required in New York, but the superb playing of Paderewski, the admirable work of the orchestra and the very able singing of Miss Franklin went far toward dulling the edge of disappointment.

"Prometheus" which used to be played time and again here in Boston, that, ballet-music though it be, scales the topmost heights of soulful beauty as well as any movement from a symphony. That the French really have true depth of sentiment is unquestionable; their painters have more than proved it. But, to give this depth of sentiment adequate musical expression seems, upon the whole, to have been denied them.

Bizet's "Patrie!" thoroughly disappointed us. In point of form, it does not rise far above a potpourri, and in character it is too often merely trivial. Both suite and overture were admirably played.

It is long since Mozart's "Parto, parto" used to be familiar here—in the days when Adelaide Phillips and Addie Ryan sang it. It is perhaps one of the best of the composer's show-arias. If its revival last Saturday gave us pleasure, it was due to the music itself and to Mr. Pourtau's exquisite playing of the clarinet obbligato. Miss Olitzka's singing did little for it. Neither did her singing of Meyerbeer's very different "Ah! mon fils" in any way satisfy us. she has a contralto voice which is not devoid of beauty; but she uses it not well. She sings with a certain outspokenness of expression, which, however, seems all too like expression from the teeth outward, with a soulless vacuum behind it. Her pronunciation is indistinct and faulty; "Eh! mon fils," or "Euh! mon fils," for "Ah! mon fils," etc.

The next programme is: Tschaikowski, symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique," opus 74 (second time); Max Bruch, "Scotch" fantasy for violin and orchestra; Margaret Ruthven Lang, aria, "Armida," opus 24 (first time); Berlioz, overture to "Le Corsaire," opus 21 (first time). Miss Gertrude Franklin will be the singer, and Mr. T. Adamowski, the violinist.

Boston Theatre: The Goldstein Benefit.

The concert given in the Boston Theatre last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by Miss Gertrude Franklin and Mr. I. J. Paderewski, for the benefit of Mr. E. Goldstein, was a grand success both musically and financially. The programme was as follows:

Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, opus 72.
Gounod: "Ave Maria" on Bach's first prelude.
(Violin obbligato by Mr. T. Adamowski.)
Miss Franklin.
Paderewski: Fantaisie polonaise for pianoforte and orchestra, opus 19.
Mr. Paderewski.
Lalo: Orchestral suite, "Namouna."
Gounod: "Repentir."
Miss Franklin.
Lisst: Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2.
(Scored for orchestra by Müller-Berghaus.)
Rossini: Overture to "Guillaume Tell."

It was no small matter for Paderewski to come on for the concert; he played in New York on Saturday night, and plays in Syracuse tonight, so the trip meant two consecutive nights in sleeping cars for him. It was a grand thing to hear him play his Polish fantasia once more. To be sure, the parquet of the Boston Theatre is no particularly good place to hear either pianoforte or orchestra from, when the latter are on the stage the pianoforte sounds pretty dull and lifeless, and the orchestra seems reduced, for the moment, to its first and second violins. But one can enjoy Paderewski, even under these disadvantages; his playing was superb at every point, and the Fantasia itself gains on closer acquaintance. Paderewski was rapturously applauded, and the calls for more were so persistent that he had to return twice to his task, playing Liszt's transcription of Schubert's "Hark! the "Lark" and Chopin's A-flat waltz, in his own inimitable way.

Mr. Guiseppe Campanari was to have sung; but Messrs. Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau suddenly found that they needed him in New York, and he was forced to yield to circumstances. His place was taken at short notice by Miss Gertrude Franklin, who sang Gounod's favorite "Ave Maria" and "Repentir" admirably, Mr. T. Adamowski playing the violin solo in the former with great beauty of expression.

The orchestra, under Mr. Paur's baton, did splendidly; the Liszt Rhapsody and the "Tell" overture were especially warmly applauded by the huge audience. The house was packed to overflowing, and there can be no doubt that a goodly sum was realized for the beneficiary and his family.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 6, 1896.

The Symphony Concert of Saturday--Clangor and Sensation.

The concert of Saturday (the 723d of the Boston series)' was as full of clangor and sensation as its predecessor had been of tranquility and classicism. Mr. Paur must have taken a lesson from the guest of the Bowery restaurant who requested that the hairs and the butter be served on separate plates. The programme began with Dvorak's second symphony. This work scarcely represents the best school of this composer; in it Dvorak seems to endeavor to become abstruse and achieves dulness rather than profundity. It is as if he were trying on the mantle of Brahms and found it rather a loose fit. The symphony plunges into a strange path even from its very first figure, and the entire first movement, although its shape is quite correct and according to classical rule, seems disjointed and heterogeneous.

The Scherzo is probably the clearest bit of the symphony, and Mr. Paur brought out its swingy character in an excellent manner. The influence of folk-music is apparent in almost every part of the symphony, spite of the involved character of some of the treatment. The finale was very finely played. It is characteristic and powerful, the best movement of the whole work. It was given with an analytical clearness that brought its different themes and contrasts into bold relief, and the sinister theme with its baleful augmented second, very like "Telramund's Curse-motif" in "Lohengrin," was especially effective.

Now followed the soloist of the concert, Miss Rosa Olitzka, who sang Mozart's seldom heard "Parto, Parto," from "La Clemenza di Tito." She did not sing it well, possibly from nervousness, for her voice had a tremolo that sometimes almost obliterated the pitch, there seemed to be considerable insecurity of intonation, and the portamento was pushed to the verge of vocal tobogganing. Nevertheless, the artist was recalled three times, received floral tributes, and sang much better in "Ah! Mon Fils" (which she gave in French), a song more adapted to her expressive and dramatic manner than the first number. Miss Olitzka seems out of her element in the concert-room, and judging by the fervor displayed in the Meyerbeer number, needs the adjuncts of footlights, costumes, and dramatic action. Even in the second number the portamento was decidedly overused and became a glissando.

Lalo's suite entitled "Namouna" was a number full of interest, just such a novelty as we need occasionally upon our programmes irrespective of its merits or defects, to show what is being done by the moderns in the various schools of composition. Without the explicit statement that "Namouna" is a series of excerpts from a ballet, the suite would be almost unintelligible, for its begins with a prelude that is sufficient to usher in the Fates and it ends with a musical circus. It is scored in better fashion than any ballets that we know of except certain parts if Rubinstein's "Feramors" or "The Demon."

The scoring sometimes suggests Wagner, sometimes Goldmark, and calls for heavier forces than any except the greatest works. Two harps were used and were most necessary in certain parts of the suite, but of course the ophicleide could not be furnished in America and the bass tuba took its place, although the latter has not quite the rancous tone-color of the instrument with the Greek name.

The first movement of the suite was a noble glow of tone-color, and the constant reiteration of the harp-figures made an effective kind of pedal-point that we do not often hear.

The second movement, a very short one, was a "Serenade," and presented scale-progressions as wierd as those used by Brahms in the slow movement of his fourth symphony. Its short and direct melody and the simple effect produced by the pizzicati of strings and the accompaniment of the harps could not fail to please the audience, and the movement won much applause.

There was the most brilliant orchestration in the variations which constituted the next movement, but no really sustained thought or continuity such as one expects in these days when variation has become thematic development.

The two last movements (which merge into one) constituted the circus aforesaid. The performance was something superb (bravo! Mr. Paur and orchestra), the scoring as spicy as if Lalo had emptied the entire pepper-box into this portion of the work, but again the thoughts, per se, were weak and spasmodic. Cornet double-tongueing, a snappy rhythm that caused feet to tap and heads to wag, a couple of thundering climaxes, and that was all. One must, however, not censure Lalo too greatly for this, but remember that the work was written under exceptional pressure and with necessary haste. Yet with even this excuse made, it may be charged against the modern French school that its development of ideas has not kept pace with its progress in orchestration; Berlioz led the way to the latter, but when will some great French composer arise to lead these skilful scorers towards a laying out of work on broader lines? The French composers of the present epoch give us a succession of little pictures, never a broad canvas with appropriate coherency.

The overture by Bizet, entitled "Patrie," is something unworthy of his fame and it came at the wrong time, too, for it is a work brimful of noise and fury, and coming after the excitement of Lalo it had the nature of an anti-climax. Again there was presented to the auditor brilliant orchestration in lieu of ideas, and this from the composer who had more ideas in his usual compositions than any other Frenchman of them all! In this overture we have so distinct a [illegible] of Berlioz that it amounts to plagiarism, it is simply the idea of the "Rakoczy March" as treated in "The Damnation of Faust," repeated in almost every detail, with a gentler episode thrown in as counterpoise. Yet even in this unworthy and unoriginal pasticcio one could occasionally get a glimpse of genius as, for example, in the central portion of the work, just before the return of the rather tawdry march-theme. Such a work, however weak it may be, has a certain right upon the Boston Symphony programmes, for Bizet is great enough that we should know all that he has done in the large forms, and to watch him copying Berlioz is not uninteresting; but the work came at decidedly the wrong moment, and either "Nomouna" or "Patrie" should have been kept waiting for a more fitting opportunity, and the two compositions should not have been suffered to neutralize each other.

The reviewer had almost forgotten to mention the excellent clarinette obligato to the Mozart aria, which was played by M. Pourtau; it was of course most artistically done, and called to mind the fact that Mozart was the first composer to really appreciate the clarinette. Handel, the great experimenter in early orchestration, used the simple clarinette of his time (then called Shawm) once only, and then gave it up as a poor instrument, but Mozart in his latest years was continually giving this instrument a post of prominence, although even he did not realize all its possibilities, and the spectral tone-color of its deepest register was first properly employed by Weber in the incantation scene of "Der Freischuetz," and by Mendelssohn in the Scotch symphony. As a supporting instrument against the voice the clarinette has some advantages over the flute, for its middle register comes nearer to the tone-color of the human voice than the flute does. Especially is this the case with a mezzo soprano or alto voice, and here the clarinette blends most perfectly, producing a duet that more artistic than the flute-and-voice, and trumpet-and-voice combinations which Handel inaugurated.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Daily Globe.
MONDAY, JAN. 6, 1896.

PADEREWSKI PLAYS.

This Time for the Benefit of a Former Member of the Symphony Orchestra —Enormous Audience and Large Receipts.

The concert given last evening, in aid of the family of Mr A. Goldstein, a former member of the Boston symphony orchestra, attracted one of the largest and perhaps the most fashionable audience ever assembled in the Boston theater on a Sunday evening. Every seat was occupied and all the standing room on the floor, and in the balconies was crowded, so there must have been nearly 4000 people present.

The receipts were larger than hoped for, and as the expenses were very small, all who had participated in the entertainment concert having freely volunteered their services, it is thought that Mr Goldstein's family will receive the substantial sum of $3000.

Aside from the satisfaction afforded by contributing to a worthy cause, the audience was well repaid for attending the concert by the excellence of the program. Paderewski was naturally the chief attraction, and the announcement of his appearance alone would no doubt have been sufficient to crowd the theater. It was exceedingly kind of the distinguished pianist to volunteer his services, and his generosity cannot be too heartily praised.

It was at considerable personal inconvenience that he was enabled to play here last evening, for it necessitated his travelling two nights on the railroad. He arrived yesterday morning, having left New York, after his concert there Saturday night, and was obliged to leave Boston on the midnight train, so as to fill his engagement in Syracuse this evening.

Every number of last evening's program was thoroughly enjoyable, and received enthusiastic applause from the appreciative audience. Mr G. Campanari had expected to be the vocal soloist, but was obliged to sing at a concert in New York, so Miss Gertrude Franklin kindly consented to appear. Mr Paur and all the members of the Symphony orchestra contributed their services.

The program was as follows:

Beethoven,
Overture to Leonore, No. 3, in C major, op 72
Gounod .....Ave Maria
(Violin obligato by Mr T. Adamowski.)
Miss Franklin.
Paderewski .....Fantasie polonaise, op 19
Mr Paderewski.
Lalo .....Suite, Namouna
Gounod .....Repentir
Miss Franklin.
Franz Liszt .....Hungarian rhapsody No. 2
(Scored by Karl Muller-Berghaus.)
Rossini .....Overture, William Tell

Mr Paderewski so recently played his Fantasie Polonaise here that it is unnecessary at this time to again comment upon the brilliancy of the composition or reiterate praises of its superb interpretation. A second hearing of the work increases one's admiration for its manifold beauties. It is not exactly the sort of a composition that would appeal very strongly to the average Sunday evening assemblage, but yesterday's audience was no ordinary gathering, and there was no doubt about the polonaise and its performance being thoroughly appreciated. Mr Paderewski was applauded with the wildest enthusiasm, and after he had returned and bowed his acknowledgments half a dozen times, he played Liszt's arrangement of Schubert's song, "Hark! Hark! the Lark," and played it exquisitely.

Miss Franklin's singing of the "Ave Maria" was thoroughly artistic and enjoyable, and scarcely less delightful was her interpretation of the "Repentir." Both selections were cordially applauded.

Regarding the playing of the orchestra under Mr Paur's direction, it is only necessary to state that each selection was played as it only could be played by this incomparable band. The audience seemed to enjoy the Lalo suite, "Namouna," more than any other number, and it certainly was superbly played.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIX., NO. 6.
MONDAY, JAN. 6, 1896.

THE GOLDSTEIN CONCERT.

The grand concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in the Boston Theatre, last evening, in aid of the family of Mr. A. Goldstein, a former member of that organization, brought out a remarkably brilliant and fashionable audience. Every seat in the house was occupied, and, on the lower floor, all the available standing room. The receipts were something over $3000, and a handsome sum, therefore, will go to the cause for which the entertainment was given. Mr. Goldstein was the principal contrabassist of the orchestra from its formation up to the time when the distressing malady that overtook him rendered him incapable of pursuing his professional duties, and made his removal to an insane asylum imperative. He was an excellent musician, and a masterly performer on the instrument to which he devoted his talents. His disease is incurable, and he will pass the rest of his days in confinement. His family being left without support, his late comrades took this method to come to his assistance, and with the gratifying results named.

Mr. Paderewski and Miss Gertrude Franklin assisted, the latter kindly replacing Mr. G. Campanari, who was to have appeared, but whose duties at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York prevented his coming hither. Mr. Paderewski played his Fantasie Polonaise. The reception accorded him, it is hardly necessary to add, was enthusiastic, and his playing was, as usual, rewarded with a tempest of applause. Not only this, but he was recalled so persistently and the demand for more was so unmistakable and irresistible, that he responded first with the Liszt transcription of Schubert's "Hark, the Lark," and then with a Chopin waltz.

Miss Franklin, who was also cordially received, sang Gounod's "Ave Maria" and "Repentis," by the same composer, in her familiar artistic and masterly manner, and was vigorously applauded and recalled after each effort. The orchestra played Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3, Lalo's "Namouna" suite, the Berghaus arrangement of Liszt's Rhapsodie Hongroise No. 2 and Rossini's "William Tell" overture, under the direction of Mr. Paur, whose welcome was of the heartiest.

The occasion was a notable and gratifying success in every way.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, JANUARY 6, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the tenth symphony concert, last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Dvorak: Symphony No. 2, in D minor, opus 70.
Mozart: Aria, "Parto, parto," from "La Clemenza di Tito."
(Clarinet obbligato by Mr. Léon Pourtau.)
Lalo: Orchestral suite, "Namouna."
(First time.)
Meyerbeer: Arioso, "Ah! mon fils," from "Le Prophète."
Bizet: Overture, "Patrie!" opus 19.
(First time.)
Miss Rosa Olitzka was the singer.

Dvorak's second symphony grows upon one at every fresh hearing. There is, perhaps, nothing in it which quite equals the wonderful exordium of his first, in D major, for originality and brilliancy; but, taken as a whole, it is decidedly the superior work of the two. The excellence of the writing in it, its general stoutness of construction, struck us forcibly even at the first hearing here, several years ago; but we were then far enough from suspecting the real wealth of musical invention it contained, and the genuine depth and beauty of the sentiment shown in it. At first, it reminded us of so many other composers, especially of Weber, in several parts of the last movement, that we could not accept it as reflecting any single, distinct musical individuality. Indeed, as is often apt to be the case with what seems to be an imitation, a good deal of it struck us as rather trivial and merely skin-deep in feeling. But closer acquaintance now reveals the work to us as essentially a complete, well-rounded, and individual whole; what once appeared like triviality and commonplace seems so no longer; we now fully feel the nobility, beauty, and admirable quality of the composition. We are now inclined to rank it very close behind the Brahms symphonies. The performance last Saturday evening was excellent to a high degree: clear, full of fire and expression, beautiful in tone-quality, and admirable in its total impression.

The two new French things—Lalo's "Namouna" and Bizet's "Patrie!"—made quite different impressions upon us, in one way, though both gave rise to much the same reflections, in another. What a wonderful sense of color these Frenchmen have! How never-sleeping and pervasive is their sense for brilliancy and elegance! And yet, comparing the best of them with the best contemporary Germans and Czechs, how lacking they seem in depth, Gemüth, and truly poetic sense! Lalo and Bizet, for instance, find no true correlatives in German music; the appeal they make to you is far and away higher and more distinguished than that made, say, by Richard Strauss or Humperdinck; but they do not begin to rise to the level of Brahms or Dvorak. The place they fill in the art of music can be better compared to that filled in the art of painting by some famous Germans, by Makart and some of his best followers; whereas the French correlatives of Brahms and Dvorak are found in painters like Millet or Corot, not among French musicians.

The five movements of Lalo's "Namouna" are delightful to listen to; the music is ingenious, by no means without beauty, full of gorgeous and delicate color, replete with genially picturesque suggestion. But we could not find a measure in the whole work to make the heart beat faster, not a phrase that pierced beyond the flattered and caressed ear. To say that the thing was originally a ballet, is not adequately to excuse this. There is an Adagio and [illegible] Beethoven's "Prometheus" which used to be played time and again here in Boston, that, ballet-music though it be, scales the topmost heights of soulful beauty as well as any movement from a symphony. That the French really have true depth of sentiment is unquestionable; their painters have more than proved it. But, to give this depth of sentiment adequate musical expression seems, upon the whole, to have been denied them.

Bizet's "Patrie!" thoroughly disappointed us. In point of form, it does not rise far above a potpourri, and in character it is too often merely trivial. Both suite and overture were admirably played.

It is long since Mozart's "Parto, parto" used to be familiar here—in the days when Adelaide Phillips and Addie Ryan sang it. It is perhaps one of the best of the composer's show-arias. If its revival last Saturday gave us pleasure, it was due to the music itself and to Mr. Pourtau's exquisite playing of the clarinet obbligato. Miss Olitzka's singing did little for it. Neither did her singing of Meyerbeer's very different "Ah! mon fils" in any way satisfy us. she has a contralto voice which is not devoid of beauty; but she uses it not well. She sings with a certain outspokenness of expression, which, however, seems all too like expression from the teeth outward, with a soulless vacuum behind it. Her pronunciation is indistinct and faulty; "Eh! mon fils," or "Euh! mon fils," for "Ah! mon fils," etc.

The next programme is: Tschaikowski, symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique," opus 74 (second time); Max Bruch, "Scotch" fantasy for violin and orchestra; Margaret Ruthven Lang, aria, "Armida," opus 24 (first time); Berlioz, overture to "Le Corsaire," opus 21 (first time). Miss Gertrude Franklin will be the singer, and Mr. T. Adamowski, the violinist.

Boston Theatre: The Goldstein Benefit.

The concert given in the Boston Theatre last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by Miss Gertrude Franklin and Mr. I. J. Paderewski, for the benefit of Mr. E. Goldstein, was a grand success both musically and financially. The programme was as follows:

Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, opus 72.
Gounod: "Ave Maria" on Bach's first prelude.
(Violin obbligato by Mr. T. Adamowski.)
Miss Franklin.
Paderewski: Fantaisie polonaise for pianoforte and orchestra, opus 19.
Mr. Paderewski.
Lalo: Orchestral suite, "Namouna."
Gounod: "Repentir."
Miss Franklin.
Liszt: Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2.
(Scored for orchestra by Müller-Berghaus.)
Rossini: Overture to "Guillaume Tell."

It was no small matter for Paderewski to come on for the concert; he played in New York on Saturday night, and plays in Syracuse tonight, so the trip meant two consecutive nights in sleeping cars for him. It was a grand thing to hear him play his Polish fantasia once more. To be sure, the parquet of the Boston Theatre is no particularly good place to hear either pianoforte or orchestra from, when the latter are on the stage the pianoforte sounds pretty dull and lifeless, and the orchestra seems reduced, for the moment, to its first and second violins. But one can enjoy Paderewski, even under these disadvantages; his playing was superb at every point, and the Fantasia itself gains on closer acquaintance. Paderewski was rapturously applauded, and the calls for more were so persistent that he had to return twice to his task, playing Liszt's transcription of Schubert's "Hark! the Lark" and Chopin's A-flat waltz, in his own inimitable way.

Mr. Guiseppe Campanari was to have sung; but Messrs. Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau suddenly found that they needed him in New York, and he was forced to yield to circumstances. His place was taken at short notice by Miss Gertrude Franklin, who sang Gounod's favorite "Ave Maria" and "Repentir" admirably, Mr. T. Adamowski playing the violin solo in the former with great beauty of expression.

The orchestra, under Mr. Paur's baton, did splendidly; the Liszt Rhapsody and the "Tell" overture were especially warmly applauded by the huge audience. The house was packed to overflowing, and there can be no doubt that a goodly sum was realized for the beneficiary and his family.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL
A PAPER OF TO-DAY
SATURDAY, JAN. 11, 1896.

THE Goldstein benefit last Sunday evening under the auspices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a complete success, not only musically, but, what is almost more important in the present instance, financially. The programme offered was of great interest, and its interpretation was to the evident satisfaction of its hearers. There was naturally some regret at the non-appearance of Campanari, the artist's services being required in New York, but the superb playing of Paderewski, the admirable work of the orchestra and the very able singing of Miss Franklin went far toward dulling the edge of disappointment.

[73]

...DAY, JANUARY 9, 1896.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Rafael Joseffy, the Noted Pianist, the Soloist.

The third Symphony concert was given last evening in Infantry Hall. There was an unusually large audience, and much enthusiasm was displayed over the reappearance on the concert platform of Mr. Rafael Joseffy, the noted pianist. Not many years ago he stood pre-eminent among players by verdict of both public and the critics. For some reason he chose to retire temporarily while at the very zenith of his popularity, much to the regret of his many admirers. The warmth of his reception last night showed plainly the general pleasure felt in his resumption of professional work, as well as the formal compliment to his actual performance.

The programme was exclusively "modern" in its make-up, and its order was as follows:

Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Op. 98.....
.....Johannes Brahms
I. Allegro non troppo (E minor).
II. Andante moderato (E major).
III. Allegro giocoso (C major).
IV. Chaconne. Allegro energico e passionato (E minor).

Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, No. 2, in A major.....Franz Liszt
I. Adagio sostenuto assai (A major).
II. L'istesso tempo (D minor)
III. Allegro agitato assai (B-flat minor).
IV. Allegro moderato (E major and D-flat major, C).
V. Allegro deciso (D-flat major; i. e., C-sharp major).
VI. Marziale (A major).
VII. Stretto (A major, C).

Suite, "Namouna".....Edouard Lalo
I. Prelude: Andante (G major).
II. Serenade: Allegro (D minor).
III. Theme with Variations; Andante (E major).
IV. a. Market-Day Shows: Allegro vivace (G minor).
b. Market-Day Festival: Presto (E-flat major).

Not only is this a programme of modern composers, but the music itself is, in the broadest sense, a product of modern environment. Music is the most plastic of the arts, and reflects most accurately the life of its period, whether written by composers of towering genius or those of lesser gifts. The music of the modern school is distinguished not only by its freedom from the more strictly scholastic forms of a bygone century, but also by its character and suggestiveness. It is typical of the broader and more complex life of the present day; it shows not only the universal relaxing of the bonds of convention and the authority of tradition, but also the spirit of unrest, the kaleidoscopic changes that mark the life of to-day. Then, too, it marks the different attunement of the modern ear. No longer do we find pleasure in hearing the simpler combinations of sound which were sufficient for our fathers. Our auditory nerves demand a stronger fillip—more startling contrasts, more noise, more discords, more everything.

No better illustration of this is needed than the music of last night's concert. The E-minor symphony of Brahms's is a work which would have been simply impossible to Beethoven or any of his predecessors. Yet Brahms has been called the last of the classical composers. But, though he betrays some preference for classical forms of construction, the matter of his compositions is as distinctively modern as either of his companions on last evening's programme. This fourth symphony is by no means a work of evenly sustained interest; it gives us Brahms at his best, and also—if not at his worst—on a plane far removed from best. The first two movements are of great beauty and surpassing interest, the first with its rich harmony and masterly instrumentation, the second with its striking originality and beautiful contrast. But the other movements betray symptoms of the turgidity which characterize so much of Brahms's writing. There are times when we are put in a position toward this great genius like that of the heathen toward his idol—we are positive that he is ugly, though we believe that he is great. The final movement is, unfortunately, the weakest of the four, and the work which starts out with so much promise and presents so much of beauty, comes to an inglorious conclusion.

If Brahm's work is dintinctly modern in tone, what can be said of Lalo's suite, which ended the programme? Here is richness, extravagance, profusion run wild. There are no greys or browns on Lalo's palette; everything is glaring white, vivid scarlet, royal purple, or an indescribable mixture, as though the colors had been thrown at the canvas rather than laid on by design. The suite is a series of tone pictures that dazzle and astound on a first hearing, and leave one in doubt as to their abiding musical worth.

The concerto by Liszt, which Mr. Joseffy chose for his number, is well fitted to display his delicate touch and finished style. There is little in the piano part of the rugged and virile character which are usually found in Liszt's works. It was magnificently played by both soloist and orchestra. The applause was stormy and prolonged, Mr. Joseffy being recalled five times.

The large audience showed appreciation of the fine work done by the orchestra throughout the evening. There was the usual crop of late comers, people walking to their seats during the opening of both the first numbers. A few ladies had the courage to appear without headdress, in accordance with suggestions that have been made by those who like to see as well as hear. The fourth concert will be given on Wednesday evening, Feb. 12.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 9, 1896.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Rafael Joseffy, the Noted Pianist, the Soloist.

The third Symphony concert was given last evening in Infantry Hall. There was an unusually large audience, and much enthusiasm was displayed over the reappearance on the concert platform of Mr. Rafael Joseffy, the noted pianist. Not many years ago he stood pre-eminent among players by verdict of both public and the critics. For some reason he chose to retire temporarily while at the very zenith of his popularity, much to the regret of his many admirers. The warmth of his reception last night showed plainly the general pleasure felt in his resumption of professional work, as well as the formal compliment to his actual performance.

The programme was exclusively "modern" in its make-up, and its order was as follows:

Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Op. 98.....
.....Johannes Brahms
I. Allegro non troppo (E minor).
II. Andante moderato (E major).
III. Allegro giocoso (C major).
IV. Chaconne. Allegro energico e passionato (E minor).

Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, No. 2, in A major.....Franz Liszt
I. Adagio sostenuto assai (A major).
II. L'istesso tempo (D minor)
III. Allegro agitato assai (B-flat minor).
IV. Allegro moderato (E major and D-flat major, C).
V. Allegro deciso (D-flat major; i. e., C-sharp major).
VI. Marziale (A major).
VII. Stretto (A major, C).

Suite, "Namouna".....Edouard Lalo
I. Prelude: Andante (G major).
II. Serenade: Allegro (D minor).
III. Theme with Variations: Andante (E major).
IV. a. Market-Day Shows: Allegro vivace (G minor).
b. Market-Day Festival: Presto (E-flat major).

Not only is this a programme of modern composers, but the music itself is, in the broadest sense, a product of modern environment. Music is the most plastic of the arts, and reflects most accurately the life of its period, whether written by composers of towering genius or those of lesser gifts. The music of the modern school is distinguished not only by its freedom from the more strictly scholastic forms of a bygone century, but also by its character and suggestiveness. It is typical of the broader and more complex life of the present day; it shows not only the universal relaxing of the bonds of convention and the authority of tradition, but also the spirit of unrest, the kaleidoscopic changes that mark the life of to-day. Then, too, it marks the different attunement of the modern ear. No longer do we find pleasure in hearing the simpler combinations of sound which were sufficient for our fathers. Our auditory nerves demand a stronger fillip—more startling contrasts, more noise, more discords, more everything.

No better illustration of this is needed than the music of last night's concert. The E-minor symphony of Brahms's is a work which would have been simply impossible to Beethoven or any of his predecessors. Yet Brahms has been called the last of the classical composers. But, though he betrays some preference for classical forms of construction, the matter of his compositions is as distinctively modern as either of his companions on last evening's programme. This fourth symphony is by no means a work of evenly sustained interest; it gives us Brahms at his best, and also—if not at his worst—on a plane far removed from best. The first two movements are of great beauty and surpassing interest, the first with its rich harmony and masterly instrumentation, the second with its striking originality and beautiful contrast. But the other movements betray symptoms of the turgidity which characterize so much of Brahms's writing. There are times when we are put in a position toward this great genius like that of the heathen toward his idol—we are positive that he is ugly, though we believe that he is great. The final movement is, unfortunately, the weakest of the four, and the work which starts out with so much promise and presents so much of beauty, comes to an inglorious conclusion.

If Brahm's work is dintinctly modern in tone, what can be said of Lalo's suite, which ended the programme? Here is richness, extravagance, profusion run wild. There are no greys or browns on Lalo's palette; everything is glaring white, vivid scarlet, royal purple, or an indescribable mixture, as though the colors had been thrown at the canvas rather than laid on by design. The suite is a series of tone pictures that dazzle and astound on a first hearing, and leave one in doubt as to their abiding musical worth.

The concerto by Liszt, which Mr. Joseffy chose for his number, is well fitted to display his delicate touch and finished style. There is little in the piano part of the rugged and virile character which are usually found in Liszt's works. It was magnificently played by both soloist and orchestra. The applause was stormy and prolonged, Mr. Joseffy being recalled five times.

The large audience showed appreciation of the fine work done by the orchestra throughout the evening. There was the usual crop of late comers, people walking to their seats during the opening of both the first numbers. A few ladies had the courage to appear without headdress, in accordance with suggestions that have been made by those who like to see as well as hear. The fourth concert will be given on Wednesday evening, Feb. 12.

EVENING AND SUNDAY.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 9, 1896.

The Boston Symphony orchestra's concert at Infantry hall last night was in many respects the most acceptable of the series. It was one over which a large and discriminating audience grew enthusiastic, and particularly was this so with reference to the "star" of the occasion, the far-famed piano virtuoso, Rafael Joseffy. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Op. 98 ..... Johannes Brahms.
I. Allegro non troppo (E minor).
II. Andante moderato (E major).
III. Allegro giocoso (C major).
IV. Chaconne. Allegro energico e passionato (E minor).

Concerto for Pianforte and Orchestra, No. 2, in A major .....Franz Liszt.
I. Adagio sostenuto assai (A major).
II. L'istesso tempo (D minor).
III. Allegro agitato assai (B-flat minor).
IV. Allegro moderato (E major and D-flat major, C).
V. Allegro deciso (D-flat major; i. e., C-sharp major).
VI. Marziale (A major).
VII. Stretto (A major, C).

Suite, "Namouna" .....Edouard Lalo.
I. Prelude: Andante (G major).
II. Serenade: Allegro (D minor).
III. Theme with Variations: Andante (E major).
IV. (a) Market Day Shows: Allegro vivace (G minor).
(b) Market Day Festival: Presto (E-flat major).

The first movement, full of the varying graces of the master Brahms genius and faculty for peculiar effects, was performed w. hout a break of any kind. The music is not of the most uproarious or sparkling sort, but it is a great instance of originality and brilliancy in the art of composing, and it gives an orchestra valuable opportunities for superior work. While Brahms has been called "the last of the classical composers," evidences of modernness were not wanting in this product of his skill. Indeed, none of the writers associated with him on the program could be called from their creation that appeared much more modern.

The celebrated concerto by Liszt was well chosen to display the wonderful and delicate touch of Mr. Joseffy. This distinguished pianist retired some years ago, but happily for the music lovers of the country he returned to the platform, and his popularity is still undimmed. His performance was delightful, both technically and from a more popular point of view.

The closing number was superbly executed. The audience appreciated the fine work of the orchestra throughout, and liberally applauded the salient points. The fourth concert will be given on Wednesday evening, Feb. 4.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

JANUARY 12, 1896.

LAST NIGHT'S SYMPHONY.

The eleventh of the season's symphonies at Music Hall last evening was thoroughly enjoyable, the orchestra contributing two numbers never heard before, and two soloists also adding to the interest of the occasion, Miss Gertrude Franklin and Mr. T. Adamowski.

The opening number was the Tschaikowsky symphony No. 6, heard for the second time this season. It is a broadly written composition in four movements, and presents many sharp contrasts, for which the composer was noted. In general character it is rhythmic and melodic, especially the first movement. The second and third movements are particularly joyous and lively, something of the scherzo, and are in marked contrast to the last movement, which is of a funereal character, and is supposed to be Tschaikowsky's own requiem. It is solemn and majestic throughout, and finally dies away in gradually lessening pianissimo. Each movement was enthusiastically applauded, which left no doubt as to the popularity of the composition.

Mr. Adamowski was heard in the Bruch fantasia on Scotch folk melodies. The piece is by no means a novelty to music lovers, but it is always interesting, especially when the sole part is played as it was last night. Mr. Adamowski was at his best last night, and played with purity and feeling. He was given a most cordial reception, which was certainly well deserved.

Miss Franklin was heard in Miss Margaret Ruthven Lang's concert aria, "Armida," which is the most ambitious composition of Miss Lang's which has yet been heard. Miss Franklin was not fully equal to the dramatic requirements of the aria. Her voice, while having great carrying power and distinct clearness in the upper tones, lacked necessary breadth, but in spite of this, she worked up to a fitting climax and finished with a warmth and volume of tone not reached in the earlier part of the number.

Berlioz's overture, "The Corsair," finished the programme, and this was also heard for the first time. It is rather bizarre in effect, and was played at a tremendously rapid gait. The violins play a prominent part throughout, rushing hither and thither in an interesting manner, and in many parts it is written in anything but symphonic form. On the whole, it was not particularly well received, which was largely owing to the fact that the hands of the clock were close on to 10, the concert having been an unusually lengthy one.

At next week's concert the soloist will be Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who will play the Brahms concerto No. 2.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 12, 1896.

Mr. Paur began his tenth concert with the second hearing of Tschaikowsky's sixth symphony, which its author called "Pathetic" and which is just making its way to the great concert-rooms of the world, Richter having introduced it to England not so many weeks ago. It made an impression no less strong and sincere than at first; but neither performance brought the calm Boston auditor to his feet at the end of the first movement as the Liverpool listeners rose three months ago when they heard it first. That impression, however, proves the power, the splendor, the boldness, the intensity, and we might almost say the majesty which are to be felt in its graver movements, when it rises, swells, and storms as potently as any page of Wagner's which we recall on the instant—unless it be the "Siegfried" funeral march—but says more, means more and controls more than most of Wagner's climaxes, because it seems more spontaneous in passion and less contrived in the expression of it. Of course its title cannot apply to the symphony in its complete extent, because in the first movement it bursts into crashes, roles and thunders that are like very cataclysms of harmony and blending contests of voice, while in the second and third, sensibility, grace, fantasy, animation, brilliancy and even levity are important elements, But in the sombre, deep-breathing, concentrated spirit of the brief introduction dwells a warning, as it were, of tragedy unescapable though distant, tragedy which comes masterfully but pitifully in the last movement, unique in being the adagio of the symphony, instinct with mighty woe for which a whole orchestra is all too little an exponent, and sinking away at last into a tender silence which is that of a great and noble calm and not that of mere exhaustion from too much common grief.

Bruch's fantasia for violin, known as the "Scotch," but Scottish rather in its suggestiveness than in any exact reproduction of Highland melodies as themes, came next, Mr. Adamowski being the player. Dedicated to Sarasate and first played by him, its characteristics might easily be guessed by whoever has an acquaintance with composer and artist. Bruch is almost before everything else sturdy and decided, putting his ideas into direct and forcible statement; then he is eager, earnest and insistent; and finally he is fanciful, playful, ornate and almost captivating. Sarasate is a past master of the most elegant, fascinating and glittering resources of the violin, but he is also nervous, potent, fervid and strenuous. In whatsoever was graceful, persuasive, reposeful and tranquil, Mr. Adamowski did beautifully, playing with delicate tone, nice phrase and just proportion, polishing all smoothly and touching the high notes in harmonics into almost elfin sound. But the energetic passages lacked positiveness and volume, while those of bravura were often defective in intonation, as if some one string were not altogether what it should be. Yet as he made no noticeable attempt to draw any one into special obedience, the inference does not seem unfair that his own execution was responsible for the inexactitudes.

Then came a novelty—a setting by Miss Margaret Ruthven Lang for soprano voice and orchestra of a portion of Armida's lament in the fourth canto of Tasso's "Gerusalemme Liberata," an English text being used. So far as technical command of the orchestra is concerned, Miss Lang here shews an advance in appreciation of instrumental values, in clearness and equilibrium of scoring and in simplicity and straightforwardness. The voice part is well written, but it is more of a composition than an inspiration. As a study it stands well related to the text and it has apparently capabilities for effects which would closely approach, even if they did not quite touch, the dramatic. Certainly it does not suggest inexperience, hesitation or paucity of thought on its composer's part. Unfortunately it could not be judged according to its abstract and intrinsic merit, because it had been assigned to Miss Franklin, whom it quite over weighted, and who was often completely buried beneath the orchestral score, which is constantly filled with the strongest, largest and most dominant tones of those instruments which are most apt to absorb or cover down the voice of a singer. Perhaps the ideal soprano, possessing the voice of a Materna, a Lehmaun, a Titiens, or a Parepa Rosa, might rise and ride triumphant over these orchestral waves and sweep on with vehemence and passion. But Miss Franklin's means and methods are not such; so that while she sang with care and conscience, made some fine and telling notes and phrased with art, she had neither the volume, the tenacity nor the enthusiasm to bear up and bear on Miss Lang's intentions. She was unable to do justice to the fine qualities for which she is esteemed, and the force of the music drove her at times almost to a tremolo and confused with indistinctness the articulation which has been often rightly praised for its definiteness.

The concert ended with an overture by Berlioz, hitherto unheard here and called "The Corsair." Although vigorous, spirited and resonant in parts, it is not particularly interesting, and certainly it is not characteristic of its theme or its author.

The orchestra played finely throughout the concert and met promotly and surely the many unusual requirements of some of the scores.

Next week Mr. Joseffy, so long a stranger, will play Brahms's second pianoforte concerto, the other numbers being Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

HOWARD MALCOLM TICKNOR.

---

[74]

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 9, 1896.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Rafael Joseffy, the Noted Pianist, the Soloist.

The third Symphony concert was given last evening in Infantry Hall. There was an unusually large audience, and much enthusiasm was displayed over the reappearance on the concert platform of Mr. Rafael Joseffy, the noted pianist. Not many years ago he stood pre-eminent among players by verdict of both public and the critics. For some reason he chose to retire temporarily while at the very zenith of his popularity, much to the regret of his many admirers. The warmth of his reception last night showed plainly the general pleasure felt in his resumption of professional work, as well as the formal compliment to his actual performance.

The programme was exclusively "modern" in its make-up, and its order was as follows:

Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Op. 98.....Johannes Brahms
I. Allegro non troppo (E minor).
II. Andante moderato (E major).
III. Allegro giocoso (C major).
IV. Chaconne. Allegro energico e passionato (E minor).

Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, No. 2, in A major.....Franz Liszt
I. Adagio sostenuto assai (A major).
II. L'istesso tempo (D minor)
III. Allegro agitato assai (B-flat minor).
IV. Allegro moderato (E major and D-flat major, C).
V. Allegro deciso (D-flat major; i. e., C-sharp major).
VI. Marziale (A major).
VII. Stretto (A major, C).

Suite, "Namouna".....Edouard Lalo
I. Prelude: Andante (G major).
II. Serenade: Allegro (D minor).
III. Theme with Variations: Andante (E major).
IV. a. Market-Day Shows: Allegro vivace (G minor).
b. Market-Day Festival: Presto (E-flat major).

Not only is this a programme of modern composers, but the music itself is, in the broadest sense, a product of modern environment. Music is the most plastic of the arts, and reflects most accurately the life of its period, whether written by composers of towering genius or those of lesser gifts. The music of the modern school is distinguished not only by its freedom from the more strictly scholastic forms of a bygone century, but also by its character and suggestiveness. It is typical of the broader and more complex life of the present day; it shows not only the universal relaxing of the bonds of convention and the authority of tradition, but also the spirit of unrest, the kaleidoscopic changes that mark the life of to-day. Then, too, it marks the different attunement of the modern ear. No longer do we find pleasure in hearing the simpler combinations of sound which were sufficient for our fathers. Our auditory nerves demand a stronger fillip—more startling contrasts, more noise, more discords, more everything.

No better illustration of this is needed than the music of last night's concert. The E-minor symphony of Brahms's is a work which would have been simply impossible to Beethoven or any of his predecessors. Yet Brahms has been called the last of the classical composers. But, though he betrays some preference for classical forms of construction, the matter of his compositions is as distinctively modern as either of his companions on last evening's programme. This fourth symphony is by no means a work of evenly sustained interest; it gives us Brahms at his best, and also—if not at his worst—on a plane far removed from best. The first two movements are of great beauty and surpassing interest, the first with its rich harmony and masterly instrumentation, the second with its striking originality and beautiful contrast. But the other movements betray symptoms of the turgidity which characterize so much of Brahms's writing. There are times when we are put in a position toward this great genius like that of the heathen toward his idol—we are positive that he is ugly, though we believe that he is great. The final movement is, unfortunately, the weakest of the four, and the work which starts out with so much promise and presents so much of beauty, comes to an inglorious conclusion.

If Brahm's work is dintinctly modern in tone, what can be said of Lalo's suite, which ended the programme? Here is richness, extravagance, profusion run wild. There are no greys or browns on Lalo's palette; everything is glaring white, vivid scarlet, royal purple, or an indescribable mixture, as though the colors had been thrown at the canvas rather than laid on by design. The suite is a series of tone pictures that dazzle and astound on a first hearing, and leave one in doubt as to their abiding musical worth.

The concerto by Liszt, which Mr. Joseffy chose for his number, is well fitted to display his delicate touch and finished style. There is little in the piano part of the rugged and virile character which are usually found in Liszt's works. It was magnificently played by both soloist and orchestra. The applause was stormy and prolonged, Mr. Joseffy being recalled five times.

The large audience showed appreciation of the fine work done by the orchestra throughout the evening. There was the usual crop of late comers, people walking to their seats during the opening of both the first numbers. A few ladies had the courage to appear without headdress, in accordance with suggestions that have been made by those who like to see as well as hear. The fourth concert will be given on Wednesday evening, Feb. 12.

THE EVENING BULLETIN

THURSDAY, JANUARY 9, 1896.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Rafael Joseffy, the Noted Pianist, the Soloist.

The third Symphony concert was given last evening in Infantry Hall. There was an unusually large audience, and much enthusiasm was displayed over the reappearance on the concert platform of Mr. Rafael Joseffy, the noted pianist. Not many years ago he stood pre-eminent among players by verdict of both public and the critics. For some reason he chose to retire temporarily while at the very zenith of his popularity, much to the regret of his many admirers. The warmth of his reception last night showed plainly the general pleasure felt in his resumption of professional work, as well as the formal compliment to his actual performance.

The programme was exclusively "modern" in its make-up, and its order was as follows:

Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Op. 98.....Johannes Brahms
I. Allegro non troppo (E minor).
II. Andante moderato (E major).
III. Allegro giocoso (C major).
IV. Chaconne. Allegro energico e passionato (E minor).

Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, No. 2, in A major.....Franz Liszt
I. Adagio sostenuto assai (A major).
II. L'istesso tempo (D minor)
III. Allegro agitato assai (B-flat minor).
IV. Allegro moderato (E major and D-flat major, C).
V. Allegro deciso (D-flat major; i. e., C-sharp major).
VI. Marziale (A major).
VII. Stretto (A major, C).

Suite, "Namouna".....Edouard Lalo
I. Prelude: Andante (G major).
II. Serenade: Allegro (D minor).
III. Theme with Variations: Andante (E major).
IV. a. Market-Day Shows: Allegro vivace (G minor).
b. Market-Day Festival: Presto (E-flat major).

Not only is this a programme of modern composers, but the music itself is, in the broadest sense, a product of modern environment. Music is the most plastic of the arts, and reflects most accurately the life of its period, whether written by composers of towering genius or those of lesser gifts. The music of the modern school is distinguished not only by its freedom from the more strictly scholastic forms of a bygone century, but also by its character and suggestiveness. It is typical of the broader and more complex life of the present day; it shows not only the universal relaxing of the bonds of convention and the authority of tradition, but also the spirit of unrest, the kaleidoscopic changes that mark the life of to-day. Then, too, it marks the different attunement of the modern ear. No longer do we find pleasure in hearing the simpler combinations of sound which were sufficient for our fathers. Our auditory nerves demand a stronger fillip—more startling contrasts, more noise, more discords, more everything.

No better illustration of this is needed than the music of last night's concert. The E-minor symphony of Brahms's is a work which would have been simply impossible to Beethoven or any of his predecessors. Yet Brahms has been called the last of the classical composers. But, though he betrays some preference for classical forms of construction, the matter of his compositions is as distinctively modern as either of his companions on last evening's programme. This fourth symphony is by no means a work of evenly sustained interest; it gives us Brahms at his best, and also—if not at his worst—on a plane far removed from best. The first two movements are of great beauty and surpassing interest, the first with its rich harmony and masterly instrumentation, the second with its striking originality and beautiful contrast. But the other movements betray symptoms of the turgidity which characterize so much of Brahms's writing. There are times when we are put in a position toward this great genius like that of the heathen toward his idol—we are positive that he is ugly, though we believe that he is great. The final movement is, unfortunately, the weakest of the four, and the work which starts out with so much promise and presents so much of beauty, comes to an inglorious conclusion.

If Brahm's work is dintinctly modern in tone, what can be said of Lalo's suite, which ended the programme? Here is richness, extravagance, profusion run wild. There are no greys or browns on Lalo's palette; everything is glaring white, vivid scarlet, royal purple, or an indescribable mixture, as though the colors had been thrown at the canvas rather than laid on by design. The suite is a series of tone pictures that dazzle and astound on a first hearing, and leave one in doubt as to their abiding musical worth.

The concerto by Liszt, which Mr. Joseffy chose for his number, is well fitted to display his delicate touch and finished style. There is little in the piano part of the rugged and virile character which are usually found in Liszt's works. It was magnificently played by both soloist and orchestra. The applause was stormy and prolonged, Mr. Joseffy being recalled five times.

The large audience showed appreciation of the fine work done by the orchestra throughout the evening. There was the usual crop of late comers, people walking to their seats during the opening of both the first numbers. A few ladies had the courage to appear without headdress, in accordance with suggestions that have been made by those who like to see as well as hear. The fourth concert will be given on Wednesday evening, Feb. 12.

The Telegram

EVENING AND SUNDAY.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 9, 1896.

The Boston Symphony orchestra's concert at Infantry hall last night was in many respects the most acceptable of the series. It was one over which a large and discriminating audience grew enthusiastic, and particularly was this so with reference to the "star" of the occasion, the far-famed piano virtuoso, Rafael Joseffy. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Op. 98 ..... Johannes Brahms.
I. Allegro non troppo (E minor).
II. Andante moderato (E major).
III. Allegro giocoso (C major).
IV. Chaconne. Allegro energico e passionato (E minor).

Concerto for Pianforte and Orchestra, No. 2, in A major .....Franz Liszt.
I. Adagio sostenuto assai (A major).
II. L'istesso tempo (D minor).
III. Allegro agitato assai (B-flat minor).
IV. Allegro moderato (E major and D-flat major, C).
V. Allegro deciso (D-flat major; i. e., C-sharp major).
VI. Marziale (A major).
VII. Stretto (A major, C).

Suite, "Namouna".....Edouard Lalo.
I. Prelude: Andante (G major).
II. Serenade: Allegro (D minor).
III. Theme with Variations: Andante (E major).
IV. (a) Market Day Shows: Allegro vivace (G minor).
(b) Market Day Festival: Presto (E-flat major).

The first movement, full of the varying braces of the master Brahms genius and faculty for peculiar effects, was performed w. hout a break of any kind. The music is not of the most uproarious or sparkling sort, but it is a great instance of originality and brilliancy in the art of composing, and it gives an orchestra valuable opportunities for superior work. While Brahms has been called "the last of the classical composers," evidences of modernness were not wanting in this product of his skill. Indeed, none of the writers associated with him on the program could be called from their creation that appeared much more modern.

The celebrated concerto by Liszt was well chosen to display the wonderful and delicate touch of Mr. Joseffy. This distinguished pianist retired some years ago, but happily for the music lovers of the country he returned to the platform, and his popularity is still undimmed. His performance was delightful, both technically and from a more popular point of view.

The closing number was superbly executed. The audience appreciated the fine work of the orchestra throughout, and liberally applauded the salient points. The fourth concert will be given on Wednesday evening, Feb. 4.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

JANUARY 12, 1896.

LAST NIGHT'S SYMPHONY.

The eleventh of the season's symphonies at Music Hall last evening was thoroughly enjoyable, the orchestra contributing two numbers never heard before, and two soloists also adding to the interest of the occasion, Miss Gertrude Franklin and Mr. T. Adamowski.

The opening number was the Tschaikowsky symphony No. 6, heard for the second time this season. It is a broadly written composition in four movements, and presents many sharp contrasts, for which the composer was noted. In general character it is rhythmic and melodic, especially the first movement. The second and third movements are particularly joyous and lively, something of the scherzo, and are in marked contrast to the last movement, which is of a funereal character, and is supposed to be Tschaikowsky's own requiem. It is solemn and majestic throughout, and finally dies away in gradually lessening pianissimo. Each movement was enthusiastically applauded, which left no doubt as to the popularity of the composition.

Mr. Adamowski was heard in the Bruch fantasia on Scotch folk melodies. The piece is by no means a novelty to music lovers, but it is always interesting, especially when the solo part is played as it was last night. Mr. Adamowski was at his best last night, and played with purity and feeling. He was given a most cordial reception, which was certainly well deserved.

Miss Franklin was heard in Miss Margaret Ruthven Lang's concert aria, "Armida," which is the most ambitious composition of Miss Lang's which has yet been heard. Miss Franklin was not fully equal to the dramatic requirements of the aria. Her voice, while having great carrying power and distinct clearness in the upper tones, lacked necessary breadth, but in spite of this, she worked up to a fitting climax and finished with a warmth and volume of tone not reached in the earlier part of the number.

Berlioz's overture, "The Corsair," finished the programme, and this was also heard for the first time. It is rather bizarre in effect, and was played at a tremendously rapid gait. The violins play a prominent part throughout, rushing hither and thither in an interesting manner, and in many parts it is written in anything but symphonic form. On the whole, it was not particularly well received, which was largely owing to the fact that the hands of the clock were close on to 10, the concert having been an unusually lengthy one.

At next week's concert the soloist will be Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who will play the Brahms concerto No. 2.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 12, 1896.

Mr. Paur began his tenth concert with the second hearing of Tschaikowsky's sixth symphony, which its author called "Pathetic" and which is just making its way to the great concert-rooms of the world, Richter having introduced it to England not so many weeks ago. It made an impression no less strong and sincere than at first; but neither performance brought the calm Boston auditor to his feet at the end of the first movement as the Liverpool listeners rose three months ago when they heard it first. That impression, however, proves the power, the splendor, the boldness, the intensity, and we might almost say the majesty which are to be felt in its graver movements, when it rises, swells, and storms as potently as any page of Wagner's which we recall on the instant—unless it be the "Siegfried" funeral march—but says more, means more and controls more than most of Wagner's climaxes, because it seems more spontaneous in passion and less contrived in the expression of it. Of course its title cannot apply to the symphony in its complete extent, because in the first movement it bursts into crashes, roles and thunders that are like very cataclysms of harmony and blending contests of voice, while in the second and third, sensibility, grace, fantasy, animation, brilliancy and even levity are important elements, But in the sombre, deep-breathing, concentrated spirit of the brief introduction dwells a warning, as it were, of tragedy unescapable though distant, tragedy which comes masterfully but pitifully in the last movement, unique in being the adagio of the symphony, instinct with mighty woe for which a whole orchestra is all too little an exponent, and sinking away at last into a tender silence which is that of a great and noble calm and not that of mere exhaustion from too much common grief.

Bruch's fantasia for violin, known as the "Scotch," but Scottish rather in its suggestiveness than in any exact reproduction of Highland melodies as themes, came next, Mr. Adamowski being the player. Dedicated to Sarasate and first played by him, its characteristics might easily be guessed by whoever has an acquaintance with composer and artist. Bruch is almost before everything else sturdy and decided, putting his ideas into direct and forcible statement; then he is eager, earnest and insistent; and finally he is fanciful, playful, ornate and almost captivating. Sarasate is a past master of the most elegant, fascinating and glittering resources of the violin, but he is also nervous, potent, fervid and strenuous. In whatsoever was graceful, persuasive, reposeful and tranquil, Mr. Adamowski did beautifully, playing with delicate tone, nice phrase and just proportion, polishing all smoothly and touching the high notes in harmonics into almost elfin sound. But the energetic passages lacked positiveness and volume, while those of bravura were often defective in intonation, as if some one string were not altogether what it should be. Yet as he made no noticeable attempt to draw any one into special obedience, the inference does not seem unfair that his own execution was responsible for the inexactitudes.

Then came a novelty—a setting by Miss Margaret Ruthven Lang for soprano voice and orchestra of a portion of Armida's lament in the fourth canto of Tasso's "Gerusalemme Liberata," an English text being used. So far as technical command of the orchestra is concerned, Miss Lang here shews an advance in appreciation of instrumental values, in clearness and equilibrium of scoring and in simplicity and straightforwardness. The voice part is well written, but it is more of a composition than an inspiration. As a study it stands well related to the text and it has apparently capabilities for effects which would closely approach, even if they did not quite touch, the dramatic. Certainly it does not suggest inexperience, hesitation or paucity of thought on its composer's part. Unfortunately it could not be judged according to its abstract and intrinsic merit, because it had been assigned to Miss Franklin, whom it quite over weighted, and who was often completely buried beneath the orchestral score, which is constantly filled with the strongest, largest and most dominant tones of those instruments which are most apt to absorb or cover down the voice of a singer. Perhaps the ideal soprano, possessing the voice of a Materna, a Lehmaun, a Titiens, or a Parepa Rosa, might rise and ride triumphant over these orchestral waves and sweep on with vehemence and passion. But Miss Franklin's means and methods are not such; so that while she sang with care and conscience, made some fine and telling notes and phrased with art, she had neither the volume, the tenacity nor the enthusiasm to bear up and bear on Miss Lang's intentions. She was unable to do justice to the fine qualities for which she is esteemed, and the force of the music drove her at times almost to a tremolo and confused with indistinctness the articulation which has been often rightly praised for its definiteness.

The concert ended with an overture by Berlioz, hitherto unheard here and called "The Corsair." Although vigorous, spirited and resonant in parts, it is not particularly interesting, and certainly it is not characteristic of its theme or its author.

The orchestra played finely throughout the concert and met promotly and surely the many unusual requirements of some of the scores.

Next week Mr. Joseffy, so long a stranger, will play Brahms's second pianoforte concerto, the other numbers being Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

---

[74]

...DAY HERALD.

...SHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.

VOL. XCIX., NO. 12.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 12, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

...ng's New Aria Finely Sung by Miss ...ranklin—Mr. Adamowski's Success.

The 11th of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall had for soloists Miss Gertrude Franklin and Mr. T. Adamowski, and presented this programme:

...ony, No. 6 ("Pathetique").Tschaikowsky
...ch Fantasia for violin and orchestra..
Max Bruch
Concert aria, "Armida".Miss Margaret R. Lang
(First time).
Overture, "Le Corsaire".....Berlioz
(First time).

The Tschaikowsky symphony increased in nobility of effect on a second hearing. It must be ranked among the most masterly works in its class that the present musical era has brought forth, not only in the beauty and dignity of its themes, its gorgeously glowing instrumentation, but in the fire and energy with which it is sustained from beginning to end, and in its unflagging interest. It is distinctly and intensely modern, and yet it is always clear, and there is in it a wealth of beautiful melody, lofty in inspiration and genuinely appealing in its tenderness. The exquisitely warm and flowing second theme of the opening movement, the grace and unique charm of the whole of the second movement with its skilful and dainty handling of the unusual and perplexing 5—4 rhythm, which is here made to flow with an ease and a piquancy, cause it to sound with graceful naturalness, and the entire magnetically impassioned finale which speaks with a large and solemn dramatic dignity which has been but rarely equalled, make the work stand by itself as the highest utterance that has been reached in contemporary symphony.

The least attractive portion of the composition is the third movement, in which the complicated contrapuntal devices are not specially interesting in themselves, and have the fault of overshadowing the themes, while the march, up to which all the elaborate preparations lead, is not in keeping with the loftiness of spirit that characterizes the rest of the work. A magnificent reading of this masterpiece was given by Mr. Paur, and the performance emphasized the glorious technique of the orchestra with surpassing effect.

In the Bruch Fantasia Mr. Adamowski excelled any of his earlier appearances here as a soloist, and his rendering of this work was something of a surprise in the depth of feeling and the thoughtfulness and the purity of taste that marked it as a whole. His tone was thin and querulous in bravura and his execution was not always clear, but the many cantabile moments of the fantasia he played with a largeness of style, a refinement of sentiment and a warm sincerity that had not before been apparent in his playing, and that revealed an artistic growth which calls for the most cordial recognition. The audience was quick in appreciation, and applauded as it had never applauded him before.

The concert aria by Miss Lang is the most ambitious effort that the composer has placed before the public. The text was found in Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered," and deals with the despair of Armida in her grief at the loss of all that she has loved and lived for. While the composition is not without force and vigor, it is musically uninteresting and unimpressive, by reason of the absence of any discoverable central point on which the whole should pivot. It is mainly florid recitative, interrupted once or twice by a brief moment of forced melody, but it all leads to nowhere in particular, and wanders about wildly and vaguely. It is wholly in the extreme modern vein, and gravitates between Wagner and Mascagni without any distinct individual character or any suggestion of originality. It is carefully made, and the instrumentation is clever and effective in its way, but, as the rule, it is overheavy for the voice and frequently obliterates it by the solid masses of tone that it piles up against it, especially, and curiously enough, when the vocal part is written in the weaker portion of the middle register. The effort is soaring and creditable to the composer in her present stage of development, but it is immature and ineffective, and the preponderance of orchestration which forces the singer into a secondary and almost unimportant position makes it a failure as a vocal concert aria. Miss Lang will do better when she has outgrown the familiar propensity of the young musician to give way to the temptation of overloading a score.

Miss Franklin performed her share in the work in the thoroughly artistic spirit and conscience she brings to bear on all that she does. She was called upon for little else than lyric declamation, and this she gave in a broad dramatic style and with impressive emphasis, making all that it was possible for singer to make of a task that must have been really thankless and discouraging. She was applauded with enthusiasm and twice recalled.

The Berlioz overture, though brilliantly played, did not offer any justification for bringing it forth from the obscurity in which it has been permitted to dwell. It is the weakest and poorest of its composer's works.

The programme for the next concert is: Unfinished symphony Schubert; concerto No. 2, for pianoforte, Brahms; overture, "Egmont," Beethoven. Mr. Rafael Joseffy is to be the soloist.

Boston Symphony Orchestra | METZEROTT MUSIC HALL.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Third Concert Tuesday Evening, Jan. 21, at 8:15 precisely.

Soloist, Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY

Tickets now on sale at Metzerott's.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 12.

The Symphony Concert.

The eleventh concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall, last evening. The programme was;

Symphony No. 6, B minor.....Tschaikowsky
Fantasy on Scotch Folk Melodies (for violin)...Bruch
Concert Aria, "Armida" (M. S.) (first time).....
.....Margaret R. Lang
Overture to "The Corsair".....Berlioz

The Tschaikowsky symphony was played last season, but it, is well worth the hearing again, for in dignity of thought, passion and pathos it is the most typical and most noble work of the master. Its characteristics, are earnestness and intensity of feeling that [occasionally becomes over-garrulous; but it is irresistible in its sweep and haunting in its impressiveness. The large grand last movement is a triumph of art and of feeling, and it is impossible to listen to it unmoved. The symphony is sound, honest and flawless work to its innermost fibres; it is pure gold welded into shape under the white heat of passionate emotion and an imperishable monument to its maker. It was finely read by Mr. Paur; read with sympathy, rare insight, and rarer intelligence. It is necessary to emphasize this fact, for it has become the fashion with a certain class of critical wits to fire their literary pop-guns at Mr. Paur and to hide their malice and poverty of invention with quotations from "Bayle's Dictionary," Burton's "Anatomy of Melancholy," and Chambers's "Book of Days." Dulness, ponderosity, and cynicism born of self-contempt, are not dangerous weapons; but this persistent hounding of a man who has shown larger capacity, broader taste, greater intelligence and rarer skill than any other conductor who has appeared in Boston, has become intolerable to lovers of fair play. It is probable that if Mr. Paur had the opportunity to criticize the witless jesters who so mercilessly pursue him, he could show in their attacks less admirable causes than jaded brains, blunted sensibility and a Bohemianism that goes no farther in æsthetics than self-worship—called in Biblical times the worship of the brazen calf.

The Bruch fantasy does not call for extended notice though one may mildly wonder why Mr. Adamowski was selected for the high honor of interpreting the solo part; for Mr. Adamowski at his best inspires content, but never enthusiasm. And then as he appears as soloist at a symphony concert, one has the right to compare him with the masters in his art, and, unfortunately, the comparison is never in his favor. His playing is pretty, graceful, sometimes coquettish, but it has not the largeness, broadness, dignity or techinal skill to fit it for classical concert work.

Miss Lang's concert aria is, in a sense, creditable to the young composer; it is scored with taste and knowledge. There is no trace of the old masters in the work, which is modern in idea and in treatment, and hints that Miss Lang is an earnest and enthusiastic student of Wagner. Unfortunately in her desire to be modern Miss Lang has forgotten that ideas are as important as form, and so she has taken infinite pains to write an elaborate setting for nothing. She has entirely misunderstood the portion of the poem she set to music, and no skill in orchestration will hide the paucity of ideas, or cause the hearer to confound noisy affectation with depth of feeling. The cleverness is misplaced, and it is a pity that so much good work should be wasted on a subject in which there is not a trace of imagination, or any of the qualities that go to the making of an enduring work of art. Miss Lang is clever, but it is impossible for even genius to say anything when it has nothing to say.]

The programme for the next concert is: Unfinished Symphony, Schumann; Concerto No. 2, for pianoforte, Brahms; Overture, "Egmont," Beethoven. The soloist is Mr. Rafael Joseffy.

THE WASHINGTON POST,

SUNDAY, JANUARY 12, 1896.

Boston Symphony and Joseffy at Metzerott's.

The third concert this season, Tuesday evening, January 21, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be the 1,353d performance by this now famous organization, and its 45th performance in this city, will be memorable chiefly for the re-appearance of the eminent piano virtuoso, Mr. Rafael Joseffy. Mr. Joseffy has been in retirement for some five years past, and it is safe to predict that he has employed his leisure during this interval so profitably that he will return at once to his former triumph. When he was active in the concert field, he stood pre-eminent among players in the opinion of both the public and the critics.

Joseffy came to this country with an already established reputation as one of the greatest pianists of the world, a name which he amply sustained by a series of triumphs in his performances with the leaders of musical organizations of this country and a series of piano recitals given in all the principal cities.

Some two weeks ago Mr. Joseffy appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their regular series of concerts at Providence, R. I., which was his initial performance with this organization since his re-entry in the concert field. In connection with this performance the Providence Journal said: "Much enthusiasm was displayed over the reappearance on the concert platform of Rafael Joseffy, the noted pianist. For some reason he chose to retire temporarily, while at the very zenith of his popularity, much to the regret of his many admirers. The warmth of his reception last night showed plainly the general pleasure felt in his resumption of the professional work, as well as the formal compliment to his actual performance. The concerto was magnificently played by both soloist and orchestra. The applause was stormy and prolonged, Mr. Joseffy being recalled five times."

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 12, 1896.

Eleventh Symphonic Concert in Music Hall Last Evening—Mr. Timothee Adamowski Played Bruch's Scotch Fantasia Delightfully.

The program of the 11th Symphony concert was as follows:

Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetique" (second time)..Tschaikowsky
Fantasia on Scotch Folk-melodies, for violin .....Bruch
Concert Aria, "Armida" (MS.) (first time) .....Miss Lang
Overture to "The Corsair" (first time)..
Berlioz

There is a story that Tschaikowsky did not die of cholera; that, weary of glory, strife and tribulation, he poisoned himself; and that in anticipation of the tragedy he wrote the noble Pathetic symphony. Whether this tale is true, or whether it is as false as the long-believed and base rumor that Mozart was poisoned by jealous Salieri, the symphony may well remain the requiem of the great Russian composer, whose genius is more and more appreciated and whose death must still be regarded as a loss, not only to his country, but to the whole musical world.

When this symphony was first produced here, Dec. 29, 1894, the Journal reviewed it at length. Perhaps it would be better to say that the Journal eulogized it in superlatives; only the third movement seemed unworthy, and in a measure trivial. A second hearing only confirms and intensifies the enthusiastic admiration felt a year ago. Still does the first movement with its mingled melancholy and sensuousness sum up the lives of many men. (And is not the sensuousness of thoughtful minds the keenest melancholy?) Still does the rhythmic charm of the second movement entrance. The third movement now seems as though it were deliberately the exposition of the intrinsic vulgarity of popular fame; the vanity of which leads to the final elegy. As for the elegy itself, it seems to me the highest flight of imagination in absolute music since Beethoven left the world. The pangs of death, the farewell to all that is known, the terror at the thought of spiritual visions that are to be seen with spiritual eyes, or the horrid thought of annihilation—are these not in this final masterpiece of Tschaikowsky?

* * *

It is doubtful reverence to expose to the light the weak works of a strong man. Even von Bülow, with all his brilliancy as a conductor, could not put the breath of life into the overture to "The Corsair" by Hector Berlioz.

* * *

The chief trouble with Miss Lang's concert aria is that while it deals with a dramatic subject, the thing itself is undramatic. Even in the orchestral accompaniment, which recalls the remark of Sain-Saëns that when women write for orchestra they wish to prove their masculine mind by being noisier than men, there is no genuine dramatic feeling or accentuation of the text. There is neither pivotal point nor climax. When a woman shrieks or laments there is either a constant recurrence to the cause of woe, or one great spasm to which Nature gives way and finds relief, or at least silence. Miss Lang took her verses from Tasso, who has been reckoned a pretty poet; but it seems, according to the program-book, that poor Whiffen's English translation was at times too "anti-musical." Miss Lang substituted then her own prose, and the singer was obliged last evening to declaim such intensely musical phrases as "persecution's thrall" and "great Chieftain." Inasmuch as this aria is without point, without climax, without dramatic declamation, without appealing melody, I wonder at the causes that led Mr. Paur to welcome it to a Symphony concert in Music Hall. Miss Franklin displayed the purity of her voice and art; in other words she made as much out of the aria as was in all reason possible. The audience appreciated her earnestness and her art and she was loudly applauded.

* * *

Mr. Adamowski gave a delightful performance of the Scotch Fantasia. In cantabile passages, he played with unusual warmth and feeling, at the same time with musical authority. And in the passages that call for brilliancy, his technique was amply adequate. All in all Mr. Adamowski appeared to his great advantage, and he richly deserved the hearty applause.

* * *

The orchestra played exceedingly well throughout the concert, and the men played the symphony as though they loved it.

PHILIP HALE.

[illegible]

SUNDAY, JAN. 12, 1896.

Eleventh Symphony Concert.

An interesting but unusually long program was provided by director Paur for the 11th of this season's symphony concerts, the 1348th performance by this orchestra and the 726th performance in Boston, Miss Gertrude Franklin and Mr T. Adamowski were the soloists. Both are local favorites and their numerous friends no doubt contributed to the increased attendance noticed at both the Friday afternoon rehearsal and the concert last evening.

The program consisted of Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetique," Max Bruch's fantasia on Scotch folk-melodies for violin; Berlioz's overture to "The Corsair," and a concert aria, "Armida," by Margaret Ruthven Lang. Both the latter selections were heard here for the first time.

A second hearing of the Tschaikowsky symphony, the last important composition written by the great Russian composer, increases one's admiration for its many beauties. It is a noble and impressive work, and is likely to possess lasting popularity. The scoring is wonderfully rich and effective, and, like most of the writings by its composer, is remarkable for great elaboration and full use of the resources of a modern orchestra.

The character of the symphony is suggested by its title, "Pathetique." There is never a moment, even in the most lively passages, when there is not a suggestion of mournfulness, a somberness of tone that the most rapid tempo cannot disguise. It is supposed that the composer meant the last movement, adagio lamentoso, to be his own requiem.

The symphony was superbly played, no more intelligent, sympathetic and wholly satisfactory performance has been given under Mr Paur's direction. A noteworthy feature of the symphony is the individual prominence given the several instruments of the orchestra, and they were played last evening with artistic judgment and splendid effect.

The Bruch fantasia has long been a popular composition for violin and orchestra, and its performance was very acceptable. Mr Adamowski was cordially received, and his playing won generous applause. Although Mr Adamowski may not be entitled to highest rank among the violinists of the Symphony orchestra, he is unquestionably an accomplished musician, and, were he much less of a social favorite than he is, his annual appearance as soloist at these concerts would be quite welcome. His performance of the Bruch fantasia last evening was very commendable.

The "Armida" aria, by Margaret Ruthven Lang, is not likely to become very popular. The text is taken from Torquato Tasso's "Gerusalemme Liberata," canto IV, and, as may be imagined, is sufficiently tragic and gloom-inspiring. The scoring is rather elaborate, and in certain portions is dramatically effective, but there is much monotonous repetition of heavy, colorless themes.

Miss Gertrude Franklin sang the music with splendid expression and gave as much dramatic effect to the composition as was possible. She is a thoroughly well equipped singer whose work is always artistic and satisfying. She was deservedly applauded with great enthusiasm.

Berlioz's overture to "The Corsair" is one of that brilliant composer's early works, but it has until recently remained in obscurity. Although the overture can scarcely take rank with many of his later compositions it is a very interesting work, bright in color and rich in varied harmonies. It well merited resurrection.

Mr Rafael Joseffy will be the soloist at this week's concert. The program will include Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," Brahms' concerto No. 2 for piano, and Beethoven's overture, "Egmont."

MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY, 15, 1896.

BOSTON, Mass., January 12, 1896.

A CONCERT was given at the Boston Theatre January 5 by the Symphony Orchestra, assisted by Miss Gertrude Franklin and Paderewski. The orchestra played Beethoven's Leonore overture No. 3; Suite, Namouna, Lalo; Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2, Liszt-Muller-Berghaus; overture, William Tell. Miss Franklin sang the Bach-Gounod Ave Maria (violin obligato, Mr. T. Adamowski) and Gounod's Repentir. Mr. Paderewski played with the orchestra his Polish fantasy and two solo pieces, Hark, Hark, the Lark, Schubert-Liszt, and a waltz of Chopin.

This concert was in aid of the family of Mr. Goldstein, formerly the leader of the double basses of the Symphony Orchestra. This accomplished virtuoso, excellent musician and estimable man some time ago hurt the back of his head by a fall. It was thought that he recovered. Soon there were symptoms of insanity. His mania took the form of belief in his own immense wealth. He wished to give large sums to his friends. He offered to introduce Mrs. Paur as a pianist to New York under the most favorable conditions. The unfortunate man is now in the McLean Asylum and there is no prospect of his return to reason.

There was a very large audience, in fact the theatre was crowded. The orchestra, with Mr. C. M. Loeffler as concert master, played exceedingly well. Paderewski, who contributed his services at no slight inconvenience, was most warmly applauded.

Mr. Campanari, formerly a member of the orchestra, had volunteered to sing at the concert, but he was under contract with Messrs. Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau to appear at the Metropolitan the 5th. Miss Franklin consented kindly, and at short notice, to take his place. She was recalled several times after her selections.

* * *

[75]

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIX., NO. 12.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 12, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Miss Lang's New Aria Finely Sung by Miss Franklin—Mr. Adamowski's Success.

The 11th of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall had for soloists Miss Gertrude Franklin and Mr. T. Adamowski, and presented this programme:

Symphony, No. 6 ("Pathetique").Tschaikowsky
Scotch Fantasia for violin and orchestra...
Max Bruch
Concert aria, "Armida".Miss Margaret R. Lang
(First time).
Overture, "Le Corsaire".....Berlioz
(First time).

The Tschaikowsky symphony increased in nobility of effect on a second hearing. It must be ranked among the most masterly works in its class that the present musical era has brought forth, not only in the beauty and dignity of its themes, its gorgeously glowing instrumentation, but in the fire and energy with which it is sustained from beginning to end, and in its unflagging interest. It is distinctly and intensely modern, and yet it is always clear, and there is in it a wealth of beautiful melody, lofty in inspiration and genuinely appealing in its tenderness. The exquisitely warm and flowing second theme of the opening movement, the grace and unique charm of the whole of the second movement with its skilful and dainty handling of the unusual and perplexing 5—4 rhythm, which is here made to flow with an ease and a piquancy, cause it to sound with graceful naturalness, and the entire majestically impassioned finale which speaks with a large and solemn dramatic dignity which has been but rarely equalled, make the work stand by itself as the highest utterance that has been reached in contemporary symphony.

The least attractive portion of the composition is the third movement, in which the complicated contrapuntal devices are not specially interesting in themselves, and have the fault of overshadowing the themes, while the march, up to which all the elaborate preparations lead, is not in keeping with the loftiness of spirit that characterizes the rest of the work. A magnificent reading of this masterpiece was given by Mr. Paur, and the performance emphasized the glorious technique of the orchestra with surpassing effect.

In the Bruch Fantasia Mr. Adamowski excelled any of his earlier appearances here as a soloist, and his rendering of this work was something of a surprise in the depth of feeling and the thoughtfulness and the purity of taste that marked it as a whole. His tone was thin and querulous in bravura and his execution was not always clear, but in the many cantabile moments of the fantasia he played with a largeness of style, a refinement of sentiment and a warm sincerity that had not before been apparent in his playing, and that recorded an artistic growth which calls for the most cordial recognition. The audience was quick in appreciation, and applauded as it had never applauded him before.

The concert aria by Miss Lang is the most ambitious effort that the composer has placed before the public. The text was found in Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered," and deals with the despair of Armida in her grief at the loss of all that she has loved and lived for. While the composition is not without force and vigor, it is musically uninteresting and unimpressive, by reason of the absence of any discoverable central point on which the whole should pivot. It is mainly florid recitative, interrupted once or twice by a brief moment of forced melody, but it all leads to nowhere in particular, and wanders about wildly and vaguely. It is wholly in the extreme modern vein, and gravitates between Wagner and Mascagni without any distinct individual character or any suggestion of originality. It is carefully made, and the instrumentation is clever and effective in its way, but, as the rule, it is overheavy for the voice and frequently obliterates it by the solid masses of tone that it piles up against it, especially, and, curiously enough, when the vocal part is written in the weaker portion of the middle register. The effort is soaring and creditable to the composer in her present stage of development, but it is immature and ineffective, and the preponderance of orchestration which forces the singer into a secondary and almost unimportant position makes it a failure as a vocal concert aria. Miss Lang will do better when she has outgrown the familiar propensity of the young musician to give way to the temptation of overloading a score.

Miss Franklin performed her share in the work in the thoroughly artistic spirit and conscience she brings to bear on all that she does. She was called upon for little else than lyric declamation, and this she gave in a broad dramatic style and with impressive emphasis, making all that it was possible for singer to make of a task that must have been equally thankless and discouraging. She was applauded with enthusiasm and twice recalled.

The Berlioz overture, though brilliantly played, did not offer any justification for bringing it forth from the obscurity in which it has been permitted to dwell. It is the weakest and poorest of its composer's works.

The programme for the next concert is: Unfinished symphony Schubert; concerto No. 2, for pianoforte, Brahms; overture, "Egmont," Beethoven. Mr. Rafael Joseffy is to be the soloist.

Boston Symphony Orchestra | METZEROTT MUSIC HALL.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Third Concert Tuesday Evening, Jan. 21, at 8:15 precisely.

Soloist, Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY

Tickets now on sale at Metzerott's.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 12.

The Symphony Concert.

The eleventh concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall, last evening. The programme was;

Symphony No. 6, B minor.....Tschaikowsky
Fantasy on Scotch-Folk Melodies (for violin)...Bruch
Concert Aria, "Armida" (M. S.) (first time).....
.....Margaret R. Lang
Overture to "The Corsair".....Berlioz

The Tschaikowsky symphony was played last season, but it is well worth the hearing again, for in dignity of thought, passion and pathos it is the most typical and most noble work of the master. Its characteristics, are earnestness and intensity of feeling that [occasionally becomes over-garrulous; but : is irresistible in its sweep and haunting in its impressiveness. The large grand last movement is a triumph of art and of feeling, and it is impossible to listen to it unmoved. The symphony is sound, honest and flawless work to its innermost fibres; it is pure gold welded into shape under the white heat of passionate emotion and an imperishable monument to its maker. It was finely read by Mr. Paur; read with sympathy, rare insight, and rarer intelligence. It is necessary to emphasize this f. t, for it has become the fashion with a certain class ltical wits to fire their literary pop-guns at Mr. Pa and to hide their malice and poverty of invention with quotations from "Bayle's Dictionary," Burton's "Anatomy of Melancholy," and Chambers's "Book of Days." Dulness, ponderosity, and cynicism born of self-contempt, are not dangerous weapons; but this persistent hounding of a man who has shown larger capacity, broader taste, greater intelligence and rarer skill than any other conductor who has appeared in Boston, has become intolerable to lovers of fair play. It is probable that if Mr. Paur had the opportunity to criticize the witless jesjesters who so mercilessly pursue him, he could show in their attacks less admirable causes than jaded brains, blunted sensibility and a Bohemianism that goes no farther in æsthetics than self-worship—called in Biblical times the worship of the brazen calf.

The Bruch fantasy does not call for extended notice though one may mildly wonder why Mr. Adamowski was selected for the high honor of interpreting the solo part; for Mr. Adamowski at his best inspires content, but never enthusiasm. And then as he appears as soloist at a symphony concert, one has the right to compare him with the masters in his art, and, unfortunately, the comparison is never in his favor. His playing is pretty, graceful, sometimes coquettish, but it has not the largeness, broadness, dignity or techinal skill to fit it for classical concert work.

Miss Lang's concert aria is, in a sense, creditable to the young composer; it is scored with taste and knowledge. There is no trace of the old masters in the work, which is modern in idea and in treatment, and hints that Miss Lang is an earnest and enthusiastic student of Wagner. Unfortunately in her desire to be modern Miss Lang has forgotten that ideas are as important as form, and so she has taken infinite pains to write an elaborate setting for nothing. She has entirely misunderstood the portion of the poem she set to music, and no skill in orchestration will hide the paucity of ideas, or cause the hearer to confound noisy affectation with depth of feeling. The cleverness is misplaced, and it is a pity that so much good work should be wasted on a subject in which there is not a trace of imagination, or any of the qualities that go to the making of an enduring work of art. Miss Lang is clever, but it is impossible for even genius to say anything when it has nothing to say.]

The programme for the next concert is: Unfinished Symphony, Schumann; Concerto No. 2, for pianoforte, Brahms; Overture, "Egmont," Beethoven. The soloist is Mr. Rafael Joseffy.

THE WASHINGTON POST,

SUNDAY, JANUARY 12, 1896.

Boston Symphony and Joseffy at Metzerott's.

The third concert this season, Tuesday evening, January 21, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be the 1,353d performance by this now famous organization, and its 45th performance in this city, will be memorable chiefly for the re-appearance of the eminent piano virtuoso, Mr. Rafael Joseffy. Mr. Joseffy has been in retirement for some five years past, and it is safe to predict that he has employed his leisure during this interval so profitably that he will return at once to his former triumph. When he was active in the concert field, he stood pre-eminent among players in the opinion of both the public and the critics.

Joseffy came to this country with an already established reputation as one of the greatest pianists of the world, a name which he amply sustained by a series of triumphs in his performances with the leaders of musical organizations of this country and a series of piano recitals given in all the principal cities.

Some two weeks ago Mr. Joseffy appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their regular series of concerts at Providence, R. I., which was his initial performance with this organization since his re-entry in the concert field. In connection with this performance the Providence Journal said: "Much enthusiasm was displayed over the reappearance on the concert platform of Rafael Joseffy, the noted pianist. For some reason he chose to retire temporarily, while at the very zenith of his popularity, much to the regret of his many admirers. The warmth of his reception last night showed plainly the general pleasure felt in his resumption of the professional work, as well as the formal compliment to his actual performance. The concerto was magnificently played by both soloist and orchestra. The applause was stormy and prolonged, Mr. Joseffy being recalled five times."

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 12, 1896.

Eleventh Symphonic Concert in Music Hall Last Evening—Mr. Timothee Adamowski Played Bruch's Scotch Fantasia Delightfully.

The program of the 11th Symphony concert was as follows:

Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetique" (second time)..Tschaikowsky
Fantasia on Scotch Folk-melodies, for violin .....Bruch
Concert Aria, "Armida" (MS.) (first time) .....Miss Lang
Overture to "The Corsair" (first time)..
Berlioz

There is a story that Tschaikowsky did not die of cholera; that, weary of glory, strife and tribulation, he poisoned himself; and that in anticipation of the tragedy he wrote the noble Pathetic symphony. Whether this tale is true, or whether it is as false as the long-believed and base rumor that Mozart was poisoned by jealous Salieri, the symphony may well remain the requiem of the great Russian composer, whose genius is more and more appreciated and whose death must still be regarded as a loss, not only to his country, but to the whole musical world.

When this symphony was first produced here, Dec. 29, 1894, the Journal reviewed it at length. Perhaps it would be better to say that the Journal eulogized it in superlatives; only the third movement seemed unworthy, and in a measure trivial. A second hearing only confirms and intensifies the enthusiastic admiration felt a year ago. Still does the first movement with its mingled melancholy and sensuousness sum up the lives of many men. (And is not the sensuousness of thoughtful minds the keenest melancholy?) Still does the rhythmic charm of the second movement entrance. The third movement now seems as though it were deliberately the exposition of the intrinsic vulgarity of popular fame; the vanity of which leads to the final elegy. As for the elegy itself, it seems to me the highest flight of imagination in absolute music since Beethoven left the world. The pangs of death, the farewell to all that is known, the terror at the thought of spiritual visions that are to be seen with spiritual eyes, or the horrid thought of annihilation—are these not in this final masterpiece of Tschaikowsky?

* * *

It is doubtful reverence to expose to the light the weak works of a strong man. Even von Bülow, with all his brilliancy as a conductor, could not put the breath of life into the overture to "The Corsair" by Hector Berlioz.

* * *

The chief trouble with Miss Lang's concert aria is that while it deals with a dramatic subject, the thing itself is undramatic. Even in the orchestral accompaniment, which recalls the remark of Sain-Saëns that when women write for orchestra they wish to prove their masculine mind by being noisier than men, there is no genuine dramatic feeling or accentuation of the text. There is neither pivotal point nor climax. When a woman shrieks or laments there is either a constant recurrence to the cause of woe, or one great spasm to which Nature gives way and finds relief, or at least silence. Miss Lang took her verses from Tasso, who has been reckoned a pretty poet; but it seems, according to the program-book, that poor Whiffen's English translation was at times too "anti-musical." Miss Lang substituted then her own prose, and the singer was obuged last evening to declaim such intensely musical phrases as "persecution's thrall" and "great Chieftain." Inasmuch as this aria is without point, without climax, without dramatic declamation, without appealing melody, I wonder at the causes that led Mr. Paur to welcome it to a Symphony concert in Music Hall. Miss Franklin displayed the purity of her voice and art; in other words she made as much out of the aria as was in all reason possible. The audience appreciated her earnestness and her art and she was loudly applauded.

* * *

Mr. Adamowski gave a delightful performance of the Scotch Fantasia. In cantabile passages, he played with unusual warmth and feeling, at the same time with musical authority. And in the passages that call for brilliancy, his technique was amply adequate. All in all Mr. Adamowski appeared to his great advantage, and he richly deserved the hearty applause.

* * *

The orchestra played exceedingly well throughout the concert, and the men played the symphony as though they loved it.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN 12, 1896.

Eleventh Symphony Concert.

An interesting but unusually long program was provided by director Paur for the 11th of this season's symphony concerts, the 1348th performance by this orchestra and the 726th performance in Boston. Miss Gertrude Franklin and Mr T. Adamowski were the soloists. Both are local favorites and their numerous friends no doubt contributed to the increased attendance noticed at both the Friday afternoon rehearsal and the concert last evening.

The program consisted of Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetique," Max Bruch's fantasia on Scotch folk-melodies for violin; Berlioz's overture to "The Corsair," and a concert aria, "Armida," by Margaret Ruthven Lang. Both the latter selections were heard here for the first time.

A second hearing of the Tschaikowsky symphony, the last important composition written by the great Russian composer, increases one's admiration for its many beauties. It is a noble and impressive work, and is likely to possess lasting popularity. The scoring is wonderfully rich and effective, and, like most of the writings by its composer, is remarkable for great elaboration and full use of the resources of a modern orchestra.

The character of the symphony is suggested by its title, "Pathetique." There is never a moment, even in the most lively passages, when there is not a suggestion of mournfulness, a somberness of tone that the most rapid tempo cannot disguise. It is supposed that the composer meant the last movement, adagio lamentoso, to be his own requiem.

The symphony was superbly played, no more intelligent, sympathetic and wholly satisfactory performance has been given under Mr Paur's direction. A noteworthy feature of the symphony is the individual prominence given the several instruments of the orchestra, and they were played last evening with artistic judgment and splendid effect.

The Bruch fantasia has long been a popular composition for violin and orchestra, and its performance was very acceptable. Mr Adamowski was cordially received, and his playing won generous applause. Although Mr Adamowski may not be entitled to highest rank among the violinists of the Symphony orchestra, he is unquestionably an accomplished musician, and, were he much less of a social favorite than he is, his annual appearance as soloist at these concerts would be quite welcome. His performance of the Bruch fantasia last evening was very commendable.

The "Armida" aria, by Margaret Ruthven Lang, is not likely to become very popular. The text is taken from Torquato Tasso's "Gerusalemme Liberata," canto IV, and, as may be imagined, is sufficiently tragic and gloom-inspiring. The scoring is rather elaborate, and in certain portions is dramatically effective, but there is much monotonous répetition of heavy, colorless themes.

Miss Gertrude Franklin sang the music with splendid expression and gave as much dramatic effect to the composition as was possible. She is a thoroughly well equipped singer whose work is always artistic and satisfying. She was deservedly applauded with great enthusiasm.

Berlioz's overture to "The Corsair" is one of that brilliant composer's early works, but it has until recently remained in obscurity. Although the overture can scarcely take rank with many of his later compositions it is a very interesting work, bright in color and rich in varied harmonies. It well merited resurrection.

Mr Rafael Joseffy will be the soloist at this week's concert. The program will include Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," Brahms' concerto No. 2 for piano, and Beethoven's overture, "Egmont."

MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY, 15, 1896.

BOSTON, Mass., January 12, 1896.

A CONCERT was given at the Boston Theatre January 5 by the Symphony Orchestra, assisted by Miss Gertrude Franklin and Paderewski. The orchestra played Beethoven's Leonore overture No. 3; Suite, Namouna, Lalo; Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2, Liszt-Muller-Berghaus; overture, William Tell. Miss Franklin sang the Bach-Gounod Ave Maria (violin obligato, Mr. T. Adamowski) and Gounod's Repentir. Mr. Paderewski played with the orchestra his Polish fantasy and two solo pieces, Hark, Hark, the Lark, Schubert-Liszt, and a waltz of Chopin.

This concert was in aid of the family of Mr. Goldstein, formerly the leader of the double basses of the Symphony Orchestra. This accomplished virtuoso, excellent musician and estimable man some time ago hurt the back of his head by a fall. It was thought that he recovered. Soon there were symptoms of insanity. His mania took the form of belief in his own immense wealth. He wished to give large sums to his friends. He offered to introduce Mrs. Paur as a pianist to New York under the most favorable conditions. The unfortunate man is now in the McLean Asylum and there is no prospect of his return to reason.

There was a very large audience, in fact the theatre was crowded. The orchestra, with Mr. C. M. Loeffler as concert master, played exceedingly well. Paderewski, who contributed his services at no slight inconvenience, was most warmly applauded.

Mr. Campanari, formerly a member of the orchestra, had volunteered to sing at the concert, but he was under contract with Messrs. Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau to appear at the Metropolitan the 5th. Miss Franklin consented kindly, and at short notice, to take his place. She was recalled several times after her selections.

* * *

Established 1872.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 13, 1896.

Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony Performed in Boston.

The concert of Saturday began with Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, which, on this occasion, received its second performance in Boston. Its first movement was given with a brilliancy that augured well for the rest. This same first movement makes very bold digressions from the path of Sonata-form, and if one were to judge by form only, one might find some fault with the work; its contents, however, are wonderful, and it has a right to be called one of the most expressive instrumental works of modern times.

It is always well to distrust a musical "story" connected with any composition; stories about Beethoven's "Moonlight" Sonata, or Schumann's "Warum" are apt to disgust one with the sentimentality which is spun around music in defiance of all facts. A bit of fiction is beginning to weave itself around Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony in the same pseudo-historical guise. It is stated that the composer did not die of cholera, but committed suicide in a very premeditated manner, composing this symphony beforehand as his own elegy and requiem. Now, the facts of the case, as given in all detail in the Russian papers at the time of Tschaikowsky's death, all go to contradict this very romantic tale. Tschaikowsky had taken some food in a St. Petersburg restaurant that seemed not quite fresh; a friend who was with him, warned him of the danger of tasting a doubtful dish in a cholera season; the composer laughed at the excessive caution of his companion; soon after the meal, however, he began to feel ill. A proof that there had been no attempt at suicide is found in the fact that a physician was at once summoned by order of the patient himself, who did everything in his power to aid the doctor's efforts. The newspapers give every detail of the ensuing illness, even to the remark made by the sick man to a young relative by his bedside—"You will never respect me again after seeing me in such a disgusting condition." The crisis seemed to have passed, and (again a fact that disproves the suicide story) Tschaikowsky seemed grateful in the highest degree to the doctor who had saved his life. Then came the relapse, the usual collapse of Asiatic cholera, and the immediate death of the composer.

These sick-room details are given only that a new romance may not be imported into an art that is too full of fictitious tales already; they are accessible to anyone who will look up a file of St. Petersburg newspapers and have them translated to him. Nevertheless the fact remains that this great threnody was the last great work of the composer and that the great musician sang his own requiem in this swan's song.

The second movement of the symphony is probably the most ingenious and sustained use of 5-4 rhythm that exists in music, and the tremendous organ-point made upon the kettledrum is not the least remarkable feature of this remarkable movement and is not only most impressive in itself, but accentuates the unusual rhythm in the most effective manner possible.

If ever it was proven that our orchestra has attained a most wonderful standard of technique it was shown in the performance of the third movement of this symphony. The responses between strings and woodwind were the perfection of an orchestral dialogue, and that march-theme which seemed the glorification of war and heroism, was given with a fervor and resistless force that was inspiring.

The last movement would have permitted more freedom of interpretation in shading and tempo, but was none the less very effectively performed. The baleful tones of the muted horns deserve an especial word of commendation; this is the ugliest tone that can be evoked from the orchestra, and is used by great composers to picture anything evil; Wagner uses it thus when Tannhaeuser determines to return to Venus, when the Flying Dutchman deserts Senta, when Ortrud weaves her wickedness about Elsa, or when Siegfried is murdered. Few composers however, have used it so sustainedly as Tschaikowsky does here. It is difficult to keep to exact pitch in producing such a tone, therefore it is worth recording that the hornplayers did this on this occasion, and in open as well as muted tones the horns played remarkably well throughout the symphony. The end of the work is something that once heard can never be forgotten; one listens to the heart-throbs growing fainter and fainter, slower and slower; at last the beating ceases and life is done; one might write "Death" instead of "Fine" at the end of this thrilling work. It was greatly appreciated by the audience as was evinced by applause at the end of each movement growing to an outburst of enthusiasm at the close of the work.

Bruch's Scotch Fantasie is a greater favorite with violinists than with Scotchmen. The Germans all (except Mendelssohn) have failed to reproduce the lilt and spirit of the Scottish muse. Bruch did not fail in this for want of trying. In "Fair Ellen" he apotheosized "The Campbells are Coming," in "The Fiery Cross" he has turned to Sir Walter Scott for his inspiration and to the Gaelic folk-song for his themes, and in this same Scotch Fantasie he builds his [illegible] upon "Scots wha Hae." Bruch once told the present writer that he was acquainted with nearly 400 Scotch folk-songs [illegible] had made the study of this [illegible] one of his chief with Rhine wine, and the kilt has turned into Teutonic trousers. Mr. T. Adamowski played the work finely. This great artist is gaining all the time, and the surety of his tone, the expression which he imparted to the slow movement, the brilliancy of the duet with the flute in the second movement, the clear and pure style of his harmonics (particularly the high harmonic with which he ended the first movement) were all sufficient to account for the enthusiasm which recalled him again and again at the close of the work. Only in the finale did one find him somewhat lacking of the true breadth of the Ossianic heroism which Bruch (a veritable Tyrtaeus in his way) attempted to delineate here.

The second movement gives something of the drone of the bagpipes, but the "Chanter" scarcely breathes Scotch tunes. In this movement there is a phrase that is taken from a solo in the composer's own "Frithjof" (Bruch's greatest work), which afterwards appears in the finale, an odd instance of self-plagiarism.

Miss Lang's new concert-aria is by no means great enough for its subject; spite of an ensy leading of the parts, a fluency of orchestration, there is a lack of dramatic power in the work, certainly an absence of that sustained breadth which one might demand in a great aria. There were impressive moments but not an impressive whole. The beginning was striking enough and the monotony of sorrow which followed was at least permissible; there was a degree of melody at "Ask me no more" which was enhanced by the skill displayed in the imitations of the vocal part upon the violincello, and there was enough of dissonance to satisfy the musical radicals; but sustained dramatic power there was not, and the great scene from Torquato Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered" demands as mighty treatment as the abandonment of Dido (which it in some degree resembles) and the burning of the palace and the rushing to death in combat cannot be portrayed even by the most respectable music, for true dramatic instinct is here imperative. Of the queer alterations in the words, the contrast of earnest poetry and prose sentimentality we prefer not to speak. It must be added that Miss Lang's work was placed in a position that would try any composer; it came after the most expressive and dramatic symphony of the modern repertoire, and a most warlike and heroic Fantasie, and it was followed by a very fiery overture. It is quite possible that, heard with less trying surroundings, the work would make a more favorable impression.

Berlioz's overture to "The Corsair" began with ferocity but gradually led into themes more directly melodious than this composer generally used, melodies that Auber might have originated. Whether the concert had been too long or the warlike tendency of things had been pushed too far we cannot say, but the work left no marked impression of any kind. The violins did their mad rushes with much unanimity, the contrasts were all sharply drawn, as Berlioz evidently wished them, but one was glad at the close that the duty of listening to a new work by Berlioz (for it was the first time the overture had a Boston hearing) had been accomplished, and that there would be no necessity for hearing it again.

Louis C. Elson.

BOSTON STANDARD.

The symphonic concert in Music Hall Saturday evening was the 11th of the season. It was, also, the 1348th performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the 726th performance in Boston. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetique" (second time).....Tschaikowsky
Fantasia on Scotch Folk-melodies, for violin.....Bruch
Concert aria, "Armida" (MS.) (first time).....Miss Lang
Overture to "The Corsair" (first time).....Berlioz

The Tschaikowsky symphony was first heard here about a year ago. It was warmly commended at that time, and its Saturday evening's representation was cordially received, and thoroughly enjoyed. This was the last work of the great master, and was published shortly before his death. It was in four movements, opening with a brief introduction, adagio, in B minor, and closing with a slow movement of funereal character, described by the program notes as "a long drawn, wailing threnody; now solemn and majestic; now impassioned in its expression, in which two contrasted themes are worked up with great dramatic power in perfectly free form."

This symphony is a noble treatment of an interesting theme, and the first movement has been considered in the light of the author's requiem. The reading by Conductor Paur was intelligent and thoroughly satisfying, and the number was the most enjoyable of the evening.

The overture to Berlioz's "The Corsair," with which the concert was closed, was uninteresting, and was the least worthy of attention of the numbers on the evening's program. It is said that a custom of Berlioz was to destroy such of his work as he was not pleased with. After hearing the overture to "The Corsair," one could wish it had shared the fate of "Rob Roy," the "Six Scenes from Gothe's Faust," and other works. I cannot imagine why Conductor Paur should want to lift it from the obscurity into which it had been relegated for years.

The solo numbers were given by Mr. Timothee Adamowski and Miss Gertrude Franklin. Miss Franklin gave Miss Lang's concert aria, and did the best she could with it. She was in excellent voice, but the orchestration was so vigorous that it at times destroyed the effect of what would otherwise have been a very enjoyable number. It cannot be said that the aria was musically strong. Miss Lang had high ideals, but in their attainment has not reached the objective point with this work.

Miss Franklin's efforts were rewarded with liberal applause, and she was twice recalled. She did not respond with another selection, however, much to the regret of her many admirers who were present.

Mr. Adamowski, solo violinist, never appeared to better advantage than in his performance of the delightful Scotch fantasia. Hearing him, and noting his splendid reading and his marvellous technique, one recalls the words in Longfellow's "Hyperion," that seem so applicable in his case: "Wonderful, and many were the soft accords and plaintive sounds that came from that little instrument, touched by the clever hand. Every feeling of the human heart seemed to find an expression there, and awaken a kindred feeling in the hearts of those who heard him."

Mr. Adamowski is master of his art. He is always heard by musical Boston with sincerest pleasure, and when he closed the allegro guerriero, in E flat major, 4—4 time, with its brilliant thematic development and phrasing by the orchestra, he was accorded a splendid ovation and recalled to the stage four times.

Next Saturday evening the program will be unfinished symphony, Schubert; concerto No. 2, for pianoforte, Brahms; overture, "Egmont," Beethoven. Mr. Rafael Joseffy is to be the soloist.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 15, 1896.

This was the program of the eleventh Symphony concert:

Symphony, No. 6, B minor, Pathétique.....Tschaikowsky
Scotch Fantasia, for violin.....Bruch
Concert aria, Armida (MS.).....Miss Lang
(First time.)
Overture to The Corsair.....Berlioz
(First time.)

It is hard to write in discriminating words about the superb performance of the noble symphony of Tschaikowsky. The work was first produced here in December, 1894. The third movement then seemed comparatively trivial. Last night it seemed to have more significance. Is it not possible that the composer wished to contrast strongly the intrinsic vulgarity of earthly glory and the terrible solemnity of death?

They say, you know, that Tschaikowsky did not die of cholera; that tired of the joys and the sorrows of life he poisoned himself; and so this requiem was written for himself. This third movement, then, may be as fraught with meaning as the first, the second and the last: the first with its mixture of heart-breaking tragedy, in which sensuousness necessarily enters; the second with its mastery of the perplexing rhythm of life and the obstinate pedal which sounds through strains of gaiety, and constantly reminds the dancer of the dance of Death; and the final elegy, the sonorous burial chant of humanity. It seems to me that no one since Beethoven has in absolute music so wrung the heart and fired the imagination as has Tschaikowsky in this marvelous symphony.

* * *

The bringing out of the Corsair overture was an act of doubtful reverence. It is the weak work of a strong man. If one of the less familiar pieces of Berlioz was needed, why not the King Lear overture?

Mr. Adamowski gave a thoroughly delightful performance of Bruch's fantasia. His tone in cantabile was pure and warm and tender, free from sentimentalism and exaggeration of any kind, and in bravura his technique was amply adequate. It was indeed an admirable performance.

Miss Lang chose as the text of her aria for soprano with orchestra the lament of Armida (Tasso's Jerusalem, Canto IV.—stanzas 70–73). The aria is undramatic, and at the same time without appealing melody. There is neither centre nor climax. The instrumentation is labored, thick, noisy. I do not see why Mr. Paur allowed it a hearing at a Symphony concert. Miss Franklin did with it what she could, and she displayed purity of tone and technical proficiency.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 13, 1896.

Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony Performed in Boston.

The concert of Saturday began with Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, which, on this occasion, received its second performance in Boston. Its first movement was given with a brilliancy that augured well for the rest. This same first movement makes very bold digressions from the path of Sonata-form, and if one were to judge by form only, one might find some fault with the work; its contents, however, are wonderful, and it has a right to be called one of the most expressive instrumental works of modern times.

It is always well to distrust a musical "story" connected with any composition; stories about Beethoven's "Moonlight" sonata, or Schumann's "Warum" are apt to disgust one with the sentimentality which is spun around music in defiance of all facts. A bit of fiction is beginning to weave itself around Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony in the same pseudo-historical guise. It is stated that the composer did not die of cholera, but committed suicide in a very premeditated manner, composing this symphony beforehand as his own elegy and requiem. Now, the facts of the case, as given in all detail in the Russian papers at the time of Tschaikowsky's death, all go to contradict this very romantic tale. Tschaikowsky had taken some food in a St. Petersburg restaurant that seemed not quite fresh; a friend who was with him, warned him of the danger of tasting a doubtful dish in a cholera season; the composer laughed at the excessive caution of his companion; soon after the meal, however, he began to feel ill. A proof that there had been no attempt at suicide is found in the fact that a physician was at once summoned by order of the patient himself, who did everything in his power to aid the doctor's efforts. The newspapers give every detail of the ensuing illness, even to the remark made by the sick man to a young relative by his bedside—"You will never respect me again after seeing me in such a disgusting condition." The crisis seemed to have passed, and (again a fact that disproves the suicide story) Tschaikowsky seemed grateful in the highest degree to the doctor who had saved his life. Then came the relapse, the usual collapse of Asiatic cholera, and the immediate death of the composer.

These sick-room details are given only that a new romance may not be imported into an art that is too full of fictitious tales already; they are accessible to anyone who will look up a file of St. Petersburg newspapers and have them translated to him. Nevertheless the fact remains that this great threnody was the last great work of the composer and that the great musician sang his own requiem in this swan's song.

The second movement of the symphony is probably the most ingenious and sustained use of 5-4 rhythm that exists in music, and the tremendous organ-point made upon the kettledrum is not the least remarkable feature of this remarkable movement and is not only most impressive in itself, but accentuates the unusual rhythm in the most effective manner possible.

If ever it was proven that our orchestra has attained a most wonderful standard of technique it was shown in the performance of the third movement of this symphony. The responses between strings and woodwind were the perfection of an orchestral dialogue, and that march-theme which seemed the glorification of war and heroism, was given with a fervor and resistless force that was inspiring.

The last movement would have permitted more freedom of interpretation in shading and tempo, but was none the less very effectively performed. The baleful tones of the muted horns deserve an especial word of commendation; this is the ugliest tone that can be evoked from the orchestra, and is used by great composers to picture anything evil; Wagner uses it thus when Tannhaeuser determines to return to Venus, when the Flying Dutchman deserts Senta, when Ortrud weaves her wickedness about Elsa, or when Siegfried is murdered. Few composers however, have used it so sustainedly as Tschaikowsky does here. It is difficult to keep to exact pitch in producing such a tone, therefore it is worth recording that the hornplayers did this on this occasion, and in open as well as muted tones the horns played remarkably well throughout the symphony. The end of the work is something that once heard can never be forgotten; one listens to the heart-throbs growing fainter and fainter, slower and slower; at last the beating ceases and life is done; one might write "Death" instead of "Fine" at the end of this thrilling work. It was greatly appreciated by the audience as was evinced by applause at the end of each movement growing to an outburst of enthusiasm at the close of the work.

Bruch's Scotch Fantasie is a greater favorite with violinists than with Scotchmen. The Germans all (except Mendelssohn) have failed to reproduce the lilt and spirit of the Scottish muse. Bruch did not fail in this for want of trying. In "Fair Ellen" he apotheosized "The Campbells are Comin'," in "The Fiery Cross" he has turned to Sir Walter Scott for his inspiration and to the Gaelic folk-song for his themes, and in this same Scoth Fantasie he builds his finale upon "Scots wha Hae." Bruch once told the present writer that he was acquainted with nearly 400 Scotch folk-songs and that he had made the study of this [illegible] national music one of his chief.

[illegible] exactly Scotch spite of "Scots wha Hae." There is a strange flavor in the oatmeal, the "whuskey" is blended with Rhine wine, and the kilt has turned into Teutonic trousers. Mr. T. Adamowski played the work finely. This great artist is gaining all the time, and the surety of his tone, the expression which he imparted to the slow movement, the brilliancy of the duet with the flute in the second movement, the clear and pure style of his harmonics (particularly the high harmonic with which he ended the first movement) were all sufficient to account for the enthusiasm which recalled him again and again at the close of the work. Only in the finale did one find him somewhat lacking of the true breadth of the Ossianic heroism which Bruch (a veritable Tyrtaeus in his way) attempted to delineate here.

The second movement gives something of the drone of the bagpipes, but the "Chanter" scarcely breathes Scotch tunes. In this movement there is a phrase that is taken from a solo in the composer's own "Frithjof" (Bruch's greatest work), which afterwards appears in the finale, an odd instance of self-plagiarism.

Miss Lang's new concert-aria is by no means great enough for its subject; spite of an ensy leading of the parts, a fluency of orchestration, there is a lack of dramatic power in the work, certainly an absence of that sustained breadth which one might demand in a great aria. There were impressive moments but not an impressive whole. The beginning was striking enough and the monotony of sorrow which followed was at least permissible; there was a degree of melody at "Ask me no more" which was enhanced by the skill displayed in the imitations of the vocal part upon the violincello, and there was enough of dissonance to satisfy the musical radicals; but sustained dramatic power there was not, and the great scene from Torquato Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered" demands as mighty treatment as the abandonment of Dido (which it in some degree resembles) and the burning of the palace and the rushing to death in combat cannot be portrayed even by the most respectable music, for true dramatic instinct is here imperative. Of the queer alterations in the words, the contrast of earnest poetry and prose sentimentality we prefer not to speak. It must be added that Miss Lang's work was placed in a position that would try any composer; it came after the most expressive and dramatic symphony of the modern repertoire, and a most warlike and heroic Fantasie, and it was followed by a very fiery overture. It is quite possible that, heard with less trying surroundings, the work would make a more favorable impression.

Berlioz's overture to "The Corsair" began with ferocity but gradually led into themes more directly melodious than this composer generally used, melodies that Auber might have originated. Whether the concert had been too long or the warlike tendency of things had been pushed too far we cannot say, but the work left no marked impression of any kind. The violins did their mad rushes with much unanimity, the contrasts were all sharply drawn, as Berlioz evidently wished them, but one was glad at the close that the duty of listening to a new work by Berlioz (for it was the first time the overture had a Boston hearing) had been accomplished, and that there would be no necessity for hearing it again.

Louis C. Elson.

MONDAY, JAN. 13, 1896.

BOSTON STANDARD.

The symphonic concert in Music Hall Saturday evening was the 11th of the season. It was, also, the 1348th performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the 726th performance in Boston. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetique" (second time).....Tschaikowsky
Fantasie on Scotch Folk-melodies, for violin.....Bruch
Concert aria, "Armida" (MS.) (first time).....Miss Lang
Overture to "The Corsair" (first time)..Berlioz

The Tschaikowsky symphony was first heard here about a year ago. It was warmly commended at that time, and at Saturday evening's representation was cordially received, and thoroughly enjoyed. This was the last work of the great master, and was published shortly before his death. It was in four movements; opening with a brief introduction, adagio, in B minor, and closing with a slow movement of funereal character, described by the program notes as "a long drawn, wailing threnody; now solemn and majestic; now impassioned in its expression, in which two contrasted themes are worked up with great dramatic power in perfectly free form."

This symphony is a noble treatment of an interesting theme, and the finale movement has been considered in the light of the author's requiem. The reading by Conductor Paur was intelligent and thoroughly satisfying, and the number was the most enjoyable of the evening.

The overture to Berlioz's "The Corsair," with which the concert was closed, was uninteresting, and was the least worthy of attention of the numbers on the evening's program. It is said that a custom of Berloiz was to destroy such of his work as he was not pleased with. After hearing the overture to "The Corsair," one could wish it had shared the fate of "Rob Roy," the "Six Scenes from Gothe's Faust," and other works. I cannot imagine why Conductor Paur should want to lift it from the obscurity into which it had been relegated for years.

The solo numbers were given by Mr. Timothee Adamowski and Miss Gertrude Franklin. Miss Franklin gave Miss Lang's concert aria, and did the best she could with it. She was in excellent voice, but the orchestration was so vigorous that it at times destroyed the effect of what would otherwise have been a very enjoyable number. It cannot be said that the aria was musically strong. Miss Lang had high ideals, but in their attainment has not reached the objective point with this work.

Miss Franklin's efforts were rewarded with liberal applause, and she was twice recalled. She did not respond with another selection, however, much to the regret of her many admirers who were present.

Mr. Adamowski, solo violinist, never appeared to better advantage than in his performance of the delightful Scotch fantasia. Hearing him, and noting his splendid reading and his marvellous technique, one recalls the words in Longfellow's "Hyperion," that seem so applicable in his case: "Wonderful, and many were the soft accords and plaintive sounds that came from that little instrument, touched by the clever hand. Every feeling of the human heart seemed to find an expression there, and awaken a kindred feeling in the hearts of those who heard him."

Mr. Adamowski is master of his art. He is always heard by musical Boston with sincerest pleasure, and when he closed the allegro guerriero, in E flat major, 4—4 time, with its brilliant thematic development and phrasing by the orchestra, he was accorded a splendid ovation and recalled to the stage four times.

Next Saturday evening the program will be unfinished symphony, Schubert; concerto No. 2, for pianoforte, Brahms; overture, "Egmont," Beethoven. Mr. Rafael Joseffy is to be the soloist.

—o—

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 15, 1896.

This was the program of the eleventh Symphony concert:

Symphony, No. 6, B minor, Pathétique.....Tschaikowsky
Scotch Fantasia, for violin.....Bruch
Concert aria, Armida (MS.).....Miss Lang
(First time.)
Overture to The Corsair.....Berlioz
(First time.)

It is hard to write in discriminating words about the superb performance of the noble symphony of Tschaikowsky. The work was first produced here in December, 1894. The third movement then seemed comparatively trivial. Last night it seemed to have more significance. Is it not possible that the composer wished to contrast strongly the intrinsic vulgarity of earthly glory and the terrible solemnity of death?

They say, you know, that Tschaikowsky did not die of cholera; that tired of the joys and the sorrows of life he poisoned himself; and so this requiem was written for himself. This third movement, then, may be as fraught with meaning as the first, the second and the last: the first with its mixture of heart-breaking tragedy, in which sensuousness necessarily enters; the second with its mastery of the perplexing rhythm of life and the obstinate pedal which sounds through strains of gaiety, and constantly reminds the dancer of the dance of Death; and the final elegy, the sonorous burial chant of humanity. It seems to me that no one since Beethoven has in absolute music so wrung the heart and fired the imagination as has Tschaikowsky in this marvelous symphony.

* * *

The bringing out of the Corsair overture was an act of doubtful reverence. It is the weak work of a strong man. If one of the less familiar pieces of Berlioz was needed, why not the King Lear overture?

Mr. Adamowski gave a thoroughly delightful performance of Bruch's fantasia. His tone in cantabile was pure and warm and tender, free from sentimentalism and exaggeration of any kind, and in bravura his technique was amply adequate. It was indeed an admirable performance.

Miss Lang chose as the text of her aria for soprano with orchestra the lament of Armida (Tasso's Jerusalem, Canto IV.—stanzas 70–73). The aria is undramatic, and at the same time without appealing melody. There is neither centre nor climax. The instrumentation is labored, thick, noisy. I do not see why Mr. Paur allowed it a hearing at a Symphony concert. Miss Franklin did with it what she could, and she displayed purity of tone and technical proficiency.

Philip Hale.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 13, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eleventh symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Tschaikowsky: Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique," opus 74.
(Second time.)

Max Bruch: Fantasia on Scotch Folk-melodies, for violin, opus 46.

Margaret Ruthven Lang: Concert-Aria, "Armida," opus 24 (MS.)
(First time.)

Berlioz: Overture to "Le Corsair," opus 21.
(First time.)

Miss Gertrude Franklin was the singer and Mr. Timothée Adamowski, the violinist.

Tschaikowsky's B-minor symphony is a wonderful work. At its first performance here, last year, it made the immediate impression of being up to the composer's highest level; and now, after a second hearing, one doubts whether it is really to be matched by any other work of his. It is a work of genius from beginning to end; and we cannot now think of any other work of true genius in the whole range of music that makes so peculiar an impression upon the listener. No doubt this impression is intensified and made more distinct by the legend (said to be authentic), that Tschaikowsky himself said—before the work was brought out—that it would be his last symphony, and that he died the day after its first performance. The symphony is so thoroughly romantic in design and character that one cannot well help looking for some meaning behind it; it is next to impossible to look at it purely and simply as music; one feels that it tells a story. Of the real facts of Tschaikowsky's life—except such as are set down in encyclopedias—we know nothing; but this last symphony of his tells the saddest story, a tragedy of the most pitiable sort. It seems like one long wail of grief and despair over lost illusions, hard-earned experience, that was not worth the earning, and the final knowledge that the wages of sin is death. One would think that never had such complete physical misery and mental wretchedness been so eloquently set to music before; whether we take that wondrous love-theme in the first movement—the saddest theme Tschaikowsky ever wrote, for it seems to tell of a youthful ardor and enthusiasm that have long since been burnt out, and are now doubly tragic, as the memory of something no longer possible—or the forced high spirits (as if fighting against nervous prostration, under the shadow of approaching paresis) of the 5-4 second movement, or again the utter blackness of despair of the Finale:—whichever of these we take, it speaks of nothing but sorrow, desperation that cannot take to the sham-relief of irony, and is equally impotent to force itself to the calmness of resignation. Poets (so-called) have sung in this despairing vein before; and, like enough, a composer or two may have piped to this hopeless strain; but seldom, if ever, with true genius—which brings some comfort even to the most despondent singer. What constitutes the novelty of this symphony of Tschaikowsky's in the history of art, is that it is wholly morbid, unredeemedly and irredeemably despairing, and at the same time most unquestionably a work of the truest and most genuine genius. It is a work for Max Nordau to descant upon, and for others to weep over. Never has Tschaikowsky shown himself more truly great than in this passionate wail over the nothingness of life. It is the wail of a giant with no soundness left in him; but still the wail of a giant!

With this stupendous symphony at the beginning of a programme, Berlioz's "Corsairs" overture came at the end as a sort of Mephistopheles sneer at the nothingness of genius. Heavens! how commonplace and trivial it sounded! But we cannot yet believe that it was wholly the score's fault. Berlioz may have been this or that, but—save in the eyes of a Mendelssohn or a Moscheles (suffering from an acute attack of classic purism)—he was at least never downright stupid. If the performance of the Tschaikowsky symphony was admirable throughout, the performance of this overture of Berlioz's had plainly much to answer for. For one thing, a Berlioz "Allegro assai" is not an Handelian "Tempo giusto." The "Corsaire" may not be one of Berlioz's strongest works; but it can be made to sound better than it did last Saturday, or we are much mistaken!

Miss Lang's new aria is a work to be considered very seriously. Without being in the least French in feeling, it is very much in the contemporary French dramatic style—a style in which, if the truth be told, we personally are just beginning to find our bearings. It seemed to us that, in her setting of this excerpt from Tasso's "Gerusalemme liberata," Miss Lang had struck a very true note of dramatic musical expression; more so perhaps in the arioso portions than in the passages of recitative. Much of the melodic writing is very broad and noble, and the whole treatment of the orchestra admirable; it shows that Miss Lang appreciates well what the true gist of "modern orchestration" is, and that it means something far finer and more subtile than the mere massing together of numerous instruments. Miss Franklin sang the aria with devotion and sincerity; it seemed to us that the composition was conceived for a heavier voice and a larger, more heroic style of singing. But it is ill quarrelling with an artist's physique; let it be enough to say that Miss Franklin sang like an artist.

It seemed to us that Mr. Adamowski never appeared to greater advantage than in Max Bruch's "Scotch" fantasia. We had all heard that he had been practising more than usual for the last eight or ten months; and his performance last Saturday evening showed the good results of it. His playing of the fantasia was immensely fine; facile, sure, and brilliant in point of technique; showing great vigor and intelligence of conception; full of the most appealing sensibility. It is pleasant to dwell a little upon a fine point now and then. Mr. Adamowski's playing of the opening, recitative portions of the introduction struck us as peculiarly and unusually fine. It was a very manly stroke of artistic wisdom to begin in [illegible] he did not burning all his dramatic and sensational powder at the first dash. We remember being struck some twenty years ago with Christine Nilsson's beginning Beethoven's "Per pieta, non dirmi addio" in much the same way; not forcing the dramatic note, but beginning the air with the gentlest appealing sweetness of expression, "en voix blanche." Mr. Adamowski's beginning the fantasia in this quiet, poetic way made its effect immediately; and it allowed him to make all the more effect with his more strenuous playing, afterwards, when it was time for him to get upon his high horse. This is but one point; but several more could be mentioned, had we time for it. Let it be enough to say that Mr. Adamowski showed something so very like genius throughout his performance that we, for one, are quite willing to accept it for genius. And we are perfectly aware of what a very big word "genius" is.

The next programme is: Schubert, unfinished symphony in B minor; Brahms, pianoforte concerto No. 2, in B-flat major, opus 83; Beethoven, overture to "Egmont." Mr. Rafael Joseffy will be the pianist.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIX., NO. 19.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 19, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Rafael Joseffy Makes His First Appearance in Boston in Six Years.

The current season of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra completed its first half with the performances of last evening. There were played:

Unfinished symphony.....Schubert
Concerto No. 2, for pianoforte.....Brahms
Overture, "Egmont".....Beethoven

The soloist was Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who, on this occasion, made his first appearance here in six years, and was given a welcome of exceptional sincerity and heartiness. The concerto has not been heard in Boston since it was played by Mr. Baermann at these same concerts, Dec. 8, 1888, under Mr. Gericke. It must be classed as one of the really great and lasting pianoforte concertos, despite something of tediousness in its first movement. The interest of the work is deeper in the second movement, but in the exquisite andante and the wonderfully fine and effective finale, with its three strongly marked and beautiful leading themes, treated with a flexibility, a grace, and a poetic and graceful warmth to which the composer has not often risen, it reaches as lofty a height as has ever been scaled in a work of its kind. Its performance by Mr. Joseffy was masterly in every noble sense of the word. His style has gained surprisingly in virility, maturity and dignity since he last played here, and in all that relates to what is best, most admirable and most satisfying in pianoforte playing this performance must be pronounced the most noteworthy that has been heard in Music Hall during the season thus far. It was solid, intellectual and manly from beginning to end.

Of the artist's technique there is no need to write. It has always been of the most perfect, and it has grown in firmness and strength. Such a performance was refreshing in its freedom from even a suggestion of mere virtuosity and sickly sentimentality, and in its vigorous earnestness, its devotion to the composer and the abstention of the player in forcing the artist to the front at the expense of the music it was especially welcome. Mr. Joseffy wears his hair short, his movements are brisk instead of languid; he seems to be pleased and excited rather than bored when he is applauded, and he recognizes applause with unmistakable gratification instead of melancholy condescension. He is, however, none the less a master in his art on this account. Mr. Joseffy's reading and playing of this work can be described only in superlatives. Especially brilliant, musicianly and large was his performance of the exactingly trying finale, not only in the splendid technique that successfully coped with it, but in the exquisite taste, the grace of expression and the sympathetic style that gave it a delightful and delighting distinction. The applause that rewarded the artist at the close of the concerto was overwhelming in its fervor and enthusiasm. He was recalled again and again until the audience fairly wore itself out. The concerto was accorded a perfect accompaniment by Mr. Paur, who was at his very best through the whole concert, and who gave a beautifully colored reading of the symphony and a glorious interpretation of the overture.

There will be no concert and rehearsal this week. At the concert to be given Feb. 1 will be played a Goldmark symphony, a suite by Godard (first time) and Rubinstein's overture, "Dimitri Donskoi." Mme. Melba is to be the soloist.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 19, 1896.

Twelfth Symphony Concert Last Evening in Music Hall, Mr. Emil Paur Conductor—The Triumph of Rafael Joseffy, Pianist.

The program of the 12th Symphony concert was as follows:

Unfinished Symphony in B minor....Schubert
Concerto for piano No. 2, B flat major .....Brahms
Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven

It was a great pleasure to welcome Mr. Joseffy again in Music Hall. His last appearance there with the Symphony Orchestra was Feb. 22, 1890, when he played Liszt's second concerto. Mr. Joseffy then had a most enviable reputation as a pianist in this country and in Europe. But, suddenly, he disappeared from the concert stage. The causes given for his retreat are many, most of them, no doubt, legendary. Occasionally reports of marvelous improvement have been circulated. When he did return to the stage, it was in Chicago, last season.

Now in the course of six years many pianists who at first dazzled at the zenith are at the end faintly perceptible just above the horizon, or their light is quenched forever. If they retire early of their own accord and for rigid self-examination, it sometimes happens that with constant study they grow distrustful of their ability; nervousness masters them; they dread the preparation for public performance and the ordeal itself; and so they are known in reality only by their intimate friends. Their names are no longer spells to conjure with. The amateur who never heard them shrugs his shoulders, and says, "Yes, according to report X was a great pianist, Y was a master of technique, Z was a passionate creature. But, you know, there have been great changes in piano playing since they were famous. If they were to play now, we probably would not think much of them."

It is a good thing, then, for his own fame and for the pleasure of lovers of music, that Mr. Joseffy has at last broken his silence.

* * *

His choice of a concerto shows the high purpose and the pure aim; for the second concerto of Brahms is not one to tickle the ear, stun the judgment and provoke cheap and boisterous applause. It was in 1859, at Leipzig, that Brahms first played his D minor concerto. It was at Vienna, Dec. 26, 1880, that he first played the second concerto at a Philharmonic concert. And as the second symphony of Brahms is to the first, so is the second concerto of Brahms to the first. In each case, while the passion is less stormy, the thoughts are less crabbed and gnarled. Only in the first movement of the B flat major concerto does Brahms "keep up a terrible thinking."

The second fascinates by its sturdiness and rhythmic capriciousness; the third movement is Brahms at his noblest, when his thought is as lofty and serenely beautiful as a summer sky at noon. And who can describe in words the enchanting, haunting delight of the finale—music like unto the perfect verse of a supreme poet whose imagination is kindled by wild or melancholy tales told him in youth by gypsy lips.

* * *

The performance of this concerto by Mr. Joseffy was the most admirable piano playing that has been heard in Music Hall for several years. This statement, made in tolerably cool blood, means much. And why this enthusiasm?

Mr. Joseffy realized first of all that the concerto is properly a symphony with the piano obbligato. His instrument was only one of many.

At the start he seemed disposed to nervousness, but he quickly recovered himself, and then until the end a crescendo of admiration was the result, and the accompaniment of the crescendo of his ability.

While he still retains rare crispness of touch and clearness of technique (precision that is never metallic, his technique has broadened without a loss of delicacy and exquisiteness of tone. The hearer never thought of technique; he was absorbed in the music of the much-abused instrument. Never was there a forced tone; never was there a reminder of strings, keys, hammers, sounding board and pedals. The piano itself, under such hands, confessed that after all it is a musical instrument.

In the phrasing there was no such attention paid to the coloring of a petty detail that the significance of the phrase in connection with the orchestra was lost. When the piano dominated, it was as a righteous master, not as a tyrant.

Add to a complete mastery of technique, a temperament that found itself in full sympathy with the changing moods of Brahms; a sense of rhythm that was not rigidly expressed, but was as sure and fluent and unconscious as are the rhythms in nature; a feeling for nuances rather than for gaudy colors; and an entire absence of anything that was theatrical or spectacular.

"He nothing common did, or mean
Upon that memorable scene."

* * *

No wonder that the applause was spontaneous, and long continued. No wonder that there were recalls without end. There was a glorious tribute to a display of uncommon art. There was the heart-felt gratitude at hearing again one of the very few great pianists of the world.

* * *

The orchestra played superbly throughout the concert. Solo work and ensemble were alike worthy of the highest praise.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 19, 1896.

Twelfth Symphony Concert.

The principal feature of the symphony concert last week was the first appearance here in several years of the great pianist, Rafael Joseffy, who played the concerto No. 2 by Brahms. The orchestral numbers were Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," and Beethoven's overture to "Egmont." Mr Joseffy has been in comparative retirement for three or four years, but the remembrance of his artistic work on former occasions was still fresh in the minds of concert patrons, and few artists can boast of a heartier indorsement from admiring auditors than that which greeted this performer at the close of the concerts. The enthusiasm of the audience was somewhat unusual, and it extended to the members of the orchestra who spontaneously joined in the applause showered upon the soloist.

The modesty of the man, which appeared almost as diffidence, was notable, and in his interpretation of Brahms the auditor instinctively felt that the composer's sentiments were being presented with artistic fidelity and intelligence and with each part given its proper value; that the interpreter, for the time, was merely the medium through whom the writer's ideas were given musical form without affectation. His command of the piano seems perfect, and his pedal work is remarkable.

In this concerto there is not a preponderance of pure solo playing, the instrument being largely used with the orchestra, but in every way Joseffy meets the requirements of the composer. The opening cadenza was most delicately played, and the subsequent ornamentations were as clear and fluently set forth as one could wish to hear. Joseffy's touch is remarkable, and even in the difficult passage work he was not overshadowed by the orchestra. The exquisite, singing quality of his tone probably accounts for this result.

In the andante the brilliant themes were grandly played, and in the more quiet passages the delicacy, clearness and dreamy tenderness of the phrases were expressed as no one but a great artist could have done. In arpeggios, double runs and octaves his execution was faultless, and, by contrast, the tripping measures of the last movement were equally worthy of high praise. In short, all the beauties of the concerto were set forth with skill of the highest order. The orchestra deserves high commendation for its share in the performance. The entrances were made in perfect tempo with the soloist, and all the lights and shades of expression were finely preserved. Mr Paur led the musical dialogues between the piano and orchestra without a break.

The unfinished symphony of Schubert was given a poetic interpretation by the orchestra. The celli sang the harmonies of the first movement very sweetly, and the oboes and clarinets admirably sustained their part of the work. The precising of the strings throughout the symphony was not broken, and the forte passages by the full band were given with the stirring effect which ensembles always receive from this body of players. Beethoven's "Egmont" overture was played with all necessary sonority and impressiveness.

There will be no concert this week. The program for next week will include a symphony by Goldmark, suite by Godard, first time, and Rubinstein's overture, "Dimitri Donskoi." Mme Melba will be the soloist.

BOSTON POST,

JANUARY 19, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Schubert's unfinished symphony, the Beethoven overture to "Egmont" and Brahms's concerto for piano was the programme at the symphony concert last night. There was a large and enthusiastic audience, drawn thither principally because of the soloist of the evening—Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who has not been heard in this city for some six years. At that time he occupied almost the foremost position among pianists, and while he is still a beautiful and accomplished musician, his work seems to lack the magnetism which it once possessed.

The Brahms concerto, in four movements, is a thoroughly musical composition, full of beautiful passages, but Mr. Joseffy's playing of it, especially the first two numbers, lacked color and contrast. The first movement does not offer the difficulties to the performer that the other movements do, though it contains much beauty, and while he gave a satisfactory rendering of it, not so much can be said for the scerzo which followed, in which he failed to catch the real spirit of the moment. The third and fourth movements were by all odds the best, the enthusiasm of the audience having worked him up to the occasion. In the fourth movement he clearly brought out the several contrasting themes, and the brilliant execution of the movement sent him off the stage at its close amid tremendous applause, and as a tribute to his ability to please he was recalled eight times.

The Schubert unfinished symphony is always a welcome number on the programme, and the orchestra read it beautifully, clearly bringing out all the charm and sentiment of each movement. The "Egmont" overture, as an example of masterly orchestration, stands rather unique, and when our own symphony players take hold of it, it is performed most intelligently.

There will be no concert next week, but the programme for the following week will include the numbers by Goldmark, Godard and Rubenstein, with Mme. Melba as the soloist.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 13, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eleventh symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Tschaikowsky: Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique," opus 74.

(Second time.)

Max Bruch: Fantasia on Scotch Folk-melodies, for violin, opus 46.

Margaret Ruthven Lang: Concert-Aria, "Armida," opus 24 (MS.)

(First time.)

Berlioz: Overture to "Le Corsair," opus 21.

(First time.)

Miss Gertrude Franklin was the singer and Mr. Timothée Adamowski, the violinist.

Tschaikowsky's B-minor symphony is a wonderful work. At its first performance here, last year, it made the immediate impression of being up to the composer's highest level; and now, after a second hearing, one doubts whether it is really to be matched by any other work of his. It is a work of genius from beginning to end; and we cannot now think of any other work of true genius in the whole range of music that makes so peculiar an impression upon the listener. No doubt this impression is intensified and made more distinct by the legend (said to be authentic) that Tschaikowsky himself said—before the work was brought out—that it would be his last symphony, and that he died the day after its first performance. The symphony is so thoroughly romantic in design and character that one cannot well help looking for some meaning behind it; it is next to impossible to look at it purely and simply as music; one feels that it tells a story. Of the real facts of Tschaikowsky's life—except such as are set down in encyclopedias—we know nothing; but this last symphony of his tells the saddest story, a tragedy of the most pitiable sort. It seems like one long wail of grief and despair over lost illusions, hard-earned experience, that was not worth the earning, and the final knowledge that the wages of sin is death. One would think that never had such complete physical misery and mental wretchedness been so eloquently set to music before; whether we take that wondrous love-theme in the first movement—the saddest theme Tschaikowsky ever wrote, for it seems to tell of a youthful ardor and enthusiasm that have long since been burnt out, and are now doubly tragic, as the memory of something no longer possible—or the forced high spirits (as if fighting against nervous prostration, under the shadow of approaching paresis) of the 5-4 second movement, or again the utter blackness of despair of the Finale:—whichever of these we take, it speaks of nothing but sorrow, desperation that cannot take to the sham-relief of irony, and is equally impotent to force itself to the calmness of resignation. Poets (so-called) have sung in this despairing vein before; and, like enough, a composer or two may have piped to this hopeless strain; but seldom, if ever, with true genius—which brings some comfort even to the most despondent singer. What constitutes the novelty of this symphony of Tschaikowsky's in the history of art, is that it is wholly morbid, unredeemedly and irredeemably despairing, and at the same time most unquestionably a work of the truest and most genuine genius. It is a work for Max Nordau to descant upon, and for others to weep over. Never has Tschaikowsky shown himself more truly great than in this passionate wail over the nothingness of life. It is the wail of a giant with no soundness left in him; but still the wail of a giant!

With this stupendous symphony at the beginning of a programme, Berlioz's "Corsairs" overture came at the end as a sort of Mephistopheles sneer at the nothingness of genius. Heavens! how commonplace and trivial it sounded! But we cannot yet believe that it was wholly the score's fault. Berlioz may have been this or that, but—save in the eyes of a Mendelssohn or a Moscheles (suffering from an acute attack of classic purism)—he was at least never downright stupid. If the performance of the Tschaikowsky symphony was admirable throughout, the performance of this overture of Berlioz's had plainly much to answer for. For one thing, a Berlioz "Allegro assai" is not an Handelian "Tempo giusto." The "Corsaire" may not be one of Berlioz's strongest works; but it can be made to sound better than it did last Saturday, or we are much mistaken!

Miss Lang's new aria is a work to be considered very seriously. Without being in the leastFrench in feeling, it is very much in the contemporary French dramatic style—a style in which, if the truth be told, we personally are just beginning to find our bearings. It seemed to us that, in her setting of this excerpt from Tasso's "Gerusalemme liberata," Miss Lang had struck a very true note of dramatic musical expression; more so perhaps in the arioso portions than in the passages of recitative. Much of the melodic writing is very broad and noble, and the whole treatment of the orchestra admirable; it shows that Miss Lang appreciates well what the true gist of "modern orchestration" is, and that it means something far finer and more subtile than the mere massing together of numerous instruments. Miss Franklin sang the aria with devotion and sincerity; it seemed to us that the composition was conceived for a heavier voice and a larger, more heroic style of singing. But it is ill quarrelling with an artist's physique; let it be enough to say that Miss Franklin sang like an artist.

It seemed to us that Mr. Adamowski never appeared to greater advantage than in Max Bruch's "Scotch" fantasia. We had all heard that he had been practising more than usual for the last eight or ten months; and his performance last Saturday evening showed the good results of it. His playing of the fantasia was immensely fine; facile, sure, and brilliant in point of technique; showing great vigor and intelligence of conception; full of the most appealing sensibility. It is pleasant to dwell a little upon a fine point now and then. Mr. Adamowski's playing of the opening, recitative portions of the introduction struck us as peculiarly and unusually fine. It was a very many stroke of artistic wisdom to begin in [illegible] did; not burning all his dramatic and sensational powder at the first dash. We remember being struck some twenty years ago with Christine Nilsson's beginning Beethoven's "Per pieta, non dirmi addio" in much the same way; not forcing the dramatic note, but beginning the air with the gentlest appealing sweetness of expression, "en voix blanche." Mr. Adamowski's beginning the fantasia in this quiet, poetic way made its effect immediately; and it allowed him to make all the more effect with his more strenuous playing, afterwards, when it was time for him to get upon his high horse. This is but one point; but several more could be mentioned, had we time for it. Let it be enough to say that Mr. Adamowski showed something so very like genius throughout his performance that we, for one, are quite willing to accept it for genius. And we are perfectly aware of what a very big word "genius" is.

The next programme is: Schubert, unfinished symphony in B minor; Brahms, pianoforte concerto No. 2, in B-flat major, opus 83; Beethoven, overture to "Egmont." Mr. Rafael Joseffy will be the pianist.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.

VOL. XCIX., NO. 19.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 19, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Rafael Joseffy Makes His First Appearance in Boston in Six Years.

The current season of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra completed its first half with the performances of last evening. There were played:

Unfinished symphony.....Schubert
Concerto No. 2, for pianoforte.....Brahms
Overture, "Egmont".....Beethoven

The soloist was Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who, on this occasion, made his first appearance here in six years, and was given a welcome of exceptional sincerity and heartiness. The concerto has not been heard in Boston since it was played by Mr. Baermann at these same concerts, Dec. 8, 1888, under Mr. Gericke. It must be classed as one of the really great and lasting pianoforte concertos, despite something of tediousness in its first movement. The interest of the work is deeper in the second movement, but in the exquisite andante and the wonderfully fine and effective finale, with its three strongly marked and beautiful leading themes, treated with a flexibility, a grace, and a poetic and graceful warmth to which the composer has not often risen, it reaches as lofty a height as has ever been scaled in a work of its kind. Its performance by Mr. Joseffy was masterly in every noble sense of the word. His style has gained surprisingly in virility, maturity and dignity since he last played here, and in all that relates to what is best, most admirable and most satisfying in pianoforte playing this performance must be pronounced the most noteworthy that has been heard in Music Hall during the season thus far. It was solid, intellectual and manly from beginning to end.

Of the artist's technique there is no need to write. It has always been of the most perfect, and it has grown in firmness and strength. Such a performance was refreshing in its freedom from even a suggestion of mere virtuosity and sickly sentimentality, and in its vigorous earnestness, its devotion to the composer and the abstention of the player in forcing the artist to the front at the expense of the music it was especially welcome. Mr. Joseffy wears his hair short, his movements are brisk instead of languid; he seems to be pleased and excited rather than bored when he is applauded, and he recognizes applause with unmistakable gratification instead of melancholy condescension. He is, however, none the less a master in his art on this account. Mr. Joseffy's reading and playing of this work can be described only in superlatives. Especially brilliant, musicianly and large was his performance of the exactingly trying finale, not only in the splendid technique that successfully coped with it, but in the exquisite taste, the grace of expression and the sympathetic style that gave it a delightful and delighting distinction. The applause that rewarded the artist at the close of the concerto was overwhelming in its fervor and enthusiasm. He was recalled again and again until the audience fairly wore itself out. The concerto was accorded a perfect accompaniment by Mr. Paur, who was at his very best through the whole concert, and who gave a beautifully colored reading of the symphony and a glorious interpretation of the overture.

There will be no concert and rehearsal this week. At the concert to be given Feb. 1 will be played a Goldmark symphony, a suite by Godard (first time) and Rubinstein's overture, "Dimitri Donskoi." Mme. Melba is to be the soloist.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 19, 1896.

Twelfth Symphony Concert Last Evening in Music Hall, Mr. Emil Paur Conductor—The Triumph of Rafael Joseffy, Pianist.

The program of the 12th Symphony concert was as follows:

Unfinished Symphony in B minor....Schubert
Concerto for piano No. 2, B flat major.....Brahms
Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven

It was a great pleasure to welcome Mr. Joseffy again in Music Hall. His last appearance there with the Symphony Orchestra was Feb. 22, 1890, when he played Liszt's second concerto. Mr. Joseffy then had a most enviable reputation as a pianist in this country and in Europe. But, suddenly, he disappeared from the concert stage. The causes given for his retreat are many, most of them, no doubt, legendary. Occasionally reports of marvelous improvement have been circulated. When he did return to the stage, it was in Chicago, last season.

Now in the course of six years many pianists who at first dazzled at the zenith are at the end faintly perceptible just above the horizon, or their light is quenched forever. If they retire early of their own accord and for rigid self-examination, it sometimes happens that with constant study they grow distrustful of their ability; nervousness masters them; they dread the preparation for public performance and the ordeal itself; and so they are known in reality only by their intimate friends. Their names are no longer spells to conjure with. The amateur who never heard them shrugs his shoulders, and says, "Yes, according to report X was a great pianist, Y was a master of technique, Z was a passionate creature. But, you know, there have been great changes in piano playing since they were famous. If they were to play now, we probably would not think much of them."

It is a good thing, then, for his own fame and for the pleasure of lovers of music, that Mr. Joseffy has at last broken his silence.

* * *

His choice of a concerto shows the high purpose and the pure aim; for the second concerto of Brahms is not one to tickle the ear, stun the judgment and provoke cheap and boisterous applause. It was in 1859, at Leipzig, that Brahms first played his D minor concerto. It was at Vienna, Dec. 26, 1880, that he first played the second concerto at a Philharmonic concert. And as the second symphony of Brahms is to the first, so is the second concerto of Brahms to the first. In each case, while the passion is less stormy, the thoughts are less crabbed and gnarled. Only in the first movement of the B flat major concerto does Brahms "keep up a terrible thinking."

The second fascinates by its sturdiness and rhythmic capriciousness; the third movement is Brahms at his noblest, when his thought is as lofty and serenely beautiful as a summer sky at noon. And who can describe in words the enchanting, haunting delight of the finale—music like unto the perfect verse of a supreme poet whose imagination is kindled by wild or melancholy tales told him in youth by gypsy lips.

* * *

The performance of this concerto by Mr. Joseffy was the most admirable piano playing that has been heard in Music Hall for several years. This statement, made in tolerably cool blood, means much. And why this enthusiasm?

Mr. Joseffy realized first of all that the concerto is properly a symphony with the piano obbligato. His instrument was only one of many.

At the start he seemed disposed to nervousness, but he quickly recovered himself, and then until the end a crescendo of admiration was the result, and the accompaniment of the crescendo of his ability.

While he still retains rare crispness of touch and clearness of technique (precision that is never metallic, his technique has broadened without a loss of delicacy and exquisiteness of tone. The hearer never thought of technique; he was absorbed in the music of the much-abused instrument. Never was there a forced tone; never was there a reminder of strings, keys, hammers, sounding board and pedals. The piano itself, under such hands, confessed that after all it is a musical instrument.

In the phrasing there was no such attention paid to the coloring of a petty detail that the significance of the phrase in connection with the orchestra was lost. When the piano dominated, it was as a righteous master, not as a tyrant.

Add to a complete mastery of technique, a temperament that found itself in full sympathy with the changing moods of Brahms; a sense of rhythm that was not rigidly expressed, but was as sure and fluent and unconscious as are the rhythms in nature; a feeling for nuances rather than for gaudy colors; and an entire absence of anything that was theatrical or spectacular.

"He nothing common did, or mean
Upon that memorable scene."

* * *

No wonder that the applause was spontaneous, and long continued. No wonder that there were recalls without end. There was a glorious tribute to a display of uncommon art. There was the heart-felt gratitude at hearing again one of the very few great pianists of the world.

* * *

The orchestra played superbly throughout the concert. Solo work and ensemble were alike worthy of the highest praise.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 19, 1896.

Twelfth Symphony Concert.

The principal feature of the symphony concert last week was the first appearance here in several years of the great pianist, Rafael Joseffy, who played the concerto No. 2 by Brahms. The orchestral numbers were Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, and Beethoven's overture to "Egmont." Mr Joseffy has been in comparative retirement for three or four years, but the remembrance of his artistic work on former occasions was still fresh in the minds of concert patrons, and few artists can boast of a heartier indorsement from admiring auditors than that which greeted this performer at the close of the concerts. The enthusiasm of the audience was somewhat unusual, and it extended to the members of the orchestra who spontaneously joined in the applause showered upon the soloist.

The modesty of the man, which appeared almost as diffidence, was notable, and in his interpretation of Brahms the auditor instinctively felt that the composer's sentiments were being presented with artistic fidelity and intelligence and with each part given its proper value; that the interpreter, for the time, was merely the medium through whom the writer's ideas were given musical form without affectation. His command of the piano seems perfect, and his pedal work is remarkable.

In this concerto there is not a preponderance of pure solo playing, the instrument being largely used with the orchestra, but in every way Joseffy meets the requirements of the composer. The opening cadenza was most delicately played, and the subsequent ornamentations were as clear and fluently set forth as one could wish to hear. Joseffy's touch is remarkable, and even in the difficult passage work he was not overshadowed by the orchestra. The exquisite, singing quality of his tone probably accounts for this result.

In the andante the brilliant themes were grandly played, and in the more quiet passages the delicacy, clearness and dreamy tenderness of the phrases were expressed as no one but a great artist could have done. In arpeggios, double runs and octaves his execution was faultless, and, by contrast, the tripping measures of the last movement were equally worthy of high praise. In short, all the beauties of the concerto were set forth with skill of the highest order. The orchestra deserves high commendation for its share in the performance. The entrances were made in perfect tempo with the soloist, and all the lights and shades of expression were finely preserved. Mr Paur led the musical dialogues between the piano and orchestra without a break.

The unfinished symphony of Schubert was given a poetic interpretation by the orchestra. The cellı sang the harmonies of the first movement very sweetly, and the oboes and clarinets admirably sustained their part of the work. The precising of the strings throughout the symphony was not broken, and the forte passages by the full band were given with the stirring effect which ensembles always receive from this body of players. Beethoven's "Egmont" overture was played with all necessary sonority and impressiveness.

There will be no concert this week. The program for next week will include a symphony by Goldmark, suite by Godard, first time, and Rubinstein's overture, "Dimitri Donskoi." Mme Melba will be the soloist.

BOSTON POST,

JANUARY 19, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Schubert's unfinished symphony, the Beethoven overture to "Egmont" and Brahms's concerto for piano was the programme at the symphony concert last night. There was a large and enthusiastic audience, drawn thither principally because of the soloist of the evening—Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who has not been heard in this city for some six years. At that time he occupied almost the foremost position among pianists, and while he is still a beautiful and accomplished musician, his work seems to lack the magnetism which it once possessed.

The Brahms concerto, in four movements, is a thoroughly musical composition, full of beautiful passages, but Mr. Joseffy's playing of it, especially the first two numbers, lacked color and contrast. The first movement does not offer the difficulties to the performer that the other movements do, though it contains much beauty, and while he gave a satisfactory rendering of it, not so much can be said for the scherzo which followed, in which he failed to catch the real spirit of the moment. The third and fourth movements were by all odds the best, the enthusiasm of the audience having worked him up to the occasion. In the fourth movement he clearly brought out the several contrasting themes, and the brilliant execution of the movement sent him off the stage at its close amid tremendous applause, and as a tribute to his ability to please he was recalled eight times.

The Schubert unfinished symphony is always a welcome number on the programme, and the orchestra read it beautifully, clearly bringing out all the charm and sentiment of each movement. The "Egmont" overture, as an example of masterly orchestration, stands rather unique, and when our own symphony players take hold of it, it is performed most intelligently.

There will be no concert next week, but the programme for the following week will include the numbers by Goldmark, Godard and Rubenstein, with Mme. Melba as the soloist.

REDUCTION

RATIO

13x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

Society Folk Have a Lively and Satisfactory Week.

Three Dinners "Twelfth Night," and Six Preceded the Assembly, Friday Night—The Latter Was a Brilliant and Enjoyable Affair—The Symphony Concert—Events to Come.

[From Our Special Correspondent.]

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Jan. 11, 1896. The week, despite the vagaries of the weather, has been much more satisfactory and lively, socially speaking, than its predecessor. It emphasized very prominently the fact that the dinner season is on in earnest, and there were appetites for the dining, which the temperature helped to bring about. Then, it also testified that, if the young set was not included among the dinner guests, it could have a good time by itself, playing whist, eating Welsh rarebits and arranging impromptu Dutch suppers.

The week opened with three dinners on "twelfth night," and ended last evening with six, which preceded the ball; then there was a Boston Symphony concert and theatre and hypnotic parties, and the ball last evening.

Mrs. James M. Coats, Mrs. W. W. White and Mrs. Lucian Sharpe gave the "twelfth night," entertaining from 10 to 12 guests each, although there was nothing special about the dinners to mark the festival, which was quaintly celebrated a year ago by Mrs. William Goddard with a truly English "twelfth night" party.

Mrs. Henry Pearce gave a pink and green dinner Wednesday evening, covers being laid for 10 guests. Mrs. Frank M. Matthewson gave a lavender dinner Thursday.

Friday the hostesses were Mrs. John H. K. Nightingale, Mrs. H. G. Miller, Mrs. Joseph E. Fletcher, Mrs. C. M. Smith, Mrs. E. D. Williams and Mrs. J. C. Brown.

The first three dinners were given in connection with the ball, so that the dinner guests were among the late arrivals. Mrs. Fletcher presented her lady guests with large corsages of violets, which they afterward wore at the ball.

It was quite interesting Wednesday evening, if one was so fortunate as to be numbered among the early arrivals at the Boston Symphony concert, to watch the effect of the letters published last Sunday in regard to late-comers and bonnetted ladies at concerts.

The interval, which has been longer than usual between the concerts, caused the largest attendance yet of the season. The gathering was certainly a brilliant and enthusiastic one, as when it was over the general expression was that it had proved a very enjoyable concert.

The concerts begin precisely at 8 o'clock, as they must end within two hours to enable the members of the orchestra to catch the 10 o'clock train to Boston. There is not any one in the audience who disappears as quickly as these musicians do, the moment their last note is sounded. Regardless of chairs, instruments, anything or anybody, they scamper away to catch that train.

The reopening of the doors at the end of the first movement of the Brahms symphony saw the arrival of the usual number of late-comers who had not sufficient time to gain their seats before the second movement began. So the letter in reference to late arrivals had no perceptible effect.

Providence audiences are proverbially late because the fact that performances here seldom commence on time has trained them in the formation of the habit. The Symphony concerts being obliged to be punctual, have made the tardiness very noticeable.

In response to the appeal for uncovered heads there were a score or more maidens who doffed their hats and bonnets and kept them in their laps, but there were as many more who wore large hats, with equally large plumes. The contrast was an interesting study during the intermissions, as well as was the general brilliancy of the audience.

Mrs. William Goddard, who returned early in the week from her visit to Mrs. Iselin, made her first appearance at this season's concerts, looking extremely well, and wearing a bodice of white satin and lace and toque of black velvet, with a steel and white aigrette. Near by were quite a number of white, blue and pink silk blouses, with dainty headgear, the entire feminine portion of the audience wearing brighter gowns than usual.

There were only three numbers on the programme, the Brahms symphony, the Liszt concerto and the performance for the first time of some delightful ballet music, a suite entitled "Namouna," by Edward Lalo.

During the intermission, while the platform was being made ready for Joseffy, there was considerable interchange of seats for chatting, all very unconscious, meanwhile, that Joseffy was very much exercised over his appearnce here, because by missing the train that he should have taken he failed to have a rehearsal with Mr. Paur and the orchestra. But there were only a few in the audience who were aware of his anxiety, and the concerto was rendered with such a mixture of delicacy and brilliancy that he was recalled again and again by both the orchestra and audience. But, notwithstanding the prolonged plaudits, he would not play again.

Everybody enjoyed the third number, the suite of ballet music, which Mr. Paur directed with characteristic motions, suited to its peculiar rhythm, and which was played by the complete orchestra, with the addition of a Boston lady harpist, who was quite secure from observation behind the 'cellos.

The Bostonians who came down to hear Joseffy managed, by hurrying, to return that evening with him.

Among the orchestra's auditors were Mr. and Mrs. William Goddard, Mr. and Mrs. Howard O. Sturges, Mr. and Mrs. W. W. White, Miss Marguerite Dwight, Mr. Edward M. Guild, Mr. J. O. Ames, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Metcalf, Mr. L. A. Hazard, Miss Hazard, Miss Hattie Hazard, Mrs. L. T. Foster, Miss Foster, Miss Mamie King, Mr. Max Heinrich, Mrs. Gottschalk, Mr. and Mrs. Fred Bart, Mr. and Mrs. Julian Herreshoff, Mrs. A. Budge, Miss Budge, Mr. E. F. Benedict, Mr. Lucian Sharpe, Miss Sharpe, Mr. and Mrs. C. M. Smith, Miss Abby Aldrich, Mr. G. F. Smith, Mrs. H. N. Campbell, Jr., Dr. and Mrs. Henshaw, Mrs. John P. Campbell, Mr. J. M. Addeman, the Misses Addeman, Annette Ham, Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Sack, Miss Edith Richmond, Mr. J. H. De Wolf, Mr. and Mrs. H. W. Cooke, Miss Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. S. O. Metcalf, Mrs. George O. Corliss, Mr. and Mrs. C. T. Dorrance, Mrs. Joseph E. Fletcher, Mrs. Samuel E. Nicholson, Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Smith, Mr. and Mrs. W. B. Vincent and Mr. R. I. Gammell.

Boston was again prominent in the concert line Thursday evening at Mr. William R. Lane's second subscription concert, at which the Temple quartet, Miss Viola Campbell and Master James Barlow, the boy soprano, of Boston, with Mr. Walter J. Towne and Mr. Lane, presented a popular programme of music. Mr. Lane had planned at first to have the two concerts given by Rimenyi, the violinist, but this artist gave his second concert at the Art Club, recently.

The young folk, who were not included in the two large theatre parties to see "The Fatal Card" Thursday evening, in spite of the severe snow storm formed a party to see Prof. Carpenter's experiments in hypnotism, in Music Hall. They were more than repaid for braving the storm for the amusement they had at the expense of the poor hypnotic subjects, and on their return tried experiments on each other while arranging things to eat and concoctions to drink.

The only dance of the week was the first of the two assemblies, held last evening in the Trocadero. Last year it was doubtful for a time whether they would be given or not, as Mr. A. D. Chapin, Jr., and Mr. Lauriston A. Hazard, who have successfully managed them during the past few seasons, decided that it would be their last, as the assemblies of late did not seem to meet any demand, there were so many other dances and balls. Their absence in the management was very much regretted last evening.

Quite unexpectedly the ball commenced at 10 o'clock, although there were not many to dance until an hour later. The Trocadero dances have been so late in beginning this season that it was not expected that the ball would begin until quite late.

The patronesses who welcomed the guests arrived soon after the appointed hour of 9. They were Mrs. William Goddard, who was very handsomely gowned in Brussels net and white lace, with diamond ornaments; Mrs. Howard Sturges in a delicate blue satin, with garnitures of white lace; Mrs. [illegible] in rose pink satin with chiffon draperies; Mrs. [illegible] in yellow moire, striped [illegible] and bodice edged with [illegible] pearls and ornamented [illegible] who assisted Mrs. Le Baron Villard, in white satin, and Mrs. Howard Richmond, in pale green silk.

The ballroom, foyer and vestibule were adorned with palms and rubber plants in the usual niches, but no attempt was made for special decoration, except about the stairs and fireplaces. Although a large number of invitations were sent out the subscriptions were not very numerous, the ball being the smallest assembly yet given, the attendance being little more than 100.

Among those present were Mr. and Mrs. William Goddard, Mr. and Mrs. William G. Roelker, Mr. and Mrs. William W. Dunnell, Mrs. Henry Pearce, Mr. and Mrs. Howard O. Sturges, Mr. and Mrs. Charles D. Orren, Mr. and Mrs. W. C. Huntoon, Mr. James B. Richardson, Mr. and Mrs. P. O. Clark, Mr. and Mrs. Edward S. Clark, Mrs. Henry Du Villard, who chaperoned her nieces, the Misses Tucker, and her sister, Miss Claudia Tucker, Mr. Walter Hidden, Mr. and Mrs. G. Richmond Parsons, Mr. and Mrs. B. F. Vaughn, Mrs. Charles Briggs, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph E. Fletcher, Mr. Charles J. Stedman, Mr. Duncan Hunter, Mr. and Mrs. W. W. White, Mrs. Howard Richmond, Mr. H. C. Richmond, Miss Helen Pearce, Miss Isabel M. Rhodes, Miss Sharpe, Miss Marrian, Mr. Edward Fuller, Mr. and Mrs. Walter A. Peck, Mr. Edward M. Guild, Mr. John H. Congdon, Mr. and Mrs. George H. Wood, Mr. Fred Hayes, Mr. E. Cole, Miss Abby Aldrich, Miss Maud Dorrance, Mr. Edward B. Addick, Mr. and Mrs. Howard Hoppin, Mr. John R. V. Gilliat of Boston, Miss Mary Gilliat, Mr. Lauriston A. Hazard, Miss Hazard, Mr. A. Duncan Chapin, Jr., Miss Chapin, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Harris of Woonsocket, Mrs. Walter B. Comstock, Miss Chapin, Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Burnett and guests, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Douglas, Miss Irene Butler, Mrs. Samuel Nicholson, Mr. and Mrs. W. W. White, Mr. Howard Dews, Mr. E. Metcalf, Mr. and Mrs. Olney Arnold, 2d, Miss Pegram, Mr. and Mrs. J. H. K. Nightingale, Dr. and Mrs. George S. Collins, Miss Elizabeth Ladd, Col. Van Slyck, Dr. and Mrs. Horace Miller, Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Thurber, Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Douglas.

Mrs. Walter B. Comstock was one of the number who wore becoming black silk gowns.

Miss Mauran wore a very effective combination of striped blue and white silk, and carried a large bouquet of pink and white roses.

Mrs. C. C. Burnett was in a handsome gown of white satin, with trimmings of old and costly lace.

Mrs. Samuel W. Douglas wore blue brocaded silk.

Mrs. Samuel W. Nicholson wore a very odd and handsome dress of yellow silk, brocaded with large floral clusters.

Mrs. Joseph E. Fletcher wore an exceedingly becoming gown of black silk with decollete bodice ornamented with violets.

Mrs. Olney Arnold, 2d, wore black silk, with panel insertions of black and white striped silk.

Mrs. Howard Hoppin wore a pale blue satin gown and a corsage garniture of pink roses.

Mrs. Walter A. Peek was in pale yellow satin.

Mrs. George H. Wood wore red silk, heavily jetted with black.

Mrs. Frank Harris of Woonsocket wore a very rich brocaded satin duchesse.

Mrs. Edward Feller, Mrs. George S. Collins, Mrs. H. G. Miller and Mrs. B. F. Vaughn wore black satin.

Miss Sharpe wore pink satin striped with white.

Miss Isabelle M. Rhodes wore a bright yellow silk, brocaded in rose colors.

Miss Irene Butler wore a very dainty gown of blue satin.

Miss Abby Aldrich and Miss Bessie Chapin were also in blue.

Miss Hazard and Miss Mollie Foster shared the honors of the younger set in gowns of black silk.

Miss Maud Dorrance wore a pink silk, striped with white, and carried pink roses.

Miss Bessie Sackett wore a silver gray satin, striped with white, and a corsage bouquet of violets.

Miss Pegram looked extremely well in a gown of plain gray satin.

There were only five of the large number of debutantes present—Miss Helen Pearce, Miss Elizabeth Ladd, Miss Chapin and the Misses Tucker.

Miss Pearce wore a very handsome gown of blue satin; Miss Ladd was in yellow satin, with violets, and the Misses Tucker and Miss Chapin wore white.

Formerly the debutantes were all anxious for these balls, because they did not end until early morning, and then, again, it was their first ball with champagne. But these things have changed, and the ball last night was particularly noticeable for its lack of young men, who throng the Trocadero dance. But then the balls are given principally for the older set.

There was no programme of music arranged, Mr. Reeves playing just what the guests felt like dancing.

Supper was served at midnight in the supper rooms. In place of the small tables large ones were used, seating parties of eight or ten. The menu included escalloped halibut, chicken salad, croquettes, ices, champagne and apollinaris.

The ball was over quite early, as the majority of the guests left after supper. The innovations of the new management, for whom it was a first ball to plan, will be even more surprising at their Valentine ball, Feb. 14.

Next week will be as lively, if not livelier, than the past.

It has always been customary every winter for the Arion Club or some musical talent to furnish some entertainment for the inmates of the Butler Hospital. Mr. Moses Goddard has arranged some theatricals for Monday evening, which will be presented by some of the society amateurs who have won dramatic fame before in charitable performances. Two short plays will be presented. The first is entitled "Decision of the Court," to be presented by Mrs. Howard Hoppin and Mr. J. R. V. Gilliat of Boston. The second—"Who Is Who"—will have five persons in the cast: Miss Lucy Aldrich and Messrs. James B. Richardson, J. R. V. Gilliat, Frank Cranston and Harry Dunnell. Quite a contingent will go out to the hospital to see the performances, and will be entertained afterward at supper by Mr. Goddard.

Tuesday evening, the second dance of the older set will be given at the Art Club. It will be a leap year dance.

Wednesday, the third of the Trocadero dances, for which Mr. Guild has planned some special dances, which he will not disclose until that night, will be given.

Miss Nethersole will have very large audiences here next week. The line for the sale, which opened Thursday morning, formed Wednesday evening, so that by noon the best seats for each performance were sold. It will be interesting to know how Providence will like her impersonation of "Carmen," which recent attendants at her performances state resemble her "Camille" very closely, the most exciting scene occurring at the end of the third act. Miss Nethersole will arrive here from New York Monday afternoon.

The new two-step, composed by Mr. E. W. Corliss, which has been arranged and played by Mr. D. W. Reeves at the Trocadero dances, will be given at the Opera House during Miss Nethersole's engagement.

The next Arion concert will be given in the evening of Feb. 14.

Those who attended the reception given by Mrs. Clarence H. Hayes, Tuesday evening, at her suite in the Empire, were much pleased with its unique floral decorations and the entire reception arrangements for the guests. The usual draperies of the windows were replaced with some made of smilax, opening in the centre and caught like the regular curtains, with loops of yellow. The window sills were beds of yellow chrysanthemums and tall white lilies, the entire effect being of white, gold and green.

Mr. and Mrs. Hayes received under a bower composed of aricas, inserted in white and gold vases, their branches intertwining at the ceiling. The mantels were dressed with ferns and asparagus plumora. The sides of the parlor were edged with baskets of flowers.

Supper was served at small tables in the dining room. In the centre of each table, at which four guests were seated, was a tall cut glass vase, filled with two hand bouquets of American Beauty roses and lilies of the valley. At a given signal, when the supper was ended, the butlers took out the bouquets, dried them, and presented them to the lady guests. This surprise and novelty, which was arranged by Doogue, was a delight to the guests, as was also the serving of the supper.

A pink and green tea was given to the members and congregation of the Central Baptist Church, Tuesday evening, from 8 until 10 o'clock, in the vestry. Mrs. Edwin Calder poured coffee, and Mrs. Howard and Mrs. Spaulding presided at the chocolate table.

President and Mrs. E. Benjamin Andrews gave their annual reception to the members of the senior class of Brown University Tuesday evening at their residence on College street. The young lady candidates for graduation honors were very prominent, meeting for the first time their fellow-classmates in a formal manner. The residence was prettily decorated, and during the two hours of the reception Mr. and Mrs. Andrews were able to extend their hospitality to the entire class of '96.

The Providence Art Club held its annual meeting, ending with a musicale and spread, Wednesday evening. The meeting disclosed the fact that the waiting list was so large that the constitution would have to be amended to extend the limit of membership. The cosey quarters of the clubhouse were also shown to be inadequate, and it was decided to build an addition to the building, the two rooms added to furnish an additional dressing room and accommodation for the sketch class.

The members unanimously showed their appreciation of the devotion and untiring [illegible] which Mr. Earl P. Mason has exhibited by re[illegible] him president. Mr. Edward C. Pratt was re-elected secretary.

The business meeting occupied more time than they expected, so that it was past 9 o'clock before the musical programme began. The numbers were given by Miss Alice L. Pitman and her quartet, which she so well directs, and which includes Misses Grace A. Newell, Ella L. Clarke, Grace E. Baker and Grace C. Irwin. There will be a "ladies' afternoon" Thursday, when Miss Harriete L. Rice will present a paper on "Angelica Kauffman," at 4 o'clock, to be followed by a 5 o'clock tea.

Two Rhode Island women have been honored by the colonial committee of the Atlanta exposition, Mrs. Richard J. Barker of Warren and Miss Mary A. Greene, both receiving silver medals. Miss Greene was chairman of the Rhode Island colonial committee, which consisted of Miss Greene, Miss Charlotte F. Dailey, Mrs. William R. Talbot, Miss Amelia S. Knight, Mrs. Richard J. Barker, Miss Elizabeth B. Dexter and Miss Susie Miner. Mrs. Barker received her medal as chairman of the book plate committee.

Mr. and Mrs. R. J. Barker are spending the winter in Fall River, while their new residence is being built in Tiverton, R. I.

There was a wedding in East Greenwich, Wednesday evening, in which Providence was considerably interested; not largely, however, as the reception was very small, the majority of the invitations being extended to the church only. The assemblage at the edifice was a large one, therefore, as there have not been many weddings since November. The bride was Miss Louise Stanton Knowles, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Samuel M. Knowles. She wedded Mr. Jacob S. Martin of Providence. Mr. D. L. D. Granger of this city was the best man, and the ushers were Messrs. John L. Mauran, A. K. Tillinghast and Morris House of Providence, and Howard Williams of Bristol. The ceremony was performed at 6:30 o'clock, and was followed by a reception from 7 until 9 o'clock, at which a very elaborate supper was served. Mr. and Mrs. Martin will reside in East Greenwich.

The weather was not considered for a moment, even Monday morning, when the hour for the inaugural ceremonies of the new city government approached, as ladies not only occupied all the seats in the balcony reserved for them, but also required special chairs in corners on the floor of the council chamber. Any debutante who is being introduced this season would have jumped with glee and delight to have such an abundance of baskets and floral designs sent them at their "coming out" as the new mayor and government did on their "coming in." The mayor had horseshoes of different sizes for good luck, a chair too small for use on the occasion and lots of baskets. There was a double semi-circle of pink and pink and white carnations on the desks, and cut flowers in abundance. Several men who participate in the prominent social functions were introduced into political life, and their fair friends went to see the initiation.

It would have seemed much more natural if Mr. Louis C. Elson's lecture, Monday, had immediately preceded and analyzed the programme of the Boston Symphony concert for Wednesday evening. It is the first winter in several seasons that the concerts have been given without his or Mr. Apthorp's explanations. Monday he gave the first of a series of lectures upon the "History Song," illustrating then "Seven Centuries of English Song." His audience, however, was not as large as usually greets him, but zero weather explains why it was preferable to remain within doors rather than go out, even if Mr. Elson is always interesting in presenting his musical themes. His second lecture, Thursday afternoon, had a much larger audience. His series will be completed next week with two lectures upon "Shakespeare in Music."

There may be some doubt as to whether Providence is quite up-to-date with the "new woman," but she certainly is not as far as the "new man" is concerned. The change in the apparel of the latter is quite recent, too. One man who guided the direction of his carriage quickly and safely through the whirlwinds of dust last Saturday wore one of those dark veils with which women guard their complexions. It was dust that troubled him, however; not complexion.

The death of Mr. Henry Holden Ormsbee, though not sudden, is mourned by a large circle of friends, who attended the burial service, Monday, in St. Stephen's Church, of which he was a prominent member. The bearers were Messrs. Jeffrey Hazard, Charles H. Hidden, Henry Pearce and W. G. Nightingale. Mr. Ormsbee was well known among the Warwick Neck colony, as his cottage adjoined the old Hazard Hotel, where he had invariably spent his summers since Mrs. Ormsbee's death. They had only two children—John, who wedded Miss Leonard and with whom Mr. Ormsbee resided on Waterman street, and Lewis, who wedded Miss McKinney.

Mr. and Mrs. William Goddard returned from New York Monday, as Mr. and Mrs. C. Oliver Iselin did not sail from New York Wednesday. They may sail next Wednesday, although they do not now expect to sail until the 22d, the time of departure depending altogether upon the report of the cup race investigating committee.

Mrs. Thomas Jenckes went to New York Thursday.

Mrs. Robert H. I. Goddard returned from Washington yesterday. Miss Goddard will not return for some days.

Mr. and Mrs. Edward Pearce have been spending the holiday season at Mrs. Pearce's former home in St. Paul.

Mr. John R. V. Gilliat of Boston has been the guest of Mrs. Howard Hoppin during the week.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 19, 1896.

Mr. Rafael Joseffy had a real stranger's generous welcome last evening, when he appeared on the Music Hall platform as the soloist for the twelfth Symphony concert, and cordial warmth and insistent applause accompanied through his performance in the second pianforte concerto of Brahms. He has been long absent, but he returns with an art matured, strengthened and enriched beyond that virtuosity which made him such a favorite in the days when he used to startle by the speed of his execution and fascinate the ear by a dainty touch for which almost no action was light enough. His aim now appears to be to satisfy and not to astonish, to edify and not to tickle, although he retains and uses the same distinguished clearness and readiness of technique and contrasts vigor with delicacy brilliantly but wisely. The concerto is none too interesting, although the second pair of movements are melodious, fanciful, poetic and developed with reasonable consideration for the listener who wants mere music and the concord of sweet sounds. The opening allegro and the scherzo-like allegro which succeeds it are often hard, harsh, labored and clamorous, and they tire. There is an immense amount of complicated writing which shows ingenuity of notion and command of treatment; but somehow these movements do not seem to reach any real relief of conclusion; they cry aloud and insist in many voices, but they do not seem to say any one thing distinctly and purposefully and to settle upon any resolution. It is a perpetual seeking and proclaiming, but even when a properly formed period is reached nothing has been determined that the discussion can end and the incident be pronounced upon as closed. The andante has gentle and connected thought and the final allegretto has plain themes, openly stated and obviously developed. Mr. Josoffy played like what he is—a man of strong intelligence, positive views and ample art, and the orchestra supported him splendidly, besides thrusting themselves too much into prominence with their applause. If a great genius or a rare artist visits the town, the orchestra might be forgiven for forgetting decorum and applauding; but when a home performer of long acquaintance acquits himself honorably and well, there is no propriety in persistent slapping of fiddle-backs and clapping of hands. Any necessary congratulations can be tendered by Mr. Paur.

A beautiful and appreciative performance of Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony began the concert, after the tranquil loveliness of whose andante the beginning of the Brahm's seemed especially rough and domineering. The "Egmont" overture of Beethoven, also well rendered was the only other number.

The thirteenth concert is set for a fortnight hence and for it are promised a Goldmark symphony, a new suite by Godard, and Rubinstein's "Dimitri Donskor" overture. Madame Melba will sing twice.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 19.

The Symphony Concert.

Last evening the twelfth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall. The programme was:

Unfinished Symphony, B-minor.....Schubert
Concerto No. 2, B-flat minor.....Brahm
Overture, "Egmont".....Beethoven
Soloist, Mr. Rafael Joseffy.

It is a pity that lovers of classic music cannot tolerate a programme that lasts longer than one hour and a half, when one item in the list must necessarily be a symphony, it is a most difficult business to give a varied programme of ninety minutes' duration. Good music will not gracefully submit itself to the measuring tape and shears, and this fact should not be forgotten by those who so eagerly clamor for change. It is true that the preparing of an attractive musical programme is a gift not possessed by many conductors; but, on the other hand, the best programmes are not the shortest, nor are they listened to by an an audience intent on catching an early train or in being present at a social function. If music is listened to by watch measure, it must be arranged by watch measure and want of time must be necessarily accompanied by want of novelty It is a sad and not stimulating truth that a great many people attend the symphony concerts from a sense of duty, and not from a love of musical art. They are more ambitious to be seen than to hear, and evon ninety minutes is too long for this purpose. Curiously enough, the same people who are impatient to be gone from a symphony concert forget the passage of time when listening to the vulgarities, indecencies and cheap art of a Yvette Guilbert; they make a brief, indifferent tourist trip to the heights of Parnassus, and then make themselves comfortably at home in the slums of Paris. A Beethoven symphony should be cut down to make it suit fastidious modern taste, but we cannot get enough of coarse stuff like "Les Vierges" or "La Soularde." Both species of art are heard in Music Hall, and when the fatuous very small art of Yvette Guilbert arouses the greater enthusiasm, it is premature to insist on an increase of time for our symphony concerts. Curiosity is the most exacting and the mos shameless of fashions, and a large amount of our so-called fondness for art has no deeper foundation.

And yet the Schubert symphony was well worth the rehearing, and as for as the Brahm concert was there not Joseffy? This artist has not been heard and his beautiful touch and graceful finger work were most pleasant to hear. But although this admirable artist has gained in seriousness and dignity, he hardly seemed to reach up to the full height of Brahms. There were grace, delicacy and faultless taste; but despite the improvement in this direction, there was a certain sweet effeminace that was foreign to the work in hand. Mr. Joseffy received a royal reception and was called out there several times to bow his thanks.

There will be no symphony concert next week.

[78]

PROVIDENCE SOCIAL GOSSIP.

Society Folk Have a Lively and Satisfactory Week.

Three Dinners "Twelfth Night," and Six Preceded the Assembly, Friday Night—The Latter Was a Brilliant and Enjoyable Affair—The Symphony Concert—Events to Come.

[From Our Special Correspondent.]

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Jan. 11, 1896. The week, despite the vagaries of the weather, has been much more satisfactory and lively, socially speaking, than its predecessor. It emphasized very prominently the fact that the dinner season is on in earnest, and there were appetites for the dining, which the temperature helped to bring about. Then, it also testified that if the young set was not included among the dinner guests, it could have a good time by itself, playing whist, eating Welsh rarebits and arranging impromptu Dutch suppers.

The week opened with three dinners on "twelfth night," and ended last evening with six, which preceded the ball; then there was a Boston Symphony concert and theatre and hypnotic parties, and the ball last evening.

Mrs. James M. Coats, Mrs. W. W. White and Mrs. Lucian Sharpe gave the "twelfth night," entertaining from 10 to 12 guests each, although there was nothing special about the dinners to mark the festival, which was quaintly celebrated a year ago by Mrs. William Goddard with a truly English "twelfth night" party.

Mrs. Henry Pearce gave a pink and green dinner Wednesday evening, covers being laid for 10 guests. Mrs. Frank M. Matthewson gave a lavender dinner Thursday.

Friday the hostesses were Mrs. John H. K. Nightingale, Mrs. H. G. Miller, Mrs. Joseph E. Fletcher, Mrs. C. M. Smith, Mrs. E. D. Williams and Mrs. J. C. Brown.

The first three dinners were given in connection with the ball, so that the dinner guests were among the late arrivals. Mrs. Fletcher presented her lady guests with large corsages of violets, which they afterward wore at the ball.

It was quite interesting Wednesday evening, if one was so fortunate as to be numbered among the early arrivals at the Boston Symphony concert, to watch the effect of the letters published last Sunday in regard to late-comers and bonnetted ladies at concerts.

The interval, which has been longer than usual between the concerts, caused the largest attendance yet of the season. The gathering was certainly a brilliant and enthusiastic one, as when it was over the general expression was that it had proved a very enjoyable concert.

The concerts begin precisely at 8 o'clock, as they must end within two hours to enable the members of the orchestra to catch the 10 o'clock train to Boston. There is not any one in the audience who disappears as quickly as these musicians do, the moment their last note is sounded. Regardless of chairs, instruments, anything or anybody, they scamper away to catch that train.

The reopening of the doors at the end of the first movement of the Brahms symphony saw the arrival of the usual number of late-comers who had not sufficient time to gain their seats before the second movement began. So the letter in reference to late arrivals had no perceptible effect.

Providence audiences are proverbially late because the fact that performances here seldom commence on time has trained them in the formation of the habit. The Symphony concerts being obliged to be punctual, have made the tardiness very noticeable.

In response to the appeal for uncovered heads there were a score or more maidens who doffed their hats and bonnets and kept them in their laps, but there were as many more who wore large hats, with equally large plumes. The contrast was an interesting study during the intermissions, as well as was the general brilliancy of the audience.

Mrs. William Goddard, who returned early in the week from her visit to Mrs. Iselin, made her first appearance at this season's concerts, looking extremely well, and wearing a bodice of white satin and lace and toque of black velvet, with a steel and white aigrette. Near by were quite a number of white, blue and pink silk blouses, with dainty headgear, the entire feminine portion of the audience wearing brighter gowns than usual.

There were only three numbers on the programme, the Branam symphony, the Liszt concerto and the performance for the first time of some delightful ballet music, a suite entitled "Namouna," by Edward Lalo.

During the intermission, while the platform was being made ready for Joseffy, there was considerable interchange of seats for chatting, all very unconscious, meanwhile, that Joseffy was very much exercised over his appearnce here, because by missing the train that he should have taken he failed to have a rehearsal with Mr. Paur and the orchestra. But there were only a few in the audience who were aware of his anxiety, and the concerto was rendered with such a mixture of delicacy and brilliancy that he was recalled again and again by both the orchestra and audience. But, notwithstanding the prolonged plaudits, he would not play again.

Everybody enjoyed the third number, the suite of ballet music, which Mr. Paur directed with characteristic motions, suited to its peculiar rhythm, and which was played by the complete orchestra, with the addition of a Boston lady harpist, who was quite secure from observation behind the 'cellos.

The Bostonians who came down to hear Joseffy managed, by hurrying, to return that evening with him.

Among the orchestra's auditors were Mr. and Mrs. William Goddard, Mr. and Mrs. Howard O. Sturges, Mr. and Mrs. W. W. White, Miss Marguerite Dwight, Mr. Edward M. Guild, Mr. J. O. Ames, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Metcalf, Mr. L. A. Hazard, Miss Hazard, Miss Hattie Hazard, Mrs. L. T. Foster, Miss Foster, Miss Mamie King, Mr. Max Heinrich, Mrs. Gottschalk, Mr. and Mrs. Fred Bart, Mr. and Mrs. Julian Herreshoff, Mrs. A. Budge, Miss Budge, Mr. E. F. Benedict, Mr. Lucian Sharpe, Miss Sharpe, Mr. and Mrs. C. M. Smith, Miss Abby Aldrich, Mr. G. F. Smith, Mrs. H. N. Campbell, Jr., Dr. and Mrs. Henshaw, Mrs. John P. Campbell, Mr. J. M. Addeman, the Misses Addeman, Miss Annette Ham, Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Sack, Miss Edith Richmond, Mr. J. H. De Wolf, Mr. and Mrs. H. W. Cooke, Miss Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. S. O. Metcalf, Mrs. George O. Corliss, Mr. and Mrs. C. T. Dorrance, Mrs. Joseph E. Fletcher, Mrs. Samuel E. Nicholson, Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Smith, Mr. and Mrs. W. B. Vincent and Mr. R. I. Gammell.

Boston was again prominent in the concert line Thursday evening at Mr. William R. Lane's second subscription concert, at which the Temple quartet, Miss Viola Campbell and Master James Barlow, the boy soprano, of Boston, with Mr. Walter J. Towne and Mr. Lane, presented a popular programme of music. Mr. Lane had planned at first to have the two concerts given by Rimenyi, the violinist, but this artist gave his second concert at the Art Club, recently.

The young folk, who were not included in the two large theatre parties to see "The Fatal Card" Thursday evening, in spite of the severe snow storm formed a party to see Prof. Carpenter's experiments in hypnotism, in Music Hall. They were more than repaid for braving the storm for the amusement they had at the expense of the poor hypnotic subjects, and on their return tried experiments on each other while arranging things to eat and concoctions to drink.

The only dance of the week was the first of the two assemblies, held last evening in the Trocadero. Last year it was doubtful for a time whether they would be given or not, as Mr. A. D. Chapin, Jr., and Mr. Lauriston A. Hazard, who have successfully managed them during the past few seasons, decided that it would be their last, as the assemblies of late did not seem to meet any demand, there were so many other dances and balls. Their absence in the management was very much regretted last evening.

Quite unexpectedly the ball commenced at 10 o'clock, although there were not many to dance until an hour later. The Trocadero dances have been so late in beginning this season that it was not expected that the ball would begin until quite late.

The patronesses who welcomed the guests arrived soon after the appointed hour of 9. They were Mrs. William Goddard, who was very handsomely gowned in Brussels net and white lace, with diamond ornaments; Mrs. Howard O. Sturges, in a delicate blue satin, with bodice garnitures of white lace; Mrs. William W. Dunnell, in rose pink satin duchesse, with chiffon draperies; Mrs. Henry Pearce, in yellow moire, striped with black, and bodice edged with a narrow band of sable and ornamented with diamonds.

The other patronesses, who assisted [illegible] evening and made good [illegible] Mrs. William G. Roelker, in [illegible] bodice spangled with the steel [illegible] finished its edge, over a skirt of black velvet; Mrs. H. Du Villard, in blue satin; Mrs. W. W. White, in white satin, and Mrs. Howard Richmond, in pale green silk.

The ballroom, foyer and vestibule were adorned with palms and rubber plants in the usual niches, but no attempt was made for special decoration, except about the stairs and fireplaces. Although a large number of invitations were sent out the subscriptions were not very numerous, the ball being the smallest assembly yet given, the attendance being little more than 100.

Among those present were Mr. and Mrs. William Goddard, Mr. and Mrs. William G. Roelker, Mr. and Mrs. William W. Dunnell, Mrs. Henry Pearce, Mr. and Mrs. Howard O. Sturges, Mr. and Mrs. Charles D. Orren, Mr. and Mrs. W. C. Huntoon, Mr. James B. Richardson, Mr. and Mrs. P. O. Clark, Mr. and Mrs. Edward S. Clark, Mrs. Henry Du Villard, who chaperoned her nieces, the Misses Tucker, and her sister, Miss Claudia Tucker, Mr. Walter Hidden, Mr. and Mrs. G. Richmond Parsons, Mr. and Mrs. B. F. Vaughn, Mrs. Charles Briggs, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph E. Fletcher, Mr. Charles J. Stedman, Mr. Duncan Hunter, Mr. and Mrs. W. W. White, Mrs. Howard Richmond, Mr. H. C. Richmond, Miss Helen Pearce, Miss Isabel M. Rhodes, Miss Sharpe, Miss Marrian, Mr. Edward Fuller, Mr. and Mrs. Walter A. Peck, Mr. Edward M. Guild, Mr. John H. Congdon, Mr. and Mrs. George H. Wood, Mr. Fred Hayes, Mr. E. Cole, Miss Abby Aldrich, Miss Maud Dorrance, Mr. Edward B. Addick, Mr. and Mrs. Howard Hoppin, Mr. John R. V. Gilliat of Boston, Miss Mary Gilliat, Mr. Lauriston A. Hazard, Miss Hazard, Mr. A. Duncan Chapin, Jr., Miss Chapin, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Harris of Woonsocket, Mrs. Walter B. Comstock, Miss Chapin, Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Burnett and guests, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Douglas, Miss Irene Butler, Mrs. Samuel Nicholson, Mr. and Mrs. W. W. White, Mr. Howard Dews, Mr. E. Metcalf, Mr. and Mrs. Olney Arnold, 2d, Miss Pegram, Mr. and Mrs. J. H. K. Nightingale, Dr. and Mrs. George S. Collins, Miss Elizabeth Ladd, Col. Van Slyck, Dr. and Mrs. Horace Miller, Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Thurber, Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Douglas.

Mrs. Walter B. Comstock was one of the number who wore becoming black silk gowns.

Miss Mauran wore a very effective combination of striped blue and white silk, and carried a large bouquet of pink and white roses.

Mrs. C. C. Burnett was in a handsome gown of white satin, with trimmings of old and costly lace.

Mrs. Samuel W. Douglas wore blue brocaded silk.

Mrs. Samuel W. Nicholson wore a very odd and handsome dress of yellow silk, brocaded with large floral clusters.

Mrs. Joseph E. Fletcher wore an exceedingly becoming gown of black silk with decollete bodice ornamented with violets.

Mrs. Olney Arnold, 2d, wore black silk, with panel insertions of black and white striped silk.

Mrs. Howard Hoppin wore a pale blue satin gown and a corsage garniture of pink roses.

Mrs. Walter A. Peek was in pale yellow satin.

Mrs. George H. Wood wore red silk, heavily jetted with black.

Mrs. Frank Harris of Woonsocket wore a very rich brocaded satin duchesse.

Mrs. Edward Feller, Mrs. George S. Collins, Mrs. H. G. Miller and Mrs. B. F. Vaughn wore black satin.

